Little did he dream of how he was going to be fiercely p opposed, and even frustrated.From Julio Gallio Calverina was fully two hundred miles away, and southwest of her. And that would be a long distance for an army to be traveling on foot, and to meet fierce oppositions. And the saddest part of the whole situation was the unloyalty of certain number of Calverinians who had claimed to be Glandelinians born in Calverinia when they were were not such persons at all but plain Angelinians who wickedly opposed the christian cause and were traitors in secret. At the beginning they had appeared to be on the side of the Angelinians and the Abbicarmians, but in secret had leagued with the enemy of God, and were the main reo possibility for the capture of the portresses and the city of Vivian Vickey. General Hanson Vivian though he seldom showed it, felt broken hearted over the whole affair, and several times he had felt like throwing the whole thing down and quit the war and leave the enemy win the war to punish the unloyal Calverinians and the careless governments, When he suspected the outbreak of the rebelion rebellion he had hopes to mobilize immense armies and crush the rebels in a few months but with the seizure of Vivian Vickoy and all her strongest fortifications, and the flooding of Calverinia with great Glandelinian armies, he had found his hopes crushed. He felt worse than a man who loses his wife or child in death. The moment he had recieved the fatal ew news, who sent it he knew not, general Hanson had felt absolutely like giving up the supression of the intercene strife and leave it to the aurthorities of Calverinia to settle with the insurrectiees as they saw fit. And Hanson and his bo brother had left home, and all they had, and had sacrified all their immense fortunes in the effort to break up the wicknd rebellion of the Glandelinians, and this was all the good they got for it. This is the gratitude they recieved.

Snobbed by their own would be friends. General Hanson was also disappointed over the disaster to the disaster to his army at Exter Starring and of the disaster one invading ending of the invasion of Northern Glandelinia. And all the credit he got was only from rescued child slaves. In southern and Northern Angelinia, general Hansons many armies under his generals had grilled the invading Glandelinian hordes to a finish, but to drive his own christian armies through Hal Calverinia, just now seemed incredibly dangerous and even next to impossible. His brother had already met terrible disaster at the battle of Abbicarm, and Erminie Creek, and it seemed most likely that immense Glandelinian armies would rush into his way to either prevent or hurl back his advance on Calverina and Lucillia Jordan. Twice already general Hanson had halted his immense armies and though a foe army eventually confronted him it would not battle him, and every time he halted his advance it would halt and encamp, and every time he would resume his advance the enemy would break camp and continue on its retreat. And this Glandelinian army was under general Isaac Mylette and Gingersnap ,and Ebenum Mc-Whirther. It was mainly under the supreme command of Gen Calmannia Shoemannia, and though it acted so queerly general Hanson nevertheless knew he must look out and be on his guard for this was a Glandelinian army of dangerous cha character and may strike like a rattlesnake when least expected to do so.

General Hanson Vivian Knew the meaning of tgi this . Shoemannia was retreating toard Calverina with the purpose of joining general Manleys army also moving toard Calverina with an army of Hobbenites. But general Shoemannia and his other generals were moving northwest, and Manleyans moving southeastward from the direction of Norma Catherine. Indeed general Hanson was apprehensive over this, and was anxious to engage Shoemannia before Manley could make a junction with him. Hanson felt sure if general Manley and his armies got ahead of him and joined Shoemannia, his christian army would be beaten.

General Hanson felt sa d over this but more sorrowful because of the capture of Vivian Vickey through spies, traitors, and the dosietfulness of the disloyal Calverinians , who claimed to be born Glandelinians. General Hanson felt like a man who had been on the stand for years facing a griling from half a dos n e dozen attorneys. Sad as he was however he was meeting with some good luck during the fourth day of his advance on reaching the Mc-Hollester Rum Region.

without bloodshed he had captured Forts Romeo, Juliet, Shylock, Gumpy Xantor, Lothaire, Gougor, and Mangnums bluff. During his fourth halt in his advance general Hanson had sat alone in his own selected headquarters a in the town of Purdue breeding over the disaster and the unfaithfulness of the wicked Galverinians when he had done so much for before the war. And this was the reply he got.1,000,000 of the Galverinians had turned against him and God. General Manson had said sadly to himself over and over again;|

"I can't even yet believe that there are millions Galverinians would be disel disloyal to their own country and deceitful to me and the Abbisannian government. I think even now if I had gone to yivian with a large army myself and strongly garrisoned the Fortifisations Luck would have come after,and one of the generals who was quow tionde. He asked me if any one of the members of the Galverinian government was going to be punished on account of the disaste r. He said:"Your Excellency, did you ever take a good look into the real cause, the real carelessness of the situation. When you shouldn't question that persons who know nothing about the disaster should be held responsible for it. I guess he was right. And darn this rebellion. I never knew so much misery could come upon me and my whole nation, and every one else. I never even knew so much misery could come into a man sans life. I'd give every penney of my most humane fortune for happiness and the ending of this dastard rebellion. Even the whole world over the fa fall of yivian Wiskey seems to me sad.I caught the eyes of millions of children------there were tears glistening in them------they seemed to say----oh general Manson how could you let the enemy do this------I wonder if the whole of heaven itself, too is unhappy over this affair. If I thought so and was sure of any sin I may have committed that brought this disaster upon me, I would go right now before the Sacred Heart of Jesus and on bended knee ask for forgiveness...."

Poor general Manson. If he could only see the vast Glandelinian army now intrenching for serious business and throwing up strong positions it would not be hard to change his feelings from sorrow to excitement.No matter how much he felt disappointed, general Manson yivian soldier ever flew into a rage. Of course when he did, he was moredangerous than a roaring dragon. He mostly felt miserable, but was not discouraged. He was determined to force his way on to success, and overthrow the child slave rebellion if it cost him his own life. He knew also that his brother was advancing with a larger armyto help him seize the battlements of Galverina and if this could be done, a goodway would be opened for a directi direct advance on v yivian Wiskey.

During the night, the whole night general Manson remained awake thinking over plan after plan and studying his geography, looking at important letters and maps and yet feeling like crying like a baby girl all the time. Then he would say again;|

"I simply can't believe it yet. Maybe some one told wile lies to those Glandelinian Galverinians about the Angelinian nation and me. Maybe it was there spies, or traitors. one of whom had already been captured and were those name was Jack Curless. But it looks to me as if it is treason treason alright, and no one but the Galverinians and the Angelinians knew the strength of the garrison at yivian Vivian Wiskey. But perhaps if I had seen to it that a strong garrison was put there personally this disaster would no not have happened. Maybe I could have brought the rebellion to an end two months ago. Oh poor Sacred Heart Of Jesus. Oh Sacred Heart of Jesus. If I were only sure of itvall. If I was only the age of one of my youngest nelces. If I could turn back time to my child hood days and be a i kid again.

To have fun and have loving children all about me, and not to have to go through this horrible ordeal. I never knew this nation would have to go through all this horrible grilling. If I did break Glandelinian's heart th through my interference with child a lavery it could never be mended with a bloody dirty rebellion. Of course the he art will break, yet breaking live on. the rebellion shall be crushed or I'll die. I feel as if I myself was being sued for breach of promish and having my Sacred Love letters read in a crowded courtoom courtroom. who ever was respon responsible for the capture of yivian Wiskey and the Mc-Whirthian fortifications shall pay dearly. Angelinia shall be avenged.I',,ll carry the war to the very doors of Glandelinia if it takes z a century...."

In his trouble and sorrow general Manson always went for the advice of general Henry Joseph Barger the great Geminian Leader and so in his troubles now he summoned the general before him once more.General Barger suspected that the e very enemy had made a go h goosey @ a gander of general Manson and believed that through his own foal fokness this misfortune had come upon Galverinia and Angolinia. When he came in to see general Manson yivian he was sitting in a big chair with both hands on the sids of his head and he looked dejected and miserable. He regarded his cuper ior and friend with with great caution but at the same time some disgust over his hay babyishness and said;

"Well for heavens sake general Manson is this the way you are carrying on like a cry baby over the capture of yivian Wiskey------f Standup general Manson Be a man. Act like the great soldier you are------stop your foolish mourning. That won't help you any. Halt your advance on Galverina for a while and organize an big an army as you can. Calll the great standing army of Abbisaniniana under general Edward Phillimon to your assistance or the Abyssinhilian army under Marshall Fred Govey. the Angolinians under general Allie, Gabath, or Ben Backrook, or Mintoe, Rosenbaum, you willneed a flock of good armies. Your hope of success and of capturing yu/le Julio Callio depends upon your ability and your prayers to God and the Blessed Virgin. And you will have to hurry as the enemy under Manley who is now advancing will reach Galverina before September the tw n twenty eight and it is already October 7th. When the glandelinians come marching into Galverina, if you whip them you can make them appear like an army of Little Eyas, and your armies will be like millions of Gelion Legrees. But if you don't hurry as I advise, the enemy will win the race, and when they prevent you from taking Galverina into your possession and the main Glandelinian generals start to concentrate their armies and artillery you and your whole army will look like the cheapest thing in a five and ten cent store.

Now, I think in one way the responsibility for the capture of yivian Wiskey really lies with the Galverinian governments. If they had acted promptly when you ordered the Mc-Whirthian fortifications to be strongly garrisoned you might have had the chance to overthrow the rebellion three months ago."

"""""When the enemy first came marching into Julie Callie as I saw them, they were to my idea dressed up in uniforms and other finery fit to kill a king.Many of the Glandelinians were even dressed up like little Eva in Uncle Toms Cabin and later the besieging Angolinians under general Manson made me think Dantes Inferno had broken loose loose with the fire of their big lines of machine guns, smoke of fires, and explosions the roar of thousands of big guns, the yell of combatants, and the fearful scenes of the in once fields of fallen soldiers-as thick as growing grain, and when the enemy leader who lo looked to me like Simon Legree roping his head out of Eadne secured the Lucillia Richson fortifications and the bunch of plans , maps, and important letters, found in the beaten christian generals hea headquarters, which he abandoned in his haste and general Purgatorians officers started to make use of them all indeed seems seemed best.'."

There was a few moments pause, then general Barger again stood in front of general Manson who had his right hand on his jaw and continued;

"IThis nation if it does not recapture yivian Wiskey in a hurry is going to make itself look like a cheap skate. As I said before if the Galverinian governments had acted immediately you might have had a full chance. But all was lost. And now we all see the point. The Galverinian governments to my idea are the ones responsible.'

There was now a few minutes of quiet and being restless Manson got up from his chair and walked slowly about the room, with his two hands behind his back. Then reseating himself in the chair relighting his cigarette and puffing away general-Barger continued;|

'There is one thing about that city of yivian Wiskey and her fortifications, he is going to make the whole war world suffer as long as this war continues and probably long afterwards.When we get through this wild storm successfully we will have a hard time showing any matieual profits, and I would not be surprised you Dear old Saint of Angelinia that we will need Abbicannians ?! full assistance, and again I say I wouldn't be surprised if Abb will do more fighting than your armies can ever do. And if you realized general I know only one general that may be able to capture yivina yiskey. Should you fail to pass through Calverina, or even if failing them and yet invent Evangelinia cranin, call upon that man they called the "Sword of God."I'll bet any amount of money the whole city and all its fortresses will not hold out against him...."

Barger then drew the big chair to the other side of the window, and Hanson still looking dejected took another seat in a another chair. Then Barger said;

"Well the Calverinian governments by foolish delays made a whole mess of the situation and I would advise you to can all and put better men in their places. My witness can say that, and prove that too, and any jury would go out after that, stall grilling and defeat your poor brother received at Abbicann and Ironside Greek. The glandelinian leaders and higher merchantities might as well have sent their generals to the Calverinian governments and ask them if they could not-lean armies, and a couple of hundreds of thrillion dollars. Well as you say the governments admitted they did not understand your orders about the garrison of yivina yiskey at first---but you got their attention anyway, and finally after yivian Yiskey was captured by the enemy-----and it was said the wicked rebels cannot resist Angelinia----but never mind you dear uncle of the dearest little girls on earth---- you will soon get the foe on his knees, I'll take time---but you will get em."

There was another moments pause in which Hanson seated himself by a table as Barger stood by a window and holding his knee with his right hand. They were quiet for a few minutes then general Hanson himself said callmly;

"I guess you are right. some section of the Calverinian governments did go and double cross us. And I have within my very country one million disloyal Calverinians whom I suspect for treason also and I'm going to destroy all their belonging and deport them as soon as I can issue the order. All the are disloyal to us shall keep as property that belongs to Angelinia. Many say I also did wrong in not seeing to it myself that it was promptly done. But I did see to it and failed.I'll make every traitor pay as dearly as possible for it."

General Barger then drew the chair up to the table near Hanson and said;

"If it was not for your armies fighting onward to christmately you would not have gotten close enough to Calverina to place your batteries of cannon, within range of the foe lines. No one is at fault but the Calverinian government and those who try to blame you for the disaster blame Abbicannia for it too and are also traitors who w ought to be burned at the stake"He added piercely."There are a great number of Calverinians who are traitors and not one of those who claim to be are really born Cal glandelinians but feign as glandelinians and are doublecrossing you because they w are enemies of god secret enemies of god, treacherious and as vile as the adder. So the general who found the spies dairy sent it to the Calverinian governments because it had uncomplementary remarks about us Angelinians and the city, and caused us so much misery. Well if that glandelinian dog of a Purgatorian hands that damn traitor of an Angelinian general a flock of dough and a sweet good kiss and a good hug it will patch up that old faked cracked heart of his andAnd did I laugh when he said how much he had learned about the capture of Julio Gallio, and then I took a peek o at you while you were questioning him, and you were crying---- that little cry you had al all by yourself, that's going to cost manley at least thirty or fourty man t million men. And when your assistant general gets through with Manley, he will-be sore because his wing was not there to fight with him.."

Then standing in front of general Hanson he continued;

"Well I think some of the Calverinian governments did make mistakes when they delayed the advance of the armies under those ten o generals. They seemed to be so t soft soks for the glandelinians. That one general who had cross examined with all that string of black hair on top of his head looked to me like an anarchist. Let me tell you Uncle. I'm not saying anything rash but just the same I don't like the looks of any of these ten generals. They looked suspicious to me.. They should be to my idea be relieved from their commands or courtmarshalled. I'm sure these ten generals are not really christian officers of any rank but either disguised spies or traitors. There are many things observed about them that makes me feel sure that they hate our cause, and hate you and your noices. Nothing would suit traitors better than to see Abbicannia and her states crushed and whipped, to see the Angelinian rebels win this war. The spies or traiters are half the battle. What you want general Hanson is to lead your armies are really truthful, faithful and good men who have suffered less on account of the enemy, new their wives or children assassinated by the glandelinians, men that suffered untold woes, and sorrows, on account of the enemy, men for generals that can make the quickest of mobolizations, not do their own will, but your with all their heart, do all the fighting you want them to do, then when they start at the enemy they will hurl the glandelinian armies out of the middle of the country, hurl their armies back and forth all over the Calverinian countries in the most frightful confusion, a knock and kick t he glandelinian hosts all about like footballs, make all the damage they can to the enemy, men who through their losses and sorrow have no regard whatever for the rebels--- that's that you want..""

General Hanson listened to all d general Barger had said, and believed it al all. He had all the time been suspicious of the ten generals for to him they had acted so strangely, when questioned, and had seemed to be in a hurry to get away. A few days after the adven e had begun anew and was well on the way again and then once more halted a certain Angelinian soldier who also knew all about the affair at yivina Yiskey, being a war correspondent, photographher and spy, having seen, and heard all general Hanson was informed of it, and as the man was brought before him the great christian general asked;

"Did any one warn you to be careful of all you did during that terrible time?"

"Yes"Replied the witness.

"Did you tell any other christian general?"

"About what?"

"About anything you have seen?"

"No sir."

"But you admit that you seen and heard all the truth?????"

"Yes sir."

A quiver of excitement thrilled among the crowd of fo officers and generals. Fashionably uniformed generals and officers made up nine tenths of the army audience. Every eye was on the informer as Hansen emotional and apprehensive cleared his throat.

"Private galenio is it a fact that you have witnessed all you are about to tel l me is it not??"""

"Yes"""Answered the soldier.

"""""How many others in your set know of this????"

The soldier hesitated. All the officers were leaning forward attentively. Some of them blushed, others paled.

"Hard to remember?"Asked Hanson.

"Yes"""Agreed the soldier, while some of the officers smile a smk snickered.....

"Was Julio Gallio the first series of yivian yiskey to be captured on that occasion?????"

In the tense silence the answer of the soldier was very audible.!!!!!

"Yes"He answered. General Purgatorians rebels came so quick the christian army there was taken by surprise."

"Did the christian armiesmake the enemy suffer losses indescriminately?!""""

""""Yes ""Answeredthe soldier.

"Were the enemy leaders drunk or sober when they seized the section called Kerma Catherine in the same manner.???"

""They were sober."

"Did you felt suspicious of some great danger approaching????"

"""""Yes sir."

The soldier was then asked about the strength of the foe armies at Julio Gallio and Kerma Catherine which he must-have found out while spying on the enemy at that most critical time. Many of the glandelinian generals were Purgeramians and he admitted this, saying also that other generals were Gamriens and Glamerenmians.

vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

"Those generals" said the spy always met and consulted over plans beginning in the evening and lasting untill midnight. The strength of the foe army there is now nearly ninty nine millioj, and the main commander had been general johnston Jashan Manley who brought the army there with john Manley and Mc-Allister Stanek the latter who is now the main commander. When some of the generals could not attend the important meetings general Purgatorian and his Cronies had a substitute list. or every foe general there was a strong body guard. some times they made plans, and studied maps, or made maps of their own, and and consul communicated let letters, looked through all kinds of Geographies, histories and other books, and mapped all regions of Vivian Wiskey; sometimes they even tore out important maps of Geographires and spent a whole night studying them. Once general Purgatorian rode to the porma bridge to a fashionably old road house where a mysterious council was in progress, o proceeded by cocktails and by consultations, and plots, which he found impossible to discover."

"didn't you make any attempts to go into the house?" Demanded general Hanson.....

"It was impossible" answered the soldier. "there were too m ny watchful guards."

He waved at Hansons insistence other Glandelinian generals who he said attended the meetings, general Sutton, Stanley, Manley Johnston three brothers, and another by the name of Morrill. As each name fell from the soldiers lips an els t electric curr current seemed to galvanize the informer r or listners I mean, for it seemed as if the informer was going over the index of generals. Then general Hanson continued:

"Private Salonie How long have you known the situation of Vivian Wiskey, the Mc-Whirthian fortifications, and the general with his garrison there?"

"About a u year and a half."

"Did any of your best friends ever give you any important warning about the threatening danger to vivian Wiskey before the outbreak of the war?"

"Only oneof them did?."

"Who was it?"

"A man."

"A What?"

"A fugitive Man from Vivian Wiskey who had escaped the Region of Terror at the time it had been going on."

"You don't mean to say a sister spied on the enemy do you?"

"No sir. I said she was a fugitive, but nevertheless gave me the warning while she was there before the war broke."

"Well what was the warning??"

"I was warned to notify the general in command at Vivian Wiskey that the garrison there was too small to resist successfully the capture of Vivian Wiskey, and that he should report to the Calverinian Governments and demand that he be strongly gar garrisoned and supported."

"After that did the general himself give you any valuable information?"

"He did."

"What was the inof information?"

"Oh about the number of the fortresses around Vivian Wiskey, a list of their names, the number of their guns, their positions, their sizes, the number of men each fortress held and the extent of each, and the strength of the fortresses of the Bay King and Longiglomenean Islands. I wrote all this down and brought the information to the government Authorities."

"You never made such an important trip anywhere before did you?"

"no sir."

"And he thought you how to accomplish it with out extravangence to us did he not?"

"Yes sir." Was the answere

At this moment general Hovey came in and said;;;

"Your Excellency this man is wanted for important buisness as soon as possible you can relieve him."

"Tell general Gindernine that I'm questioning the Geminian Spy and will have to retain him a long time...." Answered general Hanson.

"....The general will object your excellency. The delay will be l eading to....."

"Tell your general that I'm detaining him" Answered general Hanson more seriously. Hanson then repeated his question.

"AS I said you never made such an important trip in your life before did you Comrade?" And to save us great loss of time he gave you good information how to accomplish the trip is he not so?"

"He did sosir.."

"And salomo did the aurthir aurthorities of Calverinia recieve a Dairy while you was there on your mission.?"

"They did sir."

"What did the members do with the dairy?"

"They reqrote it and held it with the purpose of sending it to you with the purpose to e examine."

"Why is it I did not recieve it?"

"Some Glandelinian spies seized the messenger and destroyed the book?."

"Why did they destroy it?"

"If it got into your hands it would have frustrated the rebellion immediately."

"Did the aurthorites of the goe government retain the copy they made?"

"Yes sir."

"And do you know what resulted.?"

"Yes sir the capture of Vivi Vivian Wiskey."

"Why did not the coped manuscript be sent to me if the book failed to come?"

"They thought you got the book and the blunder caused Abbicannia and the whole world all the unhappiness that has happened."

"In the Dairy did the writing make any mention of the situation of the Mc-Whirthian Certifications??????"

"It did sir."

"Some very uncomplimentary things?"

"Yes sir it did..It also told of the strength of the garrison. The dairy had been taken from a captured spy."

"You did not expect the disaster to come so quickly at that time?"

"No sir I did not."

"When did you find out the danger was most great?"

"Shortly before the battle of Ester Starring."

"What brought you to this conclusion."???"

"The persistent battles around Julio Callio. The enemy showered the city with heavey shell fire and drove all before them."

"Did you return to the Mc-Whirthian Fortifications at the time?"

"No, but I was willing to."

"Why did you not do so?"

"I was warning in a telegram by general Consentinian Aromburg to keep away for the sake of my wife and children."

"You heard nothing else of the writings in the dairy after you became certain of the capture of the fortresses that was uncomplimentary to the Angelinian cause?"

"I did not, and Oh and I was so apprehensive about the six suspicious actions of these ten generals."

"Private Salome, you say a spy was captured before Vivian Wiskey was seized and his capt d captors found the dairy in his possession?"

"I did."

"Was any one sure the dairy belongee to the spy?"

"They were quite sure."

"That all the entries therein were in his handwriting?"

"I am quite sure."

"Then it wouldn't have been possible that some one else would have secretly stuck this book into his pocket?"

"Hardly possible."

"Private Salome you are a very brave man are n you not?"

"Yes sir, I'll have to admit it sir."

"Isn't it true comrade that you were interested in a spying proposition some months ago which duped a hundred Glandelinian armies out of their life yearned for sue cesse?"

''I must admit it is so sir. How do you know sir?''
''I was informed by many reports and have seen your pictures. What is your age, private Galvez?''
''fifty seven years!''
''You were never married or engaged since your first wife died!''
''No sir.''
''When you heard of the sea seizure of Julio Gallio what did you think it was?''
''The most serious misfortune the whole world ever heard of, and the greatest victory the enemy ever won.''
''What do to you think of the Julio Gallio disaster when you had your first sight of it!''
.!'' ''I don't remember what I thought at the time.''
''What did you think the enemy seized the ikn immense city and its fortresses for their beauty!??!''
''No,they did it n knowing they would obtain means to maintain the rebellion and even win it. And I was foolish enough to go tward Julio Gallio until general Concentinian Aronburgo telegram came to me.''
''Then you are sure he knew it was extremely dangerous!''
''If I felt like going on and did it des ite his warning I wouldn't be here now. I was wanted for my spying exploits and the enemy are even now coming all parts of the country in their possession in the h hope hopes of finding me.''
''The enemy went to some expense preparing extra things to the fortresses after their capture did he not?!?!!''
''Their government offered to pay generals McAllister and Purgaterian all that.''
''When did the government aurthorities of Glandelinia make this tremendous offer!!?''''
''They sent couriers to vivian Wickey on July twenty sixth when instructions to offer each general immense stores of ammunition, provisions, big armies, and fife hundred and fifty million dollars.''
''Did you think five hundred and fifty million dollars would cover all the expenses for those two Glandelinian armies!?!!''
''I do indeed. For at least a year anyway.''
''Would you if you were in my place standing the stand the humiliation of seeing the most important fortresses in the world captured by the enemy, and of being left flat by unloyal Calverinians for one hundred and ten million dollars!''
''No sir I would not stand for it!''
''When you first inlested into the army you had occasion to serve us in spite of the fact you are an American had you not!?!!''
''Yes sir.''
''And you felt sure that every a American in the world could love the Sacred flag of my nation''the Banner of the Five Wounds'' even if it was sticking on a mere pauper!''
''Yes sir''
''The remainder of Hansons quar quest ioning was relentless and merciless. He asked many more questions which tended to discredit the unfaithful Calverinian Aurthorities and while it was ruled out it was believed they had considerable weight with the other christian generals. When Hansons last question was;
''And you are sure these ten generals were really spies in disgus disguise, and aided by some unknown traitor!''
''Yes sir.''
From all the information recieved from this American serving in the Angelinian army, general Hanson felt sure without doubt that he and the whole nation had been double-crossed by these supposed ten generals. He was sorry he did not at the time have them held for investigation. Though it seemed to late he nevertheless ordered by telegraph all towns and commanders to watch for the ten galerns generals and place them under arrest as soon as they were seen. Then he started his armies forward at a faster gate with the purpose of reaching the vicinity of Calverins before general Stanleys army came to mak make a junction with Shoesmannia near Calverinio Hills. Hanson did not know how close to Calverins the other in ense christian army under his brother was, but though communication was cut off from him by the enemy Hanson nevertheless/felt sure general Robert Vivian would reach Calverins at the same time he did. He had no intention as yet to invest Calverins, or assail the fortresses guarding the city. He resolved mainly to defeat Stanley and Shoesmannia Shoesmannia seperately if possible. He wished to crush with Shoesmannia,and expected his brother to have a meeting with Stanley. If this worked and the two glandelinian armies were beaten, Hanson would then lay seige to Calverins, and await the arival of another army. When the combined were to assault the fortresses with such vehemence that it would be impossible for the defenders to hold out and then making the city untenable for the Angelinian rebels drive them out, close in on them and the city at the same time. His army was now about thirty miles from Calverins and this was already the twentieth of August 1918. He learned that Stanley was fourty miles from Calverins and thus Hanson hoped to win the race.How strong general Stanleys army was he did not know, but so anxious was he to reach Calverins first that he did not now make any long halts, but continued the advance at certain parts of the night, stormy weather or not, hat or eagle. Hans Hanson had an army of ninty five million men, ninty five thousand cannons, thirty thousand of which were big siege guns, the rest big field pieces, or machine and other guns. He had also ten million cavarly men. His brother had a force equal to his own, the same number of cannon but twenty million cavarly men. The total strength of the cavarly was therefore thirty million horsemen. The strength of the armies moving on Calverins was one hundred and ninty million men, and one hundred and ninty five thousand cannon. This army therefore certainly had a large supply of tents to shelter all these soldiers. The extended line of advance was about fourty miles and divided into five immense columns. One column was moving for Abbieana, the other for the city of Poverty now two miles east of Calverins, the third for Mc-Allester Town, the fourth for Calverins, and the fifth for the Calverins Hills. These Calverins was surrounded by the lexlargest army ever yet mustered. As another day had passed and Hanson was again again on the advance he recieved a message near a railroad station.

''I wonder if my brothers army has reached Calverins!!!!!''''He said to himself as he proceeded to open the note. ''I stayed the advance and rested my army as long as I could last night. I only kept one army going on the march all night. And general Purger promished to come and see me as soon as I reached Calverins.''

He then proceeded to read the note.

''Sunset Commander Quivering Jelly. The Blessed Mother of God have mercy upon us.What bunch of devils, traitors, rebels, heart breakers, The ruin of a nation. Attack and capture from my brothers army 1,000,000 and a thousand guns, thirty six battleflags, his entire equipment of tents, much ammunition and provisions and killed and wound six million two hundred of his men. Capture one million one hundred thousand soldiers..I'm the baby that is losing all those men, artillery and provisions Stanley will tighten up on me now. All-I'll I got is good day and everything else called Hell when I get to Calverins. Such a disaster. Oh my Good God. My Blessed Mother. And the Saints in Heavon. What next.? What in the world is my brother doing?!?'''

It did appear to general Hanson Vivian that his brothers armyno not a terrible misv misfortune of some kind during his advance toard Calverins, according to the shocking details of the message. Hanson almost felt like flying off into a frenzy. He even now began to feel sure that his own advance on Calverins would be a failure. The Angelinian rebels were too hot upon the movements of his own and his brothers armies and he felt certain he would have to look out for himself, and not allow himself to be surprised in the same way. According to the message no general Robert Vivian had halted his army near Rigmeyten with the purpose of making a short ti stop in his advance. He really was in his advance fifteen miles ahead of his brother general Robert Vivian Hanson Vivian I mean and was already very close to Calverins too close to be comfortable for the enemy. A new enemy force near by under a general called Leonia McAlenin Mcnoll must have known that he was more dangerous than his brother guesses, and their scouts having learned that Hansons army was also too close to be comfortable and not only beginning to win the race on general Stanley but making Shoesmannia and his army hard pressed and in grave danger determined to strike some sort of a blow to cause delay in general Robert Vivians swift advance.

vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until ll the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

This Clandelinian army under general [illegible] all flocks [illegible] marching onwards moving forward from the northeast to [illegible] general [illegible], but had been blocked by the terrvterrent of christian troops under general Robert vivian. very thing for general Robert vivian and his army that evening went very well but it the approachof midnight night two hours before the time set for the advance to be resumed general vivian found by reports that his main left wing at Pyne Pyrenent was set upon by a series of waves of [illegible] making a desperate surprise attack. He had heard before he recieved thevreports reports a tremendous noise in that direction like firing but did not know what was really up untill the disaster happened. The battle raged fully all night long, heavy enemy attacks gradually extending all along the whole of general vivians line, and the first most tremendous battle he had ever fought yet ragee all that day the enemy making succession s of assaults, under heavy artillery fire. During the day when the battle raged at its wildest it did seem several times as if the enemy were really going to win the victory entirely as they had drovenimense bodies of christian troops from the trenches and carried all before them, but the seiers of attacks tward evening fortunately by a heavy concentration of troops, cavarly, and artillery was repulsed with dreadful loss in men and generals but though vanten, and beaten badly, the enemy had secured a million prisoners never nevertheless, a thousand guns, thirty six battle flags and drew off all the equipment of his right wing in ammunition and probi provisions and secured from other parts of the christian line a lot of tents, had disabled many guns, set great fires within the christian lines, vflooded the landscape by bursting the river dam of Mc-Gallester Run and also set fire to thousands of army barracks and made the whole christian army devoid of tents by firing them all making fires of such great fery that nothing and no efforts could put it under control. The enemy loss in that nineteen hour battle was thirteen million in killed and wounded. It was dreaded by the threatening attitude of the enemy armies that another attack would be made later on and preparations were made to me meet it, but outside of a few little squabble squabbles, there was no further trouble. However on account of the disaster general vivians advance was completely delayed, his army being practically crippled despite its immense size and he was unable to advance untill provisions could be secured, and to shelter themselves the soldiers had to erect huts and buildings madd made of branches of trees or logs or sleep under the trees on the ground. The first attack which had the been the surprise assault had lasted about two hours, and in particular the enemy suffered heavy loss in killed and wounded. After the rebels retreated that fatal evening after the last assault had been repulsed, they took defense behind trees, and behind n millions of trees at once and continually spurted the flash of rifle fire untill the fierce counter attack of the christians had cleared the woods of all the rebels. The battle occured mainly near the town of Maria Pyrenette twelve miles from Calverine and southeast of her. The noise of the conflict was heard for twenty miles. The woods in the region was like an inferno during the whole conflict.

However general Hanson vivian himself felt the blow that his brother suffered more heavily and keenly, because by it he began to see his plans would be frustrated, for the enemy was on his guard and can can concentrating to prevent the attack on Calverine. Manley who was still advancing on Calverine was jubulent over the blow the glandelinians under general Ticknell struck general vii vivian. Even, general Calmannia Shoemannia was fairly happy over the affair and when general Icknells army in its own swift retreat before the enraged vivian Army reached Shoemannias army Shoemannia summoned the general before him.

"Well—" began Ticknell when Shoemannia interrupted with "I congratuoate you general Lecnin Meldonin picken Ticknell on your good success of smashing general vivians army as you did even if you had to retreat so swiftly for it. I think you did very e well in paralising his advance and capturing so many christian dogs as prisoners."

"Oh I don't know about that" said general Ticknell modestly. I expected to capture more than one million one hundred thousand prisoners, and after you get yours out of those two vivian pegs I'm afraid I won't be able to get credit from Manley on the Interest."

"I think myself its a mighty liberal capture you made anyway" said general Shoemannia standing slantwise with his back against the table and smoking a cigarette. "nd if general vivian kept awake at night as I keep my army he might have given you a good trouncing and you may not have been able to escape him at all. There is no general on our own side yet who accumulated that many prisoners yet since the war started. Of course if you had not been so fond of delaying—you could have done what you pleased with the old christian dog if you had waged a real desperate and general battle the day after and kept all your plans to yourself. the next time you get a chance to surprise a large christian army and strike a blow you had better break it all to pieces. That small blow you struck general vivians army just cost you the difference between one million one hundred thousand prisoners, and all the dirty christian armies in Calverinia, and general Ticknell Ticknell I'll tell you something else. Don't make any rash movements upon an superior army, untill you are absolutely sure you can make success—at least don't make attacks with the anticipation of rash victories to strike the christian dogs a blow with. And just remember that general vivian is a va wise old owl after all and that if every one of his guards had not been sleepy heads and knew as much as you did that night of the coming attack you wouldn't get a single national as a prisoner. You listen to good Council. the christians are dangerous now now since we are pressing the rebellion, and they cannot be trifled with."

In the meantime general Hanson vivian felt that he would give anything to have a chance to meet his brother and give him good advise. He wondered if he could find some means to locate his brother. If he could he would halt the advance of his army, place it in command of general Charles Brown and go and see him in person. However fortunately for Hanson general Robert vivian his brother knew where his army was through the means of airship scouts, and Ieab leaving his command in personal charge of general Jacob Baldwin whom the enemy dreaded he came himself to see general Hanson vivian and explain the matter to him. He came on the twenty seventh of August 1912 and general Hanson was delighted to see him. General Hanson asked his brother how the disaster happened and he got the information needed.

Poor heartbroken general Hanson had then asked general vivian his brother to come to his headquarters so that his brother could explain everything to him.

As soon as they had entered and general Hanson prepared a chair for his brother general Robert vivian himself asked;

"What's the matter with you Hans. You look terrible. What's wrong?"

"The disaster to your army has upset me." Answered Hanson How did it happen?"

"The night before the conflict I found out through spies who had made some terrible references about me when captured by me my men that a number of the sentries had been asleep on guard duty and this had caused the disaster. Of cou course I repulsed the charges but was licked nevertheless—at least I feel so. I am broken hearted also. I did not sleep at six night since then. I made every preparation for a grand march on Calverine when I had got so near to her, eve even had a portion of the army started on the march when the terrible battle came.

After the disaster and at the last minute I had seen great columns of my men driven far from their works and I had to go everywhere and almost overwork myself in my efforts to rally them. I did not return to my own headquarters long after three days. I haven't had a wink of sleep since or a mouthful of food since either. I am broken hearted."

"Now don't start to cry brother" said Hanson as he saw tears in Roberts Eyes.

"Everything will come out all right—it-'s all for the best." It was not such a terrible disaster anyway and does not hinder the advance altogether. At least I always thought t so. Come over to my lines for a while. My army has nothing to give you but our shelter and love."

As they both went through the building general Robert vivian said again;

"It was through one hundred and fifty six men placed on guard dy duty. Through the r their sleeping on duty they recieved the penalty of ten years in prison and a disv disgraceful discharge from the army afterwards.")—And general vivian then explained in fu ll detail of the foe attacks and its results. Then he finished with saying:

"Well gues I don't feel very bad about it especially the disaster, its the mortifie action it caused, and I have replaced the one million one hundred thousand men I had lost and the number of cannon and provisions also and to morrow I must go back to my fo comrades. I was able to replace that loss in a day fold."

"Why don't you ask for a new army, leave that one intrenched there, and move with the new army to Galverins?" Asked Hamson.

"I wouldn't go through it again for all the armies in the world." Answered Robert Vivian with folded arms, while Hamson seated himself on a table. "The humiliation. The Mortification. The way that little Bicknell Devil and his Angelinian rebels picked me to pieces"—

"Now listen"——interrupted Hamson getting down from the table and standing in from front of his brother who stood beside it both smoking cigars. "If you do as I advise leave the crippled army there under some good general untill it can reform and recover from the staggering shock, and bring forward a new one to junction with it, you'll get a cheap settlement out of nothing. nd let me handle this situation for you from now on. All you have to do is to have two new armies to make a junction with me. If you don't get two armies don't advance or you'll go to supreme disaster. I have learned through scouts that the enemy needs troops so bad, you could make a sweel swell deal with bagging Galverins right now. If you think you can spare another one million one hundred thousand men like you did before don't give them to the Angelinian rebels. Give them to me.. nd give me what I can save out of them. Thats good advise from a brother now and you must heed it for your safty and mine. don't let the enemy surprise you again."

The two great christian generals now took their seats in two chairs facing each other and Hamson holding aloft his cigar continued;

"One time you had pegged or had me pegged for a rob. Maybe I'm not the smartest guy in the world, but I know more about the Angelinian rebels, and their generals than you do——They are the fiercest soldiers to encounter in the world, strong in will, determination, their pugnacious character, wonderf wonderful with their fury of desperation fierce in their hatred of us christians, and incedious——but when they start to make a sucker out of a guy, like they did you they don't miss a thing. They do a good job. hey make the finish on a piano look like the bark of a hickory tree. he enemy are wicked to be sure, but they cannot be trifled with. hey are waging a bloody rebellion, that wicked as its cause is they are bound to win no matter how far they go in their attempts..go we must be careful."

General Robert Angelis ivian believed everything that his brother said. What gave him more hope was the recent victory he won over a smaller Glandelinian army under general Federal at the bloody battle of Sandersberry where many child slaves were rescued and in which so many soldiers fell and so many of the Glandelinian soldiers were taken prisoners. As soon as general Vivian went back to his own command and knowing that there were other christian armies not far away, he ordered th these to follow him and made all preparations to follow his brothers advise. ithin another week everything was completed and general Robert ivian had a more immense army than before and general isknell was compelled to withdraw further away for fear that general Vivian would strike a him a terrible blow also for revenge before he was prepared for it. so swift was general ivians advance now because he wished to make up time on account of his long delay that even Shoesmannia became apprehensive and begged general John Manley by telegraph to increase the speed of his own advance and reach Galverins before the armies under the two ivians ever got there.

The worse thing of alll for general Shoesmannia was that isknells generals apprehensive over the rate of the furious forced march of the two christian armies had withdrawn to a certain distance and he threatened to abandon Galverins to the Angelinians if Manley delayed in coming another day.

On the following night general Robert Vivian was the race on his brother. reached Galverins twelve hours ahead of him and immediately started concentrating his large ar i armies and securing the main Galverinian hills which at his advance the enemy under general isknell had abandoned. On the right of the hills was a long stone wall. While the concentration was going on a portion of general Vivians army made a grand dash and during a furious conflict raging six hours secured one hundred thousand Glandelinians as prisoners, recovered their comrades every one of them and forced - Shoesmannia and Bicknell within the shelter of their own works and held them there. During the highest part of the fray which shows how dangerous the christian are when aroused the Angelinians in a precipitate dash more like a stampeded general Bicknells headquarters surrounded and it was only by a complete mir miracle that he escaped though he lost his horse, his important plans, and all his clothing having been compelled to flee in his night shirt having having nothing else left for him.

This was a grand sight for those who had witnessed it. He was was persued for a mile by Angelinian cavarly, but he rapidly outdistanced his persuers though one of them fired and wounded him slightly in the shoulder. Then on the following morning on the twenty ninth of August made preparations to besiege the enemy just as general Hamsons army began to arive. and to Shoesmannai and isk e Bicknell there was yet no signs of Manley and his army. General Bicknell then held council. He made motion that Shoesmannia should attack the christian besiegers drive them back, break through their lines and escape.

In his argument before his generals he declared there was nothing in the evidence to warrant the slowness of general Manleys advance and that they should break away from the christian besiegers and abandon the city to the Angelinians. Bicknell then approached the su subject to Shoesmannia who without hesitation refused to make the attack saying that in his opinion without Manleys advise an attack would cause excessive losses in men and provisions and also a terrific disaster from which the Glandelinian army could not recover.

"I think it is terrible" Said general Bicknell disgusted over the whole affiar. "A po r general and his army has no chance because it is overwhelmed. A mio o million one hundred thousand prisoners. General Vivian would not miss them all, and I need ammunition and provisions so badly. Now I suppose I'll have to go through all this again and I may not get a thing. I wish I had smashed that darn christian army instead of just cutting a small slice out of it, and yet allow myself to be so mortified to be made to flee that night in only a night shirt, and having been forced to borrow a uniform of a private as mine and all my clothing was captured."

"h Well why din't you" Thundered Shoesmannia. "I advised both you and general Josipine Jemsin to smash general Vivians army or demolish it so it cannot advance. But you were not satisfied with a few hundred thousand prisoners. Thought you'd get all the armies general Vivian had w t without a battle. I told you general Vivian and all the christian soldiers were too dangerous and serious to be trifled with and you would not listen to reason.."

"We'll fight this rebellion to the bitter end." Cried general Josipine Jemsin in a bitter rage and shaking his fist into the air and making an ugly scowl. WE "e'll carry to the war to the highest and most glrious capitol of Angelinia. If that christian dog of a general Robert Vivian and thinks he or his simpleton of a brother can break up our armies and get away with it my name is not Jos ipine Jemsin."

"ow while the foe generals were angry over being so badly outwitted general Manleys armies were arriving from an opp osite direction and concentrated on August 26th but was watched closely by general Hamson Vivian. As soon as he had his own armies concentrated, general Hamson rushed off to see his brother once more, leaving t the main command in the charge of general h harles Brown. It took him five hours ti dind general Robert Vivian...s headquarters, and three hours to reach his lines. General Hamsons wife was also with u him and with them both again was general Harper.

vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

"""""ow you can make the enemy write your own ticket. I'd rather take a chance with one man with brains and judgement who knows the laws of war, and how to manage the armies than with twelve fellows who knew nothing about the management of armies, military laws and know how to outwit a wicked enemy who thinks a christian ought to give up because he is a christian."

There was great joy indeed, joy reigning supreme, and general Hansons wife clapping general Vivian on the shoulder said; joyfully;

"I congratulate you my dear brother in law. You beat general Hansons army by twelve hours despite the delays you received."

"It is simply wonderful.Right is might."Said general Parger. He listened good to general Hansons advise followed it out and profitted good by doing so. So has the enemy tightened in n a net before his brothers army got here."

It certainly was a great reunion and a day after the two Vivians started a genera general seige of Galverine.It lasted from August the twenty eighth till over the month of October IVEe e all knew well the history of Leander Alexander the Great, but general Hansen and his brother made a greater seige, than Alexander did of Tyre and in a more remarkably short time. In Galverine he indeed saw the key to the west city of Vivian Wickey and her immense fortresses. If Galverine and Vivian Wickey were recaptured the rebellion could be overthrown in a short time. Against other enemies in former wars its fortresses and walls had like Tyre itself had withstood the battering of centuries. Galverine and the fortresses of Galerine Mc-pollester guarding the city of Angelinia Agathia ranked second in strength to Vivian Wickey A part of the city of Galverine exactly like Tyre was solidly entrench ed on a wide island and Fwn Fen. half a mile from the shore of the Galverinian seas and was heavily guarded by sixteen fleets of Glandelinian warships, while general Hansen and his brother only had at the time immense land armies. They had at their command vast fleets but these were helping in the blockade and seige of Vivian Wickey. They also had other fleets at large but they were slow in coming. General Vivian and his brother had e im ediately called to gether their army engineers to build piers and pontoon bridges tw ward the water side of Galverine while the armies started to settle down to such a terrific seige as never was on land or sea in Galverinia outside of Vivian Wickey, and kept the besieging artillery batteries in an unceasing bombardment in an effort to demolish the fortresses and silence or ruin the many Glandelinian batteries. The artillery duel was ten times as terrific as the one witnessed during the seige of Jennie wren Town. Under a most incessant bombardment from the besieged city in return and also snipers fire from foe l ines the two Vivians calmly proceeded to build the great piers and pontoons straight across the oceans floor ward that one section of Galverine.

Three weeks of incredible toil br bridged the gulf and all was then being prepared for the struggle dissolition of the city. Hanson determined to hammer his way into Galverine, and yet never thought how desperately the armies under Manley, Shoemannia, and Picknell we were going to fight against him. The city of Galverine was very large being able to embrace three Cities of Chig Chicago easily.

This made the encircling besieging christian armies about one hundred miles in circumference, and they fortunately were in size enough to encir circle the big city and the battlements and the bottled up Glandelinian armies and make a seige almost as extensive as the Pacillis Picksen seige.

However general Robert Vivian had trouble within his lines on account of treasonable persons and spies , desperate spe spies. These traitors and spies.

"These traitors and spies"Said general Vivian bitterly,"are ingrates and renegades.All the good I did for them. All the friendliness I showed them. succored them through perils and all misfortunes, and all the money I paid them---and then turn turn against me, my armies and their country in our hour of need, and betray my strength and my intentions and methods. nd they testified to the aurthorities that I said I wouldn't try to capture Galverine if my refusal to do duty would cause the fall of all the christian empires. When they were captured and tried, the Court - Marshall made them admit they were paid by the spies to say lies about me, and betray my real intentions to the rebels. nd two other traitors who were lieutenants. he Court Marshall showed them up too. He made them admit that the spies paid them the sum of $100,000 in Glandelinian money ti to reveal a certain sub tunnel under my lines where nine gallions could be placed to blow up a portion of mylines. They were all sentenced to hange. I would not allow any of my men to waist was waste bullets on those ta traitors. The spies were captured also, and I'll keep them in their place. I have had that tunnel way destroyed in case the spies had already gave the information to the Angelinian rebel generals."

"Seewhat you get now."Declared Hansons adviser and army teacher to general Robert Vivian."Tell you will learn not to trust persons who pretend to be your friends and cannot keep things to themselves. Pay for a few hundred thousand dirty dollars, h those trai traitors give spies information and tell them everything. They are like some persons if they talk to you about everybody else, they will surely talk to someone else about you. The fastest ways in the world to spread news, and army information and so on, is four;Telograph, Telephone, Raido, and traitors to spies. These are the main things you got to watch out for if you want success."

This advise to general Robert vivian sunk in and after this he never trusted anyone who were absolure strangers. About a half of the month of September was alrea already gone, and the seige of Galverine was tightening more, and more. the wicked Glandelinian army was very strong and were in possession of very extensive works and ramparts. The enemy spies through spies and war corre correspondents knew all of the nt intentions of general Hanson vivian and his brother. o knew why the seige was made and of Hansons hurry tp to press it throu through to a finish. Shoemannia and Picknell however had better hopes as Manleys army having arived when the seige began was the only one which was not besieged. they however at first did not know how to warn general Manley of general Hansons and his brothers intentions, but nevertheless they did succeed in gettingspies through the besieging lines to general Manley.

When he learned of this Manley was very apprehensive, because he realis relai e realised the city of Vivian Wickey was be in danger of being attacked by se e of the most dreaded christian armies ever mobilized..... Manley was therefore determined to frustrate e general Hansons intentions at all costs. Manley was unable to besiege the two christian armies under the two Vivians as their positions could not be in vested on account of their situation, their rear being guarded by high precipitous hills and ravines, but he nevertheless decided to strike a sudden blow and with as much whomomse and force he could muster. As the attempt to mine a tunnel under general Robert Vivians lines w s was discovered too soon, he resolved on something else which would force Shoemannia to fo fight his way through and break the seige. Shoemannia and Picknell had become threatening. Long lines of me artillery was being placed into position, troops were being placed in and behind all the main ramparts and all the symptoms of a violent and bloody battle was beyond impending.....

"Well" Said general Robert Vivian when he came to see his brother once more, standing h in front of him as he sat smoking a cigar and reading an important note"

"It has has been becoming pretty tough for us Angelinians lately. I was indeed surprised to day when the enemy pulled that fake demonstr ation. I noticed their generals came to however when my lines of cannons were going to hurl a storm of shot and shell upon them, and they ordered the demonstration to cease. It would be just like me wetting a rubbing a wet sponge on a calcimined wall."

"But mark my words"Said general Hanson getting up and standing under a picture, confroting his brother with folded arms."The enemy is surely going to attack sooner or later for we have them in a stranglehold. It's my opinion to beat Shoemannia to it."

General Robert Vivian stood with one foot on the chair.

"Yes I think we should."He answered"That demonstration though a real fake was mighty suspicious. At the scene many of my generals came to watch it carefully all smiled, felt the pulsation of millions of tramping feet, walked or rode up to me and smiled at the thought they would have to hold out omdivisions from rushing down to wreck the demonstration."

Hanson still stood like a statue with his arms folded.

"The foe never made a demonstration in my view yet during the whole time."said Hanson seriously."That demonstration you saw is probably a warning

vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

for you to be ext careful and look out that ten don't be attacked unawares like you was once..Along my own lines however I never saw a suspicious movement about us all through thesesige. I did not even see a demonstration, though the enemy are concentrating unusually..I'll admit that the foe will fight us desperately. he glandelinians when they threaten are truthful in their threats alright. you can say what you like about the Angelinian rebels,but they dod not lie."

"Yes they are truthful----"said general ivian seating himself and lighting a now cigar while general Hanson stood near a low mantle shelf with his left hand resting on his chin. hey were truthful when they demonstrated before my lines before the battle of Abbiaann and then struck a blow that almost paralized my army. hat demonstration turned out to be a violent onslaught . nd that was after you were engaged at Ester Starrings. hen glandelinians flattened us out like pancakes under a steamroller, and the rebels called us"Old Wall flowers". I suppose the rebels were telling the truth then, wasn wasn't they? For us losing a battle is just like losing a four pound rainbow trout after you almost have it in the basket--never mind old kid, don't be dejected. If the Good Lord does not give us any victories at this seige, we'll throw out another seige elsewhere just as effective, and we will take Calverine yet."

At this moment general harlestown charles Brown entered and saluting said;;;

"Many friends of the Sacred Heard HeadHeart and his Blessed mother. I just could not resist the temptation of calling on you generals and extending my sympathy."

"C m come in charles."said Hanson shaving him to a chair."we need some one to cheer us up at this time."

"I heard of the bad news this morning at general obert ivians lines" charles continued."I see the glandelinian Rock of Gibralq ator got up a threatening demonstration. I hardly could resist the temptation of wrecking it. hat demonstration means that we are all going to go through a scene of excitement before very much time is past and its no strawberry festival. I'll tell you that. Well Dear Captians of God, I'm sorry for you---this war business is indeed bad.. the wicked glandelinian generals have already concentrated a lot of armies and they already think they are winning the seige,, and that us christian generals are officers with a lot of hot air with holes and wheels in our heads for machinery. It might be true at that . We are full of hot air, but which the enemy will find so strong and so securshing hot they will whiltes when a smart Glandelinian general comes along and thinks he can drive a moving tidal wave of armies through us. If I had let go at that demonstration when I saw it that glandelinian column would not live to see the dawn of another day I can tell you. If Manley or Shoemannia happens to offer you general Hanson a settlement without a battle, just hand him a couple of rattlesnakes and if they refuse to take them threw the reptiles into their faces."

"I'm sorry we did not get here to start the sw siege sooner.."said Hanson.

"Yes and you are a big man general Brown."said general obert ivian."You have never said an unkind word about me or my brother brother all during our war trials, but did a good deal to help us, and was not vicious or mean. ou have loved a lot of friends of mine, and my daughters with a great big honest lo---I should have known it.You have shewgred me with aid, and provisions in my time of need. the only thing the Calverinian governments ever gave me was sympathyn and they are sorry I don't need it all the time."

"Well Charles"said Hanson looking through a whole handful a of notes."I went over to the right of my army early this morning and received all these which are plans and letters letters, captured by one of my Dominian spies from general Shoemannia and ickmell during the time the latter was made to flee in his night shirt. I'm going to have you to make arrangements to meet general Manley Hon Comp at his headquarters and tell him I'm going to prepare to attack general Shoemannias position at Mulmny creek. ny number you can save out of your army, and what you capture from the foe is yours."

"And don't be too severe with the poo r rebels,"Added general obert ivian with a laugh."and pity poor general ickmell.He had to run without anything clothing on except a thin nightshirt.!"

"o"said general harles Brown."I won't be severe-----much.I'll just s show them my fighting manners and say you sent me to make an engagement with them and then get Married to Manley, that my best friends want to know if we are old o o enough and how full of Hot ir we are.I'll say we have one big army on Calverine Hills that we vant to clean our out the city, for new comers, that the city is full of foul germs wearing Gray uno uniforms that brings on a disease ca, called "child slavery, devils and everything. e got to make room for our armies which are too big for the small spaces here, that we have Shoemannias love letters, and clippings from Newspapers, records of his life and that of his army, and the book he has written on" ow to like the christian dogs or how to lick the christian dogs and their armies,--so let me alone the father and uncle of the dearest children on earth. I'll settle this, and when we go through Calverine, and on to ivian ickey, I'll secure myself some beautiful girl and marry myself even to one who was a child slave grown up."

It was now nearing the twenty ninth of septemer septemzber and though the enemy had made quite a number of demonstrations, and though there had been considerable sct artillery duels there was no signs of a general battle coming and this continual inactivity of the enemy made general anson and all his generals suspicip suspicious. General anson even wondered why general John Manley did not start something himself. nd general anson ivian began to feel sure that if he was ever intending to capture the city of Calverine and make his march on ivian ickey, he might as well begin now.

So he decided to force the enemy to fight a battle by attacking Shoemannia. He know that if he attacked Shoemannia, Shoemannia would not be able to watch the movements of of the army under general Charles Brown, and this would give general brown a chance to hurl a most violwnt attack upon the glandelinian army commanded by general Leonia eldonia ickmell. Hanson thus felt sure that this attack would place these two Glandelinian Armies in such peril that general Manley would have to rush his armies to the rescue, and then when general Manley advanced, obert ivian was to swing his army upon the Manley foe and close with him in the final struggle. This of course according to the size of the armies would bring one of the most tremendous battles ever four fought into existance but it could not be helped.

Shoemannia's army was entrenched in front of the Calverine Hillsand Hanson believed that his own trenches there was the strongest part of the christian lines. He told his plans and intentions to all his commanders, and only two of them disagreed, general Mac-Farran and general Harvey osanna. general Mac-garran whose under officer M9c Forren blundered ansons commands during the battle, and caused a disasterous defeat, and who was pardoned that time, declared that the plans were full of folly, and would cause unsecessary losses as the enemy positions were well covered and the christian positions were exposed, and the attackers would have no shelter to protect them when they assaulted the enely as before them lay a large wide plain. General Harvey said if the plans were carried out it would only cause disaster and that it was much better to allow the Angelinian rebels to make the attack instead or force them to do so. He declared that if the rebels were made to attack, the foe losses would soon be so heavy that the christian armies would be able to crush the remainder of the foe armies, capture the city and rout the rebels as far as they could be kept on the run."

But as only two out of a hundred generals and fifty generals disagreed with his plans general Hanson answered;;;

"I have talked the matter over with all of my other generals and all are willing to accept my plans but two. As they all hold to my idea but these two I cannot follow the advise you two gave as I am sure they are in the right. he attack on the enemy as I planned will be made abo absolutely on the last day of this month."

"Well" said general garvey. "I'm too big a man to stand in the way of your ideas and plans. After all your plans ma may be alright and do the world desired splendidly, but it will cost very heavy loss, and I would hate to see so many men fall before the guns of the army of traitors. e of course cannot tell the results untill the show is over."

"All Mac-garran said however wa; was;

"I'm here in the interest of the safty or my own troops and am prepared to offer you good advise, telling yo you that no fifty milluion man could ever lick Shoemannia alone. Now the offer is final. If you are not prepared to accept it, and you do as you plan I'm not to blame s if a disaster occurs."

Of course as the many other christian generals surgued against Mac-garr Mac-Garran general ganson decided to pull his plans through and waited impatiently impatiently for the last day of the month of September. He nevertheless took good pains that his plans and counsil had not been spied upon or discovered, and during the counsil just past he had let in all the generals whom he only knew, and then locked all darr doors and windows, pulled down all the shades, and made sure there were no small places in the room where spies or traitors could hide and overhear the conversation, and then the counsil was had by means of a candle light, and all the fenerals including general ganson vivian and his brother we were black hoods over their heads and were covered with long black regallas. It looked more like the counsil of a Secret society than that of a large number of generals planning for battle. oe for the spie or t spy or traitor that would have been discovered in there during this counsil. gut none could get in, and another thing there were none in the building at the time. In one way general Mac-Garrans advise was right but if one of his main officers had not blundered, ganson would have met good luck anyway. After the blunder had occured general Mac-garran furiously protested to ganson demanding that Mc-garron should be relieved of his command, vut general ganson was lienent this time and did not do this. At helantobburg it happened again however, and Mac-Garran wrote the trouble to the Abbiesannian government and Hanson forwith relieved Mc- Mis-garren of his command.

During the time being however general Hanson had very good luck, with his agents , spies, and Secret Service men. One spy had entered the enemys lines disguised as the Od order of the Free Masons and had secured all that was necessary for the information for the general.

"gall your e c excellency general Hanson Vivian" The deed for you is done at last." said the spy "Your humble servent is here to announce that I a have secured important papers, and plans from the enemy, after being persued for ten miles. I hope I have saved you from the danger of being defeated. Here are the roll of papers, full of the enemy plans general. I Andrew Reed have secured them all for you."

All the time the spy spoke general anson stood with folded arms with a pleased smile on his face and when the spy finished he said;

"You sure have proved yourself to be a good Secret Service man, and indeed you deserve a commission" he added as he took the roll of papers.

"ere is something else" said the spy---Look. Take a peep out the window and see what else I got---se if you recognize the door for a monogram. I escaped the enemys lines in that motar car. It belonged to his Gracious Shoemannia. hoemannia had a perfect ring of plans on his table in his headquarters. I also got all that ring. I got back with everything despite the fact that the rebel persuers fired five hundred shots at me. I am a smart guy and here are general Shoemannias letters telling or to manley and the governments of Clandelinda old dear. hese important messages;---Now take a little tip your excellency---you and your brother have learned your lessons, and don't forget.-If you want to make the rebellion as short as possible let the enemy of our Poor Lord know the weis friend and the captian of the Good Lord can fight. He who retreats without necessity ,impales himself on his own hook."

"Well" said general ganson to himself when the spy had left after eating a snap or supper with the grw great general. "I'm willing to admit I'm a smart man after all but Darger and his spies are the smarest. ne hundred and fifty million soldiers for tgree months of my time in gathering forces. Not so bad. of seige with an immense army of my size and not get tired either. and that's not all. An army of cannons thrown in with an inexhaustiable amount of ammunition and the first chance on a capture of a good fortified city, and then a march on vivian Wiskey."

There was nl d no doubt at that. he first two biggest christian armies that the two vivian brothers ever led against the enemy, was intrenched before Calverine and the way everything looked, general ganson and even his bot brother felt positively sure that they would be successful, and have the way openyo march on vivian wiskey. As they well know, should vivian Wiskey fall, the ghild lawe rebellion would be easily overthrown and the cruel war would then be over, before it grew more violent. go many incidents had already happened that surprised and startled all the other nations, and they were now looking on with keen interest, wondering where the great dram would end. great drama would end.

Abbiesannia felt that the outcome was up to general anson vivian, for all depended upon him. ven Hanson and his brother had great hopes of victory under under all conditions and even prayed confidently and devoutly for it, and so did his whole at army and all his generals. General ganson was not however presumptious for he knew the enemy were secure in their own positions and his final plans to the continual advise of general Mac-garran were to secure a , long line of works not yet inpossession of the enemy, and from here start a general concentration that would compel general Shoemannia to attack or be smashed out of his main trenches, and allow general ickwells army to be infiladed, and either annihilated or captured. If this would all right, all would be well. f not then look out. disaster would come. Hanson however decided upon utmost cautious

The frightf l and most ire irrestibe flood which swept over four hundred miles of Calverinian country in the south, destroying seventy eight villiage and scores of cities, and killing and drowning hundreds of thousands of people and wiping out a christian army tens of millions strong, clearra clearing the country for a thousandmiles of christian armies and giving the foe fullsway to utmost victory and possession of alltowns and villiages not touched by the flood and which descended upon the beautiful and prosperous city of Henrietta on October ninetteth I9I2 causing the loss of three hundred thousand extra in lives and the destruction of scores of mil ions of dollars worth of property and then ravaged also nort northern Angelinia State and elsw elsewhere killing several millions of people and animals and more christian soldiers and inflicting damage which cost more money to repair than I dare to write here for fear the reader willthink Im trying to rob heaven has had no parellel in any rea real history of the war or world yet.

The flood disaster was caused as the reports said by enemy engineers blow ing big gaps in the levees or dikes of the mighty vic-Hollester Run River right atflood time. The explosions madd by unaccountable amounts of high powerdered explosives hurled smole clouds and debris and water er uptions to all but mountian heights and the waters poured through the gaps with the most treamendous fury and then it was combining their forces water, and even big fires pounced upon their prey.

In the space of three days and nights the entire country for nearly four to five hundred miles was covered with angry flood waters, while the current of the flood at its worse rushed at the velocity or speed of nearly one hundred miles an hour, buisness houses in all the cities and towns, public buildings, hurches, residences, and allcother structures countless numbers of them gave way before the pressure of the irrestible flood or floating like so many boats and all the biggest housesthat did not crumble altogether or float away on the raging flood were so in u injured in the majority of cases that they had to be torn down or burned.

Such days and nights of unspeakable horror as the millions of unfortunate inhabatants were compass compelled to pass had never fallen to the lot of any people since the records of history were ever opened. Sixty horrors far outrivaling even that of Ga lveston and other places occured and lasted fully a week and three days. At the early stage of the floods when the water first began to invade the streets of the citi s and towns the people thinking nothing of it and believing it only a slight rising of str streams and rivers fled in fear from their homes and first sought the highest points in their homes and cities as places of refuge ta i not having timeto take anything with them not even the smaller articles in their houses with them. he floods increased more and more and to a terrible degree, houses went before it like the corn does before the tornado and then when darkness set in the flood as though possessed of a fierce fiendish vindictiveness hastened its speed and horror over the country side and poured over the surface of the highest points of the towns and cities, completely submerging it, covering the most elevated portions to a depth of fifteen feet, and the lower portions to t from thir y thirty to sixty and a hundred may n more than a hundred, many of the towns being completely buried under water as were those of the disasterous flood at Hol and when four hundred thousand lives were wiped cut.

The force ofthe dreadful flood was terribly maglignant if not more fiend ish and cruel and tore countless thousands of great buildings and the most beautiful homes to pieces as if with evident delight, scattering seas of flo t floating debris far and wide, countless thousands may m illions of telephone and telegraph poles, and hundreds of miles of wire lines were thrown down and carried away, miles upon miles ofrailroad tracks and bridges were torn up and swept away, and so many box cars and other railway conches, and every otherocar and even vandalls were floating that they they seemed as thick as fishes, and the mighty tangled masses of wire bricks, sections of roofs, roofs, sidewalks, fences and other things hurled onward and swirled all in all directions by the edd es of the flood rendered it impssible for even rescuerers to save those who were marooned on floating house tops, rafts and other things, and even all this wreckage made it impossible for any one to make his way along for days and days after the dreadful flood subsided.

In all the towns and cities th s mentions fourty million people all men women and children corr corwered in terror for more than a week an of days and nights the intense blackness of these awful nights, the horrible scenes of the day, the awful roar of the sea of water, the swishing and lapping of the waves, the demoniac howling and shrieking of the wind during stormy days increasing the horror and the indescribable and most awful crashing tearing and rending as the houses thousands at a time were shatter ed and wrecked ever sounding in their ears.Too often too the friendly shelters, countless numbers of them where whole frightened families had sought refuge would be swept away, plunging thousands and thousands of helpless ones into the mad current of the flood sea which flowed like mad rivers through every street of these d cities and towns and countless fathers and motherswere compelled to undergo the agony of seeing their children drown with no possibility of rescue, armies of husbands lost their wives, and wives their husbands, and the flood elements were only merciful when they destro e destroyed an entire family at once.

All during those fearful ten or eleven days the entire p opulation of that section of the flooded calver Calverinian country stood face to face with grim death in its most horrible and merciless shapes, they could not hope for anything more than the vengeance of the dreadful flood and as they realized that with every passing moment of each day sculds by the hundreds of by the thousands, and scores of thousands were being hurled into eternity it is it at allwonderful that after the ten days strain was over and the flood had subsided and all danger was o gone, reason for many of the survivors would soon be unseated and men and women and even child ren break into the unmeaningly gaiety or the raving fury, and other sym ptons of the insane .!...

All of the immense Helendale County and other provinces were swept and not one inhabatant of any of the cities and towns swept by the sea flod flood old enough to realize the situation had any other idea than that de death was to be the fate of all before another day appeared , when when this most long and weery suspense to which was added the chill of the awful stormy nights, and the growing pangs of hunger and the ever rising of the floods was at last broken finally by the raced ing of the flood the last day of the dreadful unindation was not at all welcome for the face of the sun was hidden by angry and morose storm clouds which dripped at frequent intervals cold and gusty October showers at times mingled with hail and then heavy wet snow.

puring the full fury of the flood throughout Helendale County and other provinces too many thousands to be related here were swallowed p up at day time and during the awful nights and their countless bodies either mangled and mutiliated by the swftitly floating and crashin g wreckage which had been tossed everywhere left to decompose in the slimy ooze deposited by the flood or forced to follow the waters in their sullen retirement to the waters of the river again or to the lakes and sea in general.....

Unusual dejection and despondancy succeedec the fright of those awful times; the full number of all business men and women of all the ruined cities and towns had suffered such total losses that they were overcome by apathy, all the homes not swept away by the torrent were in total ruins, the streets of all towns were impassable, and the dead not swept entirely away lay as thick as christian soldiers had in falling in big battles just past, all telegraph and telepo telephone wires were down for all the extent of the flood, every farming and rural district were wiped out and as countless miles of railroad trac r track had disappeared and all bridges over rivers and streams carried away there was absolutely no means of communication with any part of the outer world, except by river boat, and that was exceedingly slow.Of the beautiful city of Henry it was a strange spectacle to see such a beaut f beautoful beautiful city so close to Angelinia Agathis one of the richest cities and most beautiful of its size in theworld now lying prostrate with all its people homeless ten thousand dead, and fourty wthousand injured and all the city lying hopless helpless, a prey surprisingly to glande linian ghouls, vultures, harpies, thives, and outlaws of every size, and sort, houses burning in windrows, its people starving, and the putrid bodies of its dead breading pestilence..such disasters as these, and such dreadful floods which move with the velocity of that which swept through Henrietta city destroying scores of millions worth of property and many lives and which are to be common throughout the wat war in all parts of the country invariably orit originated because of the enemy blowing great gaps in the levees or dikes of the monsterous rivers running through the war torn districts, according to the testimony of the scout ing parties and other pa parties and also to general Hendro Dargar of the Abbieanadian Gemini Spe spy Bureau at Angelinia Agathia.In this particular instance theplace where the enemy placed the mines which tore asunder the dikes of the great mighty Mic-Hollester Run was south of Angolinia Agathia about two hundred and fifty miles, and north of Angeline junction city which was slightly touched by the same flood.The wi width of the Mic-Hollester nun River at this point when swelled by more waters than usual as at this time, varied in breadth from ten to seventeen miles; and at dry seas seasons is between five miles and eight and the deepest point is about from one hundred to one hundred and fifty six feet deep.From its full length it is always navagiable and though not the widest of all rivers known in this story is the longest and deepest and is said to carry more water to the seas than any river ever existing.The disasterious flood which swept Helendale County and other points and committed so much havoc at Henrietta City I should say originated at a considerable distance south of Angolinia Agathia, in this region where it is so deep and wide, and when it was at its worst flood waters, and was caused by enemy engineers blowing thirty dikes to fragments letting loose a sea of water all over the land''was the declaration of general Dargar the first night following the cas catastrophe.

The full fury of the flood was caused by thirty big currents or torrents meeting at some point below the river shores and this caused the wide spreading of the flood which finally spent its full force upon the whole country side.It is seldom that such floods originating from pure accidents or natural consequences extends so far in upon the land as did this one but it is never however without being predicted.The reason this flood covered so much ground and reached so far as Henrietta and even Ang Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale was that the river was at its highest flood time and the waters were rushing twice as fast as it usually does.

Usually the extent of these floods are spread over the country for only a hundred miles or so and sometimes they had reached as far as Calverino. When they had ever become this severe it was because of too much rain all over the country.The fullfi force of this disasterous flood which the enemy was responsible for missed the cities of Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale and consequently was deflected further to the east and west and south. Big bloody battles were prevailing in manyplaces in all the districts just east west and north of the flood.The conditions of the lands were such in these locations that when the disasterous floods reached that far the cities and towns had no possible means of any escape whatever and hence the awful results.

If there had been even the slightest chance for the flood to have been checked as far as possible it would in all probability w have not extended so far and the country side which have recieved nothing more than such a good wetting up.In this event the worst effects would have in all probability have been felt where the flood first began.It was an absolut absolute impossibility altogether for any one of the unfortunate survivors or even sight seers and the like to form an idea of the extent and awful magnitude of the disaster even a week after its occurance.The morning of the first day when the floods had completely resided or receded the stree streets of Henrietta city itself were found clogged with debris of all sorts.The unforunatel people of this city could not realize what had happened for days after the disaster.Fourhundred thousand beautiful homes had been entirely demolished, and hardly a building in a l parts of the city was fit for habitation.All of the people were sad and apathetic and wandered around the still flooded streets in an aimless way, seem ing to be unable to do anything whatever, or to make the slightest pre parations to do what could be done to restore the great damage done.In Henrietta City alone so great was the horror that ten Ganveston disasters see ed to have occured here in one.And even to make things worst than ever the very morning following the great horror the city of Henrietta was completely in the hands of thieves, thugs, ghouls and vampa vampires and Glandelinian bandits and spies, many of them women, who robbed the scores of thousands of dead, tore and cut up the corpses which were lying every where, ransacked all the business houses and residences and created a terrible reign of terror, and on account of glandelinian armies being in possession of all these parts of the country no officers and christian soldiers could come as yet to the aid of the unfortunates and the fierce

Glandelinian soldiery refused absolutely to do anything for the unfortunates but only delighted in their misery and privations.General ..ivian ordered out from the Canton Cantonments of Angelinia Agathia all the regiments of the Angelinia Agathia Nati nal National guard and various associations of huisness e men also tried to supple soldiers to assist to do duty in the city and sr suburbs but the Glandelinian troops and cavarly patrolling around prevented the arival of these and took possession of all ruined towns and villages themselver and confistigated all private property and created a reign of terror of their own.And the awful depred ations of the lawless element among the fie fierce Glandelinian soldiery now in possession of the flood ruins were of an inconcievably and most brutal character.Countless numbers of unprotected women whether found upon the streets i or in their home were subjected to terrible outrage and assault, and robbed of their clothing and jewelry.Ra Convents and Catholic homes and ho hospitals were raided and the n uns and Brothers disgracefully treated and the priests of various churches ledout into the streets, lined up and executed by firing squads. All the pedestrians were either held up on the streets and high ways or placed under arrest and compelled to give up all valuables in their possession.The bodies of the dead were despoiled of everything and in their haste to secure the valuables the Glandelinian soldiers would mangled the corpses in every possi w way possible cutting off fingers to obtain the rings thereon and cutting ofv the ears of women to get the ear rings thereon.Children were even brutally treated.The majority of these fierce Glandelinians belonged to the Ouarian Sects and were reinforced by Zimmermannians and Scoodlers and Mic-Hollestinians from other points who took advantage of the rs results of the flood.Their outrages became to flagrant and the people of the city became so terrified in consequence of their awful depredations that many of them when the opportunity fl presented itself fled out of the region seeking shelter among friendly christian camps and making a p appeals for help.Everything was attempted to send strong bodies of christian soldiers down there to put down the lawlessness of these Glandelinian soldiers but there seemed to be no avail.

There had been some delay in getting a number of the main christian armies into the regon region because so many miles of railroads and the like had been w washed away, the christian generals being in charge being forced to notify many corps of troops by courier, but general ..ivian had ordered the men f rw r forward to the devastated regions at once with instructions to prompt y drive out all these Glandelinian soldiers found in the region and to seize all possible and promptly shoot them and to give no quarter.Most of the Glandelinian soldiers were Mic-Hollest inians, some of them however being Whi nasies and Crowleywogs the latter being more savage and merciless in their treatment of the dead as the most abandoned of the other kind of Glandelinian soldiery.

The first army of troops com came upon a portion of the devastated regions two days after the flood and before the next morning had fought it out with a full division of Glandelinian soldiery and had shot many of them but drove them out of the villiages.On the next evening the National guard arived and with com mendable promptness drove the Glandelinians before them but suffered some heavy loss.many Glandelinian soldiers were captured but though they begged piteously for mercy yet if their pockets were filled with kewlelry and other things they were shot without trial the soldiers adminsestering the coup de grace.No attention was paid to the feelings of these Glandelinian ghouls and soldiers and they all suffered the same stern fate as the es rest.

When more christian troops arived in the city of Henrietta they also drove these Glandelinians before them and took the same severe mea sures and the result was that after within thirty six hours of fighting in different points of the flooded area the cities and towns thus recapt red were as safe from the foe as they ever had been.The soldiers even arrested every suspicious character and therefore the tents of the christian camps were soon filleacto overflowing.These prisoners were deported as soon as possible and notified that if they returned they would be shot without the slight st warning.Even the temper of the surviving citizens of the cities and towns were such that they would not stand for any more trouble of this kind and even every able bodied man in the towns and the city wasimpressed for all kinds of duties, and were also placed in the relief and burial parti s parties, and all those who refused to do the work required were either de ported or shot.By the third morning after the flood all the men required had been obtained and therefore all the relief and burial parties were filled to the quota deemed necessary, and the work of disposing of all the bodies of the dead when found, administering to the wants of the wounded and sick and the clearing of the streets of the debris and muck was now proceeding very satisfact orily.In every city and town ruined by the flood the dead lay in the streets and vacant places as thick as fallen soldiers in battle or massacres, and the unusual warmpth of the october sun began quickly to have its natural effect, for decomposition set in everywhere and the stench was becoming most unbearable.At first an effort was made to identify all the corpses but it was soon found in all cases that the work therefore could not be proceeded with as any such delay imperiled the living for there was great fears entertained in regard to a dreaded pestilence, and already the survivors of the flood were being taken ill by hundreds. So great was the loss of lives by the flood that it was absolutely very difficult to obtain enough men to perform the duty of burying the bloated corpses of the victims of the catastrophe and consequently the soldiers had to volunteer to do it themselves, the dead had to be loaded on river barges taken out to the deepest portion of the river, weighted and then thrown o into the water.The ground also had become so fearfully water soaked that it was ab o absolutely impossible to dig graves or trenches for the reception of so many w bodies although in many instances the very surviving people themselves buried relatives and friends and other dead ones in their own yards and the ground surrounding their ruined resi dences.Along the river shores itself tents of thousands of corpses of men women and children and even animals no of all kinds were buried in the sand, but the majority of the burials was in the water.within the third day of the flood nearly I22,546 bodies had been cast into the waters, while about five thousand had been interred within the limits of the cities and surviving towns.The greatest precautions were taken however to makr Many of the graves and therefore when the ground had dried sufficiently the bodies were twken out and brought to various cemeteries that were not touched by the flood where after burial anew suitable memorials were erected to makr their last resting place.No more attempts were made of identifications after the third day lists being only made of the number of victims. he many graves of all those buried in the sandy shore of the river were marked by headboards with all kinds of inscriptions, telling who the person was, the age and son on.

So accustomed did the many burial parties and soldiers become to the handling of all these deadthat they began to treat the bodies as though they were merely corcasses of animals and not bodies of human biebeings and they were dumped into the graves of trenches prepared for them without ceremony of any kind..he graves and trenches were then filled up as hurriedly as possible the sand gravel and earth then being packed down tight and hard.This might have seemed very inhuman, and very unfeeling and even brutal, but the awful exigencies of the situation demanded that the many corpses be put out of the way as quickly as possible.

From the scarcety of the numbers of survivors there was the greatest difficulty being experienced in securing the sufficient number of men to transport bodies to the river wharves where the bo barges and boats lay and therefore it seemed completely an impossibility to get any one to touch the bodies of the many p or child victims decomposition havi having set in eariler than in the case of the grown persons, and had it not been that more and more members of the army volunteered their services the remaineds of the thousands of children would have remained unburied for a longer time than they were. inally however patience ceased to be a virtue and orders was given to various christian commanders in charge of interment camps to send as many Glandelinian prisoners as possible and thesewhen ariving under guard were placed at the work and the guards under orders to shoct any rebel prisoner who refused to do his duty under the circumstances.

''The Glandelinians caused the flood and great loss of life, so they can stand it to handle the bodies of the decomposed dead.''was the word.

Indeed the result of this was that the beginning of the fourth day there was less de c delc delay in the matter of disposing of so many bodies of the dead..owever inspite of all the axtivities of the burial parties the work of clearing the streets of the corpses and the fields and country side was a most tedo tedious one.

The ..recast official of the Abbieanian Geminian war spy Bureau at Angelinia Agathia made the following report October 25th on the immense flood;;

''The Local Office of the War S y Spy pureau recieved the first of all messages and reports in regard to this disasterous flood at 5.P.M. westward andwas central off or over the Angelinia and Calverinia state or provincial boundary line the morninf of the 21th when flood warnings were ordered up for Angelinia Agathis and Dorothy Gale cities themselves.
The morning of the 22th the fury of the flood hadincreased in energy and was still now moving northeastward and at 10:10 a.M. the flood warnings were givi given to Henrietta Chamberlane and also Rosa Topay, Glorianna and MicHollester and Lucillie Jicksen City, which former however foru fortunately were not reached.But at this time Henrietta city was in grave danger.The Telephones at the Abbiesonian Soy gue Bureau were busy untill the poles and wires went down, many in the city could not get the use of telepo hne or telegraph on account of the line being busy.Pe p People came to all information offices in immense droves inquiring about the extent and devastating fury of the flood and what had caused it.About the same time the same informationwas given to all b alike;

''the flood is now spreading over three hundred and sixty miles of countr country, south west of us, and are increa ing in energy.Those who live in the lowest part of city move to higher grounds for the worst is yet to come.''

These were the only consoling words of all officials at Henrietta City from morning untill night for six successiv e d y days when the flood reaching its worst no further information could be given out.The local officials and one observer stayed at the office throughout the entire flood although the lower portions of the big building was flooded up to the second floor and the building parcially wrecked.Another official and several observers were out taking the observations of the flood about 4.P.M October Twenty fourth.Another observer and his assistant left a after he had sent the last telegram which could ever had been gotten off it being filed at Angelinia Agathia over the teleh telephone wires at the same hour of that d y and date, and at the time when the majority of the people of that city in the lower streets were literally going out boating fro one side of the streets to the other.Over half of the big city of Henrietta was covered with flood waters even by 3.P.M. Anot Another another of the observers left h for his home at about four thirty after he had done all he could as alltelephone wires and poles were then goin down before the force of the currents.The entire city was then covered with water from one to ten feet deep and the current ra running at ten to twenty miles an hour at the deepest.On his way home he saw immense crowds of terrified people and therefore he was obliged to inform all he could that the flood was only increasing in extent, that hundreds of miles of country was completelyunder water that the worst was yet to come, and there fore all the people who could not hear his voice on account of the distance he motioned them to go for safty sake in the higher stories of the bigger buildings..The tide at about six 6.P.M. stood from six to thirty feet deep throughout the whole city of Henrietta wit y with the current moving zal ost the speed of an ocean wave and the force of the flood was then carrying ofv off thousands of smal e smaller houses which had stood the force of the flood up to that time.All observers believed from the records they had managed to keep that the flood moved or extended up as far or a little beyond Angelinia Agathia City but did not effect that place to any extent to cause any considerable damage.The warnings of all various signal stations and the like was the means of many thousands of lives being saved through the extent of the inundation throughout that that part of the country.The flood was so severe however and so unusually extensive that it was impossible to prepa prepare for such an amount of awful destructi n and such great loss of lives.
however later after the floods had receded however the flood signal corps to relieve apprehension stated two days after that the flood waters had receded completely, that the levees had letout most of the water, and these being hastily repaired by christian soldiery after the enemy being driven fro the region there was no indication of any other such flood following.and the condition of the river had already returned to about the normal.

The countless numbers of surviving people of Henrietta City did not slee for four or five days and nights, and for many hundreds of weary hours they had stood face to face with the fury of the flood and death in many forms and knew that tents of thousands ou of those in the city itself had yeilded up their very li e lives and that many scores of millions of dollars worth of property had been lost or destroyed.
There was not a single building of any kind o in Henri Henrietta which had not been entirely destroyed or damaged to a great extent, and the peo ple of the flooded and ruined city lived in the val e valley of the shadow of death helpless, and hopeless, deprived of all hope, and ambition, merely waiting for the appearance of the official death roll.

Indescribable confusion and chaos reigned everywhere, death and desolation were on all sides, wreck and ruin were the only visible things that the eye might restupon, and with all business completely suspended and no other occup ation than the grewsome search for and the burial of the many of dead e men women and children it was indeed very strange that all the thoroughfares and resident streets were not filled with thousands of insane victims of the floods frightful visit.
For d y days and days and long awful nights the people of Henrietta had known thanthere was danger of theflood reaching the city, they had been warned repeatedly of its approach and its havoc throughoutthe country, but they had laughed at all fe ars, did not believe any flood could reach that far from that region, business went on as usual, and therefore when the awful blow came it found the beautiful city unprepared, and even without safeguards which could have been hastily erected and protected the city from the engroachments of the flood waters.
Owing to the stupefaction following the awful catastrophw the people of the city were in no condition whatever either physicial or mental to provide for themselves, and therefore were forced to depend upon the outer world for food and clothing.The inhabatants of Henrietta city needed immediate relief but how they were ever to recieve it was a profound mystery, for Henriettn stillsurrounded by floud waters was not yet in touch with any portion of theoutside world by rail or river.The city though c not completely wiped out like many of t the others in the flood was nevertheless ten times more sorely stricken than Galveston had been by her hurricane and was forced to appeal to the count ry at large to send food clothing and even fresh w ater.The main water works were in ruins and the cisterns all carried away so that the lack ofpure water was one of the mo most serious e of all the troubles.
Never did a flood work more cruel results. All the eletric lights n and telegraph and tep telephone wires and poles were prostrated throughout the city and the streets were littered with debris of all kinds timbers slate, glass and every conceib conceivable character of debris not from the cits citys own buildings f but from the wreckage brought down to her from other places by the force of the flood.Yet there was hardly a habatable house in the entire city and nearly every business house was entirely wrecked or ruined on their lower stories by the flood waters.
On the following d y days it was reported that there were deaths from hunger and exposure and disease and the list was swelling ost rapidly.
And the surviving people were living as best as they could, in the ruins of their homes, in school houses, in railway stations, tents and out houses, and in churches, and even in the streets by the side of their beloved dead.
Indeed so great wasthe desolation and the awful effectsof the flood,, tha that no one unless he witnessed it could ever in his life imagine a more sorrowful and yet angry place.Street cars were not running, were not able to run, no trains of anyof the biggest or smallest line could reach the city, only armies of sad eyed men and frightened faced women walked about on the water soakedstreets, the ee dead and wounded molopolized the attention of all those capable of doing anything whatever and to make things worst thecity was in the hands of Glandelinian vandals and ruffians.
All of thebiggest and finest churches w re in ruins.From Aldon to Caldwell Street thence to the outskirts of the city and to the very outside country itself, not a vestige of a single residence or any other house, or even trees, railroad tracks and other things were to be seen.
In the main business section of the city the water was still from three to ten feet deep in the stores, and stocks of all kinds including food stuffs and evrr everything imaginable were total losses.It was a most common specactle, that of the unfortunate inhabatants of this beautiful but now ill fated city wandering around in a forlorn and ford forsaken way seem ing to be indefferent to everything going around them and paying no attent ion whatever to the inquiries of friends and relatives.....
Let us hope that if it is His will that God will forbid or prevent any such real calamity to ever occur really in our own land espeic especially fromthe effects of such a dreadful and inhuman as well as probably the most wicked of all wars ever known or heard of.It was and could have been and was believed in someportions that the awful vengeance of the Fates had ben gee been visited in its most appalling shapes upon the whole country and the big cities and towns which had unwittingly incurred its wrath.

very fortunate after all howrver however that all the people throughout the land and in all thevbig cities swept by the flood and all those that had been compelled for nearly a week and three days com pelled to endure such trials were temporiarly deprived of their understanding, and were so stunned that they could not appreciate the ernor mity of the punishment inflicted upon bthem by the ruthless enemy.
The first terrible loss of life from the effects of the flood happened at the main Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad Station where nearly a whole crowd of peopleLost their lives and many others were main maimed and imprisoned. any had been sitting at the tables in the lunch room of the x station making light of the danger when the roof suddenly caved in and came down with a crash killing them, and the flood waters burst into the place drowning many.Those in the lower and also in the upper parts of the railroad station escaped with their lives in a most miracculious manner.
as the falling roof and flooring caught on a big long resturant bar enabling the people standing near it and elsewhere to crawl under the debris or to get up to higher spots out of reach of the flood waters.Yet after the flood it required several days work of very hard and diffe difficult work to get them out, and by that time they were almost half starved.
A Janitor of the l nch room of the station who had been sent for a doctor to attend to the injured was drowned not far from the station his body being found every short time afterward.Fully more than 1,700 peoplen ne men women and hildren were also congregated at another railr railroad station and most of them though not killed were injured in various ways, l slight or x seriously.One of the rescuers and some of the soldiers reported the loss of two hundred and fifty or more lives in the flooded building from whdh he escaped.And yet they were injured in various ways.Passing along Norman Street out as far as Meldon
A venue climbing over the piles of lumbe and other wreckage which had once been buildings of every kind and also residences, many bodies of men women and children were observed in the yards and in the wreckage and fourty were observed in one yard and seventy in one room of anc her building while as many as six hundred corpses were seen lying singly and in groups in the space of one ot or two blocks. majority of the drowned however were under the wreckage of thw ruined houses. The body bodies of a woman and her four children were found near their own hme corner of Aberdeener and South Morgannia Streets the mothers lips smiling but her features set in death, grasping her children ty tighly.
The remains of her husband was never found and neither were those of her other two children.
Also the report from St Maries Hospital showed that only eight persons escaped from that large Childrens Infimary out of sixteen hundred of the little Patients. The number of nurses were said to be one hundred and only ten of these escaped. he great big St Vincent's Schoolhouse chosen as a place of refuge by the people of that locality collpased before the force of the flood.Few of them who had taken refuge thereescaped alive, how many cannot be told, and probably never will be known.
Never before had the sun risen upon such a sight, a sight because of the fault of the ruthlessness of the wicked enemy and as thugh unable to endure it the sun soon veiled his face behind dull and leaden Fall clouds and refused to shine. surely without the slightest doubt it was enough to draw tears from the most inanimate things.
At the Evangeline St Claire Railroad Depot one of the baggagement pickedup the lifeless form of some beautiful baby girl of four years of age ase and within a few feet of the station. The station building had been also selected as a place of refugee by thousands of people even at the beggining of the flood and although all of the windows and a portion of the southwall of the lower sections of the buildings had been crushed in by the pressure of the flood waters and the occupants expected every moment to be their last as escape was utterly impossible for about the building the water was fully twenty feet deep or more.In this vicinity a swarm of small shanties and houses of all sorts were floating about but there was no means of making a raft or even getting a boat and the current was running at the rate of ten to thirty miles an hour.
Every available building in the city after the flood was used as a hospital for the countless numbers of injured.As for the awful army of dead they were being gotout of the way anywhere, and anyhow.In one large store on Allgrove Street all the space that had been cleared of wreckage and filth wasnow being occupied by the injured men women and children.
Indeed it was nothing strange to see so many dead and cripplee everywhere throughout the city and the living were so fascinated by the dead that or insane men what ever they may be had been active since the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they

they couldhardly be dragged away from the spots where the corpses were piled in windrows.There were dead bodies by the hundreds, by the th u thousands, and by the scores of thousands.It was indeed a vast city of dead, a vast battlefield, the slain being the victim of ne one of the biggest floods the country had ever suffered from yet since its existance began.However as we all could saythe dead were atrest, but the living and wounded had to suffer, for no aid was at hand, as the flood had devastated so much country and wiped out scores of railroadlines and severed all communications whatever from land and sea and river.In the business portions of this bif big city the very damage could not even be estimated in the most exaggerated manner. he many hundreds of big wholesale houses along the down s down town streets still had about seven to thirteen feet of water on their ground floors and basem basements and all the window panes and glasprotecters of all kinds on the lower floors, were demolished. On St Anns Street the water had been almost as deep as out on the open country.....All provisions in the hundreds of wholesale geoceries, and goods on the lower floors, were terribly saturated and rendered valueless.In clearing away the ruins of thirteen orphan asylums and other homes for children heart rending eve evidence of the heroism and love of the siserw sisters and also the attendants t was discovered. All the bodies of hundreds nay thousands of the little ones were found and by their position it was known that the most desperate and heroic measures were taken to either keep them together, or that all might be saved from the inundation.The sisters and attendants and other persons in charge of theseplaces had tied the little children together in bunches of eight ,ten and twenties, and then tied the cords around their own waists.In this way they had probably hopee to save all of the children and to lead them to safty.The horrible flood struck the buildings with such force that the structures.fell to pieces before the pressure of the current, carrying their countless inmates with it, and either burying them under tons of debris, or drowning them in the muddy water.Two large crowds of children to tied and attac attatched to sisters had been found piled on top of the sisters, and the arms of one little girl werre clasped around a sisters neck.In the wreck of these orphan asylums over ninty hundred a children and four hundred sisters and attendantswere killed.It had been at first believed that they had been completely washed out of the city into the main river by the flood, but the discovery of the groups in the ruins of these buildings indicated that allwere killed, drowned, and and buried under the wreckage.

The first two or three days after the the disasterous flood were days of the greatest suffering although the surviving population had hardly sufficiently recovered from the shock of the mighty flood calamity to realize that they were al all hungry and cold, and that winter was soon coming on to add to their misery.

On the first day after the flood all the hundreds of relief trains sent from from other cities to the flooded provinces were forced to turn back, the tracks being washed away, or the reports that enemy forces were lying in wait to wredk these trains.On the second day the after the flood the Mayo the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia who had heard of the flood esend armies to of troops to the aid of the stricken towns and an a lso sent out the following appeal to the whole nation;;;;;;;;;;;;/

I ''It is my full opinion based on all personal information that could have been recieved that nearly nine hundred thousand men women and children and five hundred thousand christian soldiers in various portions of the flood had lost their lives from wreckage or drowning. Approximately thirty of the towns swept by the flood had been entirely swept away and the rest badly damaged or completely obliterated and placed under water altogether.There are said to be millions of people thou throu h throughout the country who are homeless and de t destitute how many there is not yet any means to find out.Arrangements must be immediately made to have all the women and children sent to other big cities and towns for refuge but as the means of transportation are limited, and all tracks are washed away this for the present seems impossible.Thousands that could have reached here at Angelinia Agathia and are being cared for here, and have told the most grewsome stories of the flood.We appeal to the whole nation for immediate aid.

MAYOR OF ANGELINIA AGATHIA.
ANDREW HENDRO.''.''

Some little relief thatcould be brought through had been sent in, the railroad to Abr Aberdon city sixteen miles having been repaired while many boats hastily sent by rail also had taken the supplies from that point to as far as Henriette City. Food andclothing for the unfortunates were the things said to be most needed just now.While many of the very men the selves couldget along with the clothing they had on, and whatthey had secured since the great flood subsided, the women and also the unfortunate little children suffered severely and sadly, and there was much sickness a ong then in consequence.It was also noticeable however that the women of the city had by their example been instrumental in reviving the drooping spirits of thd the men.There was also a better feeling prevalent among the inhabatants two days after the flood as news had been recieved that within two days the acuts distress and horror would be over except in the matter of shelter, and clothing.

Every one of the houses that were still standing were very damp and also extremely cold and unhealthy, and most of the inju injured were not getting along as well as had been hped hoped.Th usands nay scores of thousands of the injured whether you believe it or not had already been set out of the city by boat and raft to Big girl Knpol city, Jessica, Angelinia Agathia, Glorinianna, Lucillie Jickson, and other big and near by places, but hundreds of thousands of the for lorn people still remained. or many of the hun dre hundreds of wounded it was feared it would endanger their very lives to move them.On thecsecondnight four hundred sneaking disguised Glandelinian ghouls and spies were said to have been shot down in their tracks by christian soldiers and also citizen guards.One of them was searched and jewerly and other valuables and important papers and money together with fourteen diamond rings, and two water soaked gold watches was found in his possession.The fingers of even little children with rings on them were found in the pockets of some of the others.

Starting as soon as the water begai to recede large relief parties began the rapid work of rescueing theawful numbers of wounded and dying and to clear the streets of the great array of dead, and also the wreckage as far as possible and to remove the woundedand the dying from their ruined homes.Indeed the scenes that were presen ted in the flood devastated city were almost beyond description.Hulitudes of screa ing women, all bruised bleeding and some of them mangled, hundreds of them bearing the lifeless forms of little children in their arms,, men broken hearted, and sobbing, and revengeful and fury stricken, bewailing the loss of their wife and children and vowing vengeance on the wicked Glandelinians,, streets filled with mas masses of floating debri debris and wreckage of every description, among which there were bodies of the victims of the flood by the thousands all constituted part of the awful poiture.Indeed in every direction as far as any one could really see or look and view the scene of awful desolation and destruction continued.It was cer certainly more than enoughto cause the stous stoutest of all hearts to quail and grow sick and frightened and yet the searchers and rescue workers and other parties well knew they could not even it if they tried their best unveil one third part of the misery and horror the destructive elements the of the flood which had been so rapidly brought about.

Everyone alsoknew that the fullimport and heaviest pq portions of the blow could not be realized for weeks, and weeks, and even months to come. Although all those in the relief and other parties were prepared to see the evidences of the raging flood and the effects following upon the heels of the mightyu inundations of the awful flood, they did not and co l could not think o of anticipating such frilg frightful scenes. ITtwas an awful butchery, a massacre without precedent, an immense gathering of victims that was so ghastly and horrible as to be beyondthe power of any man, women or child to even concieve.As party after party of rescuers and w r war correspondents and news paper men and so on went on, the members met others who made reports of things that had also come under their notice. There were five hundree and fifty killed or drowned in one section of the bi town, fifteen hundred in another,, and fifteen thousand in another.Indeed the list was growing larger and larger, and still larger with every report, and though investigations had been made to see wi whether these reports were exaggerated or not, those who investigated found the reports much below the actual numbers.....It was indeec indeed a great matter of wonder wonder, and increasing wonder too, that a single soulvof the whole country that had been swept by the flood escaped to tell the tale.Throughout the whole city of Henritta itself no one no matter who they were, men, women or children seemed entirely sane, for there was awful madness in the very ai air itself.All were seen to be moving in an atmosphere of glom, sorrow, apathy, revenge and grim horror, it was difficult to move and breathe wi with so much death on every side, and yet who could keep his eyes of those horrible and fascinating corpses, when they fairly riveted the very gaze.And to make matters more strange and shockinglife and death were often so closely mingled and intermingled that they could not be told apart.Indeed it was said to be the most awful a apotheosis of the frightful results of the worst flood ever known yet.Those who h d had escaped the awful flood were searching frantically for missing ones, and valuable proper property, and doing this yet in such a listless way as to irrestibly convey the idea that did that they did not care whether they found them or not.It was the awful langour of hopelessness, despair, and loss of faitheven.Many of those who had lost theircall, were even merry, but indeed it was nothing else but the glee of insanity.One old woman came up to one of the searchers, and with a leery face wi which had some thing terrible in it said to him with a horrible sno smile;

"See Mr I'm a Vandal.I rob the dead bodies of men, women and children and even those of heaven too.I'm a vandal.Shoot me please."

She of cour se was taken care of in a hospital for the insane a littel little later.She died in her ravings.She had lost ho e home, husband, children, and all, even her most cherished possessions.Even her reason. Ascanother sad andforlorn morning dawned the streets had had been parcially cleared of wreckage were lined with people, men women and children, all h hal half clad, and crippled in every concievable manner, hobbling as best as they could to where they could and hoped to recieve the attention of physicians for themselves, and to summon aid and provisions for friends reliatlves and the like who were too injured to move.One young man who had been a policeman was found in a most pitiable condition the toes on his feet having been crushed by weighty wreckage, his ribs were caved in and his head badly injured and other wounds, but his own condition though fatal he declared to his rescuers was nothing.His home wife and children and all hepossessed were go gone in the flood and he declared he did not care if he died because he had nothing for which to live for anyhow. All the biggest houses of all the citizens which had escaped destruction gad been turned into hospitals as were also the leading hotels, railroad stations, buisness houses, factories, schools, and others.Inddeo we can imagine the horror of it all when it can be said there was not a single house left standing which did not contain any dead as well as many injured and full ofuhalf crazy people, peopleerno makethings worstthe coldrain mixed with heavy wet snow began to pour down in torrents and the party of rescuers had to return.The misery of allthe poor people, all mangled and hurt, pressing to every good point of the ruined city for aid and medical attentionwas greatly augmented by thisstorm.Further down the street a large lunchroom which had during the height of the flood been submergdd by the water were people serving out soggy crackers and bread and cheese to the hungry crowds, and this was all that was left.The flod food was soaked full of water and mud and indeed the people who were fortunate to get these sandwitches were hungry and made no complaint. Indeed it was hard to determine what section of the city where the suffering of the people and damage to pe property had been the greatest.Information from the western and souther portions of th the city was not as yet obtained and it was negrly impossible, not nearly, but completely impossible under any conditions for even the slightest reports recieved indicated that those sections had suffered even a wo worst ate than the rest of the city. Thus the relief parties wended their way through the streets which but a few hours before were teeming with life.Now they were the thoroughfares of death, and destruction.And to make matters worst there were statements coming from outside points that the enemy were winning the war and had won it already, that general vivian had surrendered his armies to the enem , enemy, Emperor vivian was captured, Angelinia Agathia was in the possession of the enemy, and Dorothy Gale and other important points also, the foe were in possession of all the territory and that even the whole govern ment had turned over everything to the Glandelinian aurthorities and that all the helpless were cut off from all aid and w were in dan er danger of general massacre.All the ,war was really lost, and that the wickedest of enemies, enemies of heaven and humanity and of God end others had won gloriously and most f gallently causing the mightiest of all christian generals to surr surrender to very inferior forces.All these news which many reports seem to even be fully confirming made it seem as if the peop e people of the ruined city would never resound to the throb of quickl quicke quickened vitallity again.It was seeming as if it would take a million years to even remove the wreckage.As to rebuilding it a ppeared t as the work of eternity. nnihilation and horror was everywhere.Aid was cut off from the outside world and no trains could come to the region. One small party of rescuers stopped at a small g grocery store and found itpacked with injured. he provisions in this store also a had been ruined and there was nothing for any one who came hungry forlorn and tired. Even the place was both a madhouse and a hospital, no longer a store.

As was predicted the flood which was caused by t e the enemy and which had devastated Henrietta and other important cities and towns had a o most peculiar course.It's first devastating effects was first difin defin tely noticed south by east of vivianie city and the next day the center of the flood was approximately spreading over a hundred and fifty miles of country, a d and increasing in volume and violence. As it increased it spread further and from Hendro junction made ac u course almost due northwest flooding, Jennie turner,, almost devastating Flanders City, Anrandecallio, and Madge Evans n and a score of other large cities and many villiages besides, and if it had continued to spr ad in this direction it wouldch v would have reached Henrietta Henrietta city and Angelinia Agathia just the same, but it would have come somewhat earlier than it did, and if so the city of Angelinia Agathi Angelinia Agathia would have been more devastated by it than any other town or city, and Henrietta only ha parcially destroyed.The flood was apparently spreadin g tward Henrietta and Angelinia Agathia all the time but on the fourth day when almost due wouth of Chamberlaine it changed its course somewhat so as to go almost due northeast, across the low plains of chamberlaine making it a perfect deep sea, and the roaring waters poured through Glorianna and Beppo Lansin, and through the toe of Lucillie icksen City andcup to Rosa and Topsy but however did not cov it much dame of any amount here to be important.If it had not been for the depth of the plain and its q width it is probable that Angelinia Agathia and Lucillie Ricksen Gith City would have been the he hardest hit.However they were not touched much.Here one portion of the flood made another sharp turn to the northwestward and headed againx straight for Angelinis Agathia and Henrietta the for worst of it for the latter.One great christian army encam o encampmened n near Rosa and Topsy amounting to almost five hundred thou a thou a thousand men and officers, and including an interment of prisoners and the like were surprised by the flood and every man met death as they were so suddenly overwhelmed that no one could escape.One million tents were swept away and the barracks floated on the water like so many ruined house boats. he current tore the great cannons from the leveled fortif ications and swept them away as if they were mere pieces of wood. Thousands of baggage wagons were swept along with the current, and property of every conceivable q matter was destroyed.It was this sharp turn to the northwestward which could not be anticipated and therefore the army of soldiers in their camps had been utterly sup surprised by the flood which came upon the camp like a tidal wave from the sea. The people and soldiers of this immense camp had abundant warning of the coming and spreading, and as well as the increasing of the awful flood but of course could not anticipate the destructive energy it would gain as it continued to spread.Signal corps who had saw seen the evident menance of the flood had sent signalled warnings to the commanders of this vast army as well as signals for other christian armies said to be in peril or in the path of the flood but to one it had no avail and thus the dire results.

The main aurthorities at Dorothy Gale City, and also Angelinia Agathis were cont constantly informed that the first sign of the flood after the enemy had bursted the levees of the Mic-Hollester Run was noticed on the early morning of October I9yh I9I2. near the city of viviania. .On the afternoon of the same day the flood was still in the same neigh borhood but had increased in extent and energy. owever the flood did not develope any devastating features during its slow increase over that portions of the land but it was being slowly increased hour by hour by the tremendous volumes of water pouring from the broken apertures of the shattered levees and dikes. During the first three hours of the flood, the lower streets of Vivianie city were covered with three feet of water and basements of the buildings were flooded to a dept depth of tent ten feet.Two hours later the highest streets were being covered, people were forced tothe higher stories of the buildings, and the lower streets were covered with ten to fifteen feet of ro roaring water. There was some damage being done to many buildinhs at that time.This city however was the first one affected by the flood, and strange to say was not really badly affected at allthough during the whole five or eight days the waters remained of considerab e ce depth andthe people were marooned day and night in the upper stories facing almost complete starvation.By the morning of the second day after the flood started the edge of the far reaching and rapidly spreadin flood was a short dis distance northwest of Jessicia city, and the highest water marks had been reached over the southern regions west of Angelinia Agathia, fourty or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

eight feet in the east being reported from Mombi Junctio , an and fourty feet near Dorothy Gale City. ring this time inthe extreme southwestthe conditions of the land with hills and rises so far prevented the spreading or the flood tward Angeline Junction, andcit therefore continued to spread northwestward over the region as far north as Angelinia Agathia.

Tward thecevening of the same day the flood was apparently the deepest south of Henrietta City.The disasterious flood which swept out so many villiages and cities was indeed predicted with the most startling accurancy by spies and war correspondents and also by the Gemini.In one of the reports the forcast for even the following month of October was as follows;

''This will be a very bad month for the war over all portions of the big Province of Calverinia, and over northern Angelinia Province, but plenty of battles and disasters along the west, and in the south and south east.First and second days of October will be the time of great fires and frightful calamities.Third and fourth heavy batt e battles in the extreme western parts of Calverinia es pecially around Vivinn Wickey, causing many battles over norther n Angelinia and in southern Calverini Calverinia and big fires willrage in all parts of the counrty and there will be many enemy victories.

On October I9th a great flood will be formed by the enemy somewhere in southern or eastern Calverinia and this flood will extend over great stretches of country caus causing very heavy loss in lives and dame damage from Angelinia to Calverinia.''

Since the great flood occured Angelinia Agathia and also Dorothy Gale cities were the great rendezvouss for supplies and clothing sent as far as possible into the flooded territiroes, and when they could arive they poured in only however by the wagon load beginning a week after the flood.Much as possible was sent but they only could be brought by wagons as no trains could run as all tracks had been swept away.The response howeve however to the appeal for aid by the surviving people of the stricken country o on the part of The Abbieannia n Country and in fact every other country in the world was more prom ptand generous than was expected. And that urgent relief was necessary was a made apparent from the appearance of so many refugees who began to flock into Angelinia Agathia and also Dorothy Gale as soon as the boats began to run to the stricken regions by the river after the catastrophe.In addition to these scores of thousands of strangers arived also as best as they ould and for a time the aurthirot aurthorities of these cities wereat a serious loss of what to do with them.Indeed many of these visitors were from points as far distant as Pandor a and Mic Hollester Cities Abbieannia state, w all who had relatives and friends in the flood stricken distri ts districts and had come to learn the worst or the best regarding them, and others came with the purpose to vu volunteer their services in the relief work or join the army but the greatest number consisted of either news paper men from all parts of the country or others who came to see for themselves the extent of the disaster and to cause it to be broadcast over the entire world.All these were almost frantic in their efforts to get to the stricken city of Henrietta or other points.However they were not curious seekers, they did not come for curiousity, but only to see the worst, for they wished to have something on the enemy so that if possible they could hope to reduce the chance of''Quarter for the Glandelinians''.

In addition there were thousands of the sufferers themselves who had been brought out of their misery to be cared for at the two big twin cities. The question of caring for these immense cro d crowds came up at a general Mass Meeting of the Angelinia Agathia general Relief Committee held when they began to arive.Every incoming train from the northwest brought thousands of more people, every wagon and boat from the south brought more refugees and wounded, and immediate action was necessary. It was finally decided to pitch tents by the thousands in all parks of the cities and in these hastily erected camps as many people as possible were being cared for.The biggest hotel t hotels in the cities could not accomodate one fifth of them, and neither could rooming houses and other places.

First attention naturally was given to the survivors of the flood and the visitors helped in this work as generiously as any others.Mayor Turner of Angelinia Agathia sent word to Mr Marcy Mayor Hendro of Dorothy Gale that all refugr refugeesxand all people no matter how rich or poor they were, ill or well should be sent to Angelinia Agathia from the flooded districts as soon as possible.There they would be well provided for as the city was only slightyl slightly touched by the flood, he said.The urgency of his message for the quick depopulation of the flooded districts, he explained was that untill sainitation could be restored to the devastated regions everybody possible should be sent away to the city of Angelinia Agathia.With all of the refugees pouring in, as well as strangers it seemed well confirmed that Angelinia Agathia is in possessi of the foe don't it?'

It was estimated that nearly overonemillion of the unfortunate survivors and ill were sent to Angelinia Agathia from the flood districts in response to Mayor Turners requests week after the disaster.Every building at all habitable in Dorothy Gale or Ange inla Agathia was opened to them, a,ll al and all the seriously ill were comfortably housed.The others also were made as comfortable as possible but it was not only food and clothing they wanted, the only relief many of the visitors sought could never furnished . They were all grieving for lost ones left behind, fathers, others, sisie sisters wives and children.Nearly every body either a o a ong among the refugees and among the viso visitors had some relative a o among the missing but none of them were certain whther they were dead or alive.All were satisfied however that they 3 were dead.

Ar ies and armies armies of men bareheaded and bare footed, with sunken cheeks and howwo eyes, women and children with tattered clothing and bruised bodies arms and faces and mere infants with bare feet bruised and swollen were among the crowds seen on the streets of these two big cities.Large armies of rich women with hatless heads and gowns of themost rich materials torn into shreds were among the refugees.At times some man and his wife and some times with one or two children could be seen together but such sights were very infrew infrequent for nearly all of the refugees who went to Angelinia Agathia had suffered the loss f of more thanone or all of their loved ones, and were swept out of every thingthey could call property.

But with all this suffering there was a marvelious amount of heros heroism shown everywhere.Nine days before all of these pw people had happy homes and their families were around them.The day following the disaster they were comple ely homp ioneless without a single penny and with nothing to look forward to. Yet there was not the slightest sign of any whinapering or complianing.They all walked about the streets as if in a trance they accepted the assista c assistance offered them with the most he arth heart felt thks thanks and apparently were greatly relieved at being away from t the scene of sorrow and woe in the recently flooded districts.They were all made to feel at home in the two cities that they were welcome and that everything in the power of the people of the twoplaces would be done for their comfort and wel fare and yet they seemed not to understand one third that was said to them.

Frank Smither a member of the Gemini sent from Angelinia Agathia to take charge of the relief station at Delight's Turns reported to the M mayor Mayor of Angelinia Agathia as follows;

''To the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia; Sir;
Onariving at Lan L Lawn Dale this morning I was informed that the loargest number of bodies from the flood will never be recovered but many have been found on the ba beaches of the river.Two hundred and eighty six were buried yesterday and two day within less than two miles a thousand more were buried.It is sixteen miles further to Ander City and the bodies are thicker now than where they have been buried.Another member inxpecting in the opposite direction reported dead bodies as thick as strewn on the bloodiest battle field for thirty miles.The eneny surely done his work perfectly well when he bursted the levees.The residents of the towns and cities that were swept away have lost all, nut a building had been left to mark the place where they once stood and the survivors have been too busy disposing of the dead to look after personal affairs.No one no matter who you meet has anything left whatever, not even clothing, and there is real greater suffering than any one can concieve.I have myself given away nearly all the bread I brought for our own use to hungry children whom I met.Large numbers of helpless wounded women and beggarged children were landed here from Allendale this afternoon and have no place to go and not even a bite to eat.Most of them including thechildren are either in rags or stark naked.To morrow and the next day a good many others are expected from other regions of the flood.Every five or ten feet in the path of the flood tells of acts of vandalism, not a trunk, valise or tool chest that had not been robbed.We buried women and even children this afternoon whose fingers bore the mar s of a recently removed ring.The Abbieannian government willsoon furnish all tents that can be spared for the refugees at Angelinia Agathia-which will be under the supervision of the Abbieannian Marine Hospital Aurthorities.''

there m de the followi ng official report on the third day after the flood disaster;

ANGELINIA AGATHIA.(CALVERINIAO
OCTUBER 22 TH.I9. I9I2.
Adjutant general.Angelinia Agathia.
Arived at Henrietta City at 7A.M. having been ferried across still raging flood waters at peril of my life in a large yawl boat.It is impossible even to saf save my life or soul to describe the conditions, not what bhad been but what is still existing.According to what I heard the flood really began to reach Hene Henrit Henrietta City at about (/P.M. in the evening of October 2Ith and continued with increasing violence of current and height and volume of water untill after two more days.One third or of the lowest section of the city was completely imundated the height of the water in the highest portion of the city being from eighteen to nearly twenty five h feet.The floods current had the velocity of a cyclone.with few exceptions every one of the biggest building or every building not swept away by the warer is terribly injured.All the rest had been swept out of existance or are destroyed.
From the word of scouts and the Gemi ni a terrible catastrophe happened near Chamberlane fourty miles away from Henrietta. All the fortifications of an immense Mobolization camp there, even the big gun and rapid fire bar batteries of hundreds of guns y under general San Jacinto are practatically swept a away or destroyed.At general San Jacinto camp every building except the big fort has been swept away before the irrest ible pressure of the flood. Battery O, First Artillery, Abbieannian National guard consisting of one thousand field pieces lost every man and all guns are found half covered with debris and mud.Two christian armies each consisting of five hundred thousand men each are said to have been drowned or rendered without shelterless rendered without shelter. the officers and their families, many pretty children a ll perished. All the members of a hospital corps are lost and the building with all its sick sick and wounded sold soldiers and other patients is not in sight. It was swept away like a reed.Loss of life among all the soldiers probably one million.All bridges over thirteen rivers are gone, waterworks of Chamberlaine is gone, the city itself was flooded inthe streets to a depth of six feet in the lowest part and all telegraph lines are down but no lo lives were lost here though damage is said to be considerable.Chamber laine is recieved all refugees possible.Colonel general Robertsonia Viviania was and is still in the city and is making every efforts to get telegrams through.City is still under the control of the committees of citizens and all is perfectly quiet.Every article of equipment of property pertaining to all the artillery b t battgries of the camp had been wiped out.Not a record of any kind is left and the soldiers who did survive has nothing left not even the clothing on their persons is really theirs.All the survivors are without shoes or clothing not having even their shirts or trousers.Clothing necessary has been pur chased in Chamberlaine and temporary arrangements made for food and shelter for the surviving soldiers.There are probably five thousand surviving soldiers homeless and absolutely destitute who must be clothed fed and sheltered.Have ordered eighty thousand rations and tents for eleven thousand people from Allen Houstonia.Have also wired Commissiary general to ship one hundred thousand rations by express wagons.Lieute a Lieutenant general Perryville will make his way back to Angelinia Agathia and send this Telegram.Greatestcdis flood disaster I ever saw.
GENERAL BELDENVIEW."

Captian general Michel Pellion, Corps of Army Engineers, when seen after he had completed a tour of inspection of the government works in the Mobolization Camps at Chamberlaine made the following statement;
"All the high breastworks and fortifications have been leveled and all the army barracks and other houses and hundreds of thousands of tents have been swept aw y away.The river chan o channel however is as good as before perhaps better but still full of floating wreckage and human corpses. Fort Belfaster has been deprived of all gun displacements.Ten batteries consisting of one hundred guns to single have been inuntat inundated and swept away.Battery for twenty eight big mortars ab ut like proceeding and motars and carriages on hand destroyed.S river shore line near Mic-pollester Woods has moved back about thirty feet.At fortress Jennie turner the batteries for hundred for eight hundred twelve inch mortars are badly wrecked and magazines reported swept w away.None of the the rive sand parapets are left.The batteries for one thousand ten inch guns is badly wrecked.All the gun platforms are down and guns under water.The [illegible] or insane man what ever, they may be had been active since the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

battery for twenty eight4.7. inch rapid fire guns with concrete standing com letely inundated and guns gone.The battery for eight hundred twenty eight pounder guns with Concrete standing gone. port st Jaun.Battery for thirty three fifteen pounder guns with concrete parapet wiped out by flood.All guns washed awat away.The shore line is strewn with wreckage of all descriptions.Under the engineers corpsare the devastated fortifications built at a very heavy ex e expense almost the river harbor improvements of Chamberlaine upon which more than I8 $ 889 4 88,999,999 had been expended had been completely wipi wi ed out. nown in Angeline Bay, and Lake Angeline, and also Lakes Turner, and niecherts are found the fragments of all houses swept i to it through the rivers by the flood.In these lakes people fishing for materials have occasionally found the tents belonging to the army.These vast lakes are chocked with floating wreckage."

"I fear the power for Angelinia st ates and of Abbieannia wi d winning this war on the Glandelinian rebel states is destroyed already beyond its ability to recover"is the manner in which one of the Gemini concluded his report made October the 29th to the War Department at Angelinia Agathia.He recommended the continuance of his office only long enough to recover all the office safes and close up accounts and declared all government works at Chamberlane, and other places were wrecked, that all cantonments at porothy Gale were wrecked and that christian ar ies have already been so badly and severely beaten in battle that all resteration was impossible.

This gloomy prophecy for Abbieannia's future was reflected in also an official report to Governer Andros of Angelinia vine Province, by Ex general Allen who spent a day at the edge of the flooded provinces in vestigating the situation.his sta tement claimed that all of the whole of southern Calverinia was demolished and wiped out, and as for the christi christian armies for winning in the conflict gives little hope for even the slig ghtest success.General orther who acted once as aid to genera, Robert vivian during the inquiry said in his own report;

"The situation ov of our christian armies and our cause beggars description.I am convinced the country is completely ruined that the Glandelinian states are winning the war already, and that all cities of our country are practically wrecked for all time to come as we have no means for recovery.Fully a hundred of our best cities and towns have been practically wrecked irreparably destroyrd, and to make matters worst the same per cent of damagehad been inflicted to our very armies. The scenes which I witnessed in Henrietta City is terrible.Along the river warf front s hundreds of great river steamers have bodily bumped themselves on the big river piers and lie there great masses of iron and wood that even fire cannot totally destroy.The great w are houses along the river front are smashed in on one side by the prrssure of the floods some are even unroofed and gutted in side throughout their whole length their contents either piled in heaps on the river wraves or along the streets.Hundreds of small tugs and sail boats and schooners and other sailing craft have jammed themselves half or all the way into the build ings were t where they were hurled by the pressure of the flood waters and left by the receding fl ood flood.Ruined houses are also packed and jammed in great confusing masses in all the streets.I have seen reat piles of human beings, dead animals rotting vegetation, house hold furnu furniture and fragments of the houses themselves piled in confused windrows right in the main streats of the city.Along the whole river front human bodies are to be stillseen floating like cord wood.Intermingled with them I had seen the carcasses of horses, chickens, dogs, cats, rats, all other animals, and rotting vegetable matter.Above all rises the foulest stench that ever emanated from any cesspool absolutely sickening in its awful intensity and most dangerous to all health in its effects. Along the river front where were located all the big and sma lware ouses and immense stores the situation is even far worse than one can ever compren comprehend.Great stores of fresh vegetation have been invaded by the rushing flood waters and are now turned into mountians of garbage piles of most befouling odere.The flood waters played at willwith everythin. everything, smashing in all the doors of stores, depositing bodies of human beings where they plased pleased and then receded leaving the aw ful wreckage to tell its own tale of how the work of horror had been done.As a result these great river warehouses are now tombs wherein are to be found the dead bodies of human beings and carcasses of all kinds of animals almost defying the efforts of the stoutest relief parties.In the immense piles of debris along the streets, in the river waters and scat tered throughout all po portions of the city are to be found masses of wreckage and in these great piles, and windrows, are to be found more human bodies than you can take time to count by twos and three,s and also house hold furniture of every description.

Thousands of beautiful and handsome pictures are to be seen lying along side ice cream freezors and resting b s beside or over nude figures of dead men or women.And these great masses of debris were and are not confined to any one particular section of the city.The waters of this dreadful flood spared no one whatever who was exposed..Whirling masses of houses around in its powerful grasp the waters carried on the fragments like foats and logs or piled their shatteredframes high in confusion masses and dumped their contents on top.Armies of men women and little children were thrown around and swirled in every direction or dashed back and forth like so many logs of wood and left to rot in the october sun.I believe that with the best exert ions and even with the largest numbers of the men it will require months to secure some semblance of hysical order in the stricken city and it even is doubtful now if all the debris will be disposed of for most of the wreckage is not from the houses of the actual city itself but from the ruined and smashed up villiages and towns brought all the way down to Henrietta city by the violent current of the flood.

Most of the bodies of dead animals, and people found in the wreckage never lived in Henrietta City.The actual loss of life in Henrietta City was said to be either nine thousand or ten thousand.In the wreckage were said to have been already found nearly two hundred and fifty thousand corpses.Indeed I never saw such scenes of wreckage and devast ation in my whole life and I have seen over thirty floods of horrible magnitude.Far outside the city in the country districts of where the devastating floods had swept the devastating waters ledt death and un accountable and incapable destruction in its wake.

There is hardly a family of any of the devastated towns or villiages whose house hold is not short of a few members or all, and in some or many instances entire families have been washed away drowned or killed or un smothered under wreckage and mud banks dispos depositedcby the flood.The hundreds who escaped from the flood waves and seas of floating debris did so only to become victims of a worst death by being crushed by falling bu buildings or in fires that followed in many instances. nown in the big businessportions of the Henrietta city the foundations of great buildings have given way before the pressure of the torrent carrying towering structures to their ruin.These ruins falling across even the widest streets formed barricades on which gathered all the floating debris and armies of human beings which from identifications on themand from the appearance of their clothing proved they were brought from othervplaces and never lived or resided in the city.Yet many of these bodies also were completely stripped of their clothing by the force of the flood waters and there was nothing to protect them from the wa warm October Sun the millions of flies and other foul insects still remaining and the rapid decomposition that was now setting in. Indeed many of the bodies have decayed so quickly and so rapidly that they will not be handled for burial.Some of the most con servative men place the loss of human beings throughout the entire district of flood at nothing less than I,700,987 and possibly I0,000,000 while others say it will not exceed one million."

General Paul Marcus in charge of Mobolization camps at Angelinia Agathia, and also at times fighting in general Vivians army against the Glandelinians,, being asked i his own opinion of the idea of the safty of the n t nation against the rising tide of the Glandelinian rebellion,, replied as follows;;;

"War Department;
Abbieannian Palace.Angelinia Agathia; October 26th.I92 to I9I2.....(
"I should not advise the abandonment of our National armies in this great strife.It may be true as things seem to be now that the enemy will win the war as all the biggest and best christian armies are having far the worst of it in the west and south, and that Glandelinian armies have struck blows successfully elsewhere but such move ents may have been infrequent. They have made more floods also than this one but within the last thirty years of my own life at least I have never s observed flood disasters of like severity as this recent one touch any part of the Calverinian province before.But this to my idea cannot give any evidence that the enemy has already won the war as already predicted.General Vivians army has not surrendered to no one.Yet there are and h s been many points on both the very Calverinian and ric-Whirthcian sea coadts some of them occupied by fortified cities and towns like ivian wicke/ and Gertrude Angeline oven the size of Angelinia Agathia that are equally exposed to such disaster disasters as that caused by the foe which devastated so many towns and brought down most of the wreckage to surround Henrietta city and others besides bringing all the c r corpses and other matter should the enemy again burst some dike or levee as before.It would not be advisable to abandon a war or to stop fighting an enemy or to abandon fortified cities and towns and other places merely because there is a remote probability that at some future time of the war another big flood caused by the ruthless enemy may be the cause of such great loss of life and property as just happened .

We have also just passed through a flood devastation that for the numbers drowned and the amount damaged or wiped out and for the strange freaks it caused has had no parallel within the records of any floods yet known.Records of other floods, torrental disasters caused by the enemy, great explosions, great fires, and other war phenomena that have stood for the last five months months are not infrequently broken.There does not appear to be however as far as we know and should comprehend any law or power just now to over come the occurance or reoccurance of such disasters for the enemy engineer corps will do their evilwork at unexpected places, and secretly when noone seos their work and at unexpected times. The size of this flood was tremendous as wel a we all know but it was only only within the path of the strongest current of the overspreading flow that such a calamity as has befallen the Helendale country can occur. Henrietta city was not half so badly wrecked as at first reported.All the wreckage found in the city as well as found in orothy Gale, Lucillie Rickson and Glorina and other places were brought down there from the towns and villages that had been carried and swept entirely away.Therefore it would seem that rather than abandon a war or conflict just because the enemy started a devastating flood means should be adopted at Abbiennia's Main Headquarters xapitol and other powerfully builded governmental cities to erect such mighty National armies as to avenge such outrages which the enemy commit.Rigid building regulations should allow no such levees and dikes which the enemy could instantly tear open by blasts and that in the future all dikes and levees should be strongly guarded by armies of home guards, batteries of artillary and even the main stational armies if necessary then such disasters co can not occur.But nevertheless the governments of Abbiennia should take heart as the chances are that not once in a hundred thousand years would Glandelinia ever have the chance to win a y x any portion of the war, and that our armies already are immeasureably impregnable to the foe armies and than no such thing as a defeat for the christian cause is in sight."

CHIEF GENERAL PAUL MARCUS.
COMMANDER FOR PRESENT:
MOBOLIZATION CAMPS AT ANGELINIA

THE courage of most or nearly all of the Angelinians, whether soldiers or citi zens under all these distressing conditions caused by the war was shown by the utterances of one of the citizens of the city of Henryietta, indeed one of the best known residents of that sadly stricken city, and well known throughout the whole country.....

"I think "She said,"that what we have already done here in the flooded districts for the past four days which have now passed since the awful disaster has been most wonderful.Yet I believe it wi ll or may ta e us survivors over twoor three months before we can ascertain the real property loss in the flooded provinces as well as how many were drowned by the inundation.But no matter what or who will try to hinder us we are going to do straighten everything out .Even to show the wicked enemy what we are made of they will stay here and fight it out like bull doge against the cats.For the homeless we will have many fortifica fortified camps erected within a few days, and with that we can re u resume the war and handle everything that is necessary.And I think that within thirty or fourty days or less everything with the help of our armies willbe carried on in no le less volume than before.I'm going to stand up for the nation and do everything that is within my very power.It If it even cost"s me my last cent of my hard earned wages I will stand up for the Nation, and her cause to the last.."

There were so many bodies deposited everywhere by the flood for scores of miles that pestilence could be avoided only by hasty burial or cremation.This work was ordered to be carried out as soon as the flood 548 a dand subsided enough to allow the recovery of the bodies.Human corpses, all tye dead animals, and all debris, were therefore ordered to be either hastily interred or submitted to the flames.T eTherefore on the first day upwards of four thousand bodies, mostly women and chi dre children were hastily buried in long trenches and c also cremated and the work went r rapidly on.The bodies not fit to be buried were gathered in heaps of thirty to one hu dr hundred bodies soaked through with oils and the torch appi applied.

In the meantime on the third day after the flood tra n load after trai train load were lined up at Chamberlane city all filled with provisions clothing and disinfectants and medicines all these being seventeen miles from Henrietta City these having been sent to the suffering survivors of the flood who could not get to other protecting cities.Across the river were scores of thousands of people friends of the dead and living, all waiting for news of the missing ones and also expecting an opportunity to help but only the smaller meager amount of help and relief had at that time reached the stricken regions.Only two telegraph wires had been put up and only a slam amount of communication restored to let the outside world know that conditions there were far more horrible th n than was at first supposed.And that was about all.Indeed it was not that which was needed, it was a practical connection with the main country.True as many boats and other craft as possible had been pressed into service to carry succor to the suffering, and the suffering to refuges, but the ne numbers of these boats were very small and although working dilligently day and night the service was entirely small in the extreme.Andthe people were still suffering the thousands of sick in danger of dying from want of medicines provisions and care, the well growing despera te and fierce and in many cases gradually losing their reason.

While there were many who could not as yet be provided for because the necessary articles for them could not at all be carried over the flooded districts there were some small numbers who had already recieved care.And the small amount of supplies which had arived had been of great assistance but they were far from ample to provide for even a small percentage of the sufferers, estimated at nearly three million.Even the richest of the people were hungry and almost nude.And an effort was being made on the part of the aurthorities to provide for all these who were said to be in the greatest need, but indeed this was found to be the most difficult work as there were so many thousands in the saddest and most desperate condition.Therefore a rigid system of issueing supplies was quickly established and the armies of soldiers which had arived in the region, aided by the surviving citizens were sworn in as workers.These then attended to the issueing of rations as soon as the boats and wagon trains arived.

Every effort possible was made to reach the countless dying first, but all sorts of obstacles were enoun encountered, because so many of them were so badly maimed and wounded, or helpless that they were unable to apply to the relief committees and the latter were also so hardened by the great number of direct applications that they were therefore unable to send out any messengers.

To make it harder the situation was growing worse every minute, everything was needed for man and beast, disinfectants, prepared foods, hay, grain and especially water and ice.Hundreds of more people died that day as a result of not recieveing any attention for their injuries, and whole mulitudes were literally on the verge of dissolution for at best it was so many days before any train could be run into the city or into any portions of the flooded areas and the only hope wasthe arival of more boats to transportthe goods.

The relief committees also held meetings and finally decided that armed men and soldiers were needed to assist in burying the dead and clear the wreckage and therefore u quick arrangements were made to fillthis demand.

There had been and were still p plnety of volunteers for thisxwork but an insufficiency of arms.The proposition of trying to pay for the work was rejected by the comaitees and it was decided to go ahead send for Glandelinian prisoners and impress them i them into the sea service irr issueing orders for rations only to those of the prisoners who worked or were unable to work.

word was recieved that all the refugees women and children would all be cared for or carried by wagon train and boat from the flooded districts to places of refuge.Therefore an effort was made to induce all who were able to leave to go as soon as possible be cause the danger of the outbreak of plagues was aw fully near.However there was any big number willing to depart immediately and each out going boat or wagon train after

action of the wagon trains to carry the refugees to anypoint near greatly relieved the situation.The workers and christian soldiershad their hands full in any event and all the doctors and red crosses red cross nurses also, for neglect although often unavoidable often resulted in the death ofhundreds.It was estimated that nearly two twenty two million doll rs dollars would be needed for all the relief work alone. The confistication of all food stuffs held by wholesale geo groceries and others was decided upon early in the day by the re relief committee.Starvation was already threatoning anddit would sure come if the sup pp/ supplies were not dealt out with great ca care.All kinds of oils we were gone, and all works and mil s and factories in the city and throughout the flooded regions were gone.The committee asked again and again for ship loads of all oils, ship loads of drinking water and tons of disinfectants for im ediato use and also money.Not a tallow candle nor any thing to make a light with could be bought for gold, or light of any kind o procured.There was not a single baker to b make bread and mild was not even secured.what was there to do with?Everything was gone in the way of ovens and kitchen and other untensils and it was absolutely necessary to let the whole nation knew the true state of things left by the ravages of the great flood.The city itself was unable to help itself. In fact a great part of the mighty noble Province of Calverinia and a small section of Northern Angelinia was prostrate.Eve Even the whole Abbiennnain country at large was paralized at the sense of the awful magnitude of the awful flood disaster, and was for the timepowerless to do anything whatever.The entire world itself was thrilled with great al r alarm in it being in stinctlvely felt that the worst about the flood andits results was not and never would be made known.

Three million five hundred thousand people men women and children had to be clothed and fed for weeks and weeks and all supplied with housegh household goods as well.Much money was required to make the small ne number of survivin g residences fit to live it in.puring the first two days after the flood disaster disaster it was almost beyond possibility to make any estimate of the amount of money necessary to even slightly relieve the sufferings of the unfortunate people.As a means of enlight ment man many newspaper men were asked to send out statements to all news presses for dissemination throughout the nation and they accordingly did so..Indeed the conditions prev iling throughout the flooded districts was more more than any human mind can master.Briefly stated it can be said the damage to property as far as able to be figured up would be anywhere between eighteen million and twenty eight million dollars. The rea real loss of life can never be estin estimated.There was not a single chance or if even any there was no time taken to make up any lists and the numbers that are estimated is said to be only guesswork.All those who had been picked up and thrown into the river waters, buried on the ground wherever found or cremated had reached the horrible total of fifty five thousand souls.No one made any of the statements in fright or excitement.The whole story of the awful catastrophe can never be fully told because it cannot be told, would take a million volumes to do so. And the necessities of the living were more than total for not a single person, man man, women of child escaped total property loss.The property of many places are wrecked and all towns and villiages in the path of the full force of the flood was pre practically wipedout of existance entirely

However on the third day after the flood disaster Henrietta city alone began to emerge from thevalley of the shadow into which it had been plunged d for weeks and on that day for the first time actual progress was made tward clearing up the city and disposing of the rest of the dead. he bodies of all those brought from the wreckage of other towns and villiages by the flood and those, killed in the city itself for the most part had been disposed of.Large numbers were found when the debris had been removed from the wrecked buildings, but on the third day after there were found no more corpses save those occasionally found or left by the flood.As far at as sight at least was concerned, the city was cleared of all the dead.They all hand been burned, thrown into the river burned bu i buried anywhere anyhow, to get them quickly out of sight. The chief and main danger of pestilence was due almost entirely to the large number of unbi unburied cattle and horses and all other farm animals lying upon the ground throughout the flooded districts and whose decomposing carcasses pollutedthe air to an almost unbearable extent.This however was also in the city proper in many places but also a condition prevailing outside the city of Henrietta.And also one great trouble hereto fore was the inability to organize gangs of laborers for the purpose of clearing the streets because there were so ma few men survivors and the nearest christi christian ar my just now was about two hundred and fifty miles distant. Most of the property in the city itselfwas totally wrecked or at least one half of it entirely swept out of existance.Even the situation in the stricken city, and throughout the devastated portions of the country of Henda Henel.dale county five days after the catastrophe was horrible indeed.Countless numbers of women, men and even children were dying for want of food, and hundreds, nay thousands went insane from the terrible atrainvto which they hadebeen subjected.

In his appeal fto the whole country for aid issued five days after the catastrophe and also as soon as he had been known the M Mayor of Angelinia Agathia said that fully two million persons including so many soldiers had lost their lives on account of the terrible inundation, this estimate being based upon personal and general information.When those who had survived the flood said the death list would be far greater than that, andthey were backed in their opinion by all conservative men who had no desire whatever to exaggerate the awful losses but felt they were justified in letting the whole country, known, nay the whole christian worldknow the full extent of the disaster in order that the necessary relief and sympathy might be supplied.It was also the general opinion that to hide any of the facts of the flood, caused by the ruthless enemy would be far worst than criminal.None of these who reported the losses were any such a thing as a sensationalist for they wll knew what the people of the whole Abbieannian country wanted to know at that time.

And if the people of the whole Abbieannian nation at large felt they were being decieved in anything whatever they would be apt to close their very pocket books and refuse to give anything, even to support the cause as holy as it might be.

If told the truth they would respond to the appeal for aid most generiously generso generously generously and gi e all for the good of the cause.

When the small ammount of relief that could reach the stricken began t to finally pour in it was remarkable how soon the very surviving women of the stricken districts began to pluck up more courage and even go to work with the men.The wom women and children had suffered more terribly than the men or even childrenbut they had refused to give p up hope and they alone were too christian like to wish vengeance on the enemy for theflood.Many of the women called upon the Mayor of Henrietta and offered their services as nurses.All others prepared bandages for the wou wounded and sick andaided all the doctors and other physicians in finding out the medicines for the ailing and sick.They went among the me men who were engaged in burying and burning the dead ,and cheered them with bright faces and soothing words.They were every where and indeed their presence was as rays of sunshine after the black clouds of the so storm.A regular fleet of river steamers and barges and other c craft was pl ing between Henrietta and Angelinia Agathi Agathia and which alone had some railway communication with all parts of the country not yet torn up by the ugly war.As one railroad line from Big Girl Knool city to Henrietta had been re paired trains under guard were sent there as close together as possible but this did not prevent many thousands in Henrietta from dying of starvation, illness and lack of medical attendance.

One of the leading officials of stricken Henrietta gaving the following version of a great reign of terror as the regime of the thugs and ghouls were and are generally called;

''not only Henrietta City, and other places like Glorimanna and Lucillie Ricksen but all of the districts completely devastated by the flood suffered in every concievable way since the un inundation.Flood and great fires, hundreds of them came first, then famine, sickness, and then worst still vandalsim.Thousands of reckless criminal Glandelinian and other spies in all kinds of clever disguises flocked to the cities and the flooded districts by boats and wagon trains, and were unchecked in their awful work of rob bery of the helpless dead, and inunjured survivors during the last three days when the flood was only subsiding. On the day when the horror was at its worst however general Clocklin commanding the regulars at the Cantonments at Lucillie Ricksen City sent seventy five thousand men, and five thousand extra from any artillery division to all points of the districts to do guard duty in the streets and country sides, and being ordered to promptly shoot all those in disguis when found looting, no matter what manner of disguise they wore, and the instructions were carriedout to the letter.On that day over one thousand ghouls many wearing the disguises as priests, and nuns were shot down like mad dogs and no mercy was shwon the van vandals, especially those wearing the garbof priests and nuns.Those who were not killed at the first volley of the troopers, regulars of the Abbieannian army, and thse of the Galverinian National guard---saw that the coup-de-grace was quickly admins administered.

Most of the robbers were found tobe Glandelinians, and when executed were founded to be loaded with spoils, not plans and ipae papers as usual but money, jewelry wrenched from the bodies of women and even children, money n and wat he watches and silverware and other articles taken from houses of a l all kinds.Not only had these dirty Glandelinian fiends robbed the dead but they mutilated the bodies as well in many instancew fingers and ears of dead women and children were amputated in order to secure the jewelry.One mortally wounded wo n woman was killd when she swallowed the jewe lry and the vandals cut o en open her body took outher stomach and secured the proerty that way.All of thebusiness organi zations of the vities also furnished guards to assist in patrolling the streets and fully IO,000 men were also on duty. The next day the Abbieannian Regul rs shot four hundred and eighty nine ghouls after they had recieved a short trial by court marshall having found them in possession of large quanities of plunder.The van dals threatened and told the soldiers that for every one of the ghouls killed by them, that many children would be massacred by the orders of the rebel generals.''We have been sentout here to do this which is our duty and therefore all you do will not stop us.''was what they said.''WE 'll win this war if we have to resort to more horri l horrible deeds.'' Most of the vandals and other Glandelinian bandits as a rule obtained full transportation to the city and the devastated regions by represent ing themselves as to have been ganged to do relief work, to aid in burying the dead, and as persons who were seeking lost ones.Shortly after the first great bunch of Glandelinian thieves was executed another party of two hundred were shot.The outlaws were afterwards put out of the way by even the hundreds but themore therewere shot the more in numbers they came many now armed and even shot it out furiously with the guards shooting many of them down.The vandals were becoming dangerous and an appeal was made to request the arival of a full army to stop the outrages.

Mo e More than twohundred thousand dead bodies were thrown into the big river up to the fourth day after the disaster this having been fully de cidedup by the aurthorities as the only way whatever ofpreventing an awful visitation of disease and pestilence which they felt should not be added to the horrors the country had already experienced.On the third day of the work shortly before daylight came on thirty three big barges containing eight hundred bodies each were sent out down the Mic-Hollester Run River all these corpses being thrown into the water after being heavily weighted to prevent the possibilities of their afterwards coming to the surface.

As there were so few volunteers and others for this work troops and officers were continually sent out to impress all men that could be found for the service but while these unwilling laborerers after being filled with liquo liqour agreed to handle the bodies of the men women and children nothing could as yet enduce them to touch the bodies of the dead animals.Finally the firstvbatch of prisoners arived from some far distant christian army and these were forced to attend to the disposal of the corpses of the animals.These w re were more badly decomposed decomposed than the humans and it was absolutely necessary to get them out of the way to prevent infection.However there had hardly been any attempts to gather up the dead at night because all eletric light and other plants in the surviving cities and towns were so badly damaged that they could not furnish any illumonation whatever.

Since the flood however no efforts had been made to identify the bodies of the dead it having been necessary that all the bodies wherever found in the flooded distri cts to be disposed off as soon as possible.While the barges, wagons and other vehiciles containing the bodies were on their way to the river and lakes some small lists were made but that was the only care taken in regard to the victims many of whom were among the most prominent and well known people of the Henel Helendale County. Of the hundreds buried at posa town all but eight were identified, the stakes at the head of the at the head of the graves simply being marked; Man or woman. Child Male or Female.

Ei ght thousand nine hundred and ninty six were buried outside of Chamberlane city, all of which floated into and near that place from the main path of the flood.None of these were identified.State and other troops were also stationed here and outside to prevent all those who could not give a satisfactorily account of themselves from boarding boats, or going in wagons bound for Henrietta and other points.In burying the armies of dead alongbthe shore of the great river no coffins or anything else were used, the supply being exhausted.There was no time even to even put an ordinary kind of bi box together. any cases were known where the peo le of these cities had buried all the dead found in their own yards.

As soon as possible the work of cremating the remaining bodies began. For miles and miles vast funeral p r pyv pyres were erect e erected and the corpses of men women and hildren placed thereon the incineration being under the supervision of the remaining fire departments.Even matters had come to such a pass that even the casting of bi bodies into the river and lakes was not only extremely dangerous to those who were forced to handle them but there was utmost danger in carrying the de composed putrefying masses of human fla flesh and that of animals through the streets to the barges on the river.The cemeteries which had been inside or outside the cities, were now not at all fit for such purposes and no attempts whatever were made to reach them untill the ground was completely dried out.Then however the bodies of those buried in the private grounds, yards, and in the sands along the river shore were removed to some public place of interment where suitable memorals were set up to mark their last resting places.It might have seem very unfeeling and even s most brutal but the fact that the bodiew of the unidentified persons recieved such small consideration, being handled roughly by the work men and thrown into the temporary or general graves as though they were animals and not human beings, was because there was such a dread of a pestilence that would sweep the wo whole world. Despite it being such a christian country, no or prayers were uttered, sace at isolated places, and the poor mangled bodies were hurled into the the trench or thrown on the fire as hurriedly as possible.

The burying parties had not even the slightest time for sentiment and so accustomed had the workers of the so-called "dead gangs" as they were named become to their grewsome task that that they even laughed and joked when laying away the corpses.

All the special attention possible was given to the wounded and other suffering survivors of the flood.Physicians coming from all points were on duty all the time many of them not having been to bed since the night the flood began to recede.victims not badly hurt, stepped aside for those actually suffering and actually requiring the need of surgeons. There were hundreds of thousands of them.there was not one person found, that came from the flooded regions, whether women, children, men or beas s that did not bear the marks of wounds of some sort.It was a suffering nation.

INDEED THE EXPERIENCES AND ADVENTURES of many of those who had been or were in the great and disasterious flood and escaped after undergoing frightful anxiety and other tortors make some pretty good and most interesting reading for any one who likes stories about floods.Indeed those who emmerged in safty from this fearful vortex of water wereunusually fortunate when it may be considered that possibly over three millions of people and hundreds of thus thousands of christian eldiers lost their lives, and scores of thousands fell victims to the fury of the flood in the territory adjecent to the ill fated city of Hen Henrietta.

Johnson Calman Shoeman, one of the chief members of the Abbiesnnian Gemini, and who had resided at Angelinia Agathia before the war broke out was present when three hundred and thirty five passengers on the Aronburg Line Limited which left Pandora early the day before the out break of the flood lost their lives.This man was one of the passengers on this ill fated train and and fortunately together wity a few others escaped from the train and sought safty on the top of a high flag signal station which was too strong for the flood to demolish it. The fast going train reached the vinicity of Henrei Henrietta about noon and as the tracks were flooded all preparations were made to withdraw the train to safer ground but the flood waters rose to furiously and swl swiftly that the train could not get out of its reach and the conductor of the coaches after allowing the train to remain on the tracks for a few minutes t started to back it up tward Henriettathinking to reach the city before the flood would engulf the train.The flood rise increased so rapidly that soon the water had reached a level with the bottom of the seats within the cars.It was t then that some of the frig tened passengers sought safty in the near by signal station but in spite all o of all the most determined and desperate efforts three hundred and thirty five of the passengers were drowned as the coaches though not swept away by the waters were quickly engulfed. Fearful as the flood was, however after it had subsided the train was found still on the tracks, these not even washed away but the windows of the coaches were out."any of the killed were from Angelinia Agathia as the train always came from that place.And yet those who had been saved had to spend over five days on top of the disk dismal signal station and the experience will be one theywill always remember as it was one of the most terrible of their lives, they haven not eaten nothing those five days and had not hardly had a wink of sleep.

Also a graphic description one a mans experience experience was given by byn desperate and dare devil war correspondent--who by birth was a foriegner being an englishman whose name the story does not care to mention.He reached Henrietta City on Sunday morning some time after the worst of the flood had passed.His narrative can be experiencally especially interesting because it does show with what a terrible suddeness the flood assumed a assumed a most dangerous character and of how it swept so many towns away in ten minutes.

"The water was spreading over the land at first slowly like the engroachment of the sea during the approach of a hurricane"said he"but not knowing knowing its true character so little was thought of it they myself and three of my friends as well as my wife and daughter and some assistances started tward the edge of the inundation to view it more closely.

However we were soon terribly surprised for the water came up so rapidly and increased so furiously that we were forced to turn and hurry tward the higher foothills.Even before we reached it us grown people had to wade in water up to our waist.within a few minutes''he went on to say''women and children in immense droves began to flock to the foothills from the distant do towns for refuge.All were panic stricken for the flood they said was on engulfing all before it and countless numbers of per people had already perished.I saw a whole family a man and womanwith three children trying to get to my place of refuge.They were drowned not two hundred feet of us.I was the first one to have crossed from Chamberlane to Henrietta after the worst of the flood had subsided subsided.I paid ten dollars to a raftsman to make the crossing.When I reachee the vinidty of the city I found a whole train half subs submerged in the water.There I waited on the top ofone of the coaches to wait untill the water of the flood would go down and then I was surprised to see whole myriads of the bodies of men wh women and children and some ofvthen eldiers float against the coaches of the submerged train.I counted fourteen hundred bodies of children alone, and I believe the number of men and women and tnse of the soldiers whom I viewed was about fourteen or fifteen thousand all these haveing bee been brought down here by the current of the awful flood all showing that their deaths was mainly from being dashed againstwreckage and not from drowning as I had at first supposed.''

One of the surviving soldiers who escaped when the camps near Chamberlane Were engulfed by the flood and who had passed through some floods in his earlier days suffered such hardships in Henrietta City that he was convinced that all floods he had seen or heard of in his boyhood days was only mild little water courses in comparison to this big inundation. He was one of the refugees picked up at Caldwell town and sent to Henrie tta for proper care.

''I was at Caldwell when the flood started.''he said.''That town is about Thirty miles north of Henrietta.I heard of the rapid increase of the flood elsewhere but I did not think anything would occur to make matters any worse so I took my be longings and as rapidly as possible returned to thecamps at Henrietta to which point the flood was just beginning to show slight evidences of itself.It began arising at an alarming rate a few minutes after I had just returned to my qva quarters.

About Ten Oclock in the morning army work anddrilling was discontinued by the forces of troops and I left for my own barracks.I got there about twelve oclock and was forced to wade through about four feet of water in the company streets .Even then the current was going very strong.

I and the generalsxand all the soldiers were alarmed but hoped the flood would soon abate but it began to get worse and worse, the pressure of the warer growning growing stronger and stronger untill it was almost as bad as a mighty torrent of water I read of in some story book when I was a little boy.the water was rapidly getting higher, and the current stron ger the raging torrents was terrible and I saw hundreds of tents a moment being swept away and some of the barracks began floating like big house boats.Finally the barracks I was in was forced off its foundation and gradually demolished.There were one thousand nine hundred soldiers and officers in the barracks and of all of thse these only a few including mtself survived or could get away.I managed to find a large floating raft of driftwood or wreckage from what appeared to have been a country farm house and got i on it going down with the current of the flood.I had not gone far enough before a wave of water hurled a shower of debris upon us and one of the women who was also on the rq raft was swept off and I was not able to save her, and was compelled to see her drown.

I and the few survivors were carried on and on with the current some times on a raft and again I was thrown from it by coming in contact with pieces of large floating timber, parts of houses, logs, ci sterns, and other thingswhich were floating around or following the strong current of the flood sea.Indeed many and may a knock I recieved on my my head and body unt. untill I was black and blue all over.The water was rushing at a terrible rate of spped almost like an express train,, and the wa e waves were of all different forms and looked worse than the rapids of Niagara.

I drifted and swam all night andthe ne t day and then for three days more not knowing where I was going or in what direction as no land could be seen though trees of all sizes too strong for the current to carry away were seen half way ouid of the water.

About three thirty oclock in the afternoon of the fourth day in the flood I began to be swept off my raft again but somehow or other I began to feel the hard ground, and then I knew that the flood was beginning to so subside whether you believe it or nott.I then managed to wade to a point which proved to be land and stayed there untill the land every where began to appear again and the flood to entirely abate.Then I wandered around and for a whole day in the cold and drizzling rain untill I came to the partly r uined x city of Caldwell and here I went to a house and there a lone survivor of the building though left almost destitute heemsellf gave me some clothes, and what he could spare to ate.I had lost most of my clothes which had been torn from my body by the pressure of the flood waters, and only wore my underwear when I reached the town. I was either on rafts, floating wreckage or occasionally swimming in the warer for four days and nine hours, and indeed this sw sensation toge ther with the awful feeling of all the bruises and injuris in uries I had recieved on my head andcbody is not at all a pleasant one.I managed to save my own life through the hardest kindcof a struggle, but more than a hundred times I thought myself done for, and I lost all I had in this world, relatives who were dear to me, comrades in the army and property military and private everything whatevir.'.'.''''''

Jennie , ndee a well known o house keeper at Nelby's Farm saved many lives during the height of the flood.The st ry of her bravery was told by a survivor whose sum er home at Turmers point had earlier in the war been destroyed by the Glandelinian lightning raiders.

''My wife acting as housekeeper for a wealthy family was taking supper at the Aronburgs Railroad st ti station''said her husband' when she sudden ly rushed in among the waiting c st customers and u surprised all of them by crying ve e vehemently to them to save their lives.The furious tidal wave of waters was upon them almost in an instant, and almost before any of the hundreds of people could leave the r irailroad station to go to a higher point where alarge buildnh stood some fifve hundred feet away the r shing rushing waters being all about them more than ten feet deep.

The woman struggling against the furious flood torrents bore three children one of them a boy in safty to the higher point miraculiously escaping being crushed by heavy logs, and dashing wreckage which the rush ing flood waters carried along the path way of escape.Despite the danger she returned immediately to the railroad station and in like manner brought to safty some men two women and other children.Her next act of heroism was to rescue another woman her three little daughters, two boys and another woman who appeared to be of middle age.The hig house on the higher rise of ground withstoodthe flood but the railroad station was engulefed in the flood waves and the rest of the people were drowned before they could be rescued.''

General Aberdeener Franc isco who was or had been a passenger to arive on the first Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad train At Cyamberlane city, from Angelinia Agathia the night succeeding the great catastrophe was said to have spent a most thrilling and horrible night and three days in the great lumber mill in the latter city.One thousand five hundred and sixty eight other persons all mill workers and some refugee families and soldiers also shared his memorable experiences.

The great mill stood isolated from the streets near a large vacant half mile lot and was isolated and alone from all other big or little buildings and was exposed to the full force of the torrent and the first of the strongest currents came at eight oclock and shook the building so violently that soon t there was the distinctive sound of glass being shattered from the windows.Many of the windows of the mill had given way before the shock as the building almost moved before the almost irrestible r pressure of the flood.This for those indeed was the beg gining of four days of mortal horror and dread.For two days previous the flood had increased to fury beyond bea measure and continued to rise and the roar of the water was always accompanied by the sound of crashing glass afterone after another of the many windows was shaken from its fastenings and shattered against the brick walls or falling into the waters below.Women and children who had taken refugee in the building clasped their children in their arms asthoug though they expected to be torn asunder the very next minute.Men began to scan the pl pillars and many began to go to the upper floors and to take up such positions as seemed the most conclusive tosafty in case the lower portions of the building would by inundated by the flood.The building was surrounded by floating debris of all sorts and the crashing of glass was followed by the sound of ripping and tearing and of the banging of wreckage against the walls of the bu building.To add tothe teror terror and confusion the eletric lights suddenly went out and the flooded build ing was left in absolute darkness except where many of the work men stood with their lighted lamps and lanterns.Then many of the people and men moved tward the main entrances of the mill with the evidentintion one doubt of seeking other and safer quarters but they were checked at the door by the roaring seasof water which was drif driving wreckage and floating objects before it with incredible speed and which lay between them and any other place of refuge.They therefore appeared to hesitate between a c choice of being drowned outside in the awful flood and of remaining in the mill i untill the flood subsided.

The question was soon settled.E en as they looked the flood was razing or carrying off scores of buildings, buildings in the distance was going to pieces or were half covered with water and many were already being torn off their foundations all of their inmates seen to be floatingin the waters or s r struggling on rafts and ohouse tops and the like.Almost simultaneously a wail went up from a big wooden house not far off as it was torn off from its foundation and started to float off like a huge boat.Everything was pandemonuium.This therefore seemed tosatisfy those in the mill that outside no haven of safty could be found and therefore they determined to remain and make the best of the situation.Just then above the roar of the flood, the crashing of glass,the the flapping and ound ing and thumping of wreckage against the wall of the building a new sound was heard.It was that of an increase of the water torrent and of the noise of increased ammounts of dashing and sw swirling wreckage.

Every one in the building stood crouched prepared to leap to either side as the occasion might require in case the building was razed by the pressure of e water and wreckage.Indeed every one realized the awful gravity of the situation but strangely e o enough there wasno shrieking or fainiting among any one.Every one of the women even stood the orderal ordeal with such fortitude as to lend ocurage to the man with the most cowardly heart and even the babies and older children were mute and clung to their mon mothers necks in breathless dep despair.

Nearer and nearer came that awful roaring and rumbling.Fe w if any doubted that the end had now come, and that in another minute all would be buried beneath the ruins. u suddenly the sound passed and though warers began to rush in flooding the lower floors and driving the people to high p higher portions nothing else occured and the building still remained intact.It was soon learned that the entire building stood unbroken and that the noise was really of course caussed by the advance of an ernormous raft of wreckage of all kind and that on it had been many terrified people screaming for help, uttering prayers to the Almighty, and raising a confusion of cries in general.As soon as this became known and as the flood did not increase for a while now the a effects upon the awe stricken masses of men women and children was indeed electrical. The men lighted cigars and cigaretts orpipes, women cheered and laug ed, children tstarted shrieking or crying, and though more windrows of wreckage was hurled against the building with terrific force, more glass was shivered, and though the chimneys fell and the rafts floating against the walls of the structure pounded as fiercely as ever before they swirled away there was no more panic as yet and all felt and hoped and prayed that the building would withstand the fury and pressure of the flood. And it surely did did did.

Two sight seers who had gone to see the flood told an interesting story of how they got into and out of Umbi city during and after the flood and of their observations in this city which had also been stricken.This city is about fourty two miles southeast of Angelinia Agathia, and ten miles west of Ozma town which was also injured by the inundation...they both went to Nombi town on the Sunday morning over the Nic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad driving a few hours or more after the flood began to affect the city.''

''When they crossed the bridges over the eldon river going into the city of Nombi the flood waters had already reached an elevation equal to the hot tom caps of the pile bents or one foot below the level of the tracks and the currents of the water was moving as fast as an express train and made an awful roaring.After slowly crossing the bridge and reaching a point some four miles bey beyond the two were stopped by reason of a sudden washout of a portion of the tracks ahead, and therefore were compelled to wait an hour and one half for a small relief train to come over the Nic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad tracks.During this period ofone hour and a half the water rose two feet and three quarters running over the very rails of the tra k tracks and they already began to seemany houses floated in the water or moving swiftly with the current.....

mile to m much higher ground, where the passengers of the stalled train were transferred the train f crew leaving with the passengers and going on the relief train.The rushing waters had reached already an elevation of more than four feet above the Nic-Hollester and Pandora railroad tracks and was flowing in a northeasterly direction at a most terrific speed.The train crew wasxcompelled to wade ahead of the engine frequently and dislodge driftwood and wreckage and other floating objects from the tracks.At about ten minutes to six they arived at the Main Nic-Hollester depot.At that period of the day the force of the water was increasing and had then from all appearances reached a speed f of about thirty or more miles an hour.After ariving at Nombi city they immediately went to a big hotel where they remained during the balance of the flood.After four days or more the flood waters began to recede or to go higher and to creep into the very rotunda of the hotel it being about thirty six inches above the floor of the hotel or about six n and three quarters of feet above tne level of the street.

The front windows of the building and those at other sections were at times shaken out and the sky lights over the rotunda fell crashing on the floor below .The panic strickne panic stricknen

The panic stricken refugees began to come into the hotel between the three days duri duration untill at least five thousand or six thousand persons had sought sa fty there.The upper floors were strewn with people men women and children all during the full time of the flood and many of them hardly ate anything.The manager of the hotel and the help did ever thing in theirpower to help the sufferers from the effects of the flood n and to give them all the she shelter possible.when the flood was on its fourth days duration it was running about fourty five miles an hour but in two more days it had reached its climax the s e speed then being fully sixty miles n an hour.The vibration of the hotel from the force of the waters current was a almost like that of some swiftly moving box car running at high speed over a curce curve .All who were in the hotel tried to sleep at nights but there was so much noise and confusion fro the screaming of drowning people, the crashing of falling buildings, and of wreckage and of the roar of the waters that no one could get any rest.

The two sight seers two days after the flood had rededed arose early in the morning.Indee the sights which they viw viewed in the streets were more appalling than one could ever think.The water in the streets had lower ed some eighteen feet from the very high water mark leaving the pavements clear for many blocks north and south of the big hotel.The streets were foll of debris the wires were all down and all the buildings were in a badly damaged damaged conditions es edially on the lower portions.

Every buil i building in the business districts was damaged to some extent with but one of or two exception s, noticeably the great St Michaels Cathloic Church and the Main Railway depot, both of which remained intact intact and went through the great flood without the slightest portion of a wall down and the only suffering from the flood was on the lower floors in the interior.....

The frightened, hungry and injured refuggees began pouring into the heart of the city many of the having but very little clothing, and hundreds were almost totally naked.All of them were homeless and without any food, or provisions or house hold goods of any kind and all had lost their all and were really in thenost destitute circumstances.The Mayor of the city of Nombi issued a call for a mass meeting which h was held that morning at ten oclock and was attended by a large number of the most prominent citizens of Nombi City . At this meeting it was decided that immediate steps should be taken to furnish provisions and to relieve the suffering of the refugees, to restore the buildings as far as possible and to bury the dead.

A conservative estimate of the great number of people killed or drowned at Nombi City was from 11,567, to 33,678.... ..Early that same morning the two sight seers learned that the water supply had been cut off from the city for some unknown reason, and that if a big fire should break out the whole city would be swept away.They believed however it was caused by some of the big river crafts which was hurled up against the bridges cuttingthe main water pipes.At all events the city of Nombi was with out water and therefore something had to be done by the citizens of Ozma town which did not suffer so bad to relieve the situation forher city sister s city.All the people who had depended on cisternsxand wells and the like,, had all their resources swept entirely away and there werw were not even a reservi ir to be found in the business districts. The scene on the do river docks of this little city was a most terrible and dreadful one.The large river fleets of working ships and hundreds of beautiful and large schooners and yach yachts were washed up over the large river docks and the railroad tracks in frightful confusion and windrowed in the wreckage of houses brought down to Nombi from other towns by the flood.All the best and the strongest docks were demolished.The big grain elevators were moved from their foundations and one of them was total ly wrecked.....Thirty five big river steamers were seen standing right near one of the city streets, but nevertheless though washed so far up from the river by the flood these ships appeared to be in good conditions... However in most cases the damage to all the shipping interests was something immense more immense than even the best can ever or will ever believe, all the shipping works and other places also being swept completely away.

The two sight seers seeing the soldiers forcing many to go to work at clearing awaythe wreckage and to burn the bodies of the dead and so on, tried to getoutof the ruined town as quickly as they could,, and succeeded in securing passage on a small row boat which sailed the river..when they got outside the river harbor they found a terrible gale was blowing up the river from the south,and the waves of the river was running very high.As they passed the bend in the river they could see one great ocean steamer anchored off over tward where the big ri railroad bridge jus used to be and came to the conclusion that this ship may be the ve y very one which may have broken the water mains and cut the supply from the city of N Nombi.,nother big steamer was also seen off the shore not far from the north of ..ombi city but the ship when you look closelr was seen to be on dry land about one half mule from the river.

The two sight seers passed within a few hundred yards of where a large river signal station had once stood but now could see no evidence of this big building it having been completely washed away by the flood.

The waters of the river w re w r werestrewn with countless numbers of carcasses of dead animals of all dorts and includied with the. were the floating bodies of men women and children.The two sight seers indeed had a very risky passage running against a strong river ti e current but managed to reach Norty North Nombi in the evening.

At this point the two sight seers found that the awful flood had crossed over and into north Nombi carrying terrible destruction in its path.

All the buildings here were completely wrecked.Yet there was no deaths reported at North Nombi but the inhabat nts h therehad suffered great hardships during the battle with the flood.

''It indeed was one of the most awful tragedies of floods of all times so far as floods are concerned.Especially this one which has flooded Jennie Turner City.Portions of the city is in ruins and the dead there will probably number over II,000.''

So said another Abbisannian war correspondent the first of his profession to come from the stricken city after the awful inundation and who arived at Angelinia Agathia after a most perilious trip.He continuedp

''I'm just from the city of Jennie Turner which was also havocked by the flood having been commissioned by the mayor of that place to get in touch with the whole outside world and to appeal for help.Angelinia Agathi was and is the nearest point at which working telegraph instru ments can and arefound, the wires as well as nearly all the buildings between here and all other points being wrecked or floated around like so many house boats.When I left Jenn e Turner shortly before noon yesterday the people were already orginazi g for the prompt burial of the dead the distr itubion of food and all the necessary work after a period of such a disaster.

The wreck of Jennie Turner city was brought about by an inundq ion inundation so terrible and so extensive and horrible and devastating in its effects that no wor ds can ever descrive it in its intensity, and by a flood which turned the whole Helendale country and other lands for over a week into a raging sea.I believe the full force of the water current was sixty four miles an hour.The full force of the flood began to strike the city at five oclock in the afternoon on the fifth day.Previous previous to that a great section of the flood had beenraging onward west ward of the city, and the waters inthe streets at that time however had not beenso very high.The flood waters at first came from the northeast and was or seemed to be in direct opposition toa force of flood waters from the southwest.While the flood wat ers rushed into the city from the nort heast the wa ter torrent from the southwest came in greater volume and about evening it became very evident that the city was going to be visited with disaster.Thousands of residences along the outskirts of the city were hurriedly abandoned, the families and others fleeing to the dwellings in higher and better portions of the city.Every home was open to the frightened ref g refugees.The water was constantly rising, and it roared through the streets in awful torrents.By eight oclock at night the waters from the south and west seemed to mee and by dark nearly the entire city itself was submerged .The flooding of the eletric light plants and the gas plants and the other lighting plants put the who whole city suddenly into total darkness.To go upon the streets was surely committing sucide for the war waters was rushing wildly everywhere enmeshed in dashing swirling wreckage of a l descriptions.The noise of the way water and the crashing of the buildings and the shrieks of the drown ing was terrifying in the extreme.The waters rose steadily from dark untill eleven thirty of clock the next day.During all this awful time the people of Jennie Turner City were like so many rats in a trap.The highest portion of the city was from fourten fourteen to twenty feet under water while in a great majority of cases the streets of the lower portions were submerged to a depth of fourty feet, and all the lowest houses were either entirely covered or f o floated like, so many rows of boats.To leave a house was to drown in the rushing waters. To remain was to face death in the wreckage.Indeed for Jennie Turners population such days and nights of agony and suspense and horror was never equaled any where yet.without apparent reason two days later the waters began to subside at about eight oclock in the morning.Within another four hoursthe waters had gone down wo one foot, and before another two days the streets were practically free of all the flood waters.In the meantime a storm arose and snow fell almost like a blizz ard occasionally mingled with rain and hail.

Very few if any of the buildings escaped in u injury.There is not a single place for habatation in the city.when the surviving people who had es- caped death went out after the flood had subsided to view the work of the great inundation they indeed saw the most horrible sights that any one could imagine.

In every block I saw hundreds of bodies.Fourty four corpses were to be seen in one yard and many of them w re were little children.All of the big business front was stripped of every habatation, the dwellings, the great bathing and other establisments, and either str every kind of structure having been either carried or washed away by the vl flood or their ruins washed away so far that when the flood receded the fragments of those buildings wer e left in windrows of wreckage far into oroutside of the town according to the awful vagaries of the flood.

And the first h rried hurried glance over the city of Jennie Turner, showed that despite their strength and substantial walls the largest of all the struct res suffered the greatest.Ten big orphans homes fell like houses of cards.How many dead children and refugees are in the ruins no one could ever ascertain.Of the sick in St An ns Infimary together with all the attandants and help not one was said to have been saved.Even the Old Womans home on Al e Allenberry Avenue collasped before the force of the floods current and all other buildings are masses of wreckage and ruin.Two big high school which had been completelt inundated by the water are more shells, and are crushed and broken.Every big and small church in the cityare in ruins.

At the fortifications near Jennie Turner on the northwest side nearly all the christian and other soldiers, and officers with their families and animal animals are reported dead all tents and works are swept awny they all having been in temporary quarters which gave them no protection whatever against the temper of the awful flood.

The whole frontal portion of the city from end to end in is in total ruins.Nothing but the wreck of buildings remain.The lowest portions of the grain elevators have lost all their superworks and their entire stocks are damaged by the water.The railway station was carried away the wor men workmen being swept fourteen miles to Nombi city.I saw one of the officers of the drowned army yesterday and he told me that his wi e, wife and child remand many of his soldiers were drowned.

The ground outside the city for miles and milesis strewn with enough wreckage to rebuild ten cities like Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale put together.Eight hundred persons were swept across the river by the rising flood and picked up at Jessica City alive but many injured in various ways.Five thousand corpses were alsopicked up, and thousands of dead animals, mostly cows and horses but also some chickens and cats and dogs.In addition to the livingand the deadwhich the flood cast up near Jess Jessica city hundreds of caskets, and many more coffins from cemeteries in the path of the flood were fisheduot of the waters there.The big cotton mills, many factories, the gas works, the eletric light works and nearly all the industrial establishments of the Jennie Turner city are wrecked, crippled or washed away entirely.

The prowlers or window peepers, murderers or criminal Glandelinian and vandals or insane man what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

The inundation left a strange slime about two feet and one inch deep in every street of the city and unless fast progress is made in burying the corpses and carcasses of all the animals there is a grave danger of pestilance.

Some of the stories of the many escapes are indeed very marvelious. Some boys was buried in the ruins of a schoolhouse called the New bury and when dug out had no further injury than scratches and bruises and n had not been t uched by the water though the flood had been far above the ruins during its height. A man of the same building a jai janitor was knocke senseless when the structure collapsed collasped before the flood but was revived by the water and carried ten miles on drift and by the waters. A teacher was carried from the school to a house a block and a half distant the men who were carrying her having to hold her high above their heads as the water was five feet and a hl half deepwhen she was moved. Many stories were current of the houses falling by the scores and inmates escaping. One man had his family and the families of three neighbors in his house when the lower half crumbled and the upper half of the floating stfuc structure slipped down into the water. Not one in the house was hurt or drowned.

Of the Helderns family six out of eight were reported dead b t found to be very much alive. Of another family only one was known to have been saved. The family of Andrew Henson who met death as a janitor in the school building was reported to be dead. All surviving houses were turned into hospitals as all other hospitals of the city were unavailable.

Of the Aberdeen works little remains but the foundations. Half a hundred million feet of lumber and other wood besides thousands of wagons and out houses was swept away, and the owner of it said that as far as the company itself is concerned it might as well start over again.

Eighteen big river steamers were torn clean from their moorings and sta stranded on the shore. One large river steamer was carried over the river flats from the fourty thr third stre street war wharf to Jessica city and lies in the wreckage of the city's pier. Ten other steamers are steanded between Jessic a city and Jennie Turner. An ocean going liner was swirled around through the flood waters and crashed t rough the river bridges and are now lying in a few feet of water near the wreckage of the immense railroad bridges. Other steamers were carried across the land by the current of the flood and is stranded about ten miles up tward Jennie Turner. The Excursion steamer was also torn from hen docks and dashedupon the Turner flats and the bow of the Abbieannian river war craft also had been hurled there. The stern of both ships are stove in and the bow of others about six are crushed.

Down the river to the jetties man other cships lie ground. Hundreds of river schooners, barges and smaller craft are also strewn bottom side up along the slips of the citys river piers. A score of tugs are also w wrecked. It will take more than two weeks to find out the exact number of the dead and the pr property loss. It is safe however to assume that one half of the city is totally wiped out and that one half of the re sidents have to face and are facing absolute poverty.

At Jessica city thirty hundred residents were drowned. There are very few buildings at this place that did not suffer from the effects of the flood. All the hotels are completely ruined. For ten miles insalnd along the river shore is it is a most common sight to see ho hundreds of craft of every description, such as small steam and gas launches, schooners and sloops and others strewn on the ground far from the river.

The great flood which had just devastated Henrietta and Angelinia Agathia city and the whole of Holendale country and parts of Northern Angelinia reminded many of the worst floods of years gone by and of those caused by terrible tempests and cyclones but this flood as well as smaller ones gone before had been caused by the enemy and therefore it could not be at all blamed on nature'' said general Hendro Dargar.

''I had seen many floods in my day and my experiences in those floods and tempests was similar to the one just gone and I was fortunate to have escaped. The loss of property and life is too far to be estimate in this case, and this shows that the enemy is not at all to be trifled with. The christian cause we have now is as good as any good as the holiest of all but I have no faith in its results whatever. I have told Imperor Livian time and again to submit, to allow the Glandelinian states to have the freedom from the Abbieannian Government which thry desire, for Glandelinia had better resources, bigger armies more men, and has a l all our best navy in their possession and therefore I' I'm sure they will win in the long run. Of course I'm no calamity howler and hope that my statements are wrong but so far under any conditions there is no signs of our side winning against the rebelli n rebellion armies at all.

The situation of Henrietta City and Ozma and Nombi and other places in Holendale country exposes these places to the flood waters when ever there i is a severe inundation. The city of Henrietta is about thirty five miles miles long and fourteen miles in width and has a population of eight hund red and fifty sixthousand people. It is really far from the river proper being on a large river sand flat the highest point rising fifteen feet abive the level of the river. The city is so wide and large that portions is built far beyond the sand flats and therefore the opening to the river from the main land gives the flood waters during a severe inundation a full and freesweep over even the river jettises, when ever a flood of this kind happenes to occur. In this way water rising a dozen or more feet high pour immense volumes of water over these immense flats causing the river waters therefore in that location to rise many feet and flood the lower lands. Therefore in the rush of waters back to the river from these lowlands thenarrow creeks running into the river are not sufficient outlets and the floods therefore sweep the cities and towns. It is seldom that floods are so severe that the flow of waters inundates cities like Henrietta. In this very heavy flood however the great torrents right sweep everywhere into the city and addt obthe destruction in rushing back to the river from the land. All the houses have deep cellars and basements and whe when the waters pour in there it adds to the damage. When this great flood struck I and some of my members were in a house near the edge of the flood and the force of the current lifted the house off of its brock foundation and dropped it fairly into the rushing waters and it floated down with the flood for nearly fourty five miles but fortunately never parted for the house remained firm. We had taken refuge on the roof however but even there we at first felt felt sure we would not be safe.

Tendon Davidson who had lived in some large apartments in on of the largest wooden flat buildings in the city of Jessica, andwho was seen searching for the body of his wife in the debris she having been killed, said to the rescuers who aided him in the work that there were over a hundred large families in the structure when it collasped before the pressure of the flood, and that he was sure that he was the only survivor as they must be buried beneath the ruins. Policemen and citizens of the town rescued hundreds of people in this place from the fury of the great flood. The policemen and others returned to their stations only when the high waters floated the patrol wagons and threatened to drown their teams and also the rescuers themselves. They had no idea that the waters of the flood had invaded the southern parts of the city of Jessica where they themp themselves lived untill after theyvreturned home from the police stations. When rescue work was impossible elsewhere they were forced to return immed iately for their own homes but each unfortunate policeman found that their homes and their entire families had been swept away to their deaths. All of the policemen lost their wives, fathers mothers, relatives and even their children and their property all that they had. Many droves of refugees from other towns as well as from the homes of Jessica city were picked up near Lucillie Nicksen City and taken to places of shelter where they were given every possible attention. All of these refugees were suffering from injuries of all kinds and many of them had been in the water for a day or so or a week. Most of these persons had floated in on drifts and rafts and the like and one of the party came ashore near Lucillie Nicksen city on a floating table.

One hundred thousand ammunition boxes andmuskets and immense cities of floating tents boxes and horses from camp Andrew near Nombi town were found near Lucillie Nicksen city, and a score of pile drivers from the Angelinia Agathia Wharf Companies was found in the streets of the outskirts of Lucillie Nicksen city which though also flooded did not suffer any damage anywhere to amount to anything and all wreckage found in her streets as well as dead bodies were from other towns and villages.

The prairie was covered with drift and wreckage of all kinds, an immense droves of dead cattle, horses, farm implements of all kinds, furniture of all description, water crafts of all sizes, hundreds of buggies, wagons and such like. Searching bodies found three thousand bodies of drowned men women andfifty and children in Lucillie Nicksen city and buried them as quickly as possible. All th se these were or had been brought into the city by the water. ''

One of the women refugees who arived at Lucillie Nicksen City on the first train that could run from Nombi city just out of Henrietta and who hade most saw and harrowing experience in the inudation was Mrs Mrs Angeline Clintonia the wife of a farmer whose farm property had been entirely wiped out. Her family consisted of husband, and seven children. when her farm house was washed away by the sudden onrush of the flood he managed to get his three little girls and the bo s boys saftly to a large floating wagon floor and with them he helplessly drifted about for two days.But unfortunately later his queer raft collided with a bridge which was a foot under water, then was wedged in wreckage of every descrip tion and was therefore splint into pieces and he was forced to witness the drowning of his sons and daughters being unable to help them in any way.Then his own part fell apart and he also perished.The poor women said that though the flood had left the cities thewhole country side for scores of miles is still under deep water and the whole country is nothing but seething seas of water, water, water, water.

Mri Mrs Andrew Jenni g Jennings who re resided at Fourteenth Street and Allendaler Avenue Henrietta City got to Lucillie icksen City in the same way as did Anne Angeline Clo Clintonia.After losing her devoted devoted husband she set out, a d by swimming and remaining and drifting about on rafts and floating wreckage for three days and nights managed to reache higher ground near Lucillie icksen City.

A little girl and her brother both about eight and nine years of age whose home is in Lucillie icksen City hade narrow escape in the imudation. he two children however through their own fault from carelessness had been hurled down into the flood by a piece of tim ber but managed to float around in six feet of water on drift wood for nearly two days and nights and despite the ut o ut most difficulty they experienced in keeping afloat or on the rafts they held out to the end and faint from hunger and lost loss of sleep they were finally rescued in one of the streets by being pulled into a second story window of one of the houses.

In Lucille icksen city people managed to secure groceries and other foods and provisions from upper floors of store buildings by go ng going from one place to another in boats and other crafts, literally out boating in the streets.

One of the rescueing parties which was passing through the flooded territori territories near Lucillie icksen City said that at Helden Creek the res uers and relief par i parties entering the outskirts of the city saw wrecked buildin gs so smashed together that at first they believed the whole of Lucillie icksen cit had been completely razed to the ground by the flood.Later they discovered that all the wreckage from other towns had been banked up tward the outskirts of the city and into the streets and not a single building of the city had been injured except to basement properrty ruined by the waters.As they were investigating this strange freak of the flood the parties heard loud distressed cries coming out of a mass of debris near the inner street.Several of the men answered the cries and found a woman and her sister and two men fastened securely under a roof.It took all these men two days and nights with crow bars and the like before they finally got them out half starved and severely injured.While working at the rescue men had offered them something to eat but they refused.They finally pulled them out and as weak and as faint as they were they informed the rescuers there were others under the roof.A further search resulted in the finding of ninty six dead bodies, all woe women and little children.When the parties entered other sections of the city no building was found injured though the streets were almost windrowed in wreckage.

An ther of the refugees who had been a prominent citizen of Jeccis Jessica City and who had been among the list f missing in this worst of flood horrors ever known arived at home at Dorothy Gale City and was indeed recieved by his whol e family with the greatest joy.....

This man had went to Jessica city on a Friday before the outbreak of the flood,, and was there during all the awful scenes of the flood and remained there untill this hell upon earth ceased and then he had aided as much as possible in the rescue work and saw more ho harrowing and sorrowful sights than e he ever could count.He said all the survivors who did survive got through the flood ohorrors as though by a most tremendous miracle.....He saw h thousands of youngest men and even little children who were black, brown or other colored haired on the c days before the awfu awful inundation coul come out of the ordeal with hair turned completely white on the days after whether you believe it lr or not...It would take five hundred thousand men one whole year or more''he declared to his family''to clear the streets and towns of the wreckage so complete is the ruins and he also told them that such cities as Lucillie icksen, Bt Betsy Bobbin, Angelinia Agathia, Jennie urner, Dorothy Gale, and Henrietta and others recieved much of the wreckage brought down by the flood from the villiages and towns that had been completeled completely obliterated by the inundati n...

''The sights in the wrecked city of Henrietta were the most horribe that I have ever witnessed in my life.I did not think the eheay could ever dare such a thing as bing such a n wf awful flood.Dead bodies were every where as thick as flies on a decomposing horse.Part of the city had been blotted out but for the most all wreckage as far as I could see was not from the city.The flood waters had such a current that it brought the wreckage down from other places into Henrietta and the city is fairly surrounded by windrows of wreckage brought there from the other towns. For the distance of thirty miles all around the city houses which had been washed away from the other towns and villiages are bankedup in immense windrows. Out in the country itself the flood waters have not entirely receded and inside the si city itself where all the business blocks and residences once stood were simply holes marking where the foundations had been.These were filled with floating debris and t e the many bodies of the drowned and killed.

The sight was most ghastly in the extreme and as the working parties would arive at one of these awful holes and start to drag the bodies from the dirty pools of water I felt faint.Everyone was expected to work at the recovery of the dead and we were asked to assist in the work and did so for six hours.At one time we were helping some of the men working under a guard.They were lessoining a body at a time and pulling the them out on the highe rplaces and then piling them on boa rds to burn them.

Just as some of the regulars were asking me to go and take a gang of men under me and direct them at some work a terrible cry suddenly arose from some of the men engaged in the rescue work.Running quickly to the scene of trouble we saw a man who appeared to have been at vandal work running tward the open ground.I covered the running figure with my rifle but missed.The man who was dressed like a Mexican in shabby vlothrs and wearing a dropping sombero triedto shoot me in answer but he also missed.We persued and we saw him throw his hand out of his pocket and twardthe ground fel sixteen bangled fingers which he had hacked from corpsesson the ground.Each one of the fingers had more than one ring on it. With these sights of crime being evidenced before the soldiers and workers they seemed to go mad and with cries of ''Lynch him''burn him'' joined in the persuit of the unfortunate wretch.Before that he had been just retreating at a slow trot but the approach of danger now shook his courage and he ran like mad.The soldiers had no mercy for themonster and shots were fired at him constantly but there was no results.Yet such is the measure of the speedy justice which is being metedout to Glandelinian ghouls.If we had caught him he would have been marched over andplaced against a wall of a house nd a line of soldiers would have been selected and the coup de grace would have been administered had he not dine died at the first volley.Yet the p the rascal was beating us to it.I told my assistant that I did not want that kind of thing to happen and that I could not stand the na nt notion of a llowing a vandal to escape and suggested that we seperate from the main body of persuers, take only four soldiers with us g o off in another direction and tri try to intercept the fugitives.He agreed with me and we gradually edged away from the main force and finally made a run and reached Polychrome city but the fugitive had ascertainedour move and shot it out with us th so furiously that we had to be cautious.When his ammunition ran out he fien fiegned surrender but when we entered that house he was goneout at the rear.Here we asked a number of citizens to help us capture him and from Poly Ghrome we had a run of twenty miles before we could again almost catchup with the rascal near Bt Betsy Bobbin town.

Here he escaped for sure.It will be a long time before I'll ever want to go back to that scene of the flood or bec before I can forget the most terrible scenes I and my assistant witnessed there.Since I left there I have been seeing the many dead bodies for days and days lying all stark and stiff, even little omnicent innocent children with looks of horror and terror on their faces as though they all had realized that a sure and most horrible death was and had been before them and every night I have dreamed of having to help handle them, and to shoot down many vandals after a short trial by court marshall.I tell you such awful things will wear wear on the strongest man and I will bless the time when I can ever forget I was near the flooded districts.

The ruins of the wreckage borne down by the flood shows that the waters must have hurled the ruins of other towns and villiages upon Henreitta city broadside as a l the wreckage is lying upon the outskirts in almost a broad straight windrow line as far as eye can see.Even the force of the waters swept away buildings on the outskirts of the city as far as

The prowlers or window peepers, murderers or criminal Glandelinian vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

thirteen to furteen bocks inland for the wspace of three and one half miles.The main ruins however comprise all the bestparts of the ruined villiages and towns swept down to Henrietta by the waters.All the three score of towns and villiages had been completely swept away where the flood was the fiercest and nothing remains to makr mark the spots where they stood except vast lakes of waters and half submerged houses that were too strong for the current to give way.

The countless hundreds of thousands of people that were rendered home homeless and who were not able to leave the cities that were parcially flooded and are n living in the ruins or tents furnished by the Abbieannian government.All the distributing stations have been established and large forces of men were busy issueing food and clothing for the armies of unfortunate people.There appeared to be very little, r provisions fresh clean water is scarce and there is no ice.while we were there the warm th of that October day was almost unendureable and the stench from so many of the bod bodies mak made the tasks of the relief parties anything but pleasant.

The fresh water has to be haulted for several or more miles.All the eletric light plants were destroyed and the city of Henrietta is wentirely without light but the moon had has been shining brightly and the work of recovering the bodies has therefore been carried on day and night.

No one can really estimate the number of drowned though already five hundred thousand bodies have been recovered.Indeed no one knows how many were killed, no accurate statement will ever be made as the aurthorities have no dine on account of the rapid decomposition of the bodies to identify the dead, and therefore all the citizens who are able to work are bending all their efforts tward getting the city cleaned in order to prevent a pestilence.At first the relatives of those who had been killed were allowed to accompany the searching and cremating parties but this was found to be too slow a method and now all the soldiers are instructed to prevent any one not connected with the searching and burial and cremating parties from entering the city, and flooded districts of the c country.

For the first two or three days after the flood had receded the bodies were carried out to the widdle of the big river in steamers and other boats and with weights put on them they were dumped overboard but now all the workers including rebel risoners are piling up the slain in immense heaps with boards, papers and sieves pieces of timbers among them and after soaking the pil with gasoline and other oils the torch is ap lied.

It hardly seems probable that the Glandelinian nation will escape the serious consequences due for this..any of the refugees came to the city with us and indeed all seemed to be in the greatest h rr hurry to leave the scene of desolation and horror. any of the them act as though they are dazed and were unable to talk at all of their escape..nd all along the line we were besieged with frantic questions regarding the safty of all different people in the flood zone but were of course unable to give any of our questioners any reliable information.

Besides the se seventy eight villiages being wiped out by the flood, many scores of s a smaller towns had buildings flooded to an extent to amount to serious loss and a few losses in lives resulting and twenty cities were flooded and three parcially destroyed..owever Jennie ur er city of the biggest was the only one to suffer the worst and that accounts for the lose loss of life there to be so immensely large. ost of the onehundred thousand dead in Jennie ur er city were drowned and but few werekilled by any falling timber or buildings that collasped.In Evan ge ine St claire city also touched by the flood, only a few buildings were razed, and about one hundred people killed and the inhabatants went boating in the streets for seven days before the flood subsided..

The Mayor of Angelinia Agathia issued his own appeal to the Abbieannian overnment for help for the flooded districts and the response was prompt and liberal.He declared that five million people were shelterless and wholly destitute and the whole force of people were suffering in greater or less degree..he whole region swept by the worst of the flood had been entirely obliterated and there was immediate need for food clothi ng and house hold goods of all kinds.Yet near by cities were sending all possible supplies and everything was done to greatly relieve the awful sit ation.

The most biggest of all liars in the whole world could never to save his life exaggerate the existing conditions of the affairs there.I was in the City's best hotel during the flood.T e The building was thronged with thousands of refugees, wo en were praying and crying throughout the days and nights, children were terrified and too frightened to cry, and abovethe roar of the onrushing water torrents could be heard the crashing of the buildings and the s plash ofthe waves and the banging of wreckage against the lower walls of the hotel.We expected th the hotel to go down into total ruins any minute during thoseawful days and many of the refugees went mad from sheer terror and agony.At daylight when the flood had totally receded I and many others started out to take a look at the devastating effects of the flood.We passed eighthundred bodies with within three blocks, and when we reacked the outer li its of the city where the flood waters though not touching the city any more, were stillrunnin running high we stayed some time and while there about as it seemed one hundred budies per minute passed us floating on the flood tide which was enshe enshed in floating wreckage.All homes that were ma magnificent and elegant are now floating wreckage.When I finally left the Jessica city the stench from so many declaying human bodies was simply terrible and beyond bearing.It is with the most greatlest difficu ty that any one can ever dare to handle them at all and the only ones who can now dod the work, and who are forcedto do the work just now is the Glandelinian prisoners which can possibly brough be brought in to the flooded regions.The sight is terribly horrible and sickening.It is also impossible to may the slightest efforts at identification except to keep some record of the jewels which are taken from them.All attempts to hold inquests had been abandoned.The bodies as I saw were piled on drays, wagons, and sleighs and other vehecles and hauled to the river wharf and other places where they are lowered into the swirling waters with all kinds of weights on to them.They are even pile on like so many animals it being impossible to give them the slightest attention the bodies of the poor and the rich, the women nd and children are treated much a alike. Immense droves of men women and children who are seeking friends and relatives who are among the missing or the dead surround the places and points where the bodies are handled and their cries of distress are almost unbearable n and drives one frantic.Why is it so that we allow such enemieslike the Glandelinians to recieve quarter when they do all this? There was not a living animal in the region of the flood so far as I could see.Scores upon scores of thousands of heads of cattle and horses and other farm and country animals and countless chickens with deathers all stripped off their bodies were drowned or killed and are still seen floating in the points where the waters did not yet go away.No cats or dogs in any of the towns and villiages which were swept away survived the imundation and not even a bird or a rat or mouse is to be seen.No one can make any anything like a real reli able estimate of the numbers of deaths throughout the flooded Henel Glendale country. I had to walk twenty five miles and three quarters from the place where I first came before I got out of the sea of wreckage and dead.I believe the water of the flood swept the coun ry fully for four hundred and eighty miles and dead bodies of all kinds are to be seen all over this wide terro territory.I passed more bodies on my way tward refuge and on my way to get passage on a wagon that would make a bloody battlefield look like a sham.The ste c stench in this flood swept part of the Calverinien country is awful be ond comple comprehension.It is estimate that one hundred and fifty five thousand head of cattle and horses and other farm animals were drowned by the imundation throughout the flooded districts."

Indeed one of the most saddest stories of suffering and woe in the city of Henrietta caused by the flood was quickly brought to light two days after the disaster when one of the trains able to run on the Evangeline Sainte Clair Railroad arived at An gelinia Agathia from Nombi City.Among the passengers was a an old lady and her two small children her name having been Mrs Hindsale St Claire, and with her were two Abyssinki ian soldiers and a surgeon.Mrs Hinsdlae St Claire came all the way from Angelinia Agathia to Henrietta City ariving there on the first day before the awful flood accompanied by herhusband ,brother and a sister.They took apart ents in one of the fashionable hotels on the outskirts of the city.All those six days of the least part of the flood her husband and even her children had not been feeling well and therefore had been forced to remain in their room most of the time either lying down on a couch or watching the ravaging work of the devastating floods.On the next day when the flood became very bad beyond what he even thought a flood could do he arose

see by the aid of the rising sun which was dispatching the fog whether or not there was any great danger of total destruction as was so greatly feared suddenly there came an unusually high wa ll of water and a fierce torrent rushed in through the very window out of which Mr St Claire was peering and the room was immediately flooded and the force of the water literally forced him out through another window on the opposite side and he was taken along with the flood.The children and the wife so far as they were able to explain instead of being drawn along in the direction of the flood rushing through the other window was hurled back and forth in the room and swirled around as if in a whirlpoop p whirlpool and then thrown against a door way and forced into another room where she managed to secure her children and swim to a staircase up which she mounted and saved herself and the children.However she then fainted from her experiences, and when she came to her senses and found she and her children were not badly injured she began to call frantically for her husband.However call as she would there came no reply, and in her fright she f i fairly shrirked and screeched out his name.One of the men who was on the upprr upper floors came to her assistance and cared for her untill dawn of the next day and then they recieved a rescueing party they all went out together and searched the outskirts of the city for her missing husband.But no matter how hard they tried there was no trace of her missing husband.

The search was kept up for three days and even nights by which time all the wounded had been taken care of in the best way possible and all the unburied dead had becom terribly become terribly decomposed.
When the man asked some soldiers to help her get back to the Angelinia Agathia city and they brought her via Mombi to Jessica, and then they immediately took the Evangeline St Claire railroad train for Angelinia Agathia.Mr Hinsdale St Claire had in hispossession some very valuable jewelry and quite a large sum ofmoney at the time theflood washed him out through the window and when he so mysteriously disappeared.
Luckily however Mrs Hinsdale St Clare had enough money on p her to pay her way back to Abbiennia to which she property properly belonged.
She was completely overcome by fright and sorror and although only thirty two years of age had all the appearance of being a frail decrepit old woman so terrible had been her recent and most trying ordern ordeal.
S e She swas compelled to remain in her train seat while traveling.
Many w r correspondents had witnessed the horrors of the great flood and we were Snerved by what they had been forced to observe.Many of them too horrified to stand the sights hastened to leave the sticken regions and some of these managed to arive at Angelinia Agathia or Dorothy Gale two days after leaving the flooded regions.Sights of so many dead bodies, constantly before them, the horrors of the seas of wreckage strewn all over the country had horrified them so much much that according to their statement they had been without sleep since they set foot near the flooded regions.These war correspondents had a run from Angelinia Agathia to Alburn Calverinia but when they reached the end of their trip the next day they heard of the disasterous f results of the flood at Henrietta city and therefore decided to go with a strong relief party leaving that other town of Alburn that night.However on account of the flood the relief train was able to proceed as far as Jessica and from there the goods and provisions were transported to the Vic-Hollester Gun River and put aboard boats and river steamers.
One of these war correspondents was accompanied by his assistant. Although they were with the relief party they were stopped several omore times by the Abbieannian pickets at the steamer landings of the river.After much difficulty they gained a view of the once beautiful city now a city of ruin and destruction.While in the midst of their sight seeing they were accosted by the Abbieannain soldiers and were commanded pleandingly to assist in the rocery and burning of the dead.This they obeyed willing ly enough and then they saw a van dal robbing the dead make a run for a short portion of the river beach.A small boat carried the vandal to the opposite side of the river but the war correspondent and his assistant and some of the soldiers persued rapidly and were compelled to make a forced march and forced run for thirty six miles before they were able to overtake the vandal who had reached the town of Polychrome.
Reaching that town that night they started again after the vandal who once more eluding their clutches fled for Betsy Bobbin town and proceeded for the railroad station in that locality.However the valde vandal went straight through and the persuit had to be given up though the war corres pondent and his assistant and the soldiers were raving mad through over it.

It is a, always in the ho r hour of great wars, disasters and other awful calamities when no matter where you go you see the average will that is palsied and ordinary men are weaklings that men and soldiers and even women who have the vigor of mind and th the full force of goodcharacter to really and swiftly comprehend the conditions and meet their requirm ents are met with.
Of all cities Henrietta was more fortunate than others of the devastated towns and villiages or cities for in the Mayor of that city and who had been a resident of the town for two years and one half,,, and was there,, when the awful flood came, the stricken city had a man who was equal to the emergency and whose r prompt and good work and services to the needy saved thetown from utter ruin, the horrors fromvandals and the like and of having one way of doing something that brought a speefy end of the flood in that section itself.This Mayor was a man a young man of about twenty six years of age and ofunusual heroism and force of character and some time in the early a part of the war had been a general in the army buthad been wounded at one of the battles and had to retire from the National Guard.However his fulltraining put him into a g condition to wekk take in hand thework of maintaining order in the stricken city and of directing the work of the relief parties and of the many Glandelinian r prisoners.In the months of June and July 1912 he had ser ved in the ranks of many of those who had risked their lived and limb that order might be restored du ring the frightful battles near Vivian Wickey and around Julio Callio and elsewhere.
He had seen service in the Regular Abbieannian army since he was eight een years old and during the month of April during a portion of the Norma Catherine Reign of Terror he served as a general in Mans ions army and commanded a division of Winkie Abyssinkilians under Brigadier generals Nib Nichols and Francis Andersonia di doing hard and most effective service during the battle of Allenby near Norma gun.
Later after being wounded at the battle of Drossa he did secret service army work in some of the Angelinian and Abbieannian armies among other things holding councils with the powerful Gemini under general Francis Heidi Stanc lin Stanckl n.When he entered the Gemini himself under the Supreme Person Dargar with rank of Second Supreme Person but was shortly afterwards tranf transferred to other sections of the Military by orders of the Government and particip ated in many of the filibustering expeditions in Calverinia near Cedernine Creek under the command of general Millikin and for two weeks saw more hard fighting and more thrilling adventures than any one else may have seen in three years.
He was three times captured by the Glandelinians the third time being confined in a Glandelinian prison interment camp untill he was somewhat prostrated making it necessary for him to leave the christian service for a certain long time after he had been exchanged by the enemy for a prisoner held by the christians.He then left the service of the Angelinian army i with the rank of Major general but with the brevet of lieutenant general for all his services.When the war progressed on and grew worse and more bloody during the middle section of the country between May and June 1912 the general had regained his health and though holding a good position in civil lifr he raised at his own expense the First Company in Angeline Line Province that was offered from that state for service in the attempt to lay hold of Norma Catherine of which he was unanimously elected Captian.
The Cpm Company spent a week or so in hard drill and camp lifebut had not been quick enough to be sent tothe front and was some time later attacking by a raiding band of Gargoylians and Whimsie Glandelinians and destroyed the general himself barely escaping with his own li e life.Only a fast horse saved him from even capture.
At the battle of Ester Starring he recieved his most severe wound and lost a hand.For some months previous to the great flood which devasted Henrietta city Major general Trimble had been Mayor of the city with offices of value in Henrietta city itself and another elsewhere.He had become familiar with the city, and when the awful flood broke he not only knew what should be did but had all the training which qualified him to take the very initiative is restoring order and protecting life and remaining property after the flood had su receded.....
A good account of his services in the work of rescue and also that of maintaining order in the flood stricken city and limits could have been of most historical value and interesting because of his unusual brave character.For two weeks after the flood had subsided general Trimble held the destiny of the poor city in his own hand,, and his word meant life or death to the Glandelinian vandals and the like and also to Glandelinian prisoners who had refused to work.The eight day after the vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they

flood opened as a very warm october day in Henrietta and with some rain and severe thunderstorms .The rain and thunder and lightning was accompanied by a stiff gale but later it cleared up.The Mayor had been in Henriettacity at the time of the flood and according to his statements the flood had come quite gradual but its increase was swift and fast.At the first day the waters in the streets of the city had risen untill it reached the tops of the wagons and wreckage was already floating about and also houses.The people were greatly alarmed and marooned on top floors of the buildings but however no one thought the flood,, would be any more serious than those that are common when the rivers only overflow after a heavy rain.ghortly afterwhen noon arived the Mayor reaching the near outer limits of the city in a strong boat, saw whole lines of houses going to pieces.Strange to say the Mayor noticed that the flood waters had a stran e strange phosphorescent color and that the warer currents was running northward.He learned from former experiences that the scenes meant a severe flood of dangerous and most destructive character,, and therefore he hurriedly starred started for the main part of the city and told people he ment in the streets or swimming and waidin wading the waters of going about in boats that they had better remain indoors or set out for the p better parts of the city where the higher buildings and stronger ones werecsituated.
when he reached the limit of Stanck street the first main force of the flood suddenly struck and hundreds of brick and other buildings within his sight instantly went down and his boat was almost captized by the rush of water and floes of wreckage coming into the city.

He saw many oep people wading and swimming through an average of six to seven feet ofwater and all were including himself being kept bust dodging lif live wires that sputtered and burned in every direction.
At that time it was almost cimpossible for anysmall house of any size or material to withstand the pressure of the flood, and wreckage and bodies of human beings were hurled and swept past at express train speed.
He finally reached his own offices at leventh Street where he threw off his clothing and putting on a bathing suit he was ready for any rescue work that was necessary.At this time there was no one in the building but himself.Bythis time the flood waters was running and rushing most furiously through the streets and the water was full of wreckage and of floating doors and sides and roofs of houses and bodies that he knew at once did not at all come from the city.Large boats, something like center board sloops about thirty five feet long and without masts and withou without oars came along as if propelled by s str steam carrying men women and children and some soldiers.One of these boats was secured and tied to the big building.Therefore by means of rops ropes and lines this boat was s used during the days and nights of the flood in the work of rescueing persons who were being carried on the water past the buil ing building.In this way for six days and nights Mayor Trimble with the assistance of those he first rescued rescued four hundred and fifty six persons during those ti es times.
About thirty Glandelinian vanda s strayed into the building during the day and night of the last of the f great imund inundation.These somehow made plans to seize the boat when no one was looking for themselvrs and to use it with the purpose of their ghouls gho ulish work.The Mayor had some weapons in his possession and he placed the gang of Glandelinians under arrest as vandals and stationed some of the rescued men as guards over them.
By the next day the flood had slackened considerably untill there was only a little three feet of water in the streets.T Therefore the worst danger being over the Mayor first left to seek some friends and relations in another part of the city, and finding them having not been in the city at t e time of the flood and that they were safe in Pan Pandora city he returned in the hope of being of some service in the worst stricken districts.He saw stores windows being broken into at places where buildings had not been destroyed and strange fo l foulish faced people mostly men were crawling over heaps of rubbish and going in and out of the stores in the most suspicious manner.It was not yet daylight but loot ing b by Glandelinian vandals had already begun.

Later in the day the Mayor soughtthe Chief of Police with the purpose of turning over his prisoners but he found the city hall completely wiped out by the flood and some soldiers on guard told him there was no place in which to put prisoners but he could use them to good adve advan tage by making them work under guard.At that time everything was chaoes corpses from not the city itself lay in every direction in so thick a mass that they could not be counted.Large knots of people were standing on the street corners all of thembeing frightened out of their wits, while insane men and w women and also children walked up and down the streets, weeping and wailing and laughing and screaming at the top of their very voices.

The Mayor then found the Chief of Police dressed like a Hobo and who even did not seem to have a single policeman left not even a station and therefore asked if he could be of any servoice.The reply was of a decided yes sir and on a damp piece of paper the chief wrote the Mayor a commission as head executive of the city while the chiefs deputy also wrote an order for do food and supplies and ammunition for the men that the Mayor was to enlist to patrol the wrecked city.
The Mayor then went to the very city auty aurthorities and suggested to them that the salvation of the tow town lay in putting it under martial lawat once and to preserve it from the ravages of the Glandelinian vandals.He also told them he had seen many half naked soldiers from some parts unknown wandering in the streets and suggested that it might might be adviseable to take them into any service that was to be necessary.He was therefore told to go ahead.Therefore leaving the city aurthorities the Mayor found within four blocks many bare footed soldiers who at the command of ''Attention'' fell in without as ing one single question for they were glad to find some sort of an officer.
They were informed that they were to be guards and would be sworn in as soon as time came for the ceremony.In the e meantime they were to fall in and get shoes, clothing, guns ammunition and provisions.The next man the Mayor found was general Schloeder whom the Mayor knew to be one of the bravest men and to have a great deal of military experience.He had just arived to the city with a Regiment of militia and with his assistance had all the soldiers needed supplied in less than twenty minutes especially with what they needed for doing their duty.
More and more ragged soldiers were found on nearly every corner and finally a number of militia buglers with their bugles were picked up.
The ''assembly '' was blown loudly which even brought recruits from all other points and a few steaggling militia men.
Two hours after recieving his commission the Mayor had a number of soldiers on guard at almost every point of vantage and then wh went back to the city officials for more aurthority.The Mayor being satisfied as well as the Chief of Police what had been done and being busy forming a Committee of Public safty and of Relief Committees, issued the following commission;

''By the aurthority vested in me as chairmen of the Committee of Public safty of the city of Henrietta I general Trimble do hereby commission the Aldermen of the survivors as commanders of the squads in charge of the Glandelinian prisoners and only subject to the orders of the under signed, the Mayor and the Chief of Police.

Als any one who wishes to volunteer will e be hereby authorized to the requisition to any property th that he may require for the use of his force of men and prisoners and their reciept will be honored by the committees of the city of Henrietta and any such property paid for by the city.
Allen Fallen.Chief of the Relief Committee...'''' Approved of by the Mayor of Henrietta.City.''

The Mayor of Henrietta city now began to direct his great efforts to maintain order at any costs.The first morning after the flood he closed all the remaining stores and saloons with the purpose of preventing them from being looted by vandals.His orders were to his men;'' first close all stores and saloons in the city.And if any man opens up again and even sells liquir or groceries and so on after being closed arrest him. Second, shoot any one caught looting the dead or descretating the corpses in any way.Even if any one happens to resist your aurthority you are allowed to shoot.But be very careful not to interfere with the real good citizens in any way but invesgitate all suspicious character, and keep out all sight seers and the like..''
Within fourty eight hours or more finding he needed more men the Mayor called for volunteers and impressed a few citizens and drafted others and kept them busy untill Glandelinian prisoners began to arive and then as Abbieannian militia began to also arive he organized the following

e prowlers or window peepers, murderers or criminal Glandelinian vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded, but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

battalion''Company L. regular A.B soldiers of Battery D. detailed by their commander Colonel He llim who was tendering the services of all the soldiers he had outside of the destroyed mobolization camps.Companies A.B. S.D and L were also made up of mixed militia soldiers, and even citizen volunteers.There was also ariving large troops of cavarly to patrol the out lying districts.

Horses for the car cavarly troops were selected from those roaming in the streets.The Mayor himself wore out six horses a day in ma ing his rounds night and day to see that his men and soldiers did their duty.The troops now mixed as they were and many of whom were citizens and not experienced, nevertheless behaved nobly.Of course there was very strick descipline but there was not the slightest trace of rebellion or of insubordination.The men and soldiers did their duty and worked and watched the labor of the prisoners as long as they had strength and indurance to do so.Every day in the armory the soldiers and workers had tobathe their vert feet in cold water to get them into their shoes, and many of the soldiers and the citizens themselves walked miles and miles when on duty, when they should have been in the hospital.There were no complaints, no murmuring.They took care of the injured and saw to it that the refugees were shelted as much as possible.Even many of the best business men of the city and even professional were in the ranks and were working as hard as any one.Yet also the Mayor and his commaders had no rest from the time he unte undertook the command of the city forces untill he was relieved by the general arival of the army under general galderlinia,, and during that time for days and days he had had nothing to eat except an occasional br bread and cheese sandwitch and a cup of make believe coffee taken in the saddle.

The horrid work of disposing of the scores of thousands of dead wasthe most terrible and shocken in the stricken city.Bodies from other towns had come into the city as well as wreckage.H Mayor Trimbles men and soldiers drove thousands of Glandelinian prisoners at the point of the bayonet to assist in the work.

Nearly every one of the survivors for fear of the Glandelinian vandals were armed in some way even women and children.Both men and women who had no guns carried large carving knives and others too if they had no better weapons.Arms in large nu bers were even taken from guns stores and plenty of ammunition.And the danger caused by the fury of the vandals and Glandelinian vandals caused the Mayor to issue the following proclam anati proclamantion;

NOVEMBER THE TWELVETH,
To the Public;
The city of Henrietta though being under martial law and good citizens now being enrolled in some branch of the public service it becomes necessary to preserve the public peace that all arms in the city and gun stores be placed without charge in the hands of the military and all those of the citizens whether e men women and even children who know how to handle them.All good citizens are forbidden to carry arms escept they really do their duty to shoot down Glandelinian vandals like mad dogs. Therefore all good citizens are here by commanded to recieve all arms and ammunition in the city and take the f reciept of the aurthorities. Tho Those who did not know the use of fire arms take knives dag ers and the like.

''''...rank Johnstonia Trimble.Mayor.''

It was therefore under this commission that Mayor Trimble and the men and soldiers under him recieved also arms and ammunition shot guns rifles etc, from the stores,, pistols from the pawnshops, and arms and uniforms and ammunition from the armory.Therefore the whole city was a terror for vandals.When general laderlinia relieved the men of Mayor Trimbles force in acf accordance with the Mayors request on the arival of the general, it was found that the men turned over to the city aurthorities allguns arms, horses saddles, and supplies requistioned by him and his men according to orders of the aurthorities during the past week.At this time the Mayor was directed by the general to call in all his men.The men were therefore assembled at the remains of the mobolization camps from which place they were brought to the fields for inspection drill. Mayor had that day fallen from the sadele from faintless caused by a lack of sleep and food and he therefore begged to be relieved of his present commission from the city aurthorities as General of the citys volunteers untill he could rest and become fit for some duty in the work of relief .

He had been on axtive servi e service without sleep or food for three weeks and therefore by military precedence the word''aproved''was that all the commanding officer wrote on such an application.General gladerlinia disregarded precedent and indorsed as follows;

That night the city recieved more experienced guards and there was no more compliants of disorder and looting.The Mayors next duty was to escort a committee of prominent Henrietta citizens who were sent for by the aurthorities to come to Angelinia Agathia to bring back a large sum of o money for relief and other work.He was then about to return fo to Henrietta when he recieved a telegram instructing him to meet Angelinia Aronburg and her party of seven hundred g rl girl and boy scouts and give them such assistance in their investiga ion as to the cause of the flood as he dould and to also get them into other places to show them the ravages ofthe flood.He also recieved the following letter from the Mayor of Lucillie nicksen city;

Mayor borrowed a number of soldiers and formed a good house or headquarters for Gertrude Angeline.when her wagon train got in, the guards were ready the soldiers at present arms, ever thing in military style in fact that reception was the only thing in all the incidents of the flood that was of any scenery. when the mar martial law was readily declared off when it was positively sure that the vandals had been put to an end the Mayor of Henrietta city in the presence of many of the prominent citizens at the still remaining railroad station presented Mayor Trimble with the following declaration of thanks;

In behalf of the citizens of the city of Henrietta and also of the whole nation the Chief of Police and general gladerlinia desires to say that the work of Mayor Trimble which he did for the stricken city of henrietta was more magnificent than any one can comprehend and therefore cannot be atall expressed in words.He even bu built the very foundation upon which the later good work has been done and had already encouraged the Nation itself to greater efforts by his own example.The very courage and discipline which Mayor Trible displayed and the way he kept down the vandals deserves the high at praise not only from the citizens of the city, but from all the people of the nation itself. He has even the officla official and personal thanks of the emperor and his Noble cout courtiers.

vandals and the like kept out of the city. Finally when cival law superseded martial law and when christian armies began to arive near by to protect the city further the Mayor and his ofol owers were toned great ovations wherever they went. On his way tward Angelinia Agathia when sent for by Emperor Vivian he was tended similar ovations at Dorothy Gale city and at Angelinia Agathia before he was brought before the King, Count De Biff, of the Abbieannian National guard, recieved him with a tremendous military luncheon at the palace, andcturned out the full army of the National Guard of honor to escort him to the depot on his way to Emperor Vivians Palace.

CHAPTER THIRTY

THE BOY CALLED THE RATTLESNAKE IS CUT OFF BY THE FLOOD, AND SURROUNDED BY OVER ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY FIVE GLANDELINIANS. WITH HIM ARE TEN OTHER BOYS. HOW THEY ESCAPE.

HIS life or thiers--that was the stake in the two hour battle between the boy called by the Rattlesnake by his companions fighting with ten of his boys against as it seems a full field of fiercely attacking Glandelinian soldiers while on the other side the boy was hemmed off from escape thatwy way because of the very same flood and not untill the courageous boy and his ten companions had killed over one hundred and ten of the Glandelinians was he able to escape the properc way before the flood overwhelmed him and they. Radcliff I believe the reader well knows as the best friend and companion of Penrod and at the time this battle raged the flood was approaching his boys and threateneing to cut them off from escape. In that section the flood was rising and the boys saw themselves being threatened by the flood and also by the enemy who was advancing far in the distance. People who have fought with the enemy under even the most trying conditions did not consider themselves any braver than a y other folks. Even violet and her sisters and their own girl and boy friends and companions and scouts were used to the awful threatening deaths that lurked everywhere they went and did not worry about it any more than if nothing unusually thrilling was ever han happening. It was the rules of war and they defied the elements itself.

Whenever they hear a force of Glandelinians approaching either, on foot, or horseback they race away when they can and when it is impossible to do so they stop right in the middle of the road and shoot it out with the robels as a matter of course just as if th ythey go out eating ice cream or go to some enjoyment and make nothing of it afterwards.

A few days after the battle with the Glandelinians a representive of the Angelinia Agathia daily Times News Paper called on the boy and found him sou sorting out uniforms for his boy and girl scouts. The boy washed himself when he knew he was to be interviewed and then to shot what he did exhibited a large number of water blisters on both hands where three hours of frantic striking and pulling the trigger had worn the skin away and he explained how he and the ten boys got themselves into the trap and how they fought their way out just before being engulfed by the flood. The evening before the dreadful encounter a couple of the members of the Gemini stopped at the Rattlesnakes tent and mentioned that the flood was approaching tward Hen Henrietta. Next morning desiring to see the flood the boy thought to take ten of his lads with him and one girl and take a view of the flood at a safe way before the christian army should advance northward to prevent the flood from reaching them. He and his boys and the girl mounted their horses took along their pistols and winchester rifles and rode tward where he had heard the flood wq was beginning to show itself. It should be explained that at this time the city of Henrietta and many other places were being terribly devastated by the imundation and the flood was spreading unusually fast and all over the land so there was a real good and big flood for the boy to see. For a time not a sign of a Glandelinian soldier did they see but they saw the flood alright which resembed to them a sea of water filled with floating houses and pieces of wreckage and many dead bodies. It was a pretty warm october morning after nearly two weeks of cold chilly weather. The flood being rampantat this time the boys believed that there was not to be a Glandelinian to be seen for the Glandelinians they thought seemed to realize they too could be trapped by the flood of their own making and for that reason frequently moved their armies out of the reach of the deluge, or took places of higher ground for mutual protection. The rattle snake boy thought this to be so but had no idea that he was soon to step into a actual tram trap of scouting Glandelinian soldiers. Leaving their horses some little distance behind under guard of the boy the Rattlesnake lad and his nine boys and the girl walked down tward the waters edge and took a good look at the flood. They were not as heavily armed as they would have been had they intended to go out on a scouting tour and for that moment they were excellent targets of Glandelinian sharpshooters. They hadstood by the edge of the flood and were even moving back further when the waters increased still more when they heard the sound of a shot and saw that it came from a number of Glandelinians about four hundred feet distance and who were advancing from cover with a speed of a racer. Dodging behind trees the boys opened fire in return and had shot down several of the Glandelinians when they immediately heard the sound of new shots coming from another direction. As soon as they had shot down the two Glandelinians in front they attended to those from the new quarter but more Glandelinians then threatened at the same time. These Glandelinians the boys and the girl also shot. For a moment such a thing did not seem to mean anything to them, they might shoot at a few rebel soldiers like this at any time it would hardly be worth mentioning to any one. But now came a chours and a series of shots from all directions.

This was unusual and caused the boys and the girl to look around before they fired their pistols any more. Indeed what they saw would not be a pleasant thing for any one else to observe. They were being almost surrounded by hundreds of Glandelinians. The forest nearestest the flood was alive with Scoodlier Glandelinians. Those close at hand were opening fire at a fussilade while the ones further away were deploying outward and were ad a advancing from everywhere. The boys knew indeed what this scene meant. Those few shots they had fired in answer to the first rebel soldiers had called the angry attention of every one of the Glandelinian soldiers who may have been in the vinicity and they were coming up f by the hundreds from somewhere to drive away kill or capture the boy scouts. The ten boys and the girl were very willing to flee for their lives or safty back to where the horses had been left but a quick glance showed them that their retreat was blocked in that direction also, they being completely surrounded by either the flood or the dangerous Glandelinian soldiers. To fight their way through the Scoodlers meant thay they all would be bayonetted not once but many times which would be certain death for the Glandelinians respected boy or girl scouts no more than the christian soldiers themselves. To surrender would be cowardice as no christian would be left alive if surrendering for their own aide would cause them to face the firing squad if recpatured. Before them was the enemy. Behind them was the over increasing flood too terrible to even swim. Their ammunition would not last against such a swarm and a rifle and a pistol would be a poor weapon anyway for the close quarters fight that was coming. Yet the boys and the girl knew they had to stand and face them at any risk. Unless they could find something better after their ammunition gave out, and find these things in a hurry they were doomed to capture or destruction. Fortunately a large high fence ran near by and seeing the opportunity they all after firing rapidly rushed for it.

Two Glandelinian soldiers barred the way and demanded surr surrender threatening to strike the boys down with their muskets and the moment the boys started off they did too but the boys managed to fend them off with their little rifle barrels and jumped over their bodies as they fell before they had time to rise totheir feet and rush forthem. At the fence which was a thick iron one they had the good for fortune to quickly find large sticks and boards and pieces of iron that was long enough and not too heavy for their purpose. Also beside it was large pieces of scattered rocks, bricks and even clay and sand. The two Glandelinian soldiers that the boys had managed to wardoff with their rifles were coming for the lads at top speed but the children did not dare wait for them because other Scoodlers were right at their tail heels and this was no place either to fight the battle in. With the fence and some brush behind and with the waters of the flood coming nearer and nearer, the Glandelinians couldcreep and rush upon the boys unseen. So the boys in a body ran to meet the two nearest Glandelinians and pounded out their brains with good diredted blows as they were in the act of rushing in counter charge. This was taking indeed an extra risk because striking against the soldiers that way they were likely to break their rifles before they had a chance to use up their ammunition which was needed for the longer range of fighting.

The prowlers or window peepers, murderers or criminal Glandelinian vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since the great flood receded but it was not until the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

But the guns still held and they were able to reach a more thickly wooded stretch of ground a little higher above the ever rising water line. This was a good enough battlefield if the flood did not engulf them too quickly but most of it was already occupied by the enemy who demanded with loud derisive voices to the boys to surrender. The Rattlesnake boy hit at the nearest of the soldiers and at the same time another launched itself missing the boy by half an inch with his sabre. The girl shot him down from behind another tree. Another Glandelinian was back at the boy in a few seconds but he had no time to watch because he knew there would be another right behind before or beside him and with a back stroke or side stroke t the lad would catch them direct against their heads. or what the rattlesnake boy guessed was to have been an hour and three quarters of desperate fighting the boy and his companions hardly had a chance to even look beyond a circle about twelve feet in diameter in the centre of which they fired shot after shot, whirled and jumped, striking out and shooting in all directions without an instants rest and dog dodging behind the trees when the rebels in the rear opened a general fire. hen either of the boys or the girl was lucky enough to hit a Glandelinian on the head, shoulder or arm they usually killed or disabled the insurgent, but most of the strokes merely knocked them off their feet or hurled them away, and they came back angrier than ever and blaspheming od something awful.

he boys complained that their heads were b c becoming dizzy from the continual spinning around and from the sight of so many of the rebels moving back and forth, dodging from tree to tree, rushing upon them and recoiling and firing shot after shot. ow a new peril arose. ven d though the children managed to keep on repelling attacks of the new rebel soldiers of which there seemed to be no end the ground at their feet was becoming covered with swiftly moving water and also strewn with the Glandelinians they had killed or injured. ome of the Glandelinians were dead but many had broken backs, and though unable to rise were trying again and again to shoot the lads and the girl down. just as it seemed impossible to watch these treacherous scoldiers and the ever rising of the flood waters there however came a momentarily lull.

This gave the boy scouts and the girl time to take the utt of their rifles which they still clutched in their lef hands and fight their way out of reach of the water from tree to tree. his done they looked around to see if the road was clear for them to make a safe retreat to where they had left their horses. hey saw the boy and the girl who was guarding the horses staring at them as if they knew the trouble they were in but that it was her duty to stay and mind the horses. Also a they saw a whole new detatchment of reserves advancing to the attack from tree to tree and from that general direction and the battle royal was on again.

or a time which the torment childrened estimated at least another hour and a qua quarter the struggle went on more desperately than before. T The Glandelinians attacked fiercely and without pausing. the boys became out of breath, weak and their clothes drenched with sweat which sometimes ran down into their eyes. hey n knew from the quickly rising waters that they would not last much longer and was also tortured with th the fear that some of the Glandelinians would work around the other way and seize the horses and make away with them. Then just as they had come to the f atal decision to run for it came another lull. hey wiped their eyes and looked around. here did not seem to be nearly so many Glandelinian soldiers now. ithout waiting for more to gather the boys and the girl went from tree to tree to combat those that were between them and their horses. Once or tr thric e they were surrounded and the rebels attacked anew but they were getting fewer and fewer all the time and the boys and the girl fought their way t through the last of the them to the horses with hardly strength enough to mount and ride back to the christian lines.

Now indeed comes in what some may say is the most remarkable part of it all. ost boy and girl scouts would have considered that experience enough for one day but not this hardy boy the rattlesnake scout. He had a bath, a change of uniform a rest, a cup of coffee, a few pieces of cake, and then nothing would do but he must take a nother force of boys of the same number and go back to the same spot again. This time they carried better more reliable weapons and cartridge belts, and carried plenty of ammunition to celebrate any good time with. They were again looking for trouble but did not find it. not one Glandelinian soldier was in sight not even the dead or the wounded. The few survivors had wisely fled fro , the from the stricken battle field and taken their dead and wounded along with them. The Rattlesnake boy thought that in all he and his eleven comradessurely a may have killed and wounded nearly two hundred of the Scoodler enemies and they doubted if there were o more than ten of uninjured left when they made their retreat just before the flood rose so swiftly as to engulf them during the battle. he little troop had to wipe outalmost the entire force of attac ing Acoo Scoodlers before they could get away.

CHAPTER THIRTY TWO

Yet thischarrowing experience has not lessened the love of any of these boy and girl scouts for adventure and encounters with the enemy. The boys knew that they barely escaped with their lives, but what of it! They consider it their own fault just like a man who had allowed a tiger to capture him. But he said that next time he goes out looking for something unusual in the actions of nature he will be a little more carefulp--that is all. As for being afraid of being any of even his littlest girl or boy scouts surrounded by these dangerous enemies not at all. His smallest scouts knows all about Glandelinians and their ways and always keeps an eye and ear out for them .

Near the scene of the flood the one hundred thousand inhabatants of Rosa city have been recie ering even after the recession of the flood what we may all call a severe case of shaken nerves. nd for the s me reason e ery male inhabatant have appointed themselves w watchmen and help the soldiers and other guards on their duty, and all the house wives and young girls and even children jump atthe sightof their own shadows.

nd why! Because there is a very goud reason. It is caused v by dangerous vandals or crazy men or something on that order for somewhere at night out of the darkness night after night, come s the almost unearthly blasphem ies from the voices of men and these fade away from the flash lights of the citizens, police and soldiers and they fade away like strange Gnomes or ghosts and disappear from sight in the same fashion.

he prowlers are not imaginary ghosts, nor Gnomes and they also are neither. Their huge uncouth figures disguised in white regal l as or black rega.lls and hu hoods have been seen again and again, have pounced upon little children in the dark or broken into houses at night and s strangled little children to death. hey have been repeatedly shot at by the polic e armed citizens and by the soldiers but instead of being him themselves have hit their own persuers and shot them dead. Again and again they have made their appearance and woe to those who met them unarmed in the dark.

he quegtion arose among many whether they were escaped lunatics or dan gerous landelinian spies or vandals or criminals. The terrified people of osa City could not agree on the questions to save their lives. Up and down the main streets and others in the city large groups of men gather to discuss the mystery of the strangely disguised prowlers and assailants and tell how they saw them disappear and rep reappear and how they would see them scamper across vacant fields and meadows and leap over fences and heard their defiant and blasphemious yells as they darted from one tree to another.

At night time all the proch lights of every building beam brightly and also in every home the lights are kept brightly gleaming all night long and doors and windows were and are kept tightly locked. ll visitors in the city who chance to walk about any portion of the city are most closely watched.

with the purpose to try and capture these strange prowlers who have killed nearly a dozen children for every one of their vicits, the very Chief of the police department had all of his police to discard their blue coats and brass buttons for other clothing and were placed on secret patrol duty grimly determined to find the prowlers and end their career of terror. wven at the orders of the Mayor the very soldiers had to disguise themselves and yet every morning they reported back to head quarters that they had seen some traces of the prowlers and have shot at them and chased them but night after night they only turned up again and again to taunt them and a answer their fire with sometimes telling effect, and every night comes reports that some child a boy or girl had been strangled to death.

Though not yet called on the case but mobolized and ready to act where several score members of the Gemini who had volunteered their very services to the soldiers and the poli e police to track the strange vandals or prowlers down but the chief of police was fully determined to himself unravelthe mystery of the dangerous visitors though the Gemini laugh at him as trying to do the "Impossible".

The prowlers or window peepers, murderers or criminal Glandelinian vandals or insane men what ever they may be had been active since th the great flood receded but it was not unti ll the end of October that he they committed the act that brought the whole town down upon their trail.

But the guns still held and they were able to reach a more thickly wooded stretch of ground a little higher above the ever rising water line.

575 In a nive little modest home on South „umeranna street nine blocks from 575 the outskirts of the town and within sight of some portions of the flood stil remaining lives the Mayor of the city and his family consisting of his wife, his eldest daughter Mayble turner ei ght years olf old and six smaller children.It wason a Saturday night and the Mayor and his wife had gone to some service in behalf of the Nations cause in the war, lenvin the elder child at home with the younger children and a main maid and butler.About ten oclock in the evening soon after the time appointed for the Mayor to come home Little urner who was sitting in the dimly lighted reading room of the house with the shades of the windows down heard a noic noise whichshe only believed was in the upper part of the house.She listened intently and soon it went away only to be repeated a few minutes later.Then M aybe soon heard foot steps of a number of men on the front proch and then saw on the window sah shade the shadow of several men dressed as it seemed in long h regallas and a peakee hood their bodies erect like military soldiers and with great guns at shouldered arms.These huge military figures stood at the window and soon she heard some one rattling the knob od of the door.However the door was locked and who ever it was fumbled for several minutes at the door then leaped nimbly over the railing of the pr porch and went to the side of the house issueing as it seemed some order to other men the little girl watching the scene through a corner of the window shade.

Then she rushed to the telephone in another room and took down the reciever to call the police but as she did so another mans shade loomed before the window near the telephone, the glass of the pane was suddenly smashed out by a blow from some rifle then the muzzle of a gun was seen protruding tward her while a roaring voice said warningly;

''Drop that telephone you dirty christian cur or I'' l shoot''.

The girl now almost unable to move for fear was too frightened to do as the prowler bade her and as Central answered excitedly asked for police headquarters put through her call andwas about to rush back into the living room when a shot or two laid her low on the floor, and two strangely garbed men rushed in by breaking down the door and dashed her head to pieces by hitting her with the butts of their rifles.By this time the other prowlers had returned to the front proch and they too broke in while others remained outside on guard one of the guards hiding himself and crouching in one corner.„he other terrified children switching off the lights armed themselves with knives and rolling ins and took a position on the stairway of the hall near their bedroom and watched the men as they moved about in the lower rooms.A few minutes later from behind som- e one grabbed each child by the throat and; chocking them---

Ten minutes later a flying squad from police headquarters accompanied by soldiers came racing up the street.The house was ablaze from top to hottom and the prowlers scenting the approach of the officers then left the region of the house.As the police reached the scene and while one turned in the fire alarm they heard loud mocking laughs mingled with defiant cries and standingcrouched in the shadow of trees across the street were the shadows of the strangely garbed men with long rifles in their possession.

''Ha,ha,ha you christian dogs cannot catch us''they yelled in a loud pitched voice.You can't get us even though we be vandals.Come ahead and try it.''

One of the younger and most athelitic members of the police department heard the challenge and his reply was to sent a bullet from a fourry five calibrerevolver crashing in the direction of the voices.Then the policeman started for the men but before he had gone two hundred feet, the strangely garbed men started forward themselves and captured him before he knew their purpose and with several good blows dashed his brains out and then started for the other policemen themselves.These officers saw they were overwhelmed ten to one and though they opened fire they had to plunge into a darkened byway and with another of their taunting laughs the dreadful men leaped over a fence with the agility of gorillas and persued the policemen wildly.Others seeing the fire department coming started to even hinder their work and only when hundreds of enraged citizens appeared armed with shot guns did the prowlers suddenly disappear in the darkness.

By this time the Mayor and his wife had returned home and seeing their residence ablaze and realizing their children had been murdered they c„ caused the entire neighborhood to be aroused.Thousands of men soon had armed themselves with everything from broom sticks pitch forks, to shot guns and revolvers and even bombs and a general search of all the surrounding streets and alleys began but the strange men had disappeared as mysteriously as they had come.T e The police and others had no more trouble that night but two nights later a report came that a greater number number of the same kind of vandals were terrorzing a neighborhood in the vinicity of the St Anns Catholic School a i district about six blocks from the scene of the other nights outrage.At one home there they made thei usual appearance on the front porch and one of them rapped on the door.As the woman of the house who was expecting some flood refugees opened the door she saw some men sped speeding down the walk with rifles in their possession and she saw a part of her house on one end was afire.When the officers and soldiers arived they sprwad out and began a clean systemati systematic search of all the timber tract of the park near by.suddenly from somewhere out of the darkness a voice called loudly and clearly; ''Here we are.Don't advance a step further.You cannot see us but we got the drop on you.''

A number of pistols cracked and bullets whistled across the guarded underbrush and sunk into a sturdy oak tree.

''Try again you foolish Nat onals''came a taunting voice from an opposite direction and other revolver bullets settled harmlessly against the trees.Several of the hidden men answered the fire then firing ten shots and six policemen were hit and one killed.By this time the rest of the policemen and soldiers taking shelter behind trees also were shooting wildly in the direction of the flashes and in the direction of every strange sound and they recieved the answer in good roaring style.At the uproar of so many shots every home for blocks around the grove or park was brightly lighted and the male embers of families some armed with stove pokers and some with broom sticks butcher knives and fire arms were peering into the darkness ready to grapple with the prowlers if he appeared in their direction.

Lights of police'' dark lantrens blinked here and there like fireflies in the dark woodland the whole scene being given more supernatural touches every now and then by the shriekinglaugh, the firing of guns by the score or the high pitched blasphemious yells of the stran e strange vandals as they leaped from bush to bush and tree to tree while answering the fire and during his game of hi hide and seek with the ersuers.

''You big boons youchristian dogs cannot catch us''they shouted time and again.

''Come out in the open where we can see you you murderous glandelinian dogs and we will soon have the bracelets on you for keeps''one of the policemen shouted back.''If you want to fight us ''christian dogs'' as you call us let's fight where we can see each other.''

''Ha,ha,ha sure thing anything to oblige you''came back the strange laughing answer from the prowlers and suddenly from every tree it seemed in the park issued dark hooded figures who suddenly charged the police so furiously that they routed both then the soldiers and the male citizens down every street of that section of the city.This rout and fighting kept up for several hours untill ten more policemen were killed four citiz citizens including and untill the survivors were ready to believe that there were a hundr i hundred thousand prowlers in the woods and city who could fight successfully with them when either at a advantage or a disadvantage and who could vanish into thin air when ever they saw a flash light snap on and off.inally however the voices of the glandelinians shouted;

''Good nity dear little christian doggies, see you to morrow night and continue our little christian dog game''and the officers were heartily glad to see their forms lope across an open space and disappear.nullets from several police guns went after them and then the police again advanced but when they reached the spot their dangerous and fiercely fighting vivitos vito viso visitors were no where to be found and the weary ploice marched back to headquarters to make their usual report;-

''seen shot at, not captured.We our selves worsted.Many of the glandelinians roving about.''

With the incident of the murder of the Mayors children and the burning of his house and the fights with the prowlers and the police given prom inence in the towns newspapers the people of „osa „own began to suddenly take on a bad case of nerves..very one suspected every one else and was ready t shoot at any shadow at night time.The very city became an armed camp and police detectives and soldiers assigned to track the prowlers were in danger of being shot by mistake when they patrolled alleys as over zealious citizens armed to the teeth began a private hunt for the fierce marauders.finally the saddened Mayor through the press appealed to the citizens to put away their guns and let the police and soldiers handle the case but it was in vain.The citizens were too afraid of the lives of their children to do it for nightly calls always continued to pour into head quarters of the police that the prowlers were still about they having been reported in many remote sections of the city at the same moment many times untill the police who at first answered every call now tried to pick out what they thought were the most reliable reports and trace them down.But now a week or two more has passed since the prowlers began their visits and not only are their identification as much a mystery as as it ever was but their numbers have increased tremendously and in all the exciting clashes police soldiers and citizens have had with them no one has been able to look upon their faces to prevent their dreadful depredations and murders of children.They have been described as men belonging to the well known "Hooded terror" of the black uniformed Gargoylian Kurds of the Glandelinian Onarian cavarly and the police believed they were the .Scoodlers and what the motives of their visits were was not determined.

Some of the citizens advancee the opinion that they were after child slaves and murdered children of families because child slaves were hidden among the falmiles.Others think they are dangerous Glandelinian vandals disguised who have a distorted idea of securing plunder no matter what they have to do to obtain it.Still others are of the opinion they are clever acting spies who are able to throw every enemy off their tracks and thus also by throwing their voices lure their persuers to a point at which their voices sounded and then watch them saftly from their hiding places untill they are close enough and then shoot their persuers cow down.

They had operated in hundreds of places in the city within a week and ploice and soldiers have found sad and horrible evidences of their visits where ever they had been ,such as murder, robbery, and are arson.Yet they seem to prefer to stange their shooting game of blind and seek or blind mans bluff with the police when the moon in shining brightly.

Since the war broke out every city has reported to have been very often bord botheres with strange prowlers and window peepers and assassins of children especially those with bobbed hair.One of these prowlers who accosted young ten year old girls on the streets in Angelinia Agathia at night was caught by some of the members of the Gemini and were found guilty of having strangled several little girls at night to death and therefore were immediately executed after a short trial.

No attempts however has been successful in Posa town and on account of these depredations the people are fleeing by hundreds from the city.

CHAPTER THIRTY ONE...!!!!!!

SIX THOUSAND PERISH FROM THE EFFECTS OF EXPLOSION AND DEVASTATING FIRE AND SCHLOEDER TOWN, AND FOURTY THOUSAND IN SPERRY VILLE. NOVEMBER I3.TH.I9I2. THE DESTRUCTION OF THE LEVEES OF LAKE ST SILESIA AND THE TERRIBLE LOSS OF LIFE CAUSED BY BIG FLOOD RESULTING WHICH COVERS MANY HUNDREDS OF MILES OF GROUND. DEATH LIST PROBABLYI,200,000 PROBABLY I,200,000. A DISASTER OF THE WAR THAT WILL EVER BE MEMORABLE.

PROBABLY of the disaster that occured nez near the towns of Schloederxand Sperryville one of the chief spectator of this disastor says when questioned by Emperor Vivi n Vivian;

''In this awful calamity of wovember the thirteenth I9I2 in the valley of the Aronburgs Run the greatest calamity we believe in this war even so early as it is which has ever fallen on white men or any nation since the earth came into existance the u utl ultimate causewas clearly a war condition wholly beyond human control because the bodies of the enemy who were responsible for this h s shco shocking disaster were too strong for even the largest christian army to cope with successfully.

It was caused by one gigantic explosion about nearly a hundred and fifty miles from the city of Sperry Ville and many of those who had witnessed the blazt h a blast even from a great distance spoke of it as ''of a mighty volcano fairly blowing itself into the air..The flash seen for over a hundred miles was terrific in its glare and resembled the bowles bowels of the earth opening up and letting out the full contents in a gener dischagre discharge.The smoke shot upward h for or probably thousands ov of feet and spread far over the sky like an immense umbrella and was full of falling wreckage that looked like a descent of a black cloudburst.The disgorgement of earth, wreckage of every description and also torrents of waters hurled upward by the blast fell over the ground for the space of fifty miles and the weight of the falling materials shattered many houses of towns and cities near that locality.

The shock of the blast was more terrific than any one could dare imagine or that would almost make the angels laugh to hear some one speak of. Angelinia Agathia city nearly a thousand mioes away was rocked v iolently by the vibration, many buildings in orothy Gale city nearly as far was razed and othere with windows fairly blown out and all water mains in the city ruined and the streets flooded as these were bursted. The big city of Sperryville with a population of more than five hundred thousand people was actually leveled to the ground by the concussion not one wall of a single house left standing and over fourty thousand of the inh abatants were killed, outright and IO,000 mortally wounded and a million houses totally wiped o ut by the most terrible raging fire any one could ever think of reading of.The glow made a light so bright that a person could read by it fifty miles away and those who were wounded and a lay amid the ruins were in danger of the terrible fires that were raging. The city known as Schloeder town was also hard hit and many of the buildings not shaken down by the concussion were soon afire and nothing could stop the conflargration which dontinued to burn up all what had remained of a sadly stricken city.More than six thou a thousand had been killed and a hundred thousand seriously injured and all the rest were rendered homeless.

The results of the explosion was beyond comprehension.Whole forests of trees vibrated from the concussion that their very branches were whi pped together with such violence that they were shattered to pieces and the leave fell off the springs like a snow storm.The waters of innumerable streames shook into cats paw waves or swayed from shore to shore like water does in a basin and of hilly ground great avalanches of earth gravel and even trees wreckage occured which injured a number of towns either on the slopes or in the valleys and engulfed a great number oe peo ple

Probably of explosions at this time it may be said it was the greatest of all.The crash and din was heard at Angelinia Agathia like the long rumbling of thunder and houses swayed back and forth as if there was an earthquake and furniture fairly leaped to the ceiling in every house or jumped out of windows and danced wildly and insanely around the room or up and down.

But the guns still held and they were able to reach a more thickly wooded stretch of ground a little higher above the ever rising water line. This was a good enough battlefield if the flood did not engulf them too

Inside the rooms from the concussions felt in Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Cale cities: men women and children were thrown about the room or forced to perform performances which of their own efforts they could not have succeeded in accomplishing if you was to point at gun at their heads and command them to do so.The big smoke stacks in all factories in both these big cities reeled and fell crashing to the ground or through the roofs of the buildings; there was tremendous showers of glass from all windows of the taller buildings and hundreds of thousands of strange funny and most peculiar freaks occured.

The city of Sperry ville set on fire after the wrecking of the houses by the o concussi n concussiin of the explosion was totally wiped out by the fire and so was Schloeder town also and many large stretches of the woods besides.The surviving people of these towns or cities were totally wiped out of all the property they had all their homes were gone andcnot hardly even any clothing h had they for their very clothing.How ever from the exxeffects of the blasts a terrible disaster occured els whereswhich caused an ernormous loss of life.

Near thetown of Schloder town the Mic-Hollester run river widens out into an ernormous lake which however is dammed up on all sides to be used as a reserviour and also to o to prevent the country side from frightful inuniat o inundations that usually did occu in these regi ions. This big widening out of the river was known as La Lake Silesia and was about according to the height of the dam very deep and the big levees or dikes around this lake made the li lake like a huge one hundred mile wide and two hundred mile long reservior which held hundreds of billions of water was demolished by the concussion of the explosion and yet it was said that it seemed unusually strange that even a shock could have dislodged even a part of the levees and that if it was possible then the dikes may have been of a very unsound condition--the evidnce telegraphed on that pointlooks very bad indeed(you are in need) but the real reason qh wht why it broke was because of the concussion of the blast and the flood that insued was whooly beyond calculation or control, or arrest, a flood which in sweeping over the land turned hundreds of small streams and some large rivers into immense seas till the water could not pass anywhere over hilltops and which probably far exceeded in aggregate volume the contents of the lake.The masses of roaring waters of the floos rose and rose with the new accessions from the ever fed lake from the river and from the other streams, tills its force was completely unendurable and soon the unbroken masses of water sweeping forward at all points like a tidal wave of awful magnitude and throwing out clouds of spra on the edge of its advance like a volcanic steam blast roared on through and over c tiesxand got cities and towns in its path as if they fairly did not exist or never existed there.

In the full sweep of the flood not a single building stood most of the houses in the towns and cities beingall of wood and were swept away as if they were driftwood their inma tes screaming within them.Many of the eye witnesses wrote to the Emperor of Abbiennia that of all the towns and villiages in the path of the flood, tha t they had observed when the floods subsided the that they were nothing now but wastes of ground that there was not even anything whatever to even indicate that there had ever been anything else than what it is now--as clear of debris and wreckage as if there had not been a town city of villiage on it. In the path of the flood even the forests of smallest and strongest and biggest trees were completely swept clean.And yet in this region before the bursting of the les levees of the lake towns cities and villiages and hamlets covered the ground and countryside very thickly. The streets and towns of the towns and cities were paved and their side walks were of heavy and strong substantial stone and cement.Every one of the smallest of the towns as well as the learest had street car lines gas and eletric light and all the other improvements of any big city and each of even the smallest of these towns had over thirty to fourty th thousands inhabatnts.The big strong iron bridges which spanned every one of the smallest streams in this locality and the bridges andthe buildings of all these twosn and villiages were of strong substantial character.Yet now since the rush of the wars probable worse flod since it began up to now not a single brick of any of the hundreds of thousands of structures remains, not even a stone of the foundations, not a stick of timber.In all the territory of which was swept by the great flood there was not even a single mound left to show where the dsallest pile of wreckage might or should be covered with layers of mud or other substance.Every town and villiage and even small cities are gone, every building of them, every street, every sidewalk, pavement, and streetrailway everything else of these hundreds of small villiages and towns that covered the surface of thearth had vanished before the terrible pressure of the flood as though not a single oneof them has ever been placed there.The ground forvhundreds of miles has been swept as clean as though some mighty scraper had been dragged over it again and again and not even the lines of the streets of these towns and vill igge villiage can be remotely traced not even a foundation of the strongest building. As the immense flood at its worse was moving at the rate of seventy miles an hour the very beasts of thecountry and of the forests and nothing of the strongest portion of Natural growths could and did not escape, flight for even human beings at a distance of fifty feet was impossible, and the aurthorities of Angelinia Agathia greatly feared the official estimate of the dead was far within the truth and even the priva te estimate of the relief parties the committees, and the investoguti investigors one million th two hundred thousands was considerably far below the actual number.It was certain that the slaughter of even soldiers of many mobolization camps at the towns throughout the region swept by the gigantic flood had beenso great and so wholesale in numbers that the dead cannot be buried in weeks, and that in fear of a great pestilence added by the horror of so many bodies o slain in the big battles just passed; and the massacres of women and children sp spread not so much by the stench of the corpses as by their effects on drinking water and all the water of the many rivers the Abbiennian tribunals of Angelini a Agathia had ordered large regiments of soldiers and a Regiment of the militia to assis assist in the painful task, and also issued orders that all pro prisoners of th enemy to be put into action on the bodies and allthe Glandelinian prisoners who refused to do the work were to be shot as if they were vandals for said Emperor Vivian;

To add to the horror of this tragedy a considerable portion of the people who were destroyed were not drowned o r struck senseless but burned alive hundreds of thousands of wooden shanties and houses having been welded by the flood at the slower course where t it at least subsided, into a huge mountainous raft sixty miles in length and sixty acres in width which stoo stopped near the Mic-Allister run Woods and catching fire made one of the biggest conflargrations ever known for fires in the world and which burned on for days as strady as the worst city fire.The smoke of the fire by day was as bad as the clouds of fourty immense volcanoes in the most violent eruption, and the light of the flames by day was seen in the sky at the horizon at Angelinia Agathia over two hundred miles awny.Hundreds of thous nds of spectators and other persons tried with the fury of desperation and the energy of frenzyand despair to rescue all those caught in the roaring flames or held by the wreckage and though quite a number were rescued yet the mahority were burned and this probably caused one of the worst catastrophes in the whole war from beginning to even the end.The forests evencaught afire from the wreckage and a tremendous forest fire began which spread over thousands of acres in ten days and threatened other towns and v lliages that were in the open glens of these burning woods.

And amid such a scene the destruction of property, very nature itself, and hundreds of miles of forests seems not to matter but a fine of eighteen hundred million dollars leivied by r the enemy on a single moment on a populatio population of thirty million must mean for the millions of destitute survivors ruin and loss and breafment which anywhere but in other countires would be hopeless and even in this happened in merica would take out much of the happiness from life during a generation and probably ci cripple the nation for years to come.

The scale of this calamity however wi was not unusual.It may be nothing when compared with the destruction of the two cities of Schloeder town and Sperry villie at the mouth of the Mic-Hollester Run when a quarter of a million of the inhabatants perished in one single second or were as quickly rendered homeless and destitute or with the destruction of other big cities which now as tothreatenen the whole coast line of the country with a starvation, or with another portion of the flood at the middle near the town of Silesia which swept a away of away a third of the population of one million, or with the horrible long distanced course of this dreadful flood where the flooded rivers drowned it was believed more than two millions of people women and children and soldiers and hundreds of thousands of animals.The scale of the deat h list with the frightful flood and fire and explosion three in one was indeed very large, and when the fate of people of a christian country like Abbiennia is concerned and when it has been caused by the wicked designs of a foe which hates not only humanity but all of Heaven itself it is the scale of Calverinia and all her own disasters we can and often do unconsciously employ.We can therefore individualize them and actually feel with theunhappy men women and 582 children who after twive lifting father mother son or daughter or grandfathe and so on out of the water was struck by a piece of wreckage or engulfed in the floos of wreckage and crushed to death under the waters, or with one poor unfortunate man who with thirty relatives a moment before the flood, and a good piece of property knew two minutes later that he was alone in the world and allhis hard earned savings and savings and his property wiped out and he himself with the loss of a leg and an arm. This Calverinian scale of war disaster which had now a most profound effect effect upon the Abbieannian Government was of coirse the result of daus days and months which men had noticed the moderateness of the recent war calamities such as fires, explosions, terrific christian defeats, and the like of such tragedies, a moderateness so nearly unbroken that many of thebest of the Abbieannian philosophers held this big flood and the destruction of so m ny towns and cities an adequate reason for s doubting that the enemy was powerful enough to wipe out all property of the nation had he any desire to do so.

Few disasters of this great and intolerable war could ever becomemore memorable than this which caused such total sweeping awao of away of towns and villiages and such ernormous loss of life.All those wh who h had investigated the flood bore great testimony as to its speed and violence.General Dargar who was in it from beginning to end and saw all of its true horrors called it the greatest flood and fire disaster that had ever been known--a flood which overthrew whole wide forests of the strongest trees, wi ed out all towns and villiages and makde made great and total wrecks all over the land for hundreds of miles and overflooded two hundred and fifty rivers and smaller streams.Its effects were felt not only all over the western part of Calverinia in the south, but in orthern Angelinia and middle Calverinia so that the survivors trembled at its fury and the ground after the flood was strewn with wrecks of the forests and the bodies of the drowned lay like straws blown from all hay stacks in the country from a whirl wind.It was the most tremendous flood and fire disaster that was ever k o known and the trees of one quarter of the unburned portion of the Mic-Allister woods had been torn up by the roots and swept away and disasters all over the country occured as a result of this flood.The results of the flood and explosion and fire disaster made such a deep and solean im r impression upon the minds of the survo survivorsthat one wondered at the uncertainity which attended its exact date.General Dargar said the shock of the blast overthre the surrounding dikes of Lake Angeline or Silesia as it is commonly called.

What wasthe real cause of the flood?And why?.Aurthorities widely differed. General Dargar spoke of the cause of the flood as being the results of some great massacre of children that some large body of Glandelinians had wished to cover up a so that the evidence could not be against them and that the flood was to appear if if as if of an accident.

General ivian himself stated that the flood may have raged sometime before the explosion and that the blast may have sabeken down the /e levees of the lake and thus us ushered in the fatal rush of the flood that wiped out everything in a moment.

Others declared the flood was caused by mere accidental results of some great e explosion which leveled two cities and burned them to the ground and that the explosions was caused by some big fire raging before which had been set by landelinian vandals to cover a retreat of some badly defeated Glandelinian army army.And after a careful examanation of all records of the time general Hanson in holding a general council over the affair had the statement made the that the explosions caused the flood from mere designs and apparently implied that it was done by Glandelinian wd engineers who blew up some ammunition dumps near Carbondale with the purp purpose to prevent the christian armies from securing the munitions.The fury of the flood and its duration however had been long and terrible.The waters p spread over hundreds of miles of country in several hours and tore up the trees of the Marie Osborne woods on the southeastern section and wiped out everything in its path. The lake itself was almost drained as well as the great M c Mic-Hollester un River.And it is a strange thing to imagine that the enemy go on doing this and the Abbieannians not doing a thing to pay back for such a horrible disaster.

CHAPTER THIRTY TWO

MIC) MIC-HOLLESTER RUN BEGINS. NO. TWO.

THE FEARFUL BATTLE ON THE MIC-HOLLESTER RUN BANKS, NEAR CALVERINE. HOW THE STRUGGLE RAGED. THE FEARFUL CALVERINE MASSACRE.

IT is indeed surprising to know that all the nations of the world were excited over the fury of the greatwar, and also of he terriblecarnage at Gondinia, which was wholy unpredicted to them, untill many days later, hen they marvleeled marvelled.there was no doubt t hat many millions had already fallen, even at Vivian Lokey, and Violet and her sisters were sad and down cast, for they saw no end to the struggle, and had apprehensions that the worse was yet to come. even at the concentration of the mightiest christian army of the war so far before Calverine, all the Glandelinians in possession were in terrible consternation and the Glandelinian troops there proceeded to make strong batteiers between the city, and general Robert Vivians advancing army. Even fugitives were coming into King Vivians army u d every day during his advance, with news and startling reports of the situation of Calverine and warning him he would not succeed in capturing it as it was too strongly defended.During the night while his army was forming its own works there was some action near the small village of Walkin, in which bot both sides los lost over one hundred thousand in killed and wounded, but there had been no decisive results.and this was on the night of the twenty ninth.

Oh good by dear Catherine, the unhappy children cry, as they are borne so far away.here sorrow forever, seemes to be known as they dy die so far away.
Oh don't you hear the battle cry to daye

Oh good bye dear Anglinia to the mornful cry to day, as thousands are marching to drive the enemy away.
.here sorrow will never be gone, unless the enemy are retreating to day.
Oh don't you hear the cry, On to Calverine.

Oh good bye my children dear, in the mournful cry they hear,
As they are slain so brutally by the enemy,
In blood so dark and dear.
Oh good bye little children dear, their sorrowful mothers cry,
As they are borne so far away.

Chor.

On to Anglinia.On to Anglinia.
Oh good bye the unhappy children cry.
there is no one that is thine,
here so many thousands die.
Oh don't you hear the b battle cry to day."

these very verses written wherent exactly as printed here and in the room from were found on a sheet of paper tacked on a Stone post, and finding it had been written some child she probably tried to make poetry, so the writer signed this name and age some of the Anglinians who read it, laughed, some smile smiled, and others smiled.Though very simple as the verses were withr wherent humour it gave the Anglinian officers who also read it new inspiration, though they said that the child ought to have learned your poetry first before attempting to write it.

"On to Vivian Lokey.On t o Calverine."
go rose the battlecries of the Anglinian armies swept concentrated before Calverine and it was taken up by so many thousands of Anglinians, that the air was fairly deafening.In the meantime in the early morning, while General Gough was still far off, and advancing swiftly, a part of King Vivians army was already engaged o on the banks of the Bengal other gun near the Calverine Hills, being assaulted by heavy columns of landolinians led by generals, hemhill Hope, Stenmann woodruff, and prunk Sorgenmeyer battle had only began[illegible] it looked serious.The Angolinians under generals James Hightemma, Francis [illegible]mm, Thomas John Phelps, and Baldwin Snyder, with their leaders had at the very outset fallen wounded, and their columns unscreenable to withstand the fierce assut of the enemy, and retired in disorder, being driven back in confusion for fully a mile.At this moment general Calhounerys divisions came up and met the enemy but a horrible disvisi disaster occurredwhen division was surrounded and almost annihilated, and all of Calhounerys christian generals were killed and o mortally wounded.All the christian generals killed or mortally wounded whose names are written were as follows[illegible] Abernathy, John Adamson, Frank Jarnwill, James Barnes, Frank Lutherman, Georges Stephanis, Julius Fleischman, Josephin Antonio, [illegible] phelps, Edward Stevens, Thomas Rollin, William Kennedy, [illegible] Snyder Woodrow, who were all instantly,[illegible] [illegible] Calhoun, Hanlon Hagenschmidt,, [illegible], Fredrick Antonill, Harold Gallo, [illegible] Hudson, [illegible] [illegible] were mortally wounded.The third horse was annihilated with their officers and men only fifteenhorsy escaping.Of a counter division of soldiers belonging one to Sengaine, [illegible] only two third survived and all their generals fell and the remainder routed into confusion.General Fernando Hernando, Julio Del Domingue, Pablo Gallo, Hernando [illegible], Ramon Galvan, Tomas Jesus Phelps, George Corbett, Robert Tracy, and Alfred Parks or Porter commander of this routed division, while generals y l Gutierrez Domingo, Ernest Gabriel, Clarence Burger, [illegible] Lindsay, and Arthur [illegible] were mortally wounded, with great glory, victory, [illegible], Jim Pinkney, [illegible] Gallo, [illegible] In trying to rally thousands stricken columns, while other generals the fall in the massacre and being flesh outright were generals German [illegible], Henry Hatt [illegible], Harvard Glastonbury, Williams, David Hamilton,, Hernando Christopher and Shoemaker [illegible].These were all flesh then taken prisoner, while generals [illegible], and Harrison; publicity, and question with Steve Gardiner, Pershing [illegible] Abercrombie, campaigns, and Carl Hines were mortally or fatally wounded. On the [illegible] landolinians suddenly few [illegible] fell fell, being Lieutenant Wright, and o [illegible] [illegible] Gallo, Ruben Galvin, and [illegible] Quinton who were mortally wounded, while Sergeant [illegible], Ernest Pearson, and [illegible] Gallo wounded. At that[illegible] his enraged general [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] arrived and stopped the vi victorious landolinians before they advanced so far[illegible] main [illegible] landolinian columns was surprised, when they saw the freshly arriving [illegible] landolinian troops , and which had halted came up to recall their further advance, a ml during the furious contest which followed the landolinian generals Sergeine, and [illegible] Sorjeveno [illegible] forced to beg for reinforcements to come to their aid, as the Angolinians already outnumbered[illegible] three to one.General Thomas Hut Wilkins, now moved forward to support the others, and pursued Sengaine and his aid discovering the furious advance,, and disconcerted a by the appalling carnage among their ranks, fell back across the stream.Sengaine retired toward a little branch of the river, whereone hundred and fifty thousand men were now advancing under general [illegible]ford [illegible]ning reinforced the [illegible] landolinians again recrossed the river, and advanced against the christian lines in great [illegible].But in this fierce advance, [illegible] encountered the[illegible] of Hayes[illegible]ians under general [illegible] Hanson, supported by the brigades under general [illegible] [illegible], and was attacked so fiercely that he also had to [illegible] retire [illegible] he [illegible], leaving [illegible] of dead n and dying, [illegible] strewn on the ground in his [illegible].In the meantime [illegible] advanced with one one hundred and ten thousand men, a second line [illegible] his own lines and though the christians fairly poured a storm of fire from their cannon and musketry, the assailants swept on with wild yells, and reaching the christian lines their front columns melted away, but the survivors assailed the christians with redoubleduvour, that Hanson's whole line was bent backwards, and he himself killed.Adrian Francis was also killed, as the assailants entered over the works.The Angolinians though driven from their works retired to their second line and held their ground with great determination.

Yet the assailants pressed on, he [illegible] Angolinians mowed the landolinians down in thousands but more and more rolls swarming over the works.Yet still the Angolinians stuck to their position like leeches, untill the left of the line began to waver,waver as they retired the Angolinians still kept up a fire which galled the enemys line of attack frightfully smouldering the line of advance in a a perfect ridge of dead and wounded.The Angolinians had driven furiously to check the advance of the exultant foe.Rebels yelling likedemons the [illegible] landolinians still swept forward, but slowly, and rushing on stormed the christian lines with greater fury [illegible] drove them back with frightful loss, and then swept on with greater energy, britian cannon from the rear post position opened a st orm of shot and shell yet the landolinians after carrying all before them were not daunted and like hundreds of thousands of enraged demons the enfeebers on the right made a swing and swarmed up to general baldwins works, but the infantry as Baldwin went down riddled by bullets from an exploding shell, opened a withering fire at short range mowing the enemy down in one hundred thousand men at one fearful volley, and thinning their ranks like with a terrible deluge of grape and [illegible] gang gang shells.

the Angolinians under general Richardsonia Logannia on the center of the line which withstood the attack, and held their position despite the fury of the landolinian assault giving an example to the other two wings, and this cause them to finally rally and repulse the assailants with frightful loss..Yet general General Sengaine had greater numbers than his christian adversaries, and his own men which had swept onward almost turned the left of the christian line.Hundreds of leg large gaps were torn in his rebel lines w by the christian fire, but on pressed the surving survivors, and being taken in flank the left wing again began to waver. The dead and wounded on both sides on this line of battle lay in many large heaps, and the enemy now observing the confusion among the [illegible] Angolinians swept on with relentless fury crushing with great vo violence upon the remains [illegible] of all withstood the ground, driving them from the works and artillery,with their long thick lines fearfully torn, shattered badly and torn out of shape.

Despite the frightful carnage, general [illegible] Wright and Logan general rallied the shattered divisions, and being reinforced by general Antonio Phillips, i restored the line and prepared to met meet the exulting enemy. They did meet the assault, but the landolinians advanced again with the fury of fiends and also drove back his christian division, and the others pressing them still further.For an hour there was a terrible mixup with the contending forces, and now hundreds of thousands more of the Angolinians returned to the fight, and as the shattered divisions were rallied a third time the struggle was renewed and raged with warmfiel fiercyest the enemy still stronger as reinforcements that even these Angolinians now were pressed back, and the rallied divisions thrown into panic -ic curses and the flying that many troops were pierced by numerous [illegible] balls or broken down by shells, and everything in sight was in terrible confusion.The enemy pressed on after the retiring christian forces, and was advanced with irresistible force, but in the meantime six hundred and fifty thousand Angolinians made under Prince generals [illegible] ordered, three thirty [illegible] Rebs formations, and under cover of an artillery fire threw themselves in the enemy path as a barrier, and as the landolinians still pressed on, opened on confusion ing fire all along the line, and by this terrible fire the advance of the enemy was finally checked..While the horrible carnage was going on Prince Rhodes Vivian came up to his brothers support with his own divisions, and now the struggle began to assume a terrible fury.

Two hundred and fifty cannon now in position fire of the enemy thundered incessantly making a deafening din, and frightful was the rattle of countless hundreds of thousands of fi rifles on both sides.Four several more divisions of Angolinians were now coming up to the support of the Confederate Virginia fighting the guns, the other outwarding divisions had rallied and halted, and upon the whole line of the enemy was falling back, the christians pressing after them.General Hermann with his gross forces pressed general Bernard Sengaines forces back, but the landolinians under general Robert Lyons, and Blair Light Engineers came to the rebel generals support, and Hardins Blue with a division of Kingsmen, and though the Angolinians made desperate attempts to drive back the new forces of the enemy, they themselves were overthrown and again driven back for half a mile with their whole line torn to fragments.

After this success division after division of the landolinians were hastily thrown forward in overwhelming numbers against other portions of general Vivians lines and so fierce was the resistance, that it seemed impossible to imagine was that th e carnage really was.Hundreds do of thousands after hundreds of thousands rushed against the christian lines, and in the fearful struggle general Robert Lyons was killed, and his two aiding generals Blair Light Engineers and Hardins were mortally wounded.Every landolinian division of fifty thousand men each, that were brought against thechristian lines, were crushed to fragments, but every th time these disasters happened, others were led on, and the struggle was kept on with unabated fury.All along the main left wing of King Vivians I ho Immense divisions of the landolinians were pushed against the christian works, and though they were incessantly met a murderous fire from the cannon and musketry, more and more came to the support and upon the christian at this section began again to fall back,however for the four successes already gained the landolinian losses were at upwardsm, but they were undaunted and pressed on over the second line of works.But as they did so their men again fell fell in thousands.The other section of the christian line still held however, making the enemys lines reel from from front to rear and causing great consternation.Finally a landolinian general and six colonels were killed, and some other generals also by the names of Catskin,, Thomas Edwin Grey, Mo.John Gallagher, Glenster, and Donald Brunel, while Ray Lyrikin, Arthur Jameson, Brandy Jones, Cornish, Abner Pinegallester, Cannon, Biddle, Smiles,, Pelletier, Sullivan, and Pembroke Jacobs all brat have were mortally wounded, and several others by the names of Ronald Thomas, Robert Jennings, and Pellingmore severely wounded.Finally was the only one who fell fell on the landolinian side, the latter generals being named having fallen on the christian side.The others still were no fellows being fourteen altogether.

James Cannon, John Gonzales, Jesse Gonzales, Ed Farrow, Walter? Hardcastle, Woodruff, Arensberg Cornish, Henderson, Patterson, Washington J.B.Evanston, Rhe Shiloth, Theodosius,, Hardcastle he eye Hard in Th e gun, gard Hagried, Hardcastle, gentleman, Calvin and Wagner were wounded.These were landolinian generals.

The ground for the length of seventeen miles was fairly obscured with the bodies of the dead and wounded of both sides,and all the trees for that length of miles resembled ho hickory broom and so did the bushes..he Angolinians of this point were withdrawing under cover of the woods, and being heavily reinforced at nine oclock bybgeneral Katzejammer the Mandelinians continued to advance, but the center and right of the christian line had not as yet given way.and in due time more christian divisions came to the support of the others, and fiercer and fiercer became the firing l along the whole line, but the Mandelinians still came on in grand array their hundreds of thousands of cavarly not in the action charging forward now at a tumerous gallop on the right to make a swing and take the christians in the rear.The works the Angolinians were defending were bearded or wooden fences rail fences and breastworks, and these were so badly hashed and torn already by the storm of the enemys bullets, that the fences were about tofall to pieces, while the thousands of dead and wounded were increasing in numbers, and were dreadfully cut up near the works by the tempest and shrapnel balls which was di e discharged by the cannons in possession of the Mandelinians.However a portion of the enemy was again checked in their furious onset and as the christian fire never lit up so many Mandelinians were so badly riddled and cut up by the storm of bullets that they were hard to recognize, and most of the Mandelinian cavarly and who had fallen in the flanking f charge had so many bullets that through their chest, legs, or body that other were almost cut off, and the charge had been a howling f i failure.

As were had went into action the discharge of cannon and musketry became so in incessant on both sides, that the cracks had grown frightfully intense, but yet the enemy continued to advance.already the christians had been pressed back three and one half miles.Two hundred and of seventy seventy five thousand men with one hundred fife field pieces had now also arrived to the aid of generals Vivians christians and these soon joined in the bloody fight their guns opening with many charges of canister and increasing the frightful carnage.Other Angolinian guns soon arrived pouring in a raking fire that was equally effective, and caused greater destruction among the enemys serried ranks.The Angolinian gunners served at their guns until h undreds were all shot down but hundreds of others were there to take their places and the fearful art illery fire was kept up without ceasing.

Yet despite all this the Mandelinians continuedtheir fierce attack.Sides of assaults were continued along thewing, Vivians line alone, and each attack coming in succession every half hour was repulsed with the loss of thousands.However the enemy was ever confident over their successful advance so far, and made another assault with redoubled fury, while the Angolinians also redoubled their courage. As fast as the one columns in grey melted away in the face of this deadly fire, along o he christian line, hundreds of thousands more assaulted the works.

Pierre Vivian also had his hands full.

"We must be hold these works for the Duke of Christ and his blessed mother" eh shouted his christian commanders."Trust in the Lord and his blessed mother and by they will save the day for us."

With a a yell of fury the Mandelinians along th is point continued to sweep on toward the works with the wild speed of a frightful avalanche.They came very close to the christian lines these position entended? entended for five miles, then a mighty sheet of flame seemed to sweep the works the full length simultaneously, there was a deafening, murderous crashing, annihilating roar of cannon and infantry, followed by scenes of withering fighting, and the first home line of assailants the length of the works dissolved before that merciless fire.The line of survivors who were thrown into great confusion, but the Mandelinian leaders cursed and swore and blasphemed, and ordered the rest on under pains of death on their own side.

"Forward."Yelled the Mandelinian generals."We must take those works at all costs."

Most of thecurvi ors now resumed the advance, but again on again raised themost destructive effects of a cannon, of that same murderous fire, which tore the grey lin destructive through and through.The main columns continuedtheir charge and reached the first lineline of works along Germaine Vivians front. Here the slaughter was terrible.The whole front of the charging mass withered, and many divisions recoiled before the terrific fire they met, and yet as the others still continued to advance, the Angolinians turned the full force of their fire upon the turning their line to fragments, and increasing the carnage at every volley fired, untill the shredded grey lines were in great confusion.It indeed the centralgrews the main columns of Mandelinians who confused, and despite the curses, plends, a d and threats of their furious commanders broke and fell back, their officers trying in vain to check themselfsof the Angolinians to increase the demoralization of the Mandelinians swept upon them in a fierce counter charge driving all the Mandelinian columns back shattered and mangled, and drove the whole line out of place(first place.)

On pressed the Angolinians yelling like a legion of demons themselves , and the Mandelinian generals dep despairing to rally their men appealed for heavy reinforcements,their shattered troopscoming badly mixed up and like panic stricken mobs.Still the Angolinians were pressing on furiously, driving the Mandelinians back still further with frightful losses, when sudde nly heavy divisions under g general Indigestion arived and checks checked the furious advance of the christians, and throwing them into confusion.

This gave all the other divisons of Mandelinians timeto rally, while the fresh divdivisions nder general Indo Indigestion moved on tward the d retiring christian linne, a part of his forces getting around on their flank and assailing them.The left wing of gnegal Indos Indigestions division engaged the christian line under general garnard Costellio, and assailed his wave of men with irrestible fury, and as the carnage increased minute by minute, Costellio, with his division shattered to fren fragments, andcthreatened with annihilation, was obliged to retire, while by this time the other big Mandelinian columns had rallied, and they now marched o the left and pushed n against the christians under general Vivian,and terrible number of wasted corpses along this point ground showing dreadfully while the infantry supporting the chain of cannon started a furious fusillade of vollays.The slaughter was now becoming more terrible.The Mandelinians were mowed down like snow in a blizzard, and theground the whole length of their furious advance, was heaped with the corpses of dead and wounded of be both sides intermingled, presenting a scene as of a regular cut er piver of bodies.General Indigestion was killed, and twenty of his st aff officers some on gallopper, Donald Mc Pegram, quartermain Prin ceipal, Nelson Allen, Lenny Vertop, George Emmet, Robert Lindsay, Leonard Lamy, Leonard Vivian, Leonard Lamar, Lieutenants Preston, Hadden pinckpham, and Josh Gaines were mortally wounded making in this battle a terrible toll of Mandelinian Mandelinians generals already.General Indigo Indigestion Jamin the also wounded in the forehead and the Mandelinians with his overthrowings had received heavy loss under him in a an hand them, and he himself was killed afterwards, and most of his staff were killed or mortally wounded three being Alexander Reynolds, Thomas Preston, James Hamlin Shelf, Joseph Edward Reeves, sometimes Preston, Atherton gaines, Thomas Preston, gerald Thomas, and Francis Lewistiller.

This fierce battle raged for a small withings called Pseudo ,yes and certainly ought to have that name and never blood yet did shed gushed there such a battle or such carnage.The chief action like of general Vivians the whole length, seemed to flash fire and smoke, and yet the Mandelinians being reinforced a fourth time p ushed confidenal to press o on and after an hour were the whole christian line for storming their ground so gallantly against overwhelming numbers was literally cut up and thrown into terrible confusion, and on their side also heavy also christian generals fell.They were Henry Lipsom, Francis Preston, William Pendleton, Pinckpham Butler, Marvine Preston, James Costello Leonard Costello, Robert Hunt,Johnston Breckenridge, Hunt : Colquhoun, Preston gum, Hugh Middlebrooks, John Preston, Francis Thompson, Roberts Peyton, Randall Porter Walker, Zantango Prague, James C Preston, Hampton, Hartwood Anthony, Preston Fielding, Thompson Hamilton, Gallon Wright, Crop Preston Breckenridge, Hardwick Benjamin, Gilbert Lawrence, Robert Breckenridge, Thomas Hill Irving Hutchinson.

The completion of these christian disasters was already beyond control, and general Vivian soon realized that his whole right wing was being rolled p up and cut to pieces, and feared too in two hours that the day was lost and that Mandelli he wanted before Mandelinian could bring up the main columns also longed for the more hasty advance ofgeneral gaston Vivian, and called him father to sent the fleetest cavarly man to hurry him on while the great guns redoubled his some exertion and sent the messengers as requested to citizens Hotel himself and the Mandelinians on surrounding on to overwhelming numbers and his own forces driven back four miles, On came the Mandelinians with more terrific fury , following the routed soldiers, and yelling like infuriated cannibals as they advanced unopposed now.General Vivian becomes desperate and as his other forces were inactive yet, and his brothers k in Mandelivirgens army still held its position he quickly as possible threw general grannis Lan Lafayettinias forces in front of the fiercely advancing forces Mandelinia was fiercely advancing to thereon, general Robert Vivian himself had also seven hundred cannon massed upon the fee, and these within a quarter of an hour while the other christian forces were in confusion opened a a storm of grape and canister.The Mandelinian forces were galled beyond description but still the surviving Mandelinians came on with fixed bayonets, and the retreating forces of christians had to continue onward.As they met slight opposition hundreds of thousands of the Mandelinians of continued to push on undaunted by the severe storm of grape and canister from the seceseven hundred galling and other guns, the retreating Angolinians only keeping up a furious clattering fire.It was at this moment that the head of Lafayettinias force came up, but as Lafayettinias main forces was yet too far back, the advance guard could do but little against such overwhelming numbers of rebels and they were soon thrown into the samecconfusion as the rear rest.

The art illery fire of the christians still raged in a frightful manner mowing the Mandelinians down in more thousands, but in the face of it all the Mandelinians continued to advance.Onward and still onward pressed the assailants in fearful array, and again they caught up with and swarmed among the christian columns in fearful numbers.Like furious demons they mingled with the christians, and the whole line was pressed back furtyer and further by the fury of the Expect, but still the Angolinians having nothing but confusion and no fear at all, struggled with their adversaries, using bayonets, pikes, sabres, and their fire arms at close range or picking up stones and rocks and hurling them at their enemies, and in the midst of all the frightful yelling,on both sides, could be heard a roaring withering fire at another point where Lamis Vivians army still stood its ground, and here a more frightful slaughter was going on back, and yet still the gladelinians were making the most superhuman efforts to drive them back into confusion, and during the awful carnage, and under cover of the smoke both sides suddenly as come togather in a tumultious mixup, and soon the dead and wounded of both sides were piled up in windrows inside the very christian position, but fu for fully ten minutes the furios hand to hand fightcontinued.

Thousands after thousands of the gladelinians surged forward through the battle mar mark, and the ranks in gray and the ranks in purple mowed each other down, the Angelinians resisting their desperate assailand with the fury of tigers, and fought with all their might ,butin vain, for they also were overwhelmed, the gladelinians not being daunted by their own losses and pressing their advance.Indeed it seemed the enemy was bound to win thebattle at all costs swarming upon,the christian works in greater and greater numbers, their chief object as general Vivian soon realized was to capture the fiercely thundering centexmeter guns for toard the canno cannon to capture the fiercely thundering centexmeter guns for toard the canno cannon surged most of the massive limn only to be torn to fragments and their men go down in still many more thousands,General Jimmie Vivian fearing the loss of these guns, as seeing that for some reason or other gladerlinia was too sl slow in reaching the retreating christian columns under his brother Germaine decided to withdraw to the shelter of the main line of works and behind thebatters and here defend the position at all costs.he hastily sent a messenger to order him to go back and concentrate on the assailants going against the batteries.
galderlinia received no messenger,The enemy saw to that, but Gladerlinia soon realised the enemys main intentions for he observed all going on, and was half on the way when he heard the new sound of firing far to his rights.
"It's all right" laderlinia said to his generals."Those gladelinian columns are heading for those batteries b batteries.I'm not as blind as some think."
It was just ten oclock that morning when gladerlinia concentrated one u quarter of his forces which had arived upon the assailants, and while waiting for the rest to come up sent some of his artillery to the support of Jimmie vivian and a force of caverly to rel y Cor Germaines divisions, and while this was being done the enemys lines was being torn wider and wider by one thousand cannon along a line of six miles mostly gatkling guns.gladerlinia was bound to repulse this fierce attack if he could by keeping up thefearful cannonade and musketry fire, untill he almost destroyed the assailing columns, but the gladelinians were a good deal strong stronger in force than he could a imagine, and those, though columns after columns that came within range were rendered and shivered to fragments, continued the assault with indomitable fury.th o the gladelinian generals however it seemed like suicide to cross these meadows and small green plains, before the rallied christian line and before laderlinias batteries and infantry which seemed to rot the heaven and world on fire with their cerrulitting musketry and cannon fire.Brigades by scores were torn to fragments.The generals did notwish to make such an attempts but general Lucille Dickson in command of the rebels in person was bound to drive back gbert Vivian and so the generals had to obey.
Over the carnage swept meadows the surviving gladelinians cold columns rushed, and though again the front lines began to disolve, the other divisions ruthlessely rushed on and when they were also mowed down in turn, the survivors and their general generals then n began to hesitate hesitate, for they could not understand it to witness the appalling slaughter of their countrymenore
These open meadows were enveloped in the smoke of canister untill hardly nothing could be seen, and knowing that they would be utterly annihilated if they retreated now, when so near the christian lines, the gladelinians who had at first advanced as fast as men could rush, now stormed forward like racers, being bound to get across the death plains, or die in the attempt, knowing that when they could get near enough the christians would not be able to dre depress their artillery enugh to shoot them down, and that the only slaughter would be from the musketry.gladerlinia saw their purpose however, and the more further the yre advanced the more further he withdrew his artillery and infantry, increasing the total slaughter with the same canister and musketry storm.The gladelinian leaders however were big fools indeed, for they kept the advance going though the men went down in monstorous multitudes.They even ordered the men forward under the pain of death.The survivors feeling it useless, and suicidal at that, kept on reluctantly, but more slowly, and though five hundred platoons melted at once before that annihilating fire, the others inspired of the desire for revenge, continued on with frightful yells, and still the christian fire was so withering that thousands more in grey fairly encumbered the ground in literal minutes.Yet being only fif fifteen hundred feet from the blazing works now, the countless survivors rushed bravely on, th ough every platoon that came within range of gladerlinias cannon and musketry were mowed down quickly, and frightful gaps torn in the main lines.They were being fairly decimated but now they were very close upon the line of christian works, and swarmed over in terrific numbers, mingling with the gunners and infantry in terrible confusion.The Angelinians fought with the fury of desperation, but they could not hold hold the works, and so overwhelmed were they that gladerlinias divisions were flanked, and threatened with annihilation unless they yeilded.Vivia and her sisters were in the foremost ranks, and though they had no intentions of taking any part in the fearful fight, they did s during the fury of the struggle try to rally the confused masses, by waving flags they snatched from fallen color bearers and by their presence and brab brave examples.Yet gladerlinias men could move have never be rallied for their wholeline was cut up and shattered by the fire of the vily foe, and by the full example th of the little girls, and all the officers could do was to keep their columns in good order, and by this most of the Angelinian columns were rallied.All of gladerlinias cannon which being further to the rear had not yet been reached by the gladelinians and they had been withdrawn but were soon again in fierce at action,protecting the divisions already rallied, and so covered them as they made appalling counter charges in anffort to chek the wild advance of the enemy, and though driven back time and again, they hat kept it up untill the enemys line on their front was shattered.but nevertheless general gladerlinia had lost too heavily to ever maintain his ground again, and he felt sure he would have to abandon the artillery to the enemy ul unless his other divisions and reinforcements came to his aid, before it was too late.hundreds of shells per second from the batteries were exploding among the rebel l columns as in the meadows, killing thousands and wounding more thousands of reel rebels who were still pressing on.

Though threatened with tetemporary repulse as they were, the gladelinian leaders realised that gladerlinia was weakened, that his main forces had not arived to his assistance, and that his s line was shattered shattered.Mazed in their lust of victory and more christian blood, the gladelinian leaders had become more reckless, and only reformed the shattered gladelinian columns in the front of the main line who were overwhelmed with exultance, and eager to go at it again.The very meadows seemed to be plowed up and torn into ip channels of furrows and shell craters by the withering tempest of bulls, exploding shells.the gladelinian leaders again orderedtheir men forward under pain of death.As they continued to sweep leaving thousands wrecked and wounded behind in their roaring and thundering and screaming hell, and rushing on with the fury of demonsagain the other rebel columns were fairly torn to fragments, and though the survivors rushed on stoutly, their losses only became the more terrible.This caused some confusion again, but the general generals rallied the gladelinians, and so they continued onwith a deafening, corrupti ing roar a storm of hurtling shells plows through their massive lengths full length from from front to rear.By the destruction caused by this, the gladelinians were once again thrown into confusion, and general consternation prevailed narrowly escaped from one of a second storms of shells that exploded dangerously near,his horse with an earsplitting crash that shook the ground like an earthquake.
The gladelinians were now starting to full back and the foremost seen observed the reason for the stubborn stand of the Angelinians.Violet and her sisters were frantically waving flags, and doing all their best to keep the christian columns in good order, and now for this they seemed to be the worse target than any of the Angelinian soldiers, for guns and pistol went down severely wounded, while the uniform dresses of he sisters were reduced to rags from a torrent of bullets that almost stripped and tore their flags to shreds.However the little girls realising their danger threw themselves on the ground, and still kept waving the flags.The gladelinians were still badly demoralised by the heavy fire of artillery and musketry the Angelinians still poured upon themhowever their leaders would not have anything else but the advance and charge to be continued, the big fools they were, and managed to to reform them, and knowing that gladerlinia was still more crippled, and many of his guns dismbled, that his other divisions did not yet come, the generals again ordered their gladelinians forward, but this time to advance in seperate columns so that they could charge without meeting such disaster.
On e they came again this time in wedge formations.As they advanced a perfect hurricane of minnie balls, canister, chain shot, shrapnell and shell to crashed and ripped and was not crushing through the seperate grey columns with good effect and though column after column a fourth time was torn to fragments, the survivors rushed recklessly on and tried to move forward with dreadful fierceness.But so quickly as the columns ran into the wide open meadows and swept across the plains they were returned to fragments.This moment was the most determined and terrific
, but then the question was, the rebels storms across these shell and grape swept meadows and plains and thatthrough large divisions were advanced with such fury if so if to carry all before them but they received the full destructive force of the christian fire which mowed the 9 two divisions down but on and on pressed, cheers yelling in so many voices that noone could possibly have counted;
"the were than the shrieking of his own army of fiends, and the battle fieldresembling thatwhere the upsidownfiendsdemons the rest of the gladelinians came up joining the survivors, yelling more fiercely than the former columns making the heavens ring with it, and t the distant woods to echo it in a very weird manner.It seemed as if every demons and tortured soul let loose on earth from hell, were venting their rauge and horriblesuffering upon the air and earth in one voice or yell, or which o probably overwhelmed the shrieks of all these souls and demons put together.
It was certainly deafening, and bloodcurdling, worse? than the shrieking of the wildest pt btp typhoon itself.Though this terrific yell was heard plainly by the Angelinians, they were not discouraged.they kept up the terrific firing, as the whole new forces of the gray wave swept on..ut yetthe gladelinians rushed on gallantly and it was terrifying to see how many of their massive ranks melted away.Yet still foolishly and recklessly they kept on advancing in seemingly endless numbers, but several divisions far to tothe left being almost wiped out fell back in terrific confusion.All this while laderlinia still retained his works and artillery the enemy was striving with such violent efforts to capture, but the assault of the enemy though again held at bay, was not driven back.

the conflict here indeed was terrible for every column of Glandelinians that did surge up to the works an and among t the artillery fairly melted away as fast as they came.to countless survivors who were following were compelled to halt again, and make a stand, and then again tried to come on, and the Angelinians under Laderlinia realizing that they were overwhelmed, that no reinforced reinforcements or no one of the other divisions were arriving, and that they were unable to stand any longer before the frightful frightful assault began to waver, the enemy pressing on with irresistible force and fury.All through those two hours of frightful carnage, though his line was had badly thinned, Laderlinias men had k held their ground , but now the firing of the Angelinians had ben so severe and continuous that they began to exhaust their ammi ammunition, and as the rest of the rebel columns crossed the body strewn meadows and plains, the fire they met was not so spirited as before, and though the front lines had almost recoiled in expecting annihilation seeing this now took heart, and rushed forward with tremendous fury, and with fixed bayonets thinking to engagethe Angelinians hane hand to en handcovery front rank the christian fire still cut down, but on swept the main line encouraged at the wavering slackening fire.Yet the cannons still thundered with the same fury and columns of the Glandelinians were again shattered and almost dissolved before this destructive fire, but again column after column came o on anew, but the art illery fire also began to slacken

uddenly to the surprise of the Glandelinians portions of the christian works which had ben firing only feebly seemed suddenly afire, and the Glandelinians thinking it was probably their large final discharge pressed on with all their speed, charging with dare-devil- recklessness.Yet the fire extended still more to their surpurprise, the massivelines in gray un-withered.They were indeed taken off their guard for they had believed that Laderlinia had run out of ammunition but they soon discovered that twenty or all of general Laderlinias other divisions under general Glandesld, Haller Elden, Beppe James Evans, John ester, Hilen Whitehead, Lemshin Lemsin , jack gandriff, Frank prayering, David gwenner, Galselins Mellon, Marcus ware, Vivianis ganpson, Mackenzie Ford, Clive, Salitary, Lemington , tandard, Mackinac, Lenbil Shoemannia, Clide Grabb Gulbie, and Joseph Garber had casualp, and reinforcements sent by Robert vivian filed on in on the right.

However the rebel generals still n ignorant of his fact pressed h thd their Glandelinians on.The assailants came on in full force this time but shamefully to tell were again shattered and driven 2 thto consternation.They tried to press on but anew, were shattered encemare and broken into many parts by the terrific withering fire poured upon their disolving line, and the left wing of the Glande linian wave became panic stricken, and retired in the greatest confusion.The whole line of the assailants had been reduced to fragments, hundreds had been slain every second during this last fearful charge, and the tremendous cannonading again opening up with renewed vigor i increased the confusion among the disordered forces of the retreating foe, the carnage along this point being at its height now Shemmin columns seei ginning thattheir attack was useless without their leaders send ing the full force forward, and hearing that general Gusillio Johnson was blown te pieces with his horse by the explosion of a grapeshot began to retire from Jimmie Vivians and Laderlinias front, while the divisions under Germaine Vivian having rallied long before were advancing against the enemy.

Though the enemy was retreating the battle was raging just as fiercely, may even more fiercely, and a rapid turning movement made by an Angelinian force under general Gallahan caused Laderlinias army to almost surround his own assailants or former assailants, and all these Glandelinians turned and fled, the flig ht quickly developing into a panic.Pursued by Angelinian infantry, while the christ ian artillery still poured a raking fire into their flanks, the Glandelinians were driven into a stampede a stampede.However the main Lanselinian batteries having early in the morning been placed into position opened a spasmodic dron drum fire, which shelled the advancing christian lines, and even their artillery fire became so deadly, that the left wing of the Angelinians began to fall back again, but the Lanselinians opposing Laderlinia did not follow, though six eight hundred and fifty five thousand had fallen in their last desperate assault.All the while the battle had been going on along the line of Germaine Vivian his brother and Laderlinia, those not in action, or who could not go get into action, buried two hundred and twenty fivethou thousand of their own dead, and over a hundred thousand of their slain foes, and over four thousand four hundred were still left on the battlefield before Laderlinia had come to the aid of the artillery, and those had not been buried yet.When the general repulse of the assailants had come and th ey fere were added by the eight hundred thousand fallen Glandelinians.

It was now ten o-clock, and ging Vivian under cover of a thick mantle of smoke produced by the furious battle, ada advanced as much of his force as c he could get to move forward and assault the enemys lines before they could make any reformat ions.The Vivian girls who had not been wounded, had seen his advancing columns move forward before Laderlinia finally repulsed his assailants, and saw that the long line of the enemys works were within their sight, and that these either were not occupied by any Glandelinian forces or that they were abandoned for the way seemed perfectly clear.So the little girls hastily went to Jimmie Vivian their brother, and told him of their discovery.In less than half an hour during the time of the lull in the battle, a largeforce of the Angelinians went over to the surprise of the enemy in the main works, and all the artillery was pushed forward and massed upon the enemy.

General Jimmie Vivian had captured the works along this line , which extended for ten miles without the slightest contest of any kind, or without firing a shot.It however turned out to be a blunder which caused the loss of the battle.It was true, Lucillie Vivian was killed, half of his army was destroyed, and Bernard Castellices wiped up u out but Manley had come up in the meantime and during the lull, had restored the broken remnants of Johnsons army, and ordered Shoemannia to retake all that was lost at any cost whatever.

Calmannia Shoemannia moved forward his own big divisions under Jacknell and Adele-De-Carbe and Beppe Evans, and he sent Lamar Hylston forward to make the first assault.

Lamar Hylston thought it was suicide to assail the works but Shoemannia ordered him forward under pain of death.and Shoemannia said to his chief generals that if he failed to recapture the position before eleven o-clock he wh would shoot himself. A few minutes later aft er the Angelinians under the three generals had established in the captured works, and brought up all their artillery and extended the lines and at the same time th at Laderlinia was moving forward once more to strike Beppe Evans in the flank, hey scouts were frantically waving flags everywhere, signal stations were in constant operation, and there was some quick movements observed in General Robert Vivians army and it was seen these divisions were moving forward in a hurry.The general part of the battle was beginning.Violet and her sisters could beat the boy scouts in their operations, and as several of the little girls were with the boy scouts, she saw one not far away signalling in such a manner, that for some reason his responders did not catch his motions or misunderstood him misunderst ood him.Angelina knew that it was a large force of the enemy under Lamar Hylston was advancing through the Marie Osborne woods with the purrpose to manouver Jamie vivians flank, while Shoemannia was advancing to hurl himself upon generals Vivian his sons and Laderlinia simultaneously. She could see all of them from a high rise of ground through her field glasses, and by until unfurling her own flag she soon waved it in such a way that all the officers who observed it ordered their men to arms, and they signalled back to their main generals.King Vivian himself was startled by the sudden booming of fresh Baldwins artillery, and behold with appalling dismay a long wave of Glandelinia Glandelinians probably under Calmannia Shoemannia, and whose rign right was formed into ten divisions.Baldwins batteries flashed fire at every discharge, and Robert Vivian felt the earth tremble under him beneath his feet from the concussion of the distant cannonade, and then the batteries supporting Glandermines divisions broke into action, while from his lines in the rear came a crashing roar of musketry telling that a force of rebels u nder some general had turned his right flankaglang general Jimmie vivians lines the rebels in a long wedge drew nearer with amazing rapidity and rushed toard the christians with fixed bayonets. Jimmie Vivian was warned of Lamar Hylstons approach through the left wing of the Marie Osborne woods, and changing the form of his position, he massed his batteries and from their angry mouths, poured forth perfect showers of shells mingled with canister and grape and gang-gang-shells.Upon Lamar Hylston surprised columns swung among the trees tops and through them fell and tore that awful shower of death and destruction.All the nearest of the platoons of his Glandelinians were mowed down, while suddenly the showers of shells, was added by more canister and also chain shot brought up to the captured works, as the rebels came within range of these guns.The rebel army spread out however through the woods, seemingly larger and mightier, and despite the awful carnage advanced on making a swing to their right.The battle of Jimmie Vivian had resumed.The advancing columns came nearer and nearer, the christian batteries and the Angelinia in procession of the works continued their fire, and the reeking atmosphere above the works became dense with smoke.The whole line of christian batteries fairly blazed, and as Lamar Hylstons army still came on the Angelinians opened a general fire with all their musketry.There was no checking him however.Though the front line of his Lamar mannions were torn to fragments within ten minutes, the main column of his Glandelinians advanced on like a carried tidal wave.Again their whole carried line was plowed through and through, but one of the longest of the columns apparently in front drew out of the woods at last, and changing their movement began to bend toward the south in such a way th at it was soon Jimmie Vivians line was being overlapped.The crush came and the left of Jimmies line fell back in confusion.

At this critical moment general Mic-Powal Jacon whose artillery was some distance beyond opened like a thundering o volcano, and the Landelinians moving in this direction went down in great numbers.Their losses were becoming frightful, but having crushed Jimmies left, they advanced across the meadows, the immense columns of the enemy in his front and center also dashing on.There w was now a sudden series of flashes from the rest of the christian batteries still furt yer up on rise of ground and a more tremendous shower of shells and high explosives fell among the Landelinian columns tearing them down.Heaps upon heaps of Landelinians appeared, but yet though the death and destruction among their columns continued on, and more deadlier broadsides of shells tore their main line on the left fairly open the Landelinians along general Jimmies left began to hesitate.Lamar Hylston st ormed and shouted, raved and cursed but his center began to retire.Furious with rage he sprang in front of the men and rallied them and on they pushed.

divisions as the enemy advanced against him there came fearful musketry dh discharges y while his cannon fire resounded and died out at intervals.The column of the Glandelinians hehere extended across the fields and across the plains as far as eye could see, and had become a solid impentrable line.This advancing army of Landelinians being under general Black Brooks was greater than any large division of ascailants ever observed in any battle before, and yet their advance was as silent as an army of death.But the more they continued to advance, did the fire along the christian batteries and along Mullanes entire christian works continue and increase their vid vivid and deadly firing.Nor was this horrible destruction ever witne witnessed in other battles before, or any column of ascailants, so determined or silent in their advances
As the streams of shells exploded among their lines, a line of bright blue flashes appeared, and gushing forth through the small columns of smoke from the mouths of cannon like livid flashes darted restlessly along the edge of tops of rising ground, , then as simultaneous volleys were delivered from musketry, changed into lurid flashes, their increasing torrents of shells and canister again and again tearing through the Glandelinian columns, and dealing death and destruction among them far and wide, and tearing down whole lines from end to end, making a frightful scene indeed.In the pauses of the murderous showers of shells, could be heard the deafening crash of musketry, the shrieks of the wounded, the grinding and hissing murmur of canister poured down upon the enemy by the christian batteries at close range.
At intervals the solid lines of the advancing foe moving forward to assail Laderlind Gladerlinia seemed to be broken by the furious cannon fire along his lines, and by the thick clouds of smoke enveloping them in thick wreaths or by the grape torn in their waves, to assume peculiar shapes, striding across the fields, moving one ahead of the other, and vanishing swiftly into a mass of smoke from exploding shells and then reappear advancing silently.already the rebels had advanced half a mile from their own positions, and saveral feet deep in some places in the line of advance were the dead and wounded.In many places among the main line of the s advancing Landelinians huntreds of big rocks from hill sides came rolling down upon them or tearing through their massive and solid lines and causing as much destruction as shells.Sometimes the huge gung-gung-shells striking each other as they calle collided fell in opposite directions blowing rebel brigades into many fragments, scouring forth great flashes of fire, which caught everything they could burn, and along the fields before the advancing enemy, theLifting smoke revealed anew the low long windrows of dead and wounded, and confused by this sight the enemy attacking Glaterlinia began to waver anew, the heavy explosions besetting dry grass afire in their rear, which at various intervalsinervals rose fiercely and sullenly against the gloom among the high hills.Parts of the enemys lines were beginning to fall back as they saw this frightful sights Utter confusion spread among them, and yet the panic stricken ranks still suffered from the christian fire along the forces of Germin Vivians army the flashes of cannon and musketry was now incessant, the showers fell among the troops and the rebel columns moreoverwilder steadily, and also his panic stricken Landelinians were retiring in disorderat the moment when the thick wreaths of smoke cleared away again in the temporal pauses of the cannon firing or exploding shells,the dead and wounded of Lamar Eylsteas forces were exposed to view.In general parts of the woods where the dead and wounded lay the thickest, the surface and of ground among the trees presented a regular sea of bodies.The sight was appalling to Lamar Eylsts Lamar Eylsteas.The corpses had been dreadfully cut up by the deadly terrm terrents of canister, and the dead lay eatigd in big windrows all along his line of advance and beyond the rear of Jermin Vivians line.

Germaine Vivian also had his own hands full,clear and distinct was the mighty thunder of his own batteries,as they sent whirling torrents of shells, and from time to time the cerrics of bursts, and more fierver explosions rent the air, and as ever the tempest of canister swept howling and screeching through the ranks of the enemy under Duppo Grass mowing his men down and hearing scores of thousands of mangled and bleeding to the ground, and there was witnessed such sickening sights as took courcourage and consciousness, followed by a rapid revulsion of thearrested blood, and a tingling sensation of agony trembling through every nerve and fibre of the body.About two minutes a advance Duppo Grass columns still pressing on werereinforced on the right by fresh bodies of Laude Lindens and large and gigantic through a cenbrewoods, the main column of Khoemannias division now ap appeared an onrushing wave of greycoats.The first part of their were seemed to be riven to fragments, and recoiled but the left of the were o moved forward still in a monstorous line, while the center also crumbling onward seemed to try to get ahead of the other wing, and yelling so fiercely that they appeared to be two armies of demons racing for the possession of a last positions Their column ten miles long were one deep grey in color, and which extended across the open fields in front of the woods far and wide.Soon their lines at all points were becoming shrouded in smoke, save in three places, near the centreFlame Glandelinians here were winning the race.Hundreds upon hundreds of the Glandelinians had reached the nearest meadow within reach of the christian line and rushed forward like a stream.

All of a sudden on the left of this rebel force in the meadow there sprang upwards an enormous cloud of smoke and earth, there was a cragged dull sheets sheeted arch of dull shooting flame like a eruption from a crater, and as if from the jaws of hell gushed a torrent of rocks earth, human bodies, while through the air was heard the furious rattling, of debris and stones hurtling upon one another after the earsplitting crash of the vast mine explosion subsided.A perfect deluge of human bodies, earth, stone and everything descended upon the others of the Landelinians with the fury of a descending lava torrent, obscuring everything there it fell for a few minutes.At the same time the mind exploded hilling ten thousand Glandelinians and tering a four hundred f feet crater in the ground, a terrific simultaneous crash of musketry was heard resounding all along the entire of germains vivians line, following followed by cannon volleys which shook the ground convulsively, and down went many ranks of the nearest of the foe, and the survivors appalling by the mine and awful cha os of christit christian fire hesitated an instant,while they hesitated their front main line was fairly being shivered and the survivors were thrown into instant confusion.

Yet their generals rallied them with frantic appeals and ordered them on under pains of death.Louder grew a fresh christian commands, echoeing a in the woods and valley.Despi edespite the havoc among their lines, the Glandelinians still continued to advance, and as Break In the Rocks division came up on the left the whole force of Landelinians led on by Khoemannia rushed forward with indescribable furyand of the columns consisting of one hundred and fifty th ousand into which the full force of the christian fire was poured wavered, and fell back, while the artillery under Bicknell and gunnes a thousand guns in number, also burst into action, sweeping the right of Break-In-The-Rocks column out of existence.
Yet the other section of his troops being still immense in numbers rushed on over the fields toward the christian lines.At the same time pushed forth a more heaviler volley from the christian lines in possession of Khoemannias works, another and another, and still l another volley more destructive than the others.Yet on swept th e assailants a part of the wave moving upon Gladerlinias whose fire now breaking out was equally appalling.This fire cut the Landelinians down in a score of columns, while a heavy shower of canister tore the In line of survivors to fragments and the rebels recoiled from him in utter panic.The meadows in front of his works was a ter that fairly buried under the dead and wounded gray coats, and the christian loss was only one third as appalling.
Duppo Grass y yet was not checked.He moved against Baldwin and Laderlinias his whole line surged up to the christian works, and frightful was the withering musketry fire th at met them.All along the line the Glandelinians were mowed down in thousands, and the survivors who swarmed over the works were also mowed down by a by a second tremendous volley, the rest of the assailants being forced to recoil, the Angelinians plowing their lines to pieces.Duppo Grass was repulsed, Lamar Eylsteas was crushed, but Khoemannia was not daunted.Is ockuns only came on against Germaine Vivian and as he moved onin front of his lines this furious Landelinian general could see in deed the fierce struggle his divisions would have to make to surmount these flamin flaming works, extending for nearly fourty miles.His immense columns moved forward steadily, in perfect order, and array under the most storming fire ever seen in actual war.The hundreds of flags and banners were high poi poised, but checked and broken scorched by each successive rise and th e very heavens all along the line christian lines seemed ablaze.A score of thousand of his Landelinians were mowed down under the first de deadly range, but it being useless as yet the survivors did not reply but their bayonets were fixed to be ready for the final reach to sweep like the crest of a very sharp wave over the rock like barrier of the christian works.
Right on.The Landelinians now reached the last gentle sl slope before and beneath th e death delivering lines of cannon and musketry,which suddenly illumined by long undulated sheets of flame, and on an instant whole brigades and divisions seemed to sink and melt away as if they were swallowed up in the earth, the light flags quenching in the pall of smoke, and only a writhing mass marked that high tide of uttermost manhood, and supreme endeavor for a wished cause.
The There was a slow back flowing, with despairing efforts here and there to bear back broken bodies, of the brave glorified by the horrible Baptism of blood.Again and again the monstorous surviving columns repeated the assault with indom indescribable fury, but the same similar experience, and thickening ridges of the fallen marked the des perate essays.
There stood Khoemannia witnessing immortal charges, which were kept up simultaneously.
Tears ran down the cheeks of the stern Landelinian general Adele-De-Garle and his men who were waiting, almost wi hi wishing to be summoned to the same bloody onset.They listened intently to the sounds of thousands of Angelinian cannons booming and roaring like the cannonade of thousands of volcanic eruptions at on once, then the divisions of Accountants who next came on at the attack, cut through the sturbborn christian lines on wilderniss left, after a few more mini minutes of the most horrible fighting of the war, but unsupported had been driven back with the loss of one hundred thousand slain, while Break In The Rock simultaneously made the same kind of a fierce onset, but had not quickly the same similar fate, though his assault had been more desperate in its attempt,but it ended all in vain.Germaine Vivian could not be forced Galmannia Shoemannia harkened intensely f r the sound of Baldonia Bicknells guns and soon he exclaimed in an agony of suspense as he looking at his watch , saw it was already half past ten!

"For God's sake where is that fool general Bicknell.Where are his five million million, which is so quickly to decide this attack.What has happened to poppo Evans and Lesser Sylvius?"

Now amid the dreadful and increasing carnage, came the call for reinforce.Shoemannia despairing of the left, and seeing the repeated heroic valor of his assailing forces, and at last exhausted in unavailing sacrifice, ordered up his main body, and led them personally to the assault.But the christian cannon kept the range perfectly.The air was thick with the flying bursting shells, whooping solid shot, swept lengthwise, plowing hundreds of furrlow in Shoemannias line, and driving the compressed air so close to the heads of the survivors that there was an unbearable burst just to shrink beneath it, although knowing it was then too late. Two of the main open columns of over two million men amid the din and confused uproar around, had almost melted away, and other surrounding brigades who stretched on in advance to the right of the line were cut down simultaneously by the artillery artillery fire which swept the nearest approaches to the main works. But Galmannia Shoemannia directed his surviving men straight forward to the left of the series of futile attacks, which had been so frightfully cut down.The artillery fire made sickening havoc.Hundreds of thousands of crushed bodies, severed limbs, and head heads and extentions of every destruc description were every where around in the t renches, on the slopes and in the ditches.Even Galmannia Shoemannias main columns began to melt away f by the score mafter came out in the open field, and immediately through the murky smoke, Galmannia Shoemannia saw to his right a battery of two thousand cannon s, quickly swing into position to sweep his entire line of advancing cattonades and quit evidently these terrible numbers of guns open opened a general fire upon them, piercing down thousands at every discharge.

"God help us reenforcements to the left wing. I must lead here."Calmly spoke Shoemannia to pick-to-pieces, and went to the front into the storm.The rebels now reached the lines they were t o pass for the further goal, plotting the fr wny amid bodies thickly strewn, some stark, silent and cold, some still with s,e slowly ebbing life, many in agony agony, that must have voice though unavailing, some pieces from sheer exhaustion, or by final orders of hopeless commands.The living from their close clung beaon of the earth, where t e dismade them;

"It's no use boys ,we have tried that, but nothing living can stand there, its only for the dead."

On in the facing face of these storming christian batteries, pushed the rebels up slippery slopes, slippery with a sea of blood, miry with repeated trampling through the christian firing burst out in a million cannonade like roar, and while hundreds of thousands went down all along the line of advance the survivors reached that final crest before all thisencounter wasting line of verminfire they encountered fierce breastwork of volleys all along the line with the Angelinians, with every disadvantage untill the flame and smoke deepened in the rest of the seen day war, and men on both sides seemed to be going down in whole lines many miles long.

Indeed fresh glandelinians fell among the army left there in the other assault, and the sod was soaked with blood.As the assailants got within range they were met by st orm after storm of bullets, grape and canister along the whole line of works, the artillery raining shells and solid shot, which swept the rebel brigades to pieces as fast as the men pushed on.Fierce was the return fire of the Glandelinians, that the Angelinians had to lie flat on the ground behind their works to avoid the destructive tempest of missle balls, and only by careful twisting could any man load and fire his musket upon the assaulting line in front.All this while hundreds of thousands of the survivors ,were seen to creep up from the right of t he line to takeadvantage of a gully back where the ground fell away from the christian fire, and new these assailants got in a full annihilating fire upon the christians close range, and gunners went down by scores so that as t hey came on to work the guns, while the troops went down in numbers too great t o be predicted.

The situation was critical.Thousands of the Angelinians in a single minute were mowed down everywhere along the line without abatement, and so the surviving Angelinians were compelled to lay against a overpower a breastwork of bodies to cover t hem from the deadly fire of the Glandelinians, and no man could stand up and not be laid down again hurt.However thousands of Angelinians had lifted his head by the prop op his hands and forearms only to catch a bullet in the middle of the forehead.The endangered Angelinians lay there for three minutes hearing the dismal thud of the storm of bullets into the dead flesh of their life saving bulwarks.Now and then in the midst of the scathing fiery fusellade, a staff officer on the side of the christians would s up appear to bring orders : and his horse would be shot from under him, the moment he appeared within range. The whole battlefield along this seething flaming line was strewn with great incongruous ruins multitudes of men torn and broken, and torn to pieces in every indescribable way ; cannon dismounted, gun carriages smashed, ammunition wagons destroyed, or flung wildly about, thousandsof horses dead, and half dead, still held in harness, accoutrements of every sort , bayonets, shattered muskets, and fragments of shells were scattered as if by a whirlwind, while the dead and wounded lay in deep and high windrows besides and on the works .Consequently the Angelinian artillery now began to bombardthe Glandelinians, peppering these with their hail of lead, and shrapnell and grape, and canister, then several strong divisions comedown from the right upon the huddled masses of glandelinians to crush them where they ly lay to sweep them back down the hill or destroy them.

But the hundreds ofthousands of Glandelinians fiercely fought them off driving them back to the works, while Galmannia Shoemannialooking at his watch, and soo seeing it five minutes to eleven ordered the vigor of the assault to be redoubled, and prepared to lead them in person.

"Hold the ground at all costs ,don't give up a t all costs." were the hoarse commands of t he Angelinians Angelinians.

It indeed was a long ghastly assault which had been made all the way up to these wreck strewn works and slopes, were the trees were so splint splintered, and shattered as if a great dye typhoon sweeping with frightful deafening uproar of the elements had t orn them down all along the line.It was hard enough to be stumbling over torn up sod, groups of the dead, centers filled up with the bodies or forms of the solitary dying, muskets dropped with quick relax, or hil feet with deaths convulsive convulsive clutch, sabres, bayonets, cartridge boxes drawn, fragments of everything, torn out intestines, and shattered remains of hum a human bodies, torn open or to pieces, and indeed the slopes were grey with the dead and wounded Glandelinians.Indeed the ground offered every advantage for artillery in possession of the Angelinians, both for cover and for effectiveny and enabled them to dispose their whole line so to bring a front and flanking fire u upon the assailing columns as if by a fine tooth comb, and even the smallest chicken could not live in this path of destruction.Other batteries were also directed so to sweep the lines of advancing troops, and as the others were now in close range the cannon continued the terrific fire on them, and for a time the glandelinians from their horrible losses were filled with consternation, while their ranks were mowed down everywhere by the hot withering fire from the well manned christian batteries, and from the sharpshooters along the breastwor s along which seven of the advanced glandelinian columns or divisions were torn to fragments, giving a wild background to the scene and stirring some scene.In the tumult and despite the frightful carnage the fresh divigions continued to forge ahead, determined to drive all before them them, and the Glandelinians at just two minutes of eleven swarmed over the works in countless numbers, and though their front line almost withered for two miles before the deadly christian fire, the survivors coming on drove them slowly back yelling like as many fiends.Roswell Custer Johnston covered the retreat of the christian divisions a ong this part of the line mowing the enemys down columns down by the hundred as it seemed, while the short t ime he stood his ground.As these christian divisions retreated the enemy pressing on made a furious assault upon Roswell Gusters Johnstons line resuming the battle anew with indescribable fury, and as they retreated in order, the other christian troops could hear the earsplitting thunder of Roswell Custer Johnstons cannonfor an hour after Shoemannia carried the works in fulilfilment of his promish, Roswell Custer Johnstons men stood their ground with the fury of utmost desperation, and only when the other retreating christian columns were far enough to the rear did he slowly withdraw his men being compelled to give way before overwhelming numbers.His line was almost shattered by i his fearful losses and several times general Roswell Custer Johnston had narrow escapes from being wounded.Gibmall covered the retreat of the crushed and mangled divisiins divisions under Gannon as they also retreated, and held his ground against a fierce and crushing sledge hammer assault of the enemy, untill @ Gannons retreating columns were far in the rear, then he also withdrew before the overwhelming numbers, brigades reduced to regiments, and divisions reduced to regiments and brigades, and the terrible sacrifice of life on th that bleed soaked field during this fatal hour was too awful for the heardilding of victory, even for the expressing face.The divisions under Lafevrine, Jennings and Germaine Givian, also gave way after being threatened with annihilation, and so woeful was the christian losses already in men and generals, that general Robert Givian himself was appalled.All his own christian batteries along his own line which at ill held swept the fields and the enemys advancing lines, causing the most at upendious varanage and even now the other retreating christians, could hear the enemy cheering and yelling as Shoemannia gave the order "Forward" and could feel the thrill of their deafening yells as they followed Shoemannia---to--their--death, their lines of advance,--being fairly torn to pieces along its full length, and the fresh uncovered fields was fairly paved with more dead and dying of both sides.The christian columns which were retreating on account of their losses, and being in mangled shreds of columns could not under any conditions be rallied ; and were slowly being withdrawn to the rear.

While this fearful struggle had being going on general Robert Anglins Givian had now concentrated his forces on the works of Galvarine gills and he received the retreating columns covering their retreat with all his guns and finally checking Shoemannia and driving him back.

There was another lull and also while general Shoemaunia had bega making his desperate efforts for the capture of the works general Manleys Landelinian army had arived upon the field and now was concentrating his forces for a furious onslaught on Galverine Hills with the purpose to crush general Givian br before his brother came to support him .The first grand division of Manleysarmy almost 56,567,888 strong were already coming on in fearful array making a line of advancing troops fourty miles in extent, and swooping up tward those silent seemingly deserted and unoccupied hills, rending the air with their fierce yells of victory when they heard of Shoemaunias success along general Givians extreme left.General Manley however knew that these hills were not unguarded, for he had beforehis arival seen the arival of a part of general Hansons Givians army on their summits to the right, saw Hansons men ret restore the broken divisions driven in by Shoemaunia and his scouts had observed that the positions had been walled up with stone and brick di five feet high, and all surmounted with five thousand cannon, while on the slope beyound the walls was a long line of gatling gun batteries.

Adele-De-Garbes grand division was the first to reach the christian lines under general Toney Sanguine, thousands of his men melting away suddenly in the face of a furious flanking fire from distant batteries, through those Galverine Hills yet ill retainedthe same mockery of silence, and beauty.Accountants with about 88,888,888 men followed simultaneously to the 1 advance being in the centre, but the fire from nine hundred centimeter guns from a small rise of ground near the Mis-gallaster gun, now mowed down fifteen thousand in half a minute, beforethe survivors began to surge up the sl s slope.The slaughter was horrible, the advanced divisions of Adele-De-Garbes and accountants reconiling in great confusion, then the deadly fire suddenly ceased to slaughter.

Simultaneously general Greek-De-Cheiks came up with 2 one million two hundred thousand men and the whole line swept gradually tward the christ ian position and never before in any battle since gunpowder Greek was there ever heard any yelling like there now arose upit seemed as if all the inferior of hell with everything of its horror with it was again let up upon the earth all at once, and veering their range with an unearthly clamor.Sishma III and his brother were advancing upon the centre of the christian position on the Galverine Hills, and Manley and the other commanders upon their left and right.For an hour the frightful crepitating roar and crashing surrounding Thunders seemed to fairly split the earth, and the whole of the distant ridges, seemed to fill the heavens with h the frightful clamor and also with flame and smoke.

The destruction among the long grey columns first in the range of those saving of deadly batteries of cannon was horrible beyond anything ever done by artillery before, and regiments were literally mowed down in hundreds, and five h undred fuscous gaps were literally torn in the enemys lines the full length, yet like a titanic tidal wave the whole line pressed on, until they were half way up the slopeout of range of the main batteries.Still the Galverine Hills seemed silent, though on the slopes of these hills the Landelinians lay in perfect wiedrawn, where there in the world did the destructive flanking artillery fire come from the Landelinians had now passed the unseen batteries, which suddenly became oppressively silent, the Landelinians as they swept onward tward these silent hills and stone walls still ear tattering their most frightful yells.General Hansons Givian having now recieved over half of his force was bound to stick to this position as long as his brother did, or until the defeated christians under his two nephews and the others retired to a place where they could reform, and not only that to hold to the last, and so he decided to meet the charge of the Landelinians with all the violence he could.

The Landelinians had now come within fifteen hundred feet of the works and still all was silent.They therefore began to believe that the hills were now not occupied, and the present furious gunfire from the unseen place began to confirm this to thenge on they swept to nearly a hundred yards, then suddenly there was a long undulating sheet of flame from the whole line of stone walls, darting along, like the scathing blast of rivers of sheet lightning, of gigantic furnaces from fissure eruptions, followed simultaneously by the greatest roar of cannon and musketry heard yet, that sounded like a thrillion drums and hundreds of explosions going on inessantly for three minutes.The whole line of Landelinians under Adele-De-Garbe, and Sanguinte, and Terrence Icknell, almost completely withered before this terrific fire, and general Terrence Ficknell went down smuggled and bleeding with his brother also, both being severely wounded . Never before during the war up to this time was there seen such frightful unbelievable carnage, nearly over three million Landelinians being shot down in three minuminutes, during that fierce storm of musketry and cannon.Adele-De-Garbe was almost fatally wounded, and Accountants was instantly killed, by a shell which which blew his horse to pieces under him.All the while that general Hansons main line had been silent so long, ging Givians right wing had been steadily giving way f before the assailants under Zoppo Grunn and Henry Hale, but general Hanson was not going to give way, when he knew he had superior members under Richard Lindornine, Sanguine, Baldwin, and others, and with his other division coming up he had held his ground against the surge of gray waves, and had mowed down three millions.For nearly twenty minutes the surviving Landelinian columns were staggered, and disconcerted by the frightful blow they had recieved, but fortunately for them, though Adele-De-Garbes columns, and of theother ladies leaders who had fallen had recoiled, general Federals massive columns not recieveing the fire yet were already close to the christian lines, and ans they came within range of the Federals, both sides seemed to suddenly break out in an ererplitting volcano of flame and din.The upo uproar of the firish firing on both sides was fearful hewwhole swarms in Federals command melted away, and thousands of the men who succeeded in cressing the walls only met annihilation.Yet general Federal was not discouraged, and determined to carry the stone walls at all costs.

Though tens of thousands upon tens of thousands, sank to earth as they encountered the annihilating fire of the christian guns, the survivors kept up the assault, most of Federals divisions concentrating their assault upon Hansons left and center.The attack at this point assumed an almost preternatural fury. Thousands after thousands again went down, their columns swept on anew, only to melt away also.It was awful, and more terrible was the yelling of Lichnells Angelinians as the foolish Landelinians generals rushed division after division simultaneously all along the line, and yetwhich seemed to melt into fragments, as quickly as they came within range, thereby being over over one million, three th hundred and thirty thousand killed and wounded already in Federals command. Seeing that he had the advant g advantage finding the weakest point of the christian line, Federal nevertheless continued the assault against the terrible.Yet the same shrnage was repeated.For every time the columns rushed on, the long series of walls were swept by a long stream ers of flame, and Federals whole line was fairly riven with gaps.The slaughter became more terrific, thousands after thousands going down at every step.Many divisions were already swept out of existence, but still the others came on anew, swarming tward the series of steps walls.Again one hundred and ten thousand were mowed down, and yet not one more Landelinian had gotten over the walls in any way.The christian cannon swept his entire line of graveyards, and though over one hundred and ten thousand fire b undredsware mowed down at this moment, the other Landelinians under Federal fruitfully rushed against that den death dealing deliverying stone wall, and yet again no man got within two hundred feet of it, the nearest columns being cut down.All along the line simultaneously, division after division charged with unbelievable fury, and soon federal had lost over eight hundred thousand more.It was at this moment that general Walter Harrison who was on the center was caught in flank by general Timor Hylenine and Zoppe Hunn troops of Shoemaunians and Speedlers, and was forced to withdraw to save his army from destruction and fight the two desperate rebel generals on two sides at once.The Landelinians committing in front, b observing their, changed o take advantage, and swarmed over the works now unoccupied, and in the frightful melee that followed, which lasted for three hours with the most dreadful fury, and which seemed to end the whole battle field on fire, general Hansons left wing was annihilated,, his center threatened with the same disaster and Walter Harrisons almost almost o ne thousandents forced to retreat to the rear.

The bloody action along this point had reached its worse, over eighty nine thousand more Landelinians having fallen in thesmall space of a quarter of a mile.The d deafening roar of musketry had been fearful, and now the multitude of rebels swarmed over the walls like millions of gray demons, and the long line of Landelinians being crowded by those coming up behind became on a wave thirty deep as they rushed forward tr tward the retiring christians on the center, with the seemingly fure and pressure of an avalanch, and now the firing of musket volleys was discharged in such rapid succession as to keep up a continuous din.The Landelinians remaining behind in possession of the works had swan round most of the captured guns along the whole series of stone walls in their possession,and the detonations of the cannon volleys then sube subsided as they did not want to fire on their own comrades.h hile they charged on up the rest of the hill from the captured works the Landelinians came within range of the gatkling gun batteries further o up on the very topp summit, and as soon as the retiring christians fel flew back to the rear of this battery these suddenly o opened fire so rapidly, that the whole surge of victorious rebel Angelinians was swept and shot to pieces, m millions going down at one discharge, and the surviving Landelinians realising that the new batteries would annihilate them, recoiled in confusion while those in possession of the captured works replied with the big guns they had captured to cover their comrades, and fearful was the prolonged drum drum fire of almost fifteen thousand cannon.At the same time general Minderhinia Lichnellians Abyssinki i Abyssinkilian Winkies was seen to be advancing to the support of Hansons retreating center, and those advancing advanced in formidable array. There was now a fearful redoubled uproar, and thicker clouds arose from the series of stone walls, proceeded by a blinding flash, and now monstrous gaps were seen in Lichnells columns of christians, which was seen obscured in the smoke of exploding shells , and grape and canister.The Landelinians in possession of the st one walls had also captured an outs outer trench, and as Lichnells columns came within range, puffs of smoke u issued from this also, and the df detonations of the musketry volleys was appalling, and the musketry fire tore Lichnells line t o fragments.However by this time the rest of Hansons advancing Army had come up , Hansons center was rallied, and the Angelinians themselves began to rush forward moving in solid lines tward the stone walls.The Landelinian cannon had been for a few minutes silent on account of the Landelinians who were retreating being in their range but as soon as they went to the rear of the captured works the Landelinians in possession of the guns let go suddenly.

where was a series upon series of heavy detonations, like the explosion of a hundred thousand pounds of dynamite, which seemed to shake the very earth, then came the hissing roar of a storm of canister, plowing down the front line of the advancing christians, while quickly following along the whole series of stone walls was a roar worse than the or crash of a hundred million muskets and one million cannon, which seemed to rend the heavens and earth, and the Angelinian columns dissolved like snowflakes in a furnace.But the survivors, swept on still.Another Another torrent of shells and minnie balls tore through the christian lines, dividing them into many fragments, the walls seemed to burst asunder from the hundreds of thousands of detonations coming in a quick succession, the enemy now firing with all that might.Hansons main surviving columns now came up, and the Angelinians though having recoiled for a moment now increased the fury of their attack attack and formed a perfect serried wall of men and moved on the death dealing barriers , but again the glandelinian fire opened with the same same fury upon them, mowing down hundreds of men per second, without ceasing, the storm of shells wrenching loose many limbs of trees, rocks and other things, scattering the very wreckage in every direction.Onw Onward still onward, rushed the big columns of the Angelinians, and as they reached the walls millions of shots seemed or were fired at a each other point blank, and now countless numbers of men on both sidesfell before or behind the stone walls.For a time this deadly fire caught the Angelinians nicely, and the two volumes of shots picked their larges multitudes of men by scores, and the Angelinians began to recoil but still pouring volley after volley upon the enemy by thousands of shots per second, keeping up the loud volcanic uproar, and moving down thousands more of the enemy, and as they drew back, the enemy opened anew with the artillery fire, destroying , fields of soldiers with the hurrirane of canister an and grape, laying everything a most terrible ruin.The whole sides of the hills facing the works in possession of the enemy were now packed with the frenzid Angelinians, while pickmells demorilized christians, seemed to dissolve altogether under the same steady merciless fire of the enemy as they slowly withdrew, the enemy following in large scattered columns, everything now becoming fairly obscured in the wreaths of smoke for several minutes. What was left of pickmells whole christian division was even torn to fragments , and now over the at one wall, and from every section of the advanced trench, which extended as long as t he series of at one walls , first scattered knots of graycoats swarmed, added rapidly by hundreds of thousands, and the glandelinians poured down upon the retreating christians like swarms of gray bees, the artillery covering the charge, opening fires in redoubled fury to prevent the christians from rallying, making indeed all along the line an impenetrable pall of smoke, which was pierced by hundreds of thousands of flas hes more ligh like the lights of fire flies, through a thick haze or fog.General pickmells columns of gungabos glandelinians now led by general Dangerous great a gothmann, was the first t o come up with the rearmost of the retreating christians, when suddenly with a series of awful det onat ions a new christian battery to the surprise of the enemy from st ill more a hidden resource bor burst forth in a sudden general discharge , which as the surprised glandelinians still continued to advance became so spasmodic that the det onations sounded like one long prolonged roar, far more even constant and incessant than all the art illery on Galverine gills had made, and at the same time from the woods of Marie Osborne below the Galverine ridge three columns of three million three hundred thousand Angelinians suddenly emerged, and rushed ward the advancing glandelinians to take them in flank.The glandelinians pounded by the unseen christian batteries were thrown into confusion, the new coming Angelinians advancing with the fury and noise of a great avalanch, while the hidden batteries became louder and louder, the noise of hel their fire extending, sweeping the columns of confused glandelinians again and again with the most indescribable destruction.

The glandelinians however having pushed the christians half way down the other side of the ridge, and now that the stone walls were occupied by fresh forces of glandelinians from above were not obliged to retire, and covered by covered by their own artillery fire which pause paused the region there the smoke of the hidden batteries were seen continued on, but Beppo grams on a column encountered another flanking force of christians, while the hidden battery flashed thereafter, and the glandelinians seemed to melt away in the murk of smoke, while the flanking Angelinians in heavy surges swept on heard the enemys rear, and soon everything cleared the scene out of sight for several minutes, the pall of smoke became so intense.

The Angelinians had come on in one tremendous headlong rush, and hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands crashed into and through the rebel lines from the rear, when there was a series of crashing broadsides seemingly twenty miles long all at once from the ridge above, making a noise again like the detonations of the exploding of mi llions of tons of dynamite, whose crash caused to suddenly rent the air, followed by a series of most blinding flashes, and shells fell in among both friends and foes, the glandelinians commencere making a mistake and firing among their own men as well as the enemi en enemies.Yet the glandelinians reduced the three million three hundred thousand flanking Angelinians in half an hour to less than one million, and as the Angelinians drew from the assault in panic, the storm of canister, shell and minie balls again plowed them down in thousands, and other volleys followed each other so rapidly that again there was a dfearful cone continuous roar.

Yet the surviving Angelinians kept their l lines unbroken and commenced to retreat .Yet as this h havoc continued and the other glandelinians dashed upon them, the consternation and confusion started anew, and they fell back furte furt her.The rolling thunder of musketry and cannon now slackened somewhat on the h hills but the hidden batteries continued to roar and flash,the shells deluging the sides of the hills and the woods, and the victorious glandelinians werepelted with the iron hail from every make of cannon.Yet with a simultaneous yell other large forces of Angelinians came rushing on to support those already driven into confusion, and these came on with the fury and frenzy of enraged demons.Hansell had rallied his own Angelinians, and so had Hanson and therefore joined the Angelinians who had been driven back and these counter attacked the glandelinians but still the horrible rebel fire continued.Hundreds of the beautiful trees, were shattered by the storm of shot and shell, and large multitudes of the assailants again incoming from the Marie Osborne Woods were mowed down as rapidly as they came within range, the batt le becoming so fierce now that the whole scene was like some extensive forest fire, or like some lurid scene of Dante's Infernal regions a more terrible fire than ever being let loose on the christian lines, tearing the soldiers down in even their most massive numbers destroying hundreds of thousands all along the line, and crushing the main line to fragments, and down went Hansell and Hanson severely wounded,, also Boswell Hunter Johnston, Gamma and Stuart Irvine were wounded.Now from a distant ridge other hidden christian b batteries were trained upon the stone walls in possession of the rebels, and streams of high explosive shells were hurled upon the enemy on the summit, the falling bombs, and high explosives wrecking among them, demolishing some of the walls, and making breeches in the enemys lines.The d carnage was now indescribable.

The d number of detonations of the shell explosions increased, and the series of walls and the hill summits were hidden in the thick clouds of smoke and flashing fire from the guns that the enemy replied with, the enemy at taking to these positions.It was now half part two, and the whole line of advanced trenches were so literally filled or covered with the dead and wounded glandelinians, that they could not be used any more, unless the bodies were cleared away or mixed used as bulwarks, and this work was impossible in the face of the fearful storming fire of the masked christian batteries in the Marie Osborne Woods and hill tops beyond the Galverine gills, and even Hansons and Boswell Hunter Johnston who had been forcibly been detached before ed at other points of the line, had been now for a change of luck put in command of reserve christian divisions , and these two commanders kept their lines held together without without a single break of any kind.

Division followed divisions.The glandelinians though still exposed to the destructive fire of the hidden and masked batteries in the woods and hills far beyond, remained in the captured works, though already several divisions on the left of the line were wavering as the infantry and those manning the guns ceased firing, having their ammunition untill the assaulting christian columns down below forced back the glandelinians who had ceased advanced.A large number of the longer range guns however had kept tearing the christian lines and nearly five hundred hundred thousand Angelinians more had been mowed down in killed and wounded, and the firing of the resisting rebels below aided to the less.But the surviving Angelinians managed to carry all before them the retreating glandelinians retiring behind the trench enclosed walls as the Angelinians rushed on up.

The long range guns then ceased firing, and the gathling guns of both lines of better batteries were swung round and delivered a simultaneous discharge, and as the field pieces also broke loose the walls again seemed bursting asunder so great was the discharge it did not stop the charge.The Angelinians had finally recaptured the stone wall at the left on Galverine Hills driving pistolls rebels re bels back, but general Cahannde Shannon was still in possession of the christian works on Hansons right, and also along his left centre, and poor general Hansen lying wounded in an ambulance was appealing for aid from his brother for his stricken and crushed army.Though the christians had captured the works along the right or left , the guns on these walls or defending these walls were not so dreaded as those on the further ridges, and realizing that the fire ceased because of the christians being again in possession of the works the glandelinians rallied and pressed heavily against the christian lines. Manly had in the meantime pushed forward more of his own troops, and coming up to take personal command directed this furious onslaught, with Federal and Beppe Evans as his aids.Again like many hundreds of thousands of insane wild men, and with the fury of lions and tigers the glandelinians surged against the series of blazing cannons and musketry defending the stone walls, and once again they pressed over the works, though they were mowed down for the distance of a mile, in thousands upon thousands.But the survivors sending forth yell after yell engaged the Angelinians in a desperate hand to hand fight.The slaughter was now for a few minutes a literal reign of terror, for never was there such a fight witnessed before.Every column of christians that contested the enemy hand to hand were cut to fragments in a short time, and the battle now extended for the distance of t thirty miles, and the whole battle line seemed in a terrific conflagration, of fire, and a regime of slaughter and horror.But nevertheless the headlong push of the glandelinians was not checked, may could not be checked, and as Manley was directing and leading the assault in person, the pressure of the glandelinians increased, and now again the christians un a unable o face the fierce effort of the enemy, and also the bristling wall of bayonets began to break into frightful confusion, which soon became a terrible panic, and after the christians withdrew h the glandelinians delivered a parting fire which cut every one of the nearest of the retreating columns to fragments, with the deaths of hundreds of officers of all ranks, and then they slowly began to break from the walls, and follow, surging again after the Angelinians but silently, the gunners turning the cannon around again and firing shells among the christians so rapidly that the christian columns seemed in danger of being blown to into empty air. Now the cannonading from the distant ridges and hidden batteries opened again and with renewed vigore

Yet the glandelinians began to press the christians back all along the line, the smoke of battle again spreading out like thick cotton sheets. Indeed for all the distance the Angelinians were driven back, but some of the christian brigades to prevent themselves from being annihilated took defense behind fences, bordering meadows, and fields, or in corn and wheatfields, and firing a perf perfect storm of bullets from behind trees and bushes and barns and haystacks, indeed firing from every point of vantage, and in this time seventeen glandelinian regiments charging upon these new positions were completely destroyed, and big furrows were plowed in the other rebel brigades, but unfortunately the glandelinian cannon on the hill tops found their mark, ad and brought down thousands of trees in these woods, enabling the multitudes of glandelinians to pick off their snipers by many more thousands.

At three fifteen the glandelinians from two directions had crossed three miles and a half of ground over a line of advance of nearly fourty miles, driving the christian columns back all the way, in disordered and bleeding lines. The glandelinians found the hidden batteries, carried it, and continued to advance in thick columns, and supported by the tremendous fire of their own, had hopes now of a complete and final victory. Soon all the christian columns were rushing back in the wildest confusion, driven into a panic by the storm of shells that still reached them. Indeed terrible havoc had been caused by the terrific fire of both sides. On pressed the glandelinians with great great fury, and simultaneously the glandelinians under Gen Kaulmann was pushing on to the right. The rain of shells continued as some of the batteries advanced to support the rebels. Indeed as the rebels advanced they themselves could see the results of the terrible fire on both sides. Everything for miles was still enshrouded in puffs of smoke, the shell fire had destroyed fences, trees and vineyards, wooden fences, barns barns barns, haystacks, and farm houses were burning, and the deluge of minnie minnie balls and canister had cut down grain and wheat and also corn in perfect lines. Yet the enemy continued to advance, despite the hissing rear of shells from the ridges in possession of christian batteries, and rushed through the smoking broken foliage, and rows of battered blazing, trees and brush, as if through sieves. here and there as yet dense clouds of smoke still puffed from the lines of retreating christians, and though some gaps were made in the enemys lines they were closed rapidly.

The branches of thousands of trees were broken by the solid shot alone and millions of other trees were cut down or burning, and death and devastation was every everywhere. As the glandelinians never slackened in their advance it was evident the battle was losing to the christians. The cannon of the enemy on the ridges still thundered, but the christian batteries grew fiercer and fiercer, as the christian assailants drew closer or rebels grounds. And all through this line of successful advance the shell fire had cut to fragment whole brigades. Entire divisions were of the glandelinians, and the dead and wounded lay in mounds along the entire route. Yet the main line of the enemy kept up the advance, and again they were cut down in so many ranks that a sea of bodies seem lay on the many meadows and plains and in the woods. Six divisions under general Zimmermann stamok drodrew close to a part of the rallying christian line, but four were destroyed, and of the survivors nothing remained but an appalling line of cut up men bleeding and demorilized, and ragged clothing torn to shreds by bullets. Many had been caught by that terrible volley and they had been hurled violently down on their faces, or on their sides or backs. The uniform heaps of human beings was indeed appalling to see, and the stench of the pewo powder smoke was abominable. Yet by the pressure of the glandelinian advance, the christians were still giving way at all points, and all around on the ground and elsewhere in front of them was a field of dead, wounded and dying Angelinians, where thousands upon thousands of them had fallen at every volley of the rebels. Yet on swept the glandelinian columns. Nearer and nearer they came. The situation was so awful. Thirty thousand cannon at the height of the struggle had been in action. The glandelinians now decided to carry the last ridges in possession of the christian batteries. So having reached their base u on up the ridges the rebels surged, but the roar of cannon they met fairly deafened many for life. Millions of small flashes again appeared through the smoke murk like tongues of dull hued fire, appering suddenly, and reappearing, and disappearing abruptly. Yet on swept the glandelinians the ful full force of the firing spreading agi again, and now there was everywhere a bewildering movement of columns, bursting shells and roaring of millions of muskets answ. The glandelinians again became disconcerted, and the christian gunners seeing the foe hesitate opened a fire with an earsplitting crash, and a new ridge of dead and wounded glandelinians were vividely exposed to view as the thick smoke lifted for a moment or two.

t The suddeness of this part of the imortan struggle the fiercessnest and rapidity of its manifestations, the fury and almost solid charater of the glandelinin armies caused the christian infat infantry to withdraw but the main line had not as yet thought of yeilding an inch of ground so they struck to their position a but the avalanch like charge of the enemy was fearful and the swarm of graycoats which covered the whole space of ground and looked like a never ending line seemed to melt into fragments, but nevertheless the first swarm of survivors swarmed over among the desperate Angelinians onl only to be cut down, while those who did survive met in every course networks of christian trenches and stone walls, and though the carnage under of the christians under gish was terrible general James Henry Mc-Hollester who was in command of the forces defending these ridges still more havocked the r and ravaged the foe lines. The enemys formost line seemed to bend and dissiolve into pieces , but nevertheless on surged the yorn and bleeding line and columns in gray. On ressed the assailants. One monsterious column 100,000 strong pushed forward to the support of the crushed and mangled christian lines leaving thousands of their own dead in their path of advance up the other side of the hills, but strangeto st say all the Angelinians along the left had been forced to recoil or meet annihilation, the Angelinians reforming and slowly falling back down t the other side of the corsp corpse strewn slopes. Even back across the meadows they went in great confusion the enemy after them. It was now half past five. Hanson wounded as he was and fearing that the ridges the main chief point of the christian line would be taken decided to order up all the divisions not yet en gaged to the support of the position.

The left wing of the christians under general Mc-Hollester, was still standing its ground at this point melting away and cutting down huge mulitudes of glandelinians, but though the Angelinians followed this up quickly with a cannon fire their whole length the enemy only surged up, . The charge could not be stopped however and the christians became panic stricken and recoiled in series of square formations arches, lines, and V.shaped groups, but the front o lines of the hostile glandelinians disappeared behind thick shurr shrubbery and by this the Angelinians knew that the glandelinians were decending the ridge in huge avalanches to counter charge them. Indeed the highest fury of the p battle - at this point was very stupendous and fascinating. The survlving glande linians confident of victory were now coming on in a force and fury that was or seemed greater than that of any charge but all those thousands who got nearest to the christian trenches were all mowed down, and Shoe mannia who led here was severely wounded inside the christian lines, as he planted one of the tattered flags of glandelinia on one of the dath death dealing works, but was rescued by his own men who fought off all ateempts of the Angelinians to capture him. Another general who was known only as Zimmermann was fatally wounied and dies beofre he could be re moved from the field of battle, and general Dargen though at first considered fatally wounded was declared out of danger of death if he was left in quiet and solitude.

John Manleys main divisions pressed on with indescriable fury, cand while at that moment when general Mc-Hollester ordered his men t holf to hold their ground at all hazards, for the whole line had not yeilded as yet the Glandelinians were almost upon them and to the surprise of the Angelinians in purple and red uniforms. Then these Angelinians with the most horrible yells tore the gray columns to pieces, but the surviving Glandelinians rushing up before the Angelinians could fire again were among them in a terrible hand to hand melee and soon the christians with their own lines torn to pieces and with their most greatest numbers down recoiled the glandelinians pressing on despite the fact that other christian divisions still retained their ground, and with their lines ripped in pieces and with the inside and outside of their works completely filled with dead and wounded these also retired, but as they retreated they were threatened with annihilation. Many divisions of Angelinians had be been completely destroyed. The Glandelinians were now in possession of the w ole line of ridges excepting where the center of the christian line held its ground the longest, and where Mc-Hollester was in personal command. The Glandelinians at this point were led by D Federal and Desperate Desmond and Rudolph Rassendale and as they struck against the christian lines with terrible violence they closed with wild yells but of no avail thy they were hurled back with the loss of a-quarter of their number. The climax of one of the fiercest battles of the glandco-Angelinian war was reaching its worse. John Manleys army had done its best, its utmost, they had fought like angels against demons and despite all this if it had not been for a r tradge tragdey they would not have failed to carry the ridge.

The Glandelinians were already overthrown at this point and were about to retire when one of the grayscoats frenzied with frage rage and insanity had split general Mc-Hollesters head in pieces with his sabre and in his fall the whole christian line was in a rout down the other side of the ridge before the surprised Glandelinians were aware of it. Though nearly all of the line of christians had given way already general Calsins Angelinians were still in possession of the works also with Senguines Abyssinkilians, and so general Manley decided to take what general Senguine had declared was a forlorn hope at holding ,the last of these christian batteries located at ac commanding point which it seemed impossible to capture or silence.

Its fire was indescribably murderous and annihilating, and every moment during the fierce assault that was made rendered its capture seemingly the more impossible.The sl sight of the slaughter among their massive lines was so disheartening among the men and which had a contrary effect, upon the men defending the point that they closed their eyes to shut it out.The christian generals seemed to understand intuitively that what was needed owas to asti astonish and disconcert the glandelinians with a most brilliant charge down the rise.It was indeed a rex reckless thing to do but it was frustrated for the Glandelinians confining the purpose of the Angelinian officers and knowing that Senguine and the others headed the downaward rush, the remnant of the others would follow with the living scrambling over the bodies of the fallen they would probably drive them back by sheer force of entimsiasm. So the glandelinian leaders made out their own heroic pro porsition to their brave officers.They acepted it joyiously with flashing eyes and with th their sabres drawn they gathered about their main leader Federal who suddenly drew his own sabre and with their men at their heels every general mad for battle dashed up the rest of the slope waving their sabres and shouting;

''Onward my brave soldiers.Death to the Angelinians.''

So quickly they advanced that though the christian fire tore every one of their main front columns to pieces that for a moment it seemed to the Angelinians that the shells were flying harmelessly over their own heads. For the full time necessary to draw a full breath or two the glandelinians and guardians gaped at the horrible spectacle in astonishment. Then with a yell of exultation and defiance with sabres and bayonets flashing they dashed headlong after their leaders. So extraordinary so utterly unexpected was the spectacle that for the fatal moment the Angelinians at the guns forgot themselves. When they realized that these famious glandelinian soldiers had succeeded in starting one of those fanatical charges which are among the unsolved mysteries of warfare and which so often retrives a lost cause it was too late to change the range of the heavy artillery. If the infantry that supported them could not stop the wild charge of the Glandelinians then the battery was lost. General Physcian charging with his drawn sabre was the first of the glandelinians to meet the fiercer Angelinians defsding the guns.The other generals were at his back and now they were being in the chag h charging lines of men that had dashed after them.Half a dozen fierce exchanges of musketry fire in which the poor Angelinians got the worse f of it and the glandelinians were at the throats of the christins with the bayonet.The Angelinians seemed dazed at the bold ness of the Glandelinian generals whose wrongs they were eager to revenge. It was all over then.With this large assaulting swarm led by Federal and the other generals nothing could stop the glandelinians and the Angelinians were compelled to flee from the works though general physcian went down mortally wounded, while fourteen other generals Zoe, Rae, Richamnn, Cookespiller, Henery Maddonia, Marcocellioe were killed and Lenna, Elsia, Muckcome, Felldown, Emery,page,look,upsidepdown, Mc-Goink , pock Valve, and Aberdeen Procile were wounded three of the first being mortal y wounded.

T he child slaves either in Galverine Bondinia and other surrounding Galverinian cities had not learned the cause of the clangr which were shaking these cities to their very foundations the lying glandelinian overseers having taken great care that they did not. A few of the child slaves more learned than the others were suspicious though for they knew that it was too cont imuous for a volcanic eruption which some of their lying masters had told them it was.And why were so many hundreds of thousands, such big streams of wounded glandelinians loaded on carts, wagons, trains, autoss or staggering through the streets and even on long lines of street cars being taken to al the houses and the hospitals and even into many of the child slave factories for treatement.Indeed they seemed to never stop coming and indeed these child slaves had an idea that some great battle was in progress but what the results were they could not tell as the tremendous uproar was still in full sway and at times redoubling frightfully in its din and even the streets of the city was in a murk of strange mists which smelled very much like powder smoke.

T his tremendous noise caused by the battle either known as Galverine, Mc-Hollestor Run or Galverine Hills, but which really was later known as Lucille Jorden had been heard at Bondinia so many hundreds of miles away the Bondinians having at first thought that a volcano known as Mt Galverine had broken out into eruption and w had been surprised and amazed when they learned the truth. It was that after general vivians mad main wing had rallied amid one of the fiercest conflicts at this point that general vivian recieved a message from general Zoe Rae MManley which ran as follows;

''On account of their losses my men are already about to yeild their ground and there seems no chance whatever of this terrible battle being won.Manly is advancing all his reserve forces against our columns and something must be done for my lines are threat ened with annihilation.''

Yours truely.
General Zoe Rae Manley.''

General

General vivian was worried over this notice and he was at a loss of what to do.He knew that the terrible resistance of the christians had aroused the glandelinians to a fit of frenzy. Poor general vivian remembered the scenes of child slavery he had witnessed, the poor little girls and boys who had been overworked and of many children who had keeled over every minute. Yet when he was intending to do a good thing and that was to rid the country of such horrors, he seemed t o be losing out and losing one of the most terrible and bloodiest battles of the war. Even now came another note brought by his orderly which ran as follows;

''Whether your men are in a mood to retreat or not they wil have to do so or be annihilated for my men cannot hold their ground much longer against the sledge hammer onslaughts directed against our lines. It will either be you or me that will have to meet annihilation and it is the last d advise I can give. We all know that child slavery is an evil that has got to be put down by force but just now nothing can be done for our whole force is already cruched crushed and mangled. Manley is assaulting us with all his fault and it would only be foolish to hold out any longer.It is the last advise I can give.'

Yours truely.General Abner Doubleday.
Commander of christian center along the Mc-Hollester Run.'
Angelinia.A.B.C.

General vivian realized this indeed but he decided he would do no retreating untill night came.All his batteries were put into their most fiercest action and a vertible hail of storming t orrents of shot shell and high explosives were again flung into the assaulting columns along his own front the marksh marksmanship of his gunners being unerring and nearly every broadside hit their marks. Every main columns of the assailants were badly riddled and torn to fragments. All the christian batteries that had been placed into position were in general action now and indeed the uproar still seemed to split the heavens. Even baldwins batteries fairly hammered volleys, while the other christian batteries also kept on without ceasing supporting the infantry lines all they could. The firing was more terrific than ever along the whole christian line.

General Briarson had after incessant fighting repelled federals left wing with terrible loss and with considerable success though the most severe carnage of the battle had shifted to the right wing, thence furt her to the left and center.But finally Briarson was killed ad his forces suffered defeat and woeful losses in these combats being three hundred ninty thousand, five hundred and eighty two in killed and wounded and also prisoners.Consternation and gloomy p apprehension were depicted upon the faces of the directing generals under general vivian for the furious battle of Lucille jorden was exacting an awful toll of human lives. Many of these christian generals had frequ frequently been in the thickest of the fray serving with great bravery and valor. Even yet more startling news came in that dispatches from Hanson who was lying wounded advising him to withdraw from the Mc-Hollester Run Region to the new positions asigned to him as strong forces of the enemy were approaching to support the glandelinians at J Lucille jorden and this almost set general vivian crazy with frenzy and worry.T In the dispatch, was as follows;

I general Hanson vivian sent you this note with advise to with draw from your broken up positions to the more i mpregnable ones set out for the armies as planned as it is of no use to stand against the enemy at the old worls any longer and the enemy may overwhelm you and destroy your armies if you fight any longer at such disadvantages. The enemy have attacked us as I believe at a great disadvantage and we must do as planned. The positions I have marked out have excellent points and once it is obtained the enemy can never carry it. The posit ions I ya have marked out are on the southern branch of the Mc Mc-Ferner ridges the most strongest hills on record.Your armies with the others can take up st rong positions in ravines, and gullies, and on the top of precipitios heights and where all hell and heaven could no not drive your armies from it.Knee General Evans has ordered me to do like wise and his armies alone at that have succeeded in holding the enemy back along the very front of the plains near Lucille Jorden. Here the enemy had not many made any headway whatever and it does not seem possible that they can either because they are not able to even break a point in Evans lines.
The attackers are overwhelmed by his army and he had has full confidence in hurling the enemy back and checking Manleys intentions if you take my advice and do as told. And do not worry about your daughters as they are perfectly safe for the enemy have not been near to where they are confined and they have witnessed the battle from the very start and think it is the most tremendous battle ever raging in the whole war so far and cannot think that there will ever be another one like it and also that there will be no chance for the enemy to march to the rescue of Norma Cat herine and Julo Callio.
But their hopes depends on you doing as I and general Evans have advised.It's my opinion also that the cause of this disaster which have occured was on account of some blunder and what the blunder is I xannot conceive. However the enemy will not be so successful as I have feared and if we master our armies to the last we can accomplsih such wonders that the whole conflict will end as a drawn battle.
My losses have already been great, and so has the losses of the other generals and also Kindermine, but general Jack Evans reports greater losses than all of ours combined.The struggle is extremely desperate still along my lines and all seemes to be going as to say to-the very "Hell "itself. And so many of my officers have fallen that I have been completely dismayed and do not know what to makeof it.But I believe the losses of the officers of the enemy is still greater and will cause them to soon cease their attacks I'm sure when we withdraw to the position pointed out to us by general Jack Evans.So even if we are beaten we can still hold Manley back from advancing and then all will be well and the besieging armies will not be endangered and can be succored untill greater christian ma armies are sent to their aid. I do not care to predict my losses just now as I am afraid it will unerve you and also cause you to stop stop the battle too soon.

If I was so now even within arms length of that old Jackass general Manley, I would treat him like a maddog for his brutal treatement of and massacre of so many innocent children, and for his horrible butchery of so many wounded soldiers captured by his men in this conflict.He is nothing but a savage wih a handsome face anyway.I governer manson of Angelinia have renoue renoue renounced child slavery, and child massacre and since our argument during the chase after the Glandelinian spies under Captian Baker Snately, I have been in bitterest enemy ever since, not for that in general but for his massacres of childre n.His cruelty tward the h elpless children have already h gone too far and will not go unrevenged.As far as possible I will bring bring on a heavy retaliation.He is also a very treacherious man in battle and a more treacherious man to treat the Princess's of Abbiesmiaa known as the Vivian girls with such cruelty, after all the kindnes hthey have shown tward him But h hatred as I have n for Manley we may have to allow him to lick us than suffer our army to meet annihilation.So I advise to retreat as soon as you can close t he battle, for some time may come when we can ad avenge this defeat.Of course it hurts me to tll you to go back."

Hanson Angelic vivian/"

All the while he was reading these messages the Glandelinians were continueing their stupenious assaults, and Gammons lines who which had rallied upon receiving reinf orcements were unable to stand, and were forced to give way their leader being wounded.Manley Many /lines of Manleys army had fallen as the main line of assault passed on.Robert vivians ears were fairly ringing with the deafening uproar and clamor of the wilder part of thecnflict.The assault of the enemy under general Jim James Hanson Gish was fearful, seven hundred thousand at this point making a consentrated attack upon the Angelinian forces along his own front.Dressed in bright gleaming gray uniforms, the Glandelinian Scoodlers presented an imposing sight as they swiftly rushed to the attack.The guns still in the pos possession of the Angelinians, and mounted upon bastions belched forth broadside upon broadside a merciless fire of grape and canister, round shot and shells mowing down hundreds more of the intrepid Scoodlers and Th anfantmen, but the onslaught of the attacking forces did not abate, for the Scoodlers had been rated with the recent victorie victories,and refused to intertain thoughts if a of a repulse.On through the withering tempest of bullets rushed the gallent columns in gray, men again falling in their tracks by the thousands.My shmer tenney and the valor shown by Scoodler and gland Zimmermannian troops they finally reached the christian works, they having planned to scare the ramparts, and once within to trust to their deadly bayonets.
T In the absence of scaling ladders the men mounted each others shoulders , and thus many of them succeeded in a entering the works.Hundreds of the glandelinians were singly passed over the ramparts the trained Angelinian sharpshooters, picked them off like flies, and they dropped back outside the high breastworks.All the while a withering tempest of bullets , cans canister and grape shot streamed from the fatal parapet, swiftly desimating the advancing columns below.
It was a er carnage too frightful to relate in detail, and still it raged.It was at this time, at the white heatof the conflict just before the final rout of these christians, when general Hanson Gish in a bloody encounter with a large force of the Consentinian lancers and cavarly came face to a face with general Nolan Gish, an Angelinian leader but his brother at that, the christian general fighting in the foremost lines of the mounted Angelinians like an enraged demon.The two bitter adversaries, though brothers as they were recognized each other, and at once engaged in a vicious sabre duel.Thousands more of the contestants on both sides were kip killed or wounded, but the glandelinians still fought valiantly, the christians scenting ingreat numbers to the protection of their works.The hand to hand struggle was short but terrific, the Angelinians receiling t at last, general Nolan abandoning the the contest with his brother, after being disarmed and shaking hands with each ot other as friends, though fighting on opposite sides, and followed his men trying to restore the confusion among the columns of the christians.While this struggle had been going on, general Hanson Jennings, awaiting the supreme moment when an overwhelming charge with t turn the tide of battle at this point, saw the christian lines wavering a along his own front, and when the order was given to charge, his glandelinians hurled themselves against the Angelinians like a thunderbolt, sweeping everything before them, and defeating them with the loss of 40,238 while them themselves suffered the loss of one hundred and fifty thousand.Just as thesechristians were fleeing before him like frightenedsheep, general Gore vivianis arived with a large force of White Abyssinhilians and batteries of cannon, which on arriving were trained upon the soldiants, and now the slaughter became so terrific that for a time general Hanson Gish was checked in his onward rush.
General Nore vivian know that if his superior general Robert Angelic vivian lost the great contest, he could do nothing to free the p oo poor children in vivian vicksy and also Calverine, and so he was bound to see to it that these lines held firm, even at the cost of annihilation.Many provision wagons had already been abandoned, to the enemy by the christians who had already retreated, and several large guns which had been caught in a small creek had been left behind because of tre treacherious bogs and quike s a sands.

the christian artillery under general Sulelanna had directed a most raking fire upon the Glandelinian batteries , while the infantry sections on the other wing had been going on with renewed vigor. The sound of the enemys cannonading, and the whirr of hundreds of machine guns along the enemys right was incessant. It was difficult to understand how the Angelinians could long resist the return fire of the Glandelinian batteries, but they nevertheless showed the same excellant marksmen ship which characterized the previous fighters and this enabled them to offer a grim resistance. Both sides had good supplies of ammunition notwithstanding their relentless waste of shot and shell at the rate of thousands per minute. For awed by the frightful pounding of shells and high explosives, the non-combatants of yi Jennie Town and Galverine, fled for safer provinces. Several more of the divisions of Glandelinians during the terrible fire of twenty thousand cannon, had advanced to assault the left wing of Hansons lines anew. Minute after minute the fierce conflict had increased in fury, while the Glandelinian leaders directed the movements of their men or attacking forces . The thunder of cannon along the Glandelinian center was more terrific than at another wing, and the clouds of battle smoke rolled up more densely from the long chain of active batteries, where the gunners of the Glandelinians were working their artillery. There was not the slightest abatement in the artillery firing now. The Glandelinians worked their guns more and more vigoriously, and without cessation but the Angelinians along general Hansons center being rein forced by the reserves, and more artillery and more ammunition, t he rat urn fire of the christians was almost annihilating. Many more contestants on both sides were killed and wounded, being ad h eighty thousand more in a few minutes. Many n magnificent bulwarks of the Glandelinian positions were ripped to ribbons, thousands of random shells also having fallen into the outskirts of the city of Jennie town and the burst of shells dug deep craters, into the p avements of the streets.

Battery after battery of the christians opened a withering storm of shells upon the Glandelinian batteries, the artillery f fire being increased as much as possible, eight hundred being killed and eight thousand being wounded, when ten rebel guns blew up. As a sanitary measure the dead in the streets of the bombarded t town were burned in piles, the bodies being soaked in c coal oil. In several int instances bodies were also being burned by being placed over a gas main ignited for a duneral pyre. All this while Galverinian guns and children prayed for the ending of this terrible struggle. In a convent, and it was their last prayer. For a shell from a christian centemeter gun missing a rebel gun crew wn went into the town crashing into and through the building , and in exploding killed all who were in it, and wrecking the convent beyond repair. Amid the hail of cannon balls and shells hundreds of other refugees gathered in various c ur churches to join in the prayers for the end of the battle. Special prayers were even offered up, in nearly every church no matter what order, or religion, the priests of Catholic Churches offering up su pplications that the terrible battle might end, and that the passio n passions of the fighters might subside.

Never in any war were there ever such horrors. When a projectile tore away a cross of St Johns Catholic Church as the congregation were at prayer, and another fell through the roof exploding inside with such force as to blow out all of the west wall, and kill all within, and all these were random shells from the christian guns. The fighting had all this while become more desperate than an any other previous hour. More heavy artillery and machine guns, and rapid fire guns were brought into action along the distance of at least twenty miles a drum, drum fire of cannon were spitting death and horrible carnage into the very heavens as it seemed. Three little girls recklessly venturing into the streets of Jennie own were blown to nothing by a high explsive during this murderous cannon fire, and also the random shells of the Angelinians crashed into the committee bul buildings f of the loyal Galverinians, where thousands of refugees were housed, and even the red cross and thr the white cross workers were being picked off by the shells. Buildings were on fire by scores and h undreds of private dwellings and other buildings razed. The christian batteries were shelling the enemys lines fiercer and fiercer for every minutes time of reply, and still many more buildings were riddled by shrapnell from the christian guns, while buildings for hunreds of blocks were blown into shattered ruins or set on fire, or blasted into the air, by gang-gang-shells and high explosives from the Abbieannian centemeters.

The christian batteries of Baldwins command poured a constant stream of shells upon the firing line of the Glandelinian batteries, while another battery of one hundred kruppt guns under general Walter Jennings was hurling its own storm of high explosive explosives tward the center of the line of rebel guns, while simultaneously general Augustine St Clares Angelinians try tried to mount long range gathling guns on the nearest works, but thousands of men were annihilated for even the attempt all alone. By this time nearly all the christian batteries were ain action and long and deadly broadsides of shells were soon dropping in all quarters of the city of Jennie own.

The Artillery duel was indeed fierce. Hundreds of thousands of Galverinians and Glandelinian citizens and those who sided with them were deserting the city, and fleeing into the country woods and ravines, leaving all behind. The buildings were indeed deserted, and shattered by the heavy storm of shells, while many streets were impassable from the terrible wreckage of the houses.

The city hall was also damaged by the projectiles, being ripped and blown to pieces by explosives. A large number of Angelinian citizens had also been killed in the heavy artillery duel of both sides which went on so fiercely without intermission, while a near by battery of guns bang attacked by two hundred thousand Glandelinians, had stood its ground valiantly, pouring in a fierce fire, and driving back their assailants with the loss of one hundred and fifty thousand in slain. From the enemys heavier guns more fearful volleys were poured. The fierce volleys from the enemys guns under general Leo Gosyellic was followed by a series of others in rapid succession. Then more machine guns and parrott rifles began their whirr and patter and explosives reports, the fiercest of the fire being gathered where the main forces of Angelinian troops were regathering. The Angelinian gunners kept on replying with the fury of titans and soon the crash of so many guns, probably over thirty five thousand of all kinds singly on both sides alone, had s turned into a steady drum drum fire along the whole line of the Glandelinian batteries, the flash of thousands of field guns, and quick firers also was incessant. Tens of thousands of shells of every description, played awful havoc along the christian lines, but other christian guns were joining, now pounding the enemys line unmercifully. The firing of so many guns threatened to annihilate the rebel cannon but now as the firing was slackening general Hanley supposed Hanson and Gobert Givian were exhausting their ammunition, and therefore decided to send all his force forward to make a general assault.

In twenty minutes like the outrunner of an advancing storm two hundred thousand Crowleywogs and Gargoylians and Mungaboos stormed Baldwins christian line of batter ies, a force of five million fifty thousand soon moved on the whole center of general Sulesannas line, while five million more was led against the right, the rest of the assailants six million strong being led against the ri left. Here the advance guard of the fierce and general Glandelinian attack was very determined but the christian artillery of gathling guns held in reserve suddenly opened a heavy fire, and the Glandelinians at once met horrible losses anew in dead and wounded.

At the storming of the center of Hansons line itself there was murderous fighting. These Glandelinian divisions of Mumbkins and Crowleywogs operated from three sides and during the fearful struggle a division of fifty thousand men reached the works of the christians only one thousand strong. They could not go any further and threw themselves flat on the ground or surrendered to save their lives. The assailants of the rebel left wing pressing forward against Hansons left, and under general Xmer Sylstse pressed forward as near as the advanced trench of the christians and carried it, while general Xmer Sylstse sent his other grand division to brek break down the abatis on the right consisting of trees, wagons, broken accouterments and cotton loams and other machinery taken from the near by town. Three hundred and thirty thousand men attempted this. Only two thousand of these three hundred and thirty thousand volunteers returned.

After repeated efforts r general gunners Glandelinians succeeded in reaching the outermost edge of artillery and infantry line of general Walter Jennings, but the attack also here was repulsed with frightful slaughter. The new forces of Glandelinians that general Hanson ivian had warned his brother about was already on the march, and the lare largest was marching for the rear of the Galverinian hills.

Violet and her sisters in the meantime to learn which way the reinforcing body of Glandelinians was advancing, disguised themselves as ragged Galverinian child beggars to hide their beauty, and smeared their faces to look like dirty children who had no decent bring a bringing up. The day of the terrible battle though it was September was p oppressively hot there being no wind stirring, while the atmosphere everywhere was reeking in the smoke of the terrible fighting going on. Violet and her sisters started about five o-clock, hiding behind bushes every now and then, for fear of the enemys, signal stations or scouting parties and roving foragers and spies. They soon came to a high rise of ground, and climbing to the top they could only observe a se sea of smoke in the distance, and in another direction they saw some commotion going on, and descending cautiously saw several rebels consist of a blazing church, with the Blessed Sacrament in their possession. The priests of the church had been taken prisoners, and Violet and her sisters therefore de decided to give themselves up to the enemy at any risk or cost for the sake of saving the Blessed Sacrament. Violet observed that one of the Glandelinians was spitting at one of the Sacred hosts and therefore gave him a serious serious wound in the lef, thus causing some of the other Glandelinians to rush after them. Seeing they were Scoodlers Violet and her sisters realized it would be utterly rash to allow themselves to be captured, but Violet by a trick managed to secure the Blessed Sacrament from the hands of the dead Glandelinian whom Voice had shot in the heart, and then dashed away. In the confusion that followed the shots fired by the girls, the priests had escaped, but the Glandelinians enraged over being outwitted in such a fashion, and can caused by little girls in ragged clothes at that gave chase, some firing constant shots in their efforts to kill the supposed girl beggars.

They also wished to to recapture the Blessed Sacrament, more than the fugitives, and so spread out in three directions to head them off. Violet and her sisters dashed for the rise of ground and reaching it climbed up a little way, and seeing several several Glandelinians gaining on them, they urged Violet to go on, and then they stopped and brought six of the rebels down with well aimed shots. The they proceeded on their way, and finally gained the top, a score of Glandelinians being close behind. Violet and her sisters seeing the necessity of it, crept behind a ledge of sheltering rocks, and Violet set the Blessed Sacrament down in a safe place. Then all seven of the girls started firing rapidly, bring the Glandelinians down and wounding them at every shot. Yet more and more came on anew, and now a considerable number was observed to be approaching in their rear, and two of the little girls now started firing on them these. Just then Jennie noticed a dull yellow, glaring streak of dull flashes among the smoke afar to the southwest, which extended all along as far as eye could reach, but which was more expanding to the southeast, and which was increasing.

It had been only ten minutes after they had begun their defense up there, before this was discovered, and her sisters now noticed it also, but paid no attention to it, knowing that it was the flash of musketry and art illery along general Vivians main line. It had become more plainer now, and had the color of little flashes of flame through white smoke, which on account of the smoke a sickly haze covered the sky. Violet and her sisters could also hear a long rolling gush of firing which made a sickening roar at that distance, while now a strange rising wind was swaying the trees overhead like a gale.

The Glandelinians who had been advancing upon thereof Violet and her sisters saw the masses of strange yellow clouds appear among the masses of smoke, and the most strange sounds were heard almost incessantly. The yellow glow was even more brighter, and extending with great rapidity, while from another direction a strange dull booming roar became more and more pronounced. Violet and her sisters knew that their fathers line was extended now across the front of the city of Mildred Carrie to which it had been driven, and as they sumbled upon this thought they observed coming toward the little mound of ground, from which the persons had retreated, a vast terrible wall of Glandelinian troops approaching with thrilling rapidity. They seemed to extend along the whole expanse of green ground in a straight long grey column of men which reached the base in one single minute. Everywhere around the hill, except the open ground was now enhemmed in smoke wreaths, and from a new quarter a dull rattling roar of musketry came forth in sound which increased every moment.

There then was suddenly a fierce quick squall of firing, then a pause, then a fierce then was suddenly a fierce quick squall of firing, then a pause, then a thunderous rolling cloud of more musketry firing. Violet and her sisters not wishing to encounter such a force of Glandelinians, quickly made their way back toward the christian lines, by cleverly following the roads they had been on first, and seen as they reached Glederlinias reinforcing divisions which had been concentrating southeast of Mildred Carrie, the battle was on once more in a new line and position. Already the christians had been driven back ten miles. From a sudden valley of projectiles and bullets or canister a number of trees in front of the christian lines seemed to be borne down by the thousand, while now a Glandelinian force under general Purgatorian came moving forward to the assault.

Violet and her sisters watched the frightful assault from a safe distance. The assault of the enemy under Purgaterian came on with such force and fury that the litt le girls feared that the big massive brigades of Glandelinians would literally roll over the christian lines. Suddenly all along the line of Glederlinias division the assault of the enemy increased wit h redoubled fury, while trees all along the line were hurled down with a crash by astorm of shot and shell. The cannon and musketry firing suddenly let loose along Glederlinias front was simply deafening, and the shrieking of the shells was terrific, and again the dead and wounded fairly encumbered even the wreckage of the trees. Yet the steady force of the enemys assault was appalling. Divisions of christians no matter how stoutly they held their ground amid even the trees rending to earth were compelled to give ground, the air seemed full of flame and smoke, and the din became like a hundred million explosions going on inside the bowels of the earth. Violet and her her sisters who even where they were, were beaten unmercifully by the storm of flying branches and twigs, and several rocks near them were sent rolling two hundred yards by the con concussion of a gang gang shell, though the rocks were standing ten feet high, and were w fourty feet wide, and deep sea ted in the ground. This was a scene of battle worse than Violet and her sisters had ever seen before even from the fury of them shell and canister storm every tree within their sight, had again like in other battles been hacked and torn like brooms, or rendered of every branch a and leavf leaf, while thousands of others crushed to earth. The enemy who were attacking along a six mile front faced perfect torrents of st orming musketry and art illery missles and the christian line being first in zizag formation was driven almost to a horizontal form by the force of the e e enemys assault. All of Glederlinias artillery thundered, yet the assault did not stop. Violet and her sisters were almost dizzy from the frightful concussion of sound and of the terrible scene of the battle, and we even their head ached, and their eyes seemed sore and smarting from the strong fumes of the powder smoke. Sudden gusts of firing alarmingly be near at times startled them, and indeed Violet and her sisters realized that the most fearful battle they had ever seen was raging.

For an hour it had continued with unabated fury along this section within their view, and had increased so furiously that Violet and her sisters could not would not believe it would increase could not increase any more.

By crawling on their hands and knees, Violet and her sisters managed to get along the ground without being hit by the terrible storm of bullets , but they were pelted occasionally by branches, and at times a high explosive would burst many hundred yards ahead or to the right left, or in the rear of them and sent them rolling for several yards from the concussion concussion. Violet and her sisters had however reached the christian lines w and Violet had the Blessed Sacrament still in her possession, and when they could escape out of the zo zone of the terrible firing, they soon found an Angelinian priest priest and brought it to him.

King Vivian himself when they told him how they got it, came toward them with a smile on his his handsome face, and confronting them said aloud before all the gee generals and staff officers who were near him and before many of the wounded soldiers also;

"For your brave deeds, your beloved Father King Robert Angelis Vivian wishes t o reward your heroism. When scarcely six years old during the early outbreak of this rebellion and the chi d slave horrors, you suffered and sacrificed all within your power, just to be with the poor children, unbecoming of little Princesses indeed. You aided. Aided them all you could, and now during the full progress of this bloody war, and during the carnage at Apple Orchard, you were wounded cer for your bravery. You went through all the horrors at Vivian Vickey, a had many narrow escapes from the enemy during many frightful massacres and many other deeds of bravery. You nursed many a wou wounded soldier of both sides, and even wen many of those Grayco ats t o love and respect you, enemy of our blessed Lord though they are, and even at other battles and afterwards you did the same at great riske Even at Gordons Mills two of you were carried wounded from the fields amid a heap of slain and wounded Glandelinians and christian soldiers. Later during the same day in the midst of an ambulance train committed to the care of a general and his cavarly, a bomb fell near one of the wagons filled with wounded rebels, and Violet immediately seized it, and carried carried it some thi thirty feet from the ambulance, where she threw it to the ground some thirty yards, and yet by its explosion at that distance was wounded seriously. After she recovered she had with her sisters followed us here t o Bonnie town, Calverine, or Mic-gollester Run, and committed the bravest deeds of their lives probably during this long struggle. Violet with the hek help of her sisters saved the Blessed Sacrament of out of the hands of threehundred Boodlers, defeating them when they persued with the purpose of trying to get it back."

In such remarkable words did King Vivian surrounded by all his staff address the happy litt le Vivian girls. He bade them kneel down and touching them each on the shoulder three t imes with his drawn sabre he said;

"In the Name of the Saviour and of our Country and its Flag, I confer upon you little girls, my own daught ers, and the Princesses of Abbianania, the Sacred Cross of the Nation, and put you in charge of all the armies of Boy Scouts for your tried bravery. And being my daughters you have under me full authority over every other general, may your uncle himself. No body no Angelinian soldier showed more heroic deeds to mirit what you recieve. Nobody could claim a more claf denying career. Then within your power to stay out of all this, you sacrifice everything to share my sorrows, perils and discomforts of the army. Those more devoted to the service of his fellow men soldiers are present arms."

Where King Vivians lines extended in front of Mildred Carrie the enemy approached in very fantasti fanta stic column or formall during the renewal of the battle at this point the very atmosphere was oppressive and sultry, though it was the first day or last day of September, and even all the fighting soldiers who were the lightest garments flu found them a burden. For all these of hours of the terrific contest the din and uproar which prevailed the air was still enfolden, and when again the he heaviest columns of the enemy came on to the assault, there broke once more along King Vivians l ines the terrific squalls of fierce cannon broadsides, whose flashes in the approaching dusk resembled the flames of overheated furnaces through the frightful pall of smoke. Even the powder smoke seemed to have colors of unusual and most fantastic, and all those who observed it became alalarmed. Even great clouds rose from the hills where some of the remaining christian batteries were situated, looking more like smoke from burning hay stacks, or from burning houses, whi while unudulating the flashes of cannon glowed fiercely and disappeared only to glow forth again. The clouds piling up from the ridges by defendi defended by the cannons were strangely livid their irrecandence ranging to white, yalow and black, mingled with dark red, where the gang-gang shells exploded.

These unusual clouds spread uniformly out and upward with rapid speed, while that invariable herald of the main attack of the enemy came the more weird and ominous noises from all the more distant christian or rebel batteries, making a sound as of some long continued booming roar far in the sky instead of on t the ridges. When the assailants struck in their full force, general Walker and Cannon who received the shock first , could not withstand the fury of the Glandelinians, and their whole divisions were cut up and thrown into frarful confusion. The fresh thousands of Gla killed and wounded Angelinians lay as thick as straws on the ground.

Even the christian divisions of general Vivians center under generals Sen. Sen, Chiolet Hanlon, Frank O-Connor, and Endersonia Escoaris were shattered and torn to pieces by the appalling force of the Glandelinian onslaug onslaught.

General Purgatorians immense columns could be at the same time be seen approaching gladerlinias christian position on the right of gobert givians line fully five minut minutes before it struck the blow, and when the glandelinians did strio sti strike the struggle was successful though the loss of life was fearful.This assault upon gladerlinia was one of the most fiercest that had ever been made during the battle upon gladerlinias front.It swept back the massive christian columns , the glandelinians killing and wounded, with their musketry fire and bayonets, one hundred and thirty thousand Angelinians, out of a christian division of one hundred and fourty thousand four hundred and fourty four, and entirely demolished all of gladerlinias main line.So terrific was the desperate onslaught of the f glandelinians that by the very force of the onset the whole of gladerlinias army was rolled up in confusion within two hours.This desperate onslaught filled his christians with the deepest consternation.And this was not all.Jennie town suffered from the rebel fire fire before.Now it was Mildred Garrie 's turn to suffer from the rebel fire of artillery.And by this terrific shell fire of the glandelinian batteries all along over seven hundred thousand houses in less than half an hour were leveld to the ground, while the remnants of the broken and rolled up christian columns of gladerlinias army were hurled back for three miles and forced to seek rog refuge in the buildings of both ruined towns and in the woods and cornfields between them.The shell fire was then directed upon both in full force by the enemy destroying the sides of many buildings were pierced with heavy splinters driven into the them by the force of the explosions of shells.These protruded like huge pegs.In the walls of other buildings noticeable holes were noticeable that had been made by cannon balls.Even on the h outside of the city of Mildred Garrie a long line of box cars and trains of passenger coaches, and cars of every destription, including four hundred coal and cattle cars, were used as breastworks or shelter by the remnants of the retreating christians and an account of the furious cannon fire that the enemy let go all these trains of cars appeared to have gone through great chopping machines, they were so badly wrecked and shattered, and mingled with the bodies of thousands of Angelinians slain therein

The loss of life in this severe second action with gladerlinia and the enemy was truelly appalling.This first most extensive assault of the battle, raging with with general fury all along the line, and with the most spasmodic violence, displayed immense force for two hours, without one moments abatement, and for that distance of six miles or more the slaughter had been by the wholesale.Not a single house either in Jennie town or Mildred Garrie withstood the storm of shells, and many solidly builded stone and brick houses, grain elevators, and Cathedrals were raised raised to the ground by the shells, and forests extending along the whole battle line was was shattered by the converging fire of both sides, and every tree still standing was without leaves or branches.

A feature of this terrible onslaught of Purgatorians rebels which was fearfully and totally successful was the unusual size of the seried glandelinian columns , while dead horses, wreckages of war, concentraments and broken cannon lay scattered about.Several large houses were literally blown up into the air by a tremendous explosion of some kind, while a glandelinian cannon was reported to have been blown one thousand yards from its former place, the muzzle striking the ground and burried, the wheels and the rest of the gun standing upright.Even to stop the furious glandelinian advance around to Mildred Garrie, general Hallen of the Abyssinkilians destroyed a railroad running as far as the town, his massive lines however failing back to purpose the glandelinians should they g gain glad gladerlinias rear.

In their successful advance the glandelinians had captured an terrible number of christians as prisoners of war, fairly destroying carnifidas with the storm of musketry they ex embanged with the retreating Angelinians, the glandelinians also fight ing and firing from behind fri freight and passenger cars as they adv advanced, taking one batch of prisoners after another, moving down over thirty thousand of the retreating christians every minute.The one big force of christians under general Hvanna Gwenda , made a stand not far from the Mis Gallester and Western railroad, and there this advanced a large column of glandelinians.In this region stood a number of large country S School houses and other buildings and a long barn which had been converted into some kind of defensive fortifications by the christians who retreated to their shelters.

These Schoolhouses a/ alone were all manned by one hundred gatling guns apeace, there being six schoolhouses, with three hundred windows apiece, and which opened a withering fire upon the attacking glandelinians as they surrounded the buildings.Also a t errific withering fire was opened by the other rallied christian forces in the other buildings and in the long barn upon the assailants. But the glandelinians rushed forward, and while the foremost body besieged these b buildings the adva treat ad advanced onward after the retreating christian forces under general Gannon driving them into more confusion.Whether these buildings were ever ex carried I will not mention.The divisions of glandelinians under general Shannon rushed on toard the christian division under general Walter John Harrison rallied behind a a st one wall near a f fringe of woods but encountered an annihilating fire.The main column of assailants however pressed on in another direction to turn the christian flank and this proved that now the glandelinians could not be checked, for during the fighting the enemy had gained more ground, and Harrisons division was turned out it of its works with the loss of one hundred and thirty one thousand five hundred men killed and wounded while the rebels lost one h undred andthirty two thousand, one hundred and sixty four in slain.

gladerlinia however could not be forced bac back any more.To attack him openly was like entering the pit of hollegis forces were in the ruined buildings of both towns, sheltered on woods and in o corn and what fields.Not only that but Hansons had also rallied his troops near the towns, his batteries again fell into position and when the christians advanced t o attack they went down by the hundred thousand.General gladerlinas batteries in front of the t owns hurled a rain of shot and shell upon Purgatorians center, Hansons batteries responding with all the guns they could bring t o bear, mowing down the swarms of glandelinians as fast as they came within range.General Conventions glandelinians advanced the nearest and had carried a portion of th e christian line and driven it t ward Jennie town when from a hidden recess a terrific fire of concealed ma machine gathling guns were opened upon him and half of his column was destroyd before it realised what happened.The glandelinians assaulting gladerlinias forces defending the wheatfields, were much larger in numbers however being under general Shrimpie Hymn but as they poured on they drew a fire from the hidden christians among the corn, wheat and grain that tore them down in too great a numbers to be counted here.The carnage was still more frightful in the assault upon the christ ians in t he woods the glandelinians here suffering losses out of all pro portions to those th ey inflicted, for they were here exposed.For two hours the spirited and bloody fighting went on Hymns divisions alone keeping up the bloody and vigorous attacks for the whole time upon the woods, and in that time two hundred thousand glandelinians lay dead and many hundreds of thousands wounded.All this while with all the fury they could muster, and rushing with might and main the glandelinians under Exner Hylet as pressed up to the town of Jennie town, yet from every street, every window of houses not yet destroyed and from all the ruins came a fire of musketry that mowed them down.Raised the whole front of the town seemed ablaze with musketry which was opened with murderous fury.General Georgenians line of men also moved up to attack the t own from the north but he fell dead from his horse and his glandelinians broke into panic and fled.All this while a furious withering tempest of bullets and shells and canister was poured upon the still attacking columns of Shrimp Hymns divisions and he had already pressed the christians under general Puggy Hallane out of the woods despite the terrific resistan resistance.General Baldwin himself with about one h undred thousand men came to the support of general Hallans and rallied them, while his cannoneers used every piece of artillery they could bring to bear increasing the appalling carnage. Along general Rudolph Rossendales line the Angelinians for an hour repelled the attack of Hair Breadth Harrys Glandelinians, the Abyssinkilians fighting like fiends to hold their ground.Hairbreadth and Gannons landelinians still kept up the attack however, though seven of their brigades had already been reduced to regiments.Gannons divisions still moved on however, and the bloody battle was then increased.

In the meantime Jimmie givians reserves and his broken divisions having been rested advanced to the su pport of Baldwin who were st ill holding whose Angelinians were st ill holding their ground with unabated vigor.Even after this a larger force of Angelinians came to his support under general Stanck, and Baldwin now counter attacked the enemy, checking the glandelinians despite their brilliant courage they displayed, but soon were repulsed however with stupendous loss.

Yet these christian forces to prevent the enemy from advancing any further kept up the vigorous assault, while other divisions who had first made the daring counter charge and was repulsed was reforming.But these counter assaults wer were in vain, for now glandelinians under general Fred Harry moved up to support the rest of the rebels.Therefore the Glandelinians were soon press ing on again .Along one space of a few hundred yards, five hundred Angelinians seemed to have been mowed down at one discharge of musketry from the enemys line, and now one part of the christian line was in confusion.

In the meantime Germaine givians entire line had continued its recoilment and was out of the action for the rest of the time.The battle along Shrimp Hymns divisions was increasing with tremendous fury, while the fighting along the whole line under Fred Harry raged with still bloodier results heavy forces of Abyssinkilians being concentrated upon the assailants.All this while the glandelinian batteries kept up the cont inuous cannonade, supporting the Glandelinians attacking gladerlinias army in its defenses, and many hundreds of thousands of more glandelinians drawn from Manleys right were pushed forward t o support the fierce attack, and though again the Glandelinian columns were torn by the terrific christian fire, the attack still continued.Some of the surviving assailants having lost heavier again started to recoil before the murderous withering fire thwt continually met them , the roar of countless muskets and pistols continued on, and a whole hundred thousan , the roar of countless muskets and pistols continued on, and a whole hundred thousand thousand more glandelinians fell.Gannons whole line itself was threatened with annihilation from the artillery fire of the rebels , the ful force of this cannon fire raking his lines through and through with the most awful effects, and with such results that Gannon was obliged to withdrew his men out of rangee

General Fred Harry continued his own assault, hundreds of thousands of his glandelinians springing up to the very muzzles of the christian guns, and soon bec began swarming among them.However the tremendous firing had slackened from the rebel batteries, but not withstanding this, the glandelinians were on the point of driving the christians back along Rudolphs line also, when general Leocadia came up with several brigades from the right of Hansons army, and these swe pt to the rescue, and opened a destre destructive fireupon o the enemy with their-own musketry.More terrible now was the havoc in the rebel ranks, and while the glandelinian officers tried every means to stem the confusion among their columns , some of ganscns artillery from a rise of grgund put in an oblique fire ,more christian columns arived to the assistance of laderlinia, and again fairly moved the enemy down as fast as they showved themselvs through the smoke, and even massing t ogether drove the foremost columns of glandelinians backe Baldwins line was already shattered by the recent fire of the glandelinian batteries and his own men lay in monsterous windrows, and also heaps where they fell, the survivors recoiling in solid but unbroken lines.It was apparent that the glandelinians wre bound to win this reckless sucidal battle at all costs, and indeed they were winning right alongthe assailants under general Exner Hyletze had pushed on but reaching the woods on the right came upon a long line of hidden or masked Abyssinkilian batteries, which opened as if from ambush a short range murderous fire, which was followed from behind every tree, rock and brush, and even from the t ree tops and branches themselves a most deafening and incessant rattle of musketrye

Another roar of guns followed, then came the responnse of the glandelinians but for a time they could not face that terrible hell.The glandelinians were in confusion, some took shelter behind other tress and rocks, and others were falling back, but the left of the-line was still advancing to the attack, despite the fact that Exner Hyletzes glandelinians in dead and wounded l y lay like scattered hay strewn over the ground.The officers were reckless however, they rallied their columns, and desiring to accomplishing their already nearly won battle pressed the advance once moreAgain and again the christian musketeers in the ambush lis and the fire from the masked batteries belched forth the same annihilating fire and the din of that cannonading and musketry reared likesome great volcanic eruption in the woods
More awful gaps were made in the lines of the daring and reckless grayccats but still more the surviving glandelinians came on and though their front ranks or divisions had again wavered, they was prssed onward by the pressure behind,and the new stretch of ground over which they went was fairly strewn with the dead and wounded rebels.The slaughter was more dreadful and it seemedthat it would never cease. Yet with a horrid burst of yells the glandelinians continued the violence of the fiere fierce attack, and as the christian fire continued with the same destructive effect the assailants were filled with consternation, and began to give way again.Again scores of ranks of the foolish landelinians went down, the appalled survivors retiring in gr eat confusion, though their officers tried to encourage them on. Then the Angelinians delivered a withering fire enew to keep up the confusion among the columns of the enemy, and terrific was the effects on the retreating glandelinians.(Reader tell me if this battle is going t o ceaseor keep on forever.)
In these long hours of most bloody fighting with laderlinias army, the glanddilinianxx glandelinians who had assembled hid had suffered more dreadful losses than any oth er landelinian division combined, but as they fell back, other divisions of Beppe Evans army itself covered their retreat, and despite the fact that the Angelinians were moving forward rushed them with fixed b yonets.The Angelinians fell bac before this furious and sudden advance of Beppe Evans army.The glandelinians came on gallently and drove them back, charging up to the very works only to receive a galling fire that cut them down in whole lines .The very ground before the christian works wasfairly paved with the fallen grayccats, and Beppe Evans line drew back a considerable distance, while general Exner Hyletzes bodies of glandelinians now arriving moved forward to resume the terrific onslaught.Hundreds after hundre ds more of the glandelinians fell riddled by bullets, and even hundreds of grenades were hurled upon the landelinians.Yet the glandelinia s despite their losses were bound to drive the christians out of their works , and though repulsed rallied and again rushed to the assault with redoubled fury.Indeed for gladerlinias ne positions no one could have imagined a more stubborn and en enduring contest.General Flynns divisions also resumed their attack, the Angelinians along his front sticking to their position firmly, pouring as it seemed five thousand volleys upon the assailants per minute.
In the meantime the traitor general Germannia ivism, the wayward son of ging Robert ivism was also pushing forward to attack the christians, and as he came within range he came upon ging ivians center and he was surprised indeed to meet a fire of musketry which shattered his front columns, the christian cannon also raining shot and shell.Yet on pressed Germannias surviving divisions of wicked glandelinians in full fury, but again the christian fire tore awful gaps in his main line, and compelled to his main line.But the other divisions however resumed the assault upon another portion of the line, and thes Angelinians loaded their cannon and the infantry gotready to meet them and waited untill the wicked glandelinians came within close range, then their whole line seemed to blaze simultaneously.This time scores of columns of glandelinians melted away, and five officer generals, Yumoran, Abner Schroder, Arwcury, and general Porsen Lotts were mortally wounded.This confused the glandelinians but they did not fall back as General Hendersons division came to their aid, and therefore despite the great slaught er and-theless of five of their officers, the glandelinians continued the attack, while glynns divisions advancing under another hotfire, were also thrown into, confusion, and thirty thousand of their dead were strewn on the ground within a minute minute.

General Flynn had a narrow escape from a shell, but his men rallied, reformed, and again advanced in the face of that dreadful fu fire, which again gapped their lines frightfully.Other glandelinians under other generals maccmade fierce assaults upon all parts of ganscns line, but with gro greater energy, but a portion of the division for a time were demorilized, by the fierce raistance they met, and were about to fall back, when un other divisions consisting of Mangaboos and Guerriers came up to their supports.The glandelinians were therefore rallied, and again they swept forward in great force and fury, and this time struck against the christian line with such voilence and vehemence, that general Cs Costellisces Angelinians fell back, while glynns made a most furious effort to drive back the christian lines along his front.Yet again his glandelinians were repulsed with great slaught er, but a as he was forced to fall back, the landelinian batteries ree renewed their terrible firing, the gunners training all the artillery on the v christian columns, which were surging upon glynns divisions, and driving them back stillfurther.Under this artillery fire the poor Angelinians could not advance and they were forced to recoil t giving glynns divisions time to rally, and once more the glandelinians under this bold co mander pushed forward.These glandelinians now tried their level-best once more to capture the christian position but half of the fi rst w ave of glandelinians were swept away by a searching fire, and ten more of their commanding generals Gast Cansin, James Houghton, Frank Vist erian, Victor Gingersnap, Handonia Whitehead, Exner Hyletze, Candonia, Mandonia, and Beppe Evans, Gander givian , Hendersen Becker, Keller Fendersnip, Patrick goward and several other worthy glandelinian generals were all killed except Exner Hyletze and Beppe Evans who were severely wounded.
Yet the surviving glandelinians kept up the tremendous attack, sweeping forward this time with seemingly irrestible force.But again a fire was poured upon the rebels that again drove them into consternations.This christian fire had been so sudden and severe that brigades and even divisions had b een reduced to small fragments.No governor despicall this, the glandelinians only went at it again, and moved forward in full force to capture theworks, thistime sweeping forward in immense lines, and wedge formation, but thechristian fire was just as de adly as before, the first divisions of the rebels being reduced to a few hundred men, and their front line disolvedlike a snowbank.Piles upon piles of dead and wounded lay arw besides the works, and again the survivors recoiled, and this time the Angelinians went after them.Nearly one whole quarter of gladerlinias divisions or army was now counter advancing, and the glandelinian cu gunners a mile to the rear of the rebel advancing force seeing the Angelinians coming massed all their batteris once more, and opened probably the fiercest fire of the wholetatle.But despiye the fearful cannon fire, the whole lineof christians pressed on, and though now their own columns melted away before the terrific storms of shells, grp grape and canister, they began to drive the retreting glandelinians back st i ll furher further at the pointof the bayonet, and moved forward with desperate devil recklessness, tearing and cutting their way through and through the enemys lines, mix mixing up in a frenzied hand to hand fih fight, and driving the rebels into a sta,pede.The carnage-now was awfule
But more andmore f of the glandelinian batteries were-trained uponthem and would have fired had not the christians been mixed with the glandelinians.But Pprgatorism massed i his whole entire force upon the advancing christians.This newly advancing rebel army extending nearly ten miles long overlapped a portion of the christian wave and took it in the flank, and the Angelinians with many of their own brigades and divisions reduced b more hand fuls of men again began to recoil,the flanking gl n glandelinians attacking the panic stricken chris christians, with no mercilless fury, and,thoughwithinin another hour one attacking force of five hundred thousand glandelinians was reduced to fifty thousand, the confusion of the survivors could not now effect the main line, which carried all before them, and cut the christian line all to pieces, and routing them like frightened sheep. The other two wings of laderlinias division or army still held, even when the glandelinians swarmed forward to the attack in overwhelming numbers.They drove back the left and right of the glandelinian assailants, crushing and mangling them with the loss, the glandelinians strong in numbers as they were notbeing able to stand before the christian fire of two thousand cannon, and millions of muskets going off at once, riddling thousands of their men with bullets, and tore and shattered their whole line untill not hing was left but scattered fragments here and there, and almost hidden in the smoke of battle, and made weird in color by the flashes of countless n umbers of shell explosions and can -n cannon and musket volleys.In this terrible discharge id of cannon and musketry, the Angelinians had used up more than a thousand rounds of ammunition per minute they had fired so incessantly.Yet the second main line of the rbel left no now appeared through the sea of smoke and flame, and pressed upon the christians with such fury, that though general Emery Page and Hanson Johnie H johnson came to the air it e seemed that the glandelinian advance or assault could not be checked, though a drum drum fire of sevet seventy batteries was opened u pon them in a continuous general discharge.At one point three umma umm unnamed Glandelinian generals had been powed down and torn to pieces by a storm of bullets and canisters , while thousands of privates fell, while in the space of one quarter of a mile within three minutes one hundred thousand Angelinians were cut down, and the other

Angelinian divisions defending this point point being dreadfully cut up, and half the wing shattered to mere regiments were at last compelled to withdraw, and Gladerlinia indeed observed and realized that the whoce battle was lost. Yet one of his wings still held though his whole army of nine million had been reduced to three, and so Glanderliia was bound to hold his lines together, untill the enemy either gave up the assault from sheer exhaustion, or that he would die first, before he would even retreat in the face of such stubborn headlong assaults. So he ordered all his officers to hold all their surviving divisions together, even at the cost of annihilation, for he declared that if he was worsted the main army under King Vivian would be crushed and wiped out, and that the enemy would then win the war, and the child slavevil would never be put to an end. The Angelinian officers, though this seemed like folly, realised that not far from the scene of this terrible battle they had children of their own, and this made them more det ermined, and therefore though the Glandelinians pressed the assault with greater determination, their whole lines of assault of even five hundred thousand or more were literally rended and wiped out within two hours time of accession of three more assaults. The other Glandelinians exultant with successes elsewhere, did all their best to force the christian lines of Gladerlinias forces backwards even resorting to super human efforts, and therefore exhausted their most greatest numbers against the deadly christian fire, but the surviving Angelinian columns though cut to pieces rapidly still held on nevertheless, fih fighting their assailants with bayonets and every available weapon, even used stones, pick axes, boots, shovels and spades, as weapons, and even in the tustle, would bite and tear at their assailants with their teeth and finger nails like mad dogs.

The experiences of Violet and her sisters or what they went through during the rest retreat of the main christian armies under King Vivian, and general Hanson, was the greatest they had ever had. Many of the christian divisions as the littles girls dashed away onn on their own horses, passed on in another direction, and soon the little girls saw masses of graycoats swarming tward them yelling like demons and firing and shouting as if they had gone crazy. As several of the Glandelinians who were Guerians dashed for them, Violet and her sisters, galloped on faster with the swarm of howling graycoats after them. Horse as they swerged from the evening shree shadows of the tall trees and galloped to the rear Violet saw bigger columns of Glandelinians dashing after them from three direc tions to hem them in. Violet and her sisters therefore no longer confined them selves to the paths, but seperated for a time dashing over lawns and over hedges and down the embankments embankments, their horses fairly swarm swreuling in their fails, and as the little girls were dismounted the Glandelinians sp sped after them with greater gleefhere seemed to be wild confusion everywhere. Large bodies of purple coats, were running swiftly over the fields toard the south, while the advancing rebel cannonnamon still thundered behind. It seemed impossible for Violet and her sisters to elude their desperate persuers, but they in their frantic dash for life reached a large column of Angelinians who were retreating like flying sheep. And the little girls to save themselves tried to rally them them. As they went on they saw at a distance a part of Hansons main columns spreadding in great confusion, and there was a general uproar. Amid all the infernal din Violet and hersisters by their presence and by their daring exmmple managed to stem the confusion among some of the fregiments they caught up with, and just when a large body of rebels emerge. They got away from their clutches just in time. Hansons retreating columns swarmed across large meadows, down roars roads, through woods and over meadows, and large rebel colu mns dashed on in persuit. Indeed the sight was the most thrilling that Violetvand her sisters had everwitnessed during the war. Many of the Glandelinians persued the regiments that Violet and her sisters had succeeded in rallying, and a score of the Glandelinians tried with al their energy to over take the little girls but were promptly shot down. Most of the christians shamed by the presence of the Vivien girls being among them had rallied and these stood their ground to cover cover the retreat of thelittle girls, and poured a fierce volley upon the frenzied Glandelinians.
The regiments that Violet and her sisters had rallied, tretreated to a good sized plain, andwhen they were a quarter of a mile away, the others who had stood their ground followed followed quickly. The enemy were indeed greatly exaltant over their brilliant victory and kept up the persuit for miles. Violet and her sisters were still chased by the Glandelinians who it seemed were bound to capture the little girls at all costs. On every side countless shots rang out, and the booming of cannon still sounded behind, the shells bursting rr frequently among the retreating christian committing awful havoc. The Glandelinians The Glandelinians persueing Violet and her sisters were gaining on them st eadily some being well mounted, butthe Angelinians covering the retreat of the little girls again started firing, bei bringing down a gray coat at every shot. The Angelinians realized indeed the plight of the litt le girls and made another sdous serious resistance, permitting the little girls to get away, and then agai again continued their own retreat. Indeed most of the whole christian army was in retreat, for the enemy having cut up every christian division to pieces had crashed upon them with fixed bayonets, carrying all before them, and at half past ei ght that night the victory was complete and Gladerlinias army alone had still maintained its own ground.

For the rest of the evening the battle continued along gladerlinias front while the rest of the army was retreating. The Glandelinians had continued to deliver the assaults with the spirit and determination that usually marks thespartian soldier when in action, but the Glandelinians were again and again repulsed with the most frightful slaughter. Gladerlinia felt sure that the enemy was so despgate that the Glandelinians would never ce ase the attack upon him. Most of the Angelinian columns which had recently been driven back with their lines c rushed had retreated to the ruins of the two towns. Gladerlinia held his ground all the time and ven never failed and finally the enemy gave it up.

All night long the christian armies of Hanson Vivian and Robert Vivian continued its retreat without rest. However tward morning two other armies of christians one under Jack Ambrose Evans, and another under Jackno Jacksonia Evans were advancing northward and encountered the christian armies which were on the full retreat. Jack Evans the frind of the Vivian girls opened his ranks and allowed most of the christian columns to pass through, and then threw his army in the way to hold general Manley at bay. This occuredcat seven thirty and soon h there was a most extreme action along his own lines. Manley had been surprised at the appears ce of the new army but he was determined not to be cheated of his victory now and therefore sent all his force sweeping against Jack Evans line, while his artillery covered the attack. From the explosion of so many shells again trees crushed to earth in frightful numbers, or wevere stripped of limb and bark, and debris flew about like snow. Column after column of the assailants were shattered to pieces , the roar of the new battle along Evans line seeming as if Heaven had turned into a warfare of its self. Trees were literally being split in the middle, stripped of limbs, and crashed to the ground by thousands, while sheets of grape shot and canister which was poured in terrents goughed holes in the trunks of the tress too many to be counted. With the utmost steadiness the conflict raged with the same vocoviolence while the others of Robert Vivians army was still coming on in its retreat. The enemy cheated ot of the prey desired surged in long lines against Jack Evans forces, maddening whirlpools of men, and sickening abysses showed in their lines where new gaps were torn, while now now and then the left of Evans titan christian line would no bend before the mighty strength of the onslaught. Yet the infuriated assailants seemed to come al the time in never ending swarray, and this at once indicated to Evans that he had the full force of Manleys Glandelinians concentrated against him and that he could not be able to hold his ground half a day before such overwhelming numbers. During the height of his attack, general Jack Evans saw through the smoke a large column of graycoats seven deep literally arise as it seemed on the flank of his line of his left wing as if on the crest of a wave, and then sweep forward like so many grains of sand on the shore. This alarmed him for if this flank assault was successful the Glandelinians on his front could break his line to pieces and he would meet a terrible disaster. There was a battery of machine guns not in use, and these were immediately swung round upon the fa flankers, and poured such a storm of grape and canister upon these assailants, that it smashed the surging column to pieces within a few minutes, and drove the survivors back in confusion. Though general Sherman had declared "war to be hell" he never with his own army of Union Troops had a fiercer counter part in a struggle for life, and safty as Jack Evans army did in the concluding titan s throes in this mighty struggle. During this awful assault of the enemy scarcely a single front part of Jack Evans line was left to tell the tale of the frightful struggle and thousands of the fleeing Abbiesnnians of General Vivians army continueing onward, were either blinded by the haze of powder smoke, or killed outright by exploding shells and storms of bullets at random, or subsequently died of exposure and fright, and even died from being unable to bear the terrible din.
Along Jack Evans center the assault of the Glandelinians progressed with the most appalling fury and soon the ground, fields and glens for miles along this new battle line were literally as to say, flooded with the blood of the fallen, and covered with vertible mounds and windrows windrows of fallen Glandelinian soldiers and debris. Hundreds of regiments and scores of brigades on both sides were time and again almost annihilated, the left of Evans line was crumpled up by by the fierce impact, and his right and left grand divisions were already demorilized. Indeed for a time it seemed as if Jack Evans was at the mercy of the enemy and he felt his army was lost for nothing it seemed s could stop the wild Glandelinian attack. It seemed as if masses more of trees themselves went down as if at a breat h from shell explosions, and h undreds of thousands of trees and timbers were shattered anew by the fierce exchange of musketry and artillery on no both sides. During the height of the charge a score of Angelinian regiments along Evans center went down into dead and wounded and socomplete was the destruct ion of general Journalls division that only a big windrow of dead and wounded mingled with wreckage could be found, the wreckage of which was enveloped in a furnace of fire. The firing of musketry and cannon along the whole of Evans lik line had spread in horizontal sheets. General Journall narrowly escaped, though he had been persued by the enemy for half a mile untill Jack Evans came to his rescue with a body of cavarly and drove back his hundreds of persuers and slaughtered them all.

In this new storm of battle many other officers of all ranks but not generals, lost their lives, and general Burnsider of the Angelinians plainly saw a great number of Clandelinians go down in bleeding corpses. At this point however the rebel assault was perfectly futile. The Abyssinkillians themselves fought and shouted and struggled like maddogs against the hugdreds ,and hundreds of masses that broke over the works, and hat yet every Clandelinian who crossed the works never came back to tell the tale. During this storm of carnage over the works a whole brigade of Clandelinians numbering several hundred thousand perished in an hour, and yet thought it was finally repulsed and held back for a while, what the titanic assault did to the christian line can never be imagined. Several christian divisions not able to withstand the cyclonicassault seemed like chaff to have been driven to the four corners of the archipelago, while other immense divisions were crushed like immenxe immense egg shells. This attack caused the heaviest firing ever heard in battle. The flashing and thunder of the long linss of musketry and cannon was moredreadful. Though repulsed after three hours struggling the rest of the enemy had come up to Hanleys suppoer and the support and the assault was reassumed, and soon the furious poin pounding of the Clandelinian columns indicated that the worse was yet to come. Indeed the fury of the second attack was indescribable. In the terrifin combat hand to hand, the very clothes were torn from the bodies of the fiercely battling soldiers, and everything visible in the haze seamed incased in smoke peirced by the never ceasing flashes of musketry. It a was a wonder and a mire miracle that Evans line could hold as long as it did, whileeven now more Clandelinians were reinforcing the assailants which increased their attack with redoubled fury, the rebels rushing to the attack as fast as men could run.

Indeed the pressure of the Clandelinian onslaught seemed to have the pressure as if every wave of troops was an avlanach of stones mud and earth, or to rea retain the weight and density of a mountian. So o wonder the Clandelinian onslaught concentrated from probably half of Hanleys army upon Evans seamed to crush every front line that dared to stand and oppose them. Wreckage andflying debris still scatt ered in every direction from the burst of high explosives , while fallen trees would seemingly roll so midways sideways from the concussion of thes ex shells and at times the bayonets of the assailants and the defenders would be clashing together untill they brokefrom the force of the blows, while the two lines in mingling with one another would writhe, and twist and squirm in a most frightful manner, and the weight and pressure of the assaulting columns as both sides would rush back and forth would cause a break here and there among or along the christian line, but neverytheless the Angelinians still held firm, and would be enabledto check the furious onrush of the Clandelinians. The screaming of the continuous sect orm of shells, and the furious rain of canister which tore the Clandelinian columns to pieces for every charge made a hadious noise, and down would go thousands of ranks in gray, big rok rocks were blown to nothing by the high explosives How anyhow general Evans realized that he was not going to be able to hold out much longer. His left wing was threatened with annihilation already and Jacksonia Evans army was over three miles yet to the rear.

Thousands of gasping, half torn wretches, and half stunned soldiers attempted to crawl away ot wor to safty but they were swept to death by torrents of grape and canister. Upon now the very Clandelinian columns extendingwas far as eye could reach seemed to be si subjected to the most frightful fury. For a time in spite of take taking shelter of every objecti of protection, and in the face of the worse storm of cannon andmusketry the Clandelinians were mowed down in the most indes criable numbers, but nevertheless the survivors camen like the furious waves of the sea advancing against a breakwater, only to shatter themselves anew against the christian lines, though of course they in turn also rended the christian lines to fragments. For six hours that morning the most frightful series of whirlwind of attacks that Evans had ever seen in his service during the war, raged with unabated fury, and when eleven o-clock came that morning there was no change in the situation and now his army was almost encircled by the enemy who had ag again flank flanked him in-two places, and were cutting and shooting himmen down in hundreds of thousands, and to make it worse the Clandelinian columns came on one after another like the most furious seas driven ahead by a cyclone, threat ening again to tear down all opposition, and indeed it looked as if Evans army could not withstand the titanic fury of the onslaught. Many hundreds of thousands of the Angelinians were already in a state of stunned, numbed, paralyzed collapse from enduring the din of the battle, and overcome with exhaustion from enduring the onslaught so long without resting, and thy were about to give up for the onslaugh onslaught showed no sign of abatement. This indeed was the second crisis of the battle, and yet when eleven thirty o-clock came the situation was still unfavorable and no signs of Jacksonia Evans. Evans had come. The whole christian army of Jack Evans had gone through the whole storm of furious battle as nicely however as the rigi rigging would through a furious tempest at sea, the whole main linebeing reduced to shrouds, but Jack Evans knowing now it was too late to escape, and hoped afresh for the hasty coming of general Jacksonia, and even sent messengers o on the most fleetest horses to warn Jacksonia of his danger. Out of millions of trees standing along the battle line there was only a thousand left upright, or with their leaves and branches on. It also seemed that the sagging and chrushed christian line would soon have to yeild against the ormormous pressure, of the screaming and yelling Clandelinian columns, and now some of the Angelinian divisions on Evans right began to give way a step by step. Even the terrible storm ofminnies made the most plaintive howlings and shrieking, while mingled with the savage roar of musketry and artillery strange rattli rattlings filled the air, while at times the shrill tempest like hissing of shells and canister kept on with all its fury, and all of a sudden at one quarter of the christian line there came one burst of horrible tu thunder of cannon, which deafened, and almost blinded the Clandelinians. Then suddenly it subsided, the appalling tumult of the firing at other points of the battle line only brea breaking the silence, and Evans could see through his glasses, that his left left was surging forward, and that the foe wave in that location was recoiling.

Wondering what it could mean general Jack Evans sent little Angelinia Aronburg or Gertrude Angelina to find out. Gertrude though she was as sly as probably thousands of fo xes in one in her way of escaping pro prowling Clandelinians realised that this was an extremely dangerous undertaking, and at first fully refused the mission But she realised if she did not do it she would be reported to Violet and her i sisters and probably lose their friendship or some one else would be placed in her stead on the scounting line, and so she bravely took the chances, and disguising herself as a boy, put aside her girlish airs for a while and started. Or as soon as she was ready to go she concealed some weapons about her person, and then startestarted off in the direction where thechristian line was surging forwards as As she went she had to dodge between trees when she ha heard sudden squalls of firing close. She was astonished to observe from a high riseof ground a cloud of new smoke puffs which soon dwindled into a sea or river of smoke and thousands of rows of bright and dim flashes which disappeared, only to reappear, and she at once realised from the direction that Gladerlinia must have fallen back from his position during the night, and having moved from another direction came to Jack Evans aidgar in the distance where there seemed to be a redoubled roar of cannon, she knew that the enemys batteries had been brought up in increased numbers of guns, and even felt for some reason or otge other that one battery was trained on the rise of ground she occupied, for shells began to explos explode dangerously near here. So she quickly scrambled down the side facing the far distant active christian lines. She entered an open glen where to her horror she discovered a perfect sea of dead and mangled bodies, and turning away, feeling almost faint, she suddenly observed to her right the bright gleam of new bayonets far in the distance, and in the direction she knew the Clandelinian army to be

Indeed the bayonets appeared to be moving forward at a great rate and now the fresh thunde r of en cannon, and even big machine guns broke out with a sudden crash. Even as she listened, the gray gleam of uniforms could be seen and the man in lines the Clandelinians were, seemed to be advancing tward her, and so she was compelled to hide in some thick lofty bushes. She knew that once she was discovered by any of the Clandelinians it would be all up for her, so wxhshe was bound to save herself from capture, or die fighting. She therefore drew the concealed weapons and looked over them to see if they were all loaded.

A few minutes later the Clandelinians were seen approaching more swiftly, and in grand array, and even a score of them ,all generals came riding straight for thir their hiding place, and in the front of them all was general Purgatorian, while along side of him rode a fierce looking general wg whom she believed she had seen somewhere before, btbut could not remember his name.

Despite their numbers the little girl decided to make a brave defense, and shoot down all their generals first, but fortunately the officers halted, and dismounting started a loud conversation. Gertrude knew the crafty Clandelinians too well and she remained in her hiding place remaining as still as a mouse.

The far distant cannon was still booming, and one of the shells exploded close to the spot where she was hiding. More cannon boomed, and now a score of shells exploded dangerously near her at once, and only by lying flat did she manage to escape the fragments, that the explosions threw in all directions.

"I must hi de somewhere else" she thought with alarm. "The shells are exploding everywhe lately, and though these may be from the christian guns, a litt lo' Christian Dog " like me is not safe, and as these foolish oats here are soon liable t o draw the full fire of the cannon, I may be killed yet, for sooner or later one of these terrible bombs will find their mark."

Indeed she soon observed that she was right. She must surely seek a new hiding place, or be blown to pieces by the shells, for the thunder of cannon was more incessant, and the detonations of shells, and even high explosives crashed among the lines in gray before her, tearing whole regiments to pieces, and one almost hit upon the very spot where she was hiding and almost buried her in earth.

Two shells came near hitting her, but they only exploded with ear splitting detonations very close to the bushes raining perfect showers of dirt and other wreckage upon her, and spitting clouds of smoke for the space of a hundred feet. Soon she saw a place where she thought it was safer to hide. The problem however was to leave her first hiding place, without being observed by those terrible devilish gcoodler generals in uniforms so handsome that they seemed to be in positions high enough to betoken that they ruled the world and skye

Not far from where she was, and where no shells exploded, there was a long hedge of thrown thorns, and with a spalling small opening, and she quickly darted for this when a shell hid her movement with its smoke, and unseen by the generals who were in the heart of some conversat ion, probably about some secret plans they had in their minds. Just then sevenral officers came up to her former hiding place, three of them being colonels fol/ following the two generals, and then just at that moment a cloud of smoke shot upwards, followed by an ears earsplitting roar, and the whole fiv five went down mangled and bleeding, their horses also. This caused some consternation among the other Clandelinian generals and Furgatorian said when he found they were dead;

"We had better move on fromthis dangerous region or we may have to be brought back on stretchers for those dastardly Federals are finding the range too perfectlye."

Suddenly another officer came up, and he had a suspicious look on his face.

"Well if they ain't the slipperest of spies." He cried. "I could swear that there was some one here a moment ago, though there is no one within sight now. I guess the spies had moved away at our approache"

"What spies did yo you see?" Asked Furgatorian. "I believe you must have dreamed about them." and he let out a hadious laugh.

"No I'm not dreaming your Excel e Emellency." Answered the officer. "I really saw several spies run from those bushes, just where those officers were killed by the high explosive, and run for that hedge of thorns. And they were men dressed as Calverinian peasants."

"You don't say." Exclaimed another officer.

"supposing the spies are among the thorns now." Said another officer.

"Could not be" Said Furgatorian. "for there are too many stickers, and even girl or boys are afraid of being impaled by the thorns. no man would go and hide between them either. And if one little girl got a single thorn, in their leg, arm or hand, they would bawl like a baby. The men spies have escaped that is all."

"Shall we take a look anyway?" Asked one of the generals.

"Not necessary, but you ma y do so if you wish to be killed. But also don't blame me or the others for laughing at you if you get fooled and you find no one there."

A score of the Clandelinian soldiers were called over by the gens general, and when they came up they were ordered to fire a volly at the hedge of thrown thorns. The Clandelinians took aim, and fired, and then as there was no answering cry, and as no one was seen to rise or fall, some of the rebels dashed for the hedge. They hacked it open, but there was no one in sight. The Clandelinians however found bits of clothes, and knew that some one had been there, and then looking around saw a very pretty faced boy vanish from view behind a clump of trees.

"After that boy scout fools." Shouted one of the officers. "It might be one of these Vivian girl brats who are the hardest to catch, and whose shots cut down a man Without missing. Look out for her and be cautious."

The Clandelinians followed swiftly and spread out, but Gertrude seeing them coming, and knowing that her only chance of escape was of creating coming a confusion among them took aim at the leg of one one of the officers and fired but missed his lef leg and the ball struck him in the forehead killing him instantly. The chief officer then caught a glimpse of her face and exclaimed;

"Well if it ain't a strange boy to be so pretty."

"It's a little girl in disguise." Said one of the other officers who was a disguise reader. "But I swear it cannot be one of the Vivian Girls, for she is too tall and her manners are different. She is a crafty she devil however, who ever she is, and a regular sharpshooter, just as unerring as the Vivian girls. She is not so hard to catch however if she is not armed."

"Maybe if we pretend to give up the persuit, she will lose caution and try to flee, thus explo exposing hi herself t o our full view" Said the chief officer "go stop firing boys. Her shots are unerring, and she would rather shoot down all of us poor devils, than risk capture."

The Clandelinians decided to do this, as her return fire was picking a companion at every single shot, and after a severe fusillade of musketry, which dwindled into a slowly receding clattering fire, they pretended to run run slowly disappering out of sight. But by the help of her field glasses she saw what their motion was and be, believing that they expected her to come out and run into their ambush. Nevertheless she knew how to make an retreat without exposing herse lf. So she stopped to pick up a gun she had dropped in her excitement, when she saw lying at her feet a large folded sheet of paper. She picked it up and found that it was some order sent to one of the christian generals by King Vivian himself, and seeing that not far away from where she was there was the body of a dead officer in purple uniform, she realised why he had faile. failed to carry the message to him, so she decided t o do so at all costs. Sailing roughily, she concealed it inside her waist after slipping off her disguise, and hoping that the field glasses the rebels who were hiding in ambush may use would not detect her, she retreated from tree to t ree on her hands and knees, but at times being forced to dodge the screaming shells which still fell here and there. Several of the Clandelinians had crept nearer to her, but they knew she was so well armed, that that they did not dare touch her, but followed her for a distance, and then brought others to their aid by making a strange signe

Gertrude being lost in the shell smitten woods had a long way to go to any point of Jack Evans army, or still further to go where he may be in personal command, and the sight of the graycoats now approaching upon her from two directions aroused her, and therefore she darted for a thick clump of bushes, and in a few minutes the Clandelinians were puzzled again especially, as she disappeared as suddenly as a ghost. The chief officer tried to detect her by the aid of his glasses, but the bh bushes all a over were too thick to reveal her, while Gertrude in desperation loaded loaded every chamber in hs her revolver that were empty. So sreveral of the Clandelinians ke crept to the bushes with great caution, and when they reached the bushes they proceeded to hack a gap in them with their sabres. They did so and forced themselves through the bushe bushes, without encountering any one, but one of them saw something like a boy dart quickly into a small ravine. The Clandelinians aroused the others by opening fire, and then they rushed after her. Stepping for a moment behind a tree Gertrude returned the fire bringing down a Clandelinian wounded, at every shot, and as the rest came swarming after s her she retreated, and disappeared into the ravine. There were a few trees around her all the rest having been leveled to the ground by the recent storm of shells, but on mounting up the other slope s, slope h h she scrambled over the network of branches, and climbed over the trunks, and seeing in the distance the rear of the white wall of smoke from the christian firing line, now had more hope of escaping her desperate pursuers.

Still she climbed from trunk to trunk, and tore her way through the branch branches, but the fierce Clandelinians were able to do the same, and more quicker, and soon Gertrude as she looked back observed that probably three hundred rebels were coming after her, from trunk, to trunk, and scrambling through the branches and every few minutes the officers cursed and swore and ordered her to holde back and let them take her prisoner. So Gertrude was now for the first time experiencing the the reality of being persued by Scoodler Clandelinians.

She observed for the first time the stubborn fury of he Clandelinians w who have no mercy on children, and who could detect spies as well, and as easily as an angel could detect sinners. And these Clandelinians were more feriocus ferocious and crafty, than she had ever imagined, and even it was hard for any game to get away from them. Yet Gertrude managed to clamber over the last of the fallon trees and sped full rate tward the distant wall of smoke. As she dashed on she came upon a single Clandelinian officer coming from an opposite direction, and leveling her pistol at him cried;

"Get down from that horse mr toughy I want to ride hime"

The man looked at her in a quizzical manner and then said;

"You are mistaken boy. I'm a no Clandelinian as you suppose me to be. But if you are chased by t he Clandelinians younder, jump on the horse behind me and I'll take you to the christian lines in safty."

Gertrude at once recognized the voice. It was one of the Angelinia officers of King Vivians command who had been on a scouting tour in disguise. Gertrude seeing the Clandelinians coming, obeyed his request, and he sent the horse forward at a full gallop, far out distancing t he persuers, who were on foote As they neared a batch of woods, a quarter of a mile from where they could yet see the smoke wreaths the man in gray dismounted and ta helping the little girl down said;

"It does surprise me that such a pretty looking boy like you were persued by the Scoodlers, and in the midst of such a frightful b.t battle. What is your name?"

"My name is Angelinia Aronburg, but for some reasons I call myself Gertrude Angeline." she answerede"

"Oh you are Angelinia Aronburh b Aronburg. My goodness what a make up. How did you come to be here?"

She t old him and then said;

"I have found an order written to -n one of the commanding christian officers by King Robert Vivian himself. The bearer as I discovered had never reached h is destiniat ion for he was killed not far from where I picked it up."

Then she told him the whole st ory of her experience, after she had been sent by general Jack Evans to see why his right wing had been moving forward, and asked if he was far offe."

"I'm glad to meet you Gertrude and you are indeed a great little girl indeed" said the general. "I do not believe you you remember me in my disguise." "I'm general Jack Evans himself."

"General Jack Evans" she gasped. "what were you doing in the gray uniform? And h ow did you come to be where I found you? and why did you go out on this mission after you sent me"?

"I had gone out on a scouting tour to learn who the new arivals were coming to the rescue of my wing." said Jack Evans. I d "I discovered who it was. It was Gladerlinia. But let me have the plans and we must start off right away."

"It may be already too late but maybe we can find out who the note is suppose to go to" said Gertrude "It's funny the one who wrote it did not sign his name."
Suddenly a bigforce of rebels was seen approaching from another quarter and general Jack Evans who first s saw them, quickly, n and suddenly grabbed Gertrude by the arm, and pulled her almost rudely into a bush, hiding his horse quickly as welle Jack Evans was sad indeed over King Vivians defeat, yet he was determined that the Glandelinians would not get this little friend of his when he had repulsed the Glandelinians under Manley and Shoemannia and as they were in hiding Evans remarked to Gertrude in a tone of bitter ascent;
"I'm sure as long as this war rages, the reign of terror at Vivian Vickey will never st op."
As soon as the last of the party of graycoats had passed, all going at a swift gallop on horseback, both darted from their hiding place, and Jack first placed Gertrude on his horse, then ,e leaped on himself, and off they galloped, the Glandelinians in the rear observing them and opening fire. As the two had only gone a sho short distance, Evans "g again dismounted when he observed that the rebels did not follow, and he was about to show Gertrude the way to the safest part of the line, when the little girl threw her arms around his neck and said;
"Oh ggeneral how can I ever thank you for saving me from those frightful Scoodlers. And after you sent me into it at that."
"Oh it's nothing" e answered blushing in spite of himself at being kissed by such a pretty child, and indeed for the first time in his life. "And then he gu hugged her fondly and returned the kiss
"I guess you had better come with me to the lines as they may mistake you for a rebel." Said Gertrude.
Evans was about to answer, when suddenly he let go his embrace and glanced quickly t ward the south. Astonished by his action she looked in the same direction, and saw a great army advancing, and as the atmosphere was very h azy from the smoke of battle which was st ill raging, both at first could not detect their uniforms. They feared it was rbel reinforcements, and gladly would he be willing to dash f back to the christian lines, and give the alarm but it was too far, and these if they were enemies would get there far ahead of him or Gertrude. He examined the moving hosts with his field glasses for fully two minutes.
"Red coats?" He exclaimed. "I wonder who they can be?"
Evans and the little girl advanced out further to see them more distinctly. They were Winkis Abyssinkilians alright but what command he could not tell. There was no other christ ian army to reinforce him or Gladerlinia except Jacksonia Evans than he could judge, and Jacksonia would not come from that direction. Then therefore he began to realize that it must be a fresh army under some new commander or a part of Hansons retreating army which he kn knew must soon be approaching t ward him. Evans and Gertrude waited for fifteen minutes, and then as they were within a tenth of a mile, Evans and Gertrude ga went forward to meet them, Evans having discared his gray uniform.
"Who is in command here" he shouted, dashing up within hailing distance. The troops at his approach, halted amid therolling od of drums, and a tall elderly looking general on horseback advanced to met general Jack Evans, holding a crucifix in his right hande
"I'm in command here and I'm general Costellio Benligan" said the elderly general with a slute and a polite bow. "I have come with this army to reinforce your right and centr cent er, and to help you hold your ground. A partofmy command is already pressing back over two quarters of the assailants. I was attacked myself or I would hav have come sooner. And general Jacksonia Evans had moved his army to the relif of general Hanson and Robert Vivians. Here is my commission papers."
"It's all right" Said Evans. "you were coming from a direct ion that filled me with suspicion. My right and center has already been crushed to pieces, just before Gladerlinia h imself came to my relief, and also I thank you dor your prompt arival for general Gladerlida could not go it all for me. I have sent this little girl with me to see what caused the change on my right as she was long in comingback I then went myself."
"That's true" said Gertrude
"Well I h v have arived with the reinforcements so what shall I do now?" Remarked th general.
"Take your other forces and succor my left" nswered Evans.
After saluting the general and recieving the salute in return, Jack Evans and the little girl galloped off in another direction.
Indeed the enemy had no idea of the arival of reinforcements, and when Costellio Benligan moved up withthe rest of his men to support the christian left, the Glandelinians were indeed surprised. Even while Gertrude had been away, the christians had lost over seven hundred and fifty six thousand killed and wounded, and at the arival of the reinforcements first from Gladerlinia the u u survivors took heart, and and drove in at the Glandelinians with their bayonets. As she and Evans went on their way, o some how or other they got lost in a dense woods, and here they came upn upon a party of Glandelinian officers whom Gertrude Angeline had seen before.

She also saw a strange one among them, who was very strongly builded, and tk taking a good look at him she saw he was tall, and wore a rich gray uniform his feature being howeve more hedious than any man she could have ever seen or imagined. All the other officers had less ferocious looks, but nevertheless their face showed stubborn ess and courage that nothing could shake. The Glandelinian generals were standing by by a tall oak tree, and the most hedious of them all spread out a thick roll of papers.
"All here is the plan I have worked ten nights and days to make" Said the hedious officer. "I hardly had two hours sleep every night. The other one was stolen by an Angelinian spy who when we caught him destroyed it. We are to try and flan gens flank general Jack Evans army to night."
"Yes but be careful of spies" Said one of the general officers with a scowle "here w was a certain girl whom we had chased only half an hour ago, and she got away with one of the orders sent by King Vivian whom one of the men had left lying on the ground aftafter he had been destroyed by the shell fire he passed through. He was supposd to take it to Costellio Benligan. That little devi/ is nothing but a snipe."
"Devil and snipe indeed" Said the ugly looking general with a fierce frown. "That little girl cannot be one of the Vivian Girls, for they are somewhere else, and probably with that dog of a King Robert Vivian;;;"
Who was defended in good st yle in this battle just fought." Laughed another Glandelinian officer.
"I know those Vivian Girls though they do notknow m me." Said the great general. "Before the war I had seen them na many ti e times, especially interfering with the child slave masters, and were once or twice brought before me only to escape. They are indeed slippery striplings, and as crafty as the other girl spy herself, but not so dangerous. But tell me who was that girl in boys clothes you chased. You cannot tell me it was that Amazon viper Angelinia Aromu Aronburg?"
"I cannot tell your Excellency, but she kind of resembled here" Said one of the generals. "But she was as slippery as an ell, for even all the men failed to cat ch her, or even shoot her down, and every shot she fired hits its mark and all the soldiers were killed."
"These Angelinians are more crafty than we are." Said another officer." and a prisoner never escaped who is taken by them, unless by death, exchange or by the help of crafty companions. With i us it is different. Our guards are careless, and we ourselves do not watch good wnough. So we are alone to blame."
"You are right" admitted the fierce looking general with a deadly scowl that looked more like the scowl of a demons. He had black whiskers and hair) "Now as for this attack. We will have to get around with an overwhelming force, for Glad Gladerlinia is supported by Jack Evans and Ben i gn ligan, and the be bst to best to do is to surprise the flank of both by noon if not sooner. And there is no one to over hear our plans now. Th e Vivian Girls are not in our way, and as for the other spy-"
"Crash bang, smashe uche."
Every officer leaped around and stared at each other in consternation.
"What in the world was that?" Whi whispered the hedious looking general, at last after a moments silence, his face as white as chalk.
"There is some one behind those trees" cried one of the officers, whose name was general Maurice Stoneheart. (Heart as hard as a brick)
With a bound the hedious one who was general Raymond Richardson Federal sprang at the tree, and though Gertrude Angeline was captured Evans escaped.
"Spies. Traitors." Enraged firing a shot after Evans. "What does this mean."
"We are no traitors" Said Gertrude. "We just happened to overhear."
Then suddenly with whitening face, but flashing eyes Gertrude straightened herself up to his h her full graceful height, and deliberately flung off her hair and hat and loosened her hair and then looked at Federal as she blurted out fiercely;
"You general Raymond Ri h Richardson Federl are nothing but an insulting fiend, in calling me a viper, a snipe, and a devil and in talking disrespectfully of t he Vivian Girls, whom you have wrongly spurned who are your rightful queens. You are also gul guilty of murdering my sister and shall pay dear for it."
"And if I did my pretty Amazon" Sneered Federal placing his hand on the hilt of his sabre "what is it to you, and why do you skulk behind trees, to hear words which are not meant for your fair ears?"
"You spoke insultingly of the Vivian Girls, and of me, general Federal, and though I may seem to be your prisoner I demand that you immediately retract what you have said, or I'll kill you where you stand." And easily and carelessly she laid her hand upon the hilt of her own sabre which the rebels had forgotten to take from her."
"What a hot headed amazon she is." Observed Maurice Stoneheart amusedly."
"nd prett Ier than any girl next to the Vivian Girls. Faith you have tre ated upon her te treaded upon her dainty toes general Federal."
Federals ran rage ad given place to a deadly calm more menancing than his anger had been.
"Maybe it is Angelinia Aronburg herself in disguise." He retorted. "For a boy could not look that handsome and may even the Vivian Girls would not retort to me like she did. Don't let her get away. h she has learned my intent intentions, and I'll shoot every one if she escapes."

Gertrude was seized by Federal himself, and by force her weapons were taken away. The prisoner was marched off for a considerable distance, and soon general Stone heart blw a whistle, and a score of graycoated soldiers, two of them captians came at once.

"Take this girl prisoner and put t her to death." said Federal "she was with a general spying and r probably was the same one who has been spying before."

The soldiers surrounded the prisoner and formed into a line general Stoneheart at one heart, placing the prisoner in the middle. Then saluting the soldiers marched off to a lonely place, Stoneheart following to direct the execution. They passed through a long avenue in the glen, and every one of the Glandelinians continually scowled at Gertrude, who was defiant, and determined to get away despite the close guard around her. And if she succeeded not she had confidence of Evans who would bring a whole brigade to her rescue, and she knew it. And also she decided to do a very bold deed, when they were quite close to the christian firing lines. Of course she did not fear da death, but she knew if she did not escape, she would not be able to deliver the note to King Vivian, and there would be a great diss disaster. Yet around her was a solid phalanx of armed men, and armed men in front. The Glandelinians guarding Gert Gertrude and Elaine were reviling and cursing her and several women were mean enough to strike her in the fa e face, and spit upon her. When the g Glandelinians finally halted, general Stone Heart inspected her, and presently he selected one of the men who was to join the firing squad, and addressed some words to the man which Gertrude could not hear. The lone rebel soldier nodded his head, and raised his hands above his head, in token of a death s lute, and then grasped the little girl by the wrist, and dragged her from the line, and placed her in front, about twenty yeards. Then the Glandelinians formed in line. They did not see three men sir springing tward them. Just then Gertrude observed to her horror another band of executioners approaching and with them was a band of brightened girls and boys. She had been on her knees with her hands upraised tward heaven, and she was half naked at that, while several of the hedious Glandelinians had no doubt conceived in their minds such horrible torture that no matter that no man no matter how hard his hear was, could have stood there and here to see it carried carried out.

At length the three men in hiding spied the huddled knot of terror stricken children, and also spied Gertrude and a wave of fury surged over them, and with loud yells of bestial frenzy charged tward the Glandelinians with bayonets fixed. The three men were almost upon the rebels thoug long bayonets glea l gleaming in the sunlight. General Stoneman or heart saw them and p sprang toward them wit h a couple of mighty bounds, with all his muscles required, to carry him to the aid of his men in the path of the attackers. His long sabre circled whirringly through the air and one of the men sprawled headless to the ground. The other two man now turned upon the general, and as he stood facing them, a sullen yell from the distance answered the cheers from the aroused Glandelinians. From the tail of his eye (Maybe it had a tail too long to see with) gone general Stoneheart s sawthree scores of redcoats rushing through the woods tward the Glandelinians, while more and more appeared. At their g head was general Evans. Then another man looking like an officer appeared in front of them. He paused a moment with his sabre upraised.

"Forward charge. Let's make the fight worth while, and turn this coming butchery bur butchery, int o an orgy of revenge that willechoe through the ages, and cause men to blanch."

Then without another word he turned and bounded tward the Glandelinians, w o began firing fiercely as they recoiled, while from all directions a thunderous shout went up in n answer t o general Evans exhortations. The Glandelinians who acted as the firing line went down before the howling mobs, and o now hundreds of purple coat s poured forth seemingly with the lust to kill. The first three men had gone down before general Stone Hearts c sabre, while the main body of the Abyssinkilians were st ill some distance away. The little children in the confusion, had the opportunity to escape, including Gertrude, and these fled tward the redcoats, and from there on tward the christian lines, leaving the scene of conflict behind.

In the meantime general Gladerlinia hiself had long been expecting her, and yet she only reached him in time only to be attacked by several score of graycoats, and even the poor general himself was hemmed in by the shrieking demons whose assault had not as yet been checked by the arival of such heavy reinforcements, and which had only increased the fury of the battle, the enemy being bound to win at all costs. At general Gladerlinias back was Gertrude, and it was for her safty and possession that Gladerlinia fought. He remained standing tye there to meet his inevitable death, but with the det determination to give such an account of himself, as long would be remembered by the wicked Glandelinians who ever survivied the assault along this point. The Glandelinians had la already reached the first line of purple coats, and fal upon them with the fury of demons, and as the few survivors retired from the frightful slaughter, thinking that every Glandelinian in the rebel army was attacking them, Gladerlinia rushed to the support with more men, and drove off his assailants. In the rapid hand to hand fighting, general Gladerlinia had little chance to note aught else than the movements of his many adversaries, but now and then he caught a fleeting glimpse of a purring sabre, and the light light ly springi n springing f figures of an sinewy steel, that filled his heartwith a strange yearning, and a mighty but unaccountable pride. The Glandelinians with their pikes, bayonet s, and sabres, and evey other kind of weapon, played awful havoc among the Angelinians, while for his own part General Jack Evans also sprang into the fight to give his men exap example, now sidestepping awicked thrust from a graycoat, not now stepping in to let his g his sword point drink deeply into a foes heart, berore it buried itself into his throat. Jack Evans was h aving a merry time of it, when a great number of Abyssinkilians came surging up to the support of the others with fierceeries, while from all allong the line the Glandelinians swarmed upon them, presenting a bristling wall of bayonets. For all this while it was like as if an inferno had broken loose. Both sides fought in an intricable mass, howling cursing, blood streaked demons, and Evo even the sabre of Jack Evans flashed beside many a comrade. Thousands had gone down on bot h sides in the hand to hand fight within a few seconds, but by far greater haves had been wrought in the lines of the Abyssinkilians and christians, who seemed bent on annihilating the graycoats by sheer force of numbers. rather than give way before the fierce onset, and suffer a serious disasters As one man at times, the series of lines of graycoats and Angalinians would move against each other, an irresitible fighting mass, over the bodies of dead and dying foes, and hordes of t he dought iest fighting men of Glandelinian Glandelinia poured forth in countless numbers, to check the now threatening counter advance of the Abyssinkilians, even pouring fierce broadsides of thousands of muskets, at point blank, but the redcoats continually went and shot down thousands of graycoats before them, as if they had been paper mone.

Even now Jack Evans asked a hundred of the Abyssinkilians to drop back behind him, then turning to a thousand w o who had formed a the outer line he cried;

"Down with general Furagcetorane. Follow me and kill general Furgaturian. It's the only way to repulse these desperate assailants. We will rep reap vengeance where vengeance is well deserreds."

The Abyssinkilian officer who was at his side was the first to take up his cry of down;

"Down with general Furgaterism and then at his back and from all sides rose a hoarse shout "Down with Furgaterism.

"Down with Furgaterism."

On both sides the Abyssinkilians broke to left and right, pouring in a galling fire and lusting for the crowded victims who awaited them. In another moment the entire atmosphere was filled with the shrieks of the dying, and wounded, mingled with the slash of arms, rattle of many hundreds of thousands o of musketry all along the line of battle in general, and pistols and the victorious shout of the dreaded Abyssinkilians who gave no quarter.

The Glandelinian assi assailants closed in with the rest of their comrades, and knowing no quarter would be given by them fell upon the Abyssinkilians with the most frightful fury, but thousands after thousands of more were cut down, glorious martyrs to hopeless cause. Even thousands upon thousands more still, went down on both sides, before the sabres, bayonets, and hail of bullets, and sabre thrusts the Abyssinkilians fight ing like savages, while others swarmed in continually to fill the breaches, but inch by inch, foot by foot, the Glandelinians n ow began to press the Abyssinkilians back. All this while a yell went up from the frenzied Glandelinians, and rose and fell, untill it swelled to a mighty co volume of sound, that swept in great billows of noise about the stag atmosphere.

In every direction more and more Glandelinians were falling upon the faltering Abyssinkilians, while now only a single thin line stood before Gertrude Angeline and the furious Glandelinians.

Many thousands of the Abyssinkilians had fallen in this hand to hand fight already, and poor little Gertrude was likely to have gone to doom too from a nasty sabre cut in the chest, or probably ripped open altogether, had not a hand reached out from behind her feenzied assailant, and clutched his elbow as the blade was falling upon here an Abyssinkilian ran to her aide and thrust his sabre through th the fellow, before he could recover to deliver another blow. She would have even died then, for another Glandelinian had picked u her up by the throat, and co cha chocked her almost senseless, but another assailant ran this assailant through the head with his bayonet, while another waved his shimmering blade chining in the sun light, while others already disarmed plucked sabres and other weapons from the bodies of the dead about them, or picked up falla guns and muskets armed with bayonets and even heavy armaments, which could be turned into bludgeons, and such indeed were the implements of those already having been disarmed, besides pick axes, boots, shoes, clumsey axes, hatchets, and even daggers, and heavy sticks picked off the ground, and even stones were thrown at each other. It was indeed a sight to make one shudder for heaps of dead lay on top of one another.

Hundreds of thousands recently had charged against Gladerlinia and all these already lay dead or wounded, and among the fences and corn fields many others were cut down. Yet the fight went on with unabated fury, the furious rush of the rebels seeming to force the Abyssinkilians back step by step. Even during the fg fighting when Gertrude had recovered from the effects of the chocking she had recieved, she had found gone general Sanguine and reported to him of the plans of general Federal.

"So he is going to attack me and Gladerlinia on the flank is he?" he grittted.

"Well we will be prepared for that."

Some of the officers were at once summond before the great and bold general and he said;

"The enemy are going to prepare to strike me and gladerlinia a blow on the flank therefore we must prepare for it." Then he gave out certain orders, and then

big divisions of troops were seen hurrying for the rear, while the batteries which could not be placed in action against the assailants in front, wereplaced on the flak flank..All this while the assault was going on, there had been attacks upon Jack Evans center which was repulsed.However also when the flank attack came the conflict in that locatkon location became incredibly bloody, but however the Angolinians were successful in breaking up the flank attack, and in the hotly contested contested battle general Stoneman was wounded severely.The scene of battle was still more awful and already it was five minutes to twelve, and the main attack of the enemy showec showed no sign of abating.General Sladerlinia himself was indeed beset with grave difficulties, for the Glandelinians continually harassed the flank and rear of his line by serigs of repeted repeated attacks, my christians being taken prisoners, by the Glande,i Glandelinians who like a flash of lightnig surprised and surrounded the, them, killing them, and cutting off their heads, and with their booty the Glandelinians disappeared agai again only to repeat the assault at some other point not expected to be attacked.Many times the Angelinians would has hasten to the assistance of their comrace comrades but they were invuri ably too late for they would only find the corpses of many of them and no trace of the reste It was indeed realized that during these sorties upon Sladerlinias rear, many of the poor Abyssinkilians had fallen into the hands of the enmy alive, for the daring attackers would fling themselves upon the christians and hastily bind them then they would place their prisoners in front of them selves on their horses, and then with fleeting feet, they would vanish into the woods.This was the worse than that could haveshappened to the unhappy pr prisoners, as it was absolute ly known that they were ki killed in a most shocking, and torturesome manner.The flank itself however was soon strongly fortified, and hundreds of carmen had soon been massed toard the direction the flankers would come, to defeat every attack, an and the uttermost care was enjoined upon the soldiers to be on the look out for even the mounted Glandelinians who were swarming about, their mis muskt ems kt ery looking like fire flies in the far distance through the smoke as they were discharged.All along the line of the flank on the highest ground, stronger forces of christians were placed and these were instructed to hold their post no matt er wha what happened, and to sound the alarm at the slightest sign of danger or if the enemy was becoming successful in the attack.In the meantime Benligan had recieved the note which Gertrude had found and which read;

"The bearer of his this note, will request you to hurry reinforcements to the aid of general Jack Evans as soon : as possible.He is hard pressed by the Glandelinians, and is overwhelmed ,and threate ned with destruction.And if his line gives way, then it will be like a dam bursting, for general Stanley will be enabled to sweep my lines tofore him fu further than he has already, and like the wreckage before the flood, and then I or Hanson will be lost.For Gods sa e sake please u hurry, for he has to hold his ground at all costs to cover my headlong retreat.Hurry now before it is too late.

General Costellio Benligan had recieved this note the assault of the enemy had st ill continued on along the front of Evans , Sladerlinia and even Benligans lines , and more columns of troops had to be sent to relieve those who were fighting the enemy so bravely.Even with the aid of these columns the first few minutes passed away without any wavering in their lines, and at twelve o-clock a larger body of troops appeared, and this caused the attack to finally subside along Sladerlinias front, and general Sladerlinia sent an officer to see how the rear was getting on.The forces at the eastern and western part of the central line were found intact, despite the hammering onslaught of the flank attackers, but as he reached the line toard the southeast , he found where these forces had been posted , but of the men themselves, there was not a one found alive, and here forces of yelling gray coats were surging among the captured guns.

The officer and the soldiers who came with him at first stood as if paralized Dazed all of this strong body of Angelinians had evidently been overwhelmed by the crafty and horrible Glandelinians, and had been appra apparently annihilated before any help could arive to them.Then suddenly the officer said to his brigade commanders;

"quick boys, t he Glandelinians have the artillery in their possession.We must retake them quick."

The officers wat back to their respective commands and gave the orders.The whole brigade rushed forward in one long line two miles long, and these men certainly fough fought a most desperate battle for the purpose to retake the guns, but they were literally cut down in whole sections of men, and now everything pointed of the usual nocturnal sallies.In the meantime nothing else it seemed could be done, than to him immediately inform general Sladerlinia of the affair.The empty breach,

Breah was filled up with hundreds of thousands of men all the plucky men occupying the position of the fateful dangerous rise of ground which still seemed like a seething volcano from the fierce discharge of musketry on both sides and they were particularly warned not to let the enemy at this point get the best of them for here it was a matter of life and death, and success depte depended upon their following out the advisse. It was now ten after twelve and when however several of the generals came up with more forces they discovered that the same strange thing had occured once more. The line of christians on the eastern and western positions were still found at their plae places and in flame and smoke from discharges of musketry and cannon, but the christians on the southeast souther southa southeastern position had again been annihilated. This was worse than the first all the men being found terribly mangled, and the enemy still in possession of the artillery and now raking the nwcoming troops with terrible canr carnage.

This affair was now becoming painful, aye indeed extremely grewsome. During the next few moments nothing else was hardly spoken of among the officers and soldiers , and the general who was disagreebly affected by the occurance made known to the soldiers that he did not oblige any of them to assume the offensive on the rise of ground t ward the southeast and that he would only accept volunteers for such a perilious position where twice already a division of over two hundred thousand making four hundred thousand now alt oget altogether had been mysteriously annihilated with all their one hundred generals.The Angelinians were chivarious people.Immediately quite a number of officers reported for duty. Then the general picked out them whom he regarded as the bravest, the most powerful and the most trustworthy.He then gave them his in structions personally that they should incessantly use all the gathling guns they would bring wit h them and besides to keep perfectly q quiet and in order during the conflict, and and not do any yelling and to do all they can to find out the cause of the annihilation of the other two divisions for the safty of the christian army, for we was not their situation at a grave stake.!

The leaders did as they were ordered and soon five hundred thousand within an hour was situated on the rise of ground tward the southeast, but nevertheless the very same thing happened, they also met annihilation. Every one of the five hundred thousand soldiers had vanished like the wind in even a quarter of an hour into dead and wounded.General Gladerlinia then assembled his officers to take councle with them. The opinion was that for the other few minutes half og of his left wing should be sent to the perilious position with two thousand cannon and this was agreed upon. The whole colugn was sent. And here indeed they saw a sublime sight.Millions of Glandelinians were advancing as caut iously as cats the Angelinians watching them for a few minutes untill they came in pla plain sight and as several off officers went to general Gladerlinia to report what they saw the christ ian troops let loose with their two thousand cannon followed by a seriss of blasts of musketry which brightened the darkness like lightni ng, and following this the Angelinians swarmed down upon their assailants and for ten minutes there was a horrible melee thousands going down per second in the face of muske try fire and impalled by bayonets and pikes. Immediately the foe officers flourished their sabres and ordered their columns to rush the Angelinians and as the Glandelinians did so the Angelinians remained as quic quietly as possible never letting out a yell but fairly blazing their lines in musketry.The graycoats pressed on but the pressure of the foe line was not too terrific and then to the surprise of the Angelinians as the Glandelinians had come nearer and nearer they bega to suddenly break and fall back.The Glandelinians seemed dazed at the boldness of the Angelinians after the horrible destruction which had occured to three divisions, so many of these Ange linians whose children they were so eager to revenge. It was all over for them.With their large assaulting columns led by the var ious commanders nothing could stop the Angelinians the Glandelinians flesing from the assault. The battle was over and was considered fully a draw.Though the enemy worsted the christians at some parts of the line they were not successful at others, and so two days after the battle the whole Glandelinian army moved northward and a,ll was over for a time. The Glandelinian losses was considered beyond telling as well as christian losses.

It was some time before all the dead and wounded had been buried and while this was in process the whole christian army was on the march following the enemys retreat vigorously. During the advance of the christian army violet and her sisters who had been watching some of the near est retreating columns noticed a white glaring streak along the southwestern horizon and even it also extended along the western horizon from north to south. There was even a strange coloring of reddish hue on the whole horizon sky and a strange coloring around the moon probably caused by the smoke and which made a sickening haze in the sky.No doubt another big fire was burning somewhere.

THE BATTLE OF GINHAM.

Some time later the retreating enemy or most of the retreating Glandelinian army had halted near the town of Ginham to opose the christ ian pursuit and again a terrific battle and bombardment together was raging and violet and her sisters was the sole witness to it all. A furious screming tempest of shells was tearing through the air, and the coming christian columns to the assault increased the confusion among the rallying Glandelinians. A vertible wall of purple coats had already crossed over the snow covered plains and approached the enelys rallying lines with appalling rapidity their line extending across the whole plain in an A almost archy shape, and soon the enemys new and hastily erected positions was enshrouded in smoke of musketry.

The firing along the enemys line had suddenly o opened with the rapidity of lightning and in the direction of the enemys lines a dull rumbling roar was heard, the roar of cannons and soon as the christian batteries let loose there was again the most deafening uproar ever heard, and sheets of Glandelinian soldiers seemed to be swept b down by the christian artillery fire.The christian troops which was advancing had now come within range of the enemys fire and they began to drop also in great numbers a as far as eye could reach. The christian wave then began to recede and hurled its wav back tobthe point w from which it issued.An hour later came a desperate assault upon the christian lines made this time by a perfect wave of Mc-Hollestinians. Violet and her sisters who happened to be in the danger zone at the time and being caught a third time between two fires just in time managd to throw them selves into some shelter and as the Glandelinian wave suddenly came on with redoubled fury violet and her sistss feared that the storming christian fire would annihilate all the Glandelinians nd and them with the foe. All of the nearest Glandelinian columns were shivered to fragments the frightful din was first worse than an hour before, and the whole woods seemed to be a chaoes of destruction, many Glandelinian soldis soldiers bing being swept away at one volley, and violet and her sisters who had taken shelte shelter behind some rocks feared a shell would blown blow the bowlders upon them.

All t he trees in the viniety of the battle line no matter wha sizewere stripped stripped of a ll their branches by the storming barrage of exploding shells, scores being hurled contemptiously to the ground by the outbursts of mines set by the christian engineers the explosion of the mines and the shells making seemingly a million deafening crashes other trees being torn up by the roots by other shell explosions, the air being full of flying branches and debris which fell among some of thenow confused Glandelinian columns the unfortunate Glandelinians trying now to seek shelter but were at times thrown down or rolled like footballs by the concussion. Violet an her sisters were the s themselves at times pelted unmercifully by the falling branches and twigs, and indeed this was one of the worse battles the little girls had ever been caught in every tree with within their viw view having been blown down by shells all the biggest t rees thundering against the ground as they were hurled down amid the earsplitting explosions. At last two shells hit the rocks sheltering violet and her sisters and the little girls were compelled to start themselves rolling down therise of ground and they wereals almost dizzy with the rolling flight when they reached the base the rise having been so steep that thy had rolled down like whirling dervises for several rods before thy they were dashed stunned and bleeding to the ground at an enormous distance from where they rolled as a concussion of a shell sa sent them flying.....

Being thrown into a ravine Violet ahd and her sisters were now safe from the destructive course of the storm of humanity which had raged in its ful l duration for twenty minutes before the enemys desperate assault cease ceased.The havoc among the retreating Glandelinian columns was indeed terrible the very uproar of the battle itself being worse or g having been worse than the din of the wildest typhoon and everywhere now along the retreating Mc-Hollestinian lines at this point a fire of christian cannon bore down everything it in its way the canister pouring among the retreating columns like shet sheets of rain and the smoke of the firing had become thick enough to obscure objects at the distance of thirty feet.The Glandelinians who had managed o throw themselves on the ground to escape the christian fire were pelted occasionally by falling branches. In the full path of the enemys assault the terrific sweept sweep of the christian fire was terrific. Every Glandelinian column had been shattered to pieces and retired in confusion.Violet and her sisters however reached the christian lines saftly before the storm broke again.It soon did and the infuriated Glandelinians seemed to come from every point all at once the firing soon indicating a full grown battle of the severest type. Charge after charge was made by the Glandelinians each succeeding charge with greater force and fury andall the time the firing lasted the thick fog of smoke almost hie hid everything from viw view.

General vivians who line had been caught in the full sway of th9s tremendous battle but the mightiest columns of Glandelinians were dashed to pieces in their headlong onslaught s and indeed it was terrible the Glandelinian soldiers struggling for the mastery in this terrible typhoon of battle. Nevertheless the enemy could not force the christian line and finally tward night night fall they gave it up. The losses on both sides was unaccountableand en either general refused to relate wha the los ses were.

THE SEVERE AND DESTRUCTIVE BOMBARDMENT BOMBARDMENT OF JULO CALLIO.

At the same time that the battle of Lucille Jorden had been raging the Angelinians besieging the enemys positions at julo Callio had been unable to accom ac accomplish anything for all their pains and seeing that the enemy were recieving provsions through some secret means and also more troops the Angelinians decided to smash down the whole city entirely wiyh their guns and not allow the as enemy to shelter themselves in the homes and pub, public buildings. So in the build bombardment scarcely a building was left standing and thousa thousands of the Glandelinians themselves taking shelter from the bombardment were burid burid d in theruins. and smothered to death in the debris. The streets after this storming bombardment were found to be filled with mounds of wreckage. Telegraph and telephone wires were down in the viniety of the enemys lines thousands of whole residences lay crumpled up, the whole city seeming to have been at the mercy of the christian cannon and the wreckage was worse here than committed by the storm at Jennie-Wren T own.The bombardment had lasted three days. All the houses had been shattered and ground to pieces by the appal ing storm of bursting shells and the loss of life among the Glandelinians was indeed frightful. Over I7,000 were killd killed and over fourty thousand wounded and millions of house timbers were burned by the conflargrations that followed the bombardment. During the bombardment great assaults were made by the enemy in their efforts to stop or at least slacken the artillery storm of the christians and in one case the enemys desperate assaults had been completely successful at one point the christian forces having been driven back for ten miles by the force of the attack and the firing had been dreadful to behold hundreds of christian officers having been killed or wounded in trying to stem the confusion among the christian columns and afterwards found several miles away from the actual besieging lines far to the rear b badly mangled while scores of others had been swept away of whom no vestige could be traced. It took four hours of the most desperate efforts of the main christian generals to resti restore the broken and ch smashed up christian line but that portion of the works could be never be regained and the enemy held on during the remainder of the seige.The outbreak of this most desperate Glandelinian assault of the entire war had filled the whole

big divisions of troops were seen hurrying for the rear, while the batteries which could not be placed in action against the assailants in front were placed on the flah

christian army besieging Julo Callio with complete terror and consternat ion and demorilization and to add to all this over II,777,000 Angelinians had been killed or wounded by this desperate assault of the enemy and the remnants of the wrecked christian line overwhelmed by the torrent of Zimmermannian assailants screaming with demonish fury had fled like panic stricken sheep for four miles before they were rallied and compelled to hold their ground ,new positions having been selected by their commanders.It was one of the most terrific battles of the war and the sides of outbuildings along the battle line were afterwards found pierced by heavy splinters of wood which pro truded like huge pegs having been hurled against the houses with great force by the thousands of shell explosions. It took a full day entirely to restore the broken christian line and fill the dangerous gap, and even most desperate and sweeping counter assaults had to be made in order to crush back the enemy which was accomplished after fighting that it seemed only angels alone could do. Even in the city of Julo Callio itself over I,777,000 houses had been leveled to the ground by the bombardment of the christian artillery and in many of the walls of houses left standing great holes were noticeable that were made by the cannonballs. Even during the battle itself a long t rain of empty box cars and fourty coal cars were razed by the shell fire.Indeed no immense tornado could display the force with which it struck rh the Glandelinian wave had struck against the christian line on the second day of the battle and the right wing of the besiegers were unable to withstand it.It was inded indeed the most unusal struggle of the war and even a feature of this immense battle was the unusual size of the Glandelinian waves that swept one after another in human torrents upon all points of the christian line and the attacks se had seemed as swift as a wind sweep and though the enemy was the attackers the christian los ses was ten to t heir oe one and unspeakab unspeakably the enemy won the enti re battle and drove the whole christian army back entirely from all of its positions their main general commanding the whole army being mortally wounded and the whole christian line rolled up. Many solid stone buildings along the christian line had been used by the Angelinians as forts, even some immense grain elevators and even country Cathr Cathedrals and these by the enemys shell fire had been razed to the ground. To the christians this battle was a terrible disaster. Almost unbelieved but some of the most immense christian columns over whelming the enemy ten to one had been fairly spanked by inferior forces of the enemy. The whole region for miles was strewn with the maze of fallen soldiers torn and mangled by shell fire and even dead cattle, hogs, horses, dogs and pu poultry were found shot to pieces by the storm of canister from both sides, and bedding and wearing appearal was found strewn about. Many freaks were left by the power of exploding shells. A Shot gun wrenched from the firm grip of a dead soldiers hands was hurled one thousand yards by a shell explosions directly under him.T he muzzle struck the ground and buried the barrel leaving the butt standing only six inches out of the ground so deep it had went into the deep hard f frozen ground. T housands of lines of tal l tall hedges of every growth were stripped bare by flying canister and even white by the violence of the concussion of shell fire the bark and branches being stri pped off by whipping violently together for every concussion. The feathers were blown off thousands of ch chickens in a blasted chicken house within the battle lines by the shell explosions and even their dead bodies with their skin literally flayed off and some with intestines exposed were an unusual sight? In general Kin Flanders headquarters on the christian center several wounded generals had been brought in, and no sooner had they been layed on a bed when a deafening shell explosion tore off violat vioce violently the upper part of the house on the level of the bed in which they were lying helpless and threw down upon them a avalanch of debris. Fortunately they were dug out f without further injuries. So complete was the destruction of villiages to which some of the beaten christian columns had retreated that only a small amount od of debris from the wreck could be found after the battle storm, and not one of the bodies of the dead soldiers here were ever recognized.

Many of these thousands of buildings big or little were literally blown to the four corners of the archipelago which the immenser buildinfs built of solid masonery were crushed like an egg shells.Many thousands of the fleeing Angelinians were caught in this terrific storm of enemy shell fire the greater number being literally killed by shells and falling trees and indeed it had seemed hardly possible that any human being could ever survive through suth an awful inferno of battle as this as it had been of long duration.

Even hundreds of thousands of demorilized Angelinian soldis soldiers under general Jordense had tried to crawl along the ground in the havoc st rewn woods or hide in snow drifts to escape the enemys storming musketry fire but thy sw were swept to eternity by shells or torn to pieces by the fire of the enemys advancing machine guns. The blasting concussions literally tore the clothes from the bodies of thousands of the surviving soldiers.

In the headlong assault upon the christian center in particular the enemy seemed to have the pressure of a panic in a burning showhouse and all the Angelinians here despite all their most energitic exertions had been driven back the enemys advancing fire shattering the whole christian center in a few hu hours the concussion of explosions sending the survivors rolling about everywhere. It was indeed as said before the most terrific battle the Angelinians bese besiging Julo Callio had ever fought and one of the bloodiest of the war and the most disasterous in its consequences. The enemy had literally torn down the whole christian line in their headlong onslaughts carrying a all the positions, forcing their way through all obstructions, and many thousands of the retreating AAngelinian soldiers were in a state of stunned, numbed paralyzed collaspe from enduring the impact of the Glandelinian tornado of humanity. The christian columns struck by the enemy along the right had been almost annihilated by the vd violence of the Glandelinian assault and not one portion of this line either could resist the pressure of the Glandelinians whose roa yells roared savagely mingled seemingly with plaintive howlings, shriekings and strange rattlings mingled with curses and blasphemies and all the while with the burst of horrible cannon thunders from the main christian batteries added by firing of other cannons and long lines of musket ry which sound ed like a million cannon and which deafened and almost blinded the surviving Glandelinians. When the assault did finally ceased being com pelled to by the christian batteries being wi thdrawn from the bom bardment and massed upon the Glandelinian assailants wit with cruel and damanating slaughter the whole christian line was completely broken up and demorilized and mixed up in a mighty conglomeration of confusion, and it took two days and nights afterwards before the survivors harassed continually by the Glandelinian fire the battle never ceasing, could recollect their senses, and restore their [illegible]h shattered and broken lines and throw up more positions to meet the ne next onslaughts of the enemy which really came with redoubled fury. Many half stunned and gasping wretched who had attempted to crawl to safty were swept away like chaff by shell explosions and a grea great number of christian cannons blew up so frequently were they wer discharged. Hundreds of thousands of Angelinians had been fairly scattered for miles by the driving enemy assaults and it had taken two days to rally them. So terrific was the enemys own shell fire that may of the trees had their branches blown off and all the trees within the battle line were afts aft erwards seen without a single branch branch and the trees were pierced with countless bullets and grape and canister.

N AN ASSAULT OF GREAT EXTENT.

During the afternoon of this terrible storm of four days dreadful fighting the worse assau t w broke the very moment the signal stations warned of its coming and so quickly that most of the christian generals could take no precautions and the whole position of the christian line was lost. This terrible assault bursting so suddenly upon the christian line that that the warnings of the signal stations were too la te destroyed many christian divisions, and while the assault was in full progress and sweeping all before it, many Glandelinians took boats into the Norma Run Ri ver and destroyed many big christian pro vis ion ships, and seven monster Angelinian warships. The centre of the Glandelinian wave of assault had advanced through the wooded plains of Julo Callio first breaking the christian line at that pij point, and swept tward Beppos line of Abyssinkilians driving them also back and the works on the outer limits of the christian camp was captured, and then reached the Abbisannian lines under general Ricksonn where the havoc among the foe lines was uncomprehensiable from the effects of the christian fire. I The Glandelinian wave was thus checked here but another portion of the gray wave struck Julo Callioes lines of Abyssinkilians and Concentin ians but disolved into windrows of dead and dying as it met an annihilating fire.

At Julo Callios position the battle was the fiercest of it all and the storm wave of Glandelinians struck a large squadron of Angolinian and Concontinian as well as A byssinkilian cavarly under general Jackson Markinchin, and in the deafening struggle men fell like leaves in a storm sweping a forest, the christian cavarly general was killed, and the Glandelinians sweeping on stormed the christian fortifications at this point, and while the scene resembled a forest fire from the smoke of cannon and musketry the other column of the wave struck the main section of Julo Callioes christian line but thirteen brigades of Glandelinians were destroyed in the bloody conflict, at the same time the enemy engineers were destroying fifty transport ships in the river and blowing up many bridges. The main centre of the Glandelinian tidal wave made its way upon general Ricksons main front twelve thousand Glandelinians were blown to pieces by shell fire immediately and twenty thousand were wounded but in the rush the guns were captured before they could be fired again and over ninty thousand Glandelinians captured the whole christian battery at this section. The Glandelinians extended all along the line like a gray sea wave and the Glandelinians here in sweeping upon the christian line lost I,999,I40, in killed and wounded at meeting the very first fire. When the Glandelinian wave had progressed tward the right of the christian position it made its way to the main line but seventeen divisions were shattered against the Abyssinkilian line and out of ninty other columns of Glandelinians which had stormed the christian line none returned. Along general Andreans line where 66,666, had perished the most massive Glandelinian columns had been shattered and torn to pieces, ca, cannon of all kinds having been massed upon them, and all that day the battle raged with such a terrific fury that no one could conceive howe how on earth it was ever going to turn out.

God alone would have known how it would have turned out if it had not fortunately been for the arival of a another christian army. This army had been advancing for quite a long time and at the right opportune time it was thrown upon the Glandelinian army attacking the besiegers. The result was the enemy being finally hurled back and thus the siege had not been broken and the enemy were dismayed at the turn in events.

CHAPTER THIRTY [illegible] FOUR.

THE HURRICANE, OR PECULIAR HURRICANIC TYPHOON.

During the time of the battle of Ginham the christians had been really completely victorious but nevertheless it was believed for facts that the christian armies under general Vivian had been forced for most of his army had been reported retreating. During the battle Violet and her sisters had noticed a white glaring streak along the southwestern horizon and even it had extended along the western horizon also from north to south. There was even a strange coloring around the moon which was probably caused by the smoke but this however as well as Violet and her sister sisters knew was not so. A furiously cold screaming gale was already rising steadily swaying the tall trees simultaneously, and the coming storm increased the confusion among general Vivians retreating christians. A vertible wall of cloud had already crossed the moon which had been approaching with appalling rapidty having extended along the whole horizon in an archy shape and everyt hing was soon enshrouded in strange pitchy darkness except where a long white line of cloud along the horizon soon broke the terribe terrible blackness.

The long white line of cloud grew wider with the rapidity of lightning and and in that direction a dull rumbling roar was heard which changed to aroar like cannons and soon there was the most deafening uproar of the elements ever heard and sheets of vapor white as steam swept by them and all the remaining trees went down as far as eye could reach. Violet and her sisters just in time managed to throw themselves into some shelter and as the great windstorm suddenly came on fiercely and with such redoubled fury Violet and her sisters feared that the storm would annihilate the retreating christian armies. All the trees that they could see that the battle spared were literally shivered to fragments, the whole woods seeming to be a sea of destruction and chaoes, all the trees being swept away at one breath, and Violet and her sisters who had taken shelter behind some rocks feared that they would be rolled upon them by the winds. All the trees no matter what size, or how st out had been stripped of all their branches, and hurled contemptiously to the ground, with deafening crashes, aft er being torn up by the roots, the air also being full of flying branches, and debris, which beat the confused and demorilised christians as thick as snow, the poor creatures trying to seek shelter but were thrown down or rolled about like foot balls. Violet and her sisters were beten beaten unmercifully by the wind and by the flying branches and twigs, and indeed this was probably one of the worse storms they had ever been caught in. The rain was coming down in perfect sheets, and driven horizontally by the winds. All the bu biggest trees had thundered against t he ground as they were hurled down, and the thunder roared in ear splitting crashes every second. At last to the terror of Violet an and her sisters the rocks threatened to give way, and they were compelled to start themselves rolling down the rise of ground. They were made dizzy by the revolving flight when they reached the base. There a sudden gush of wind suddenly caught them, and sent them rolling like whirling de dervises for several reis, and also made them do some cart wheel performances before they were dashed stunned and bleeding to the ground at an ernormous distance from where they were picked up.

Being thrown into a ravine, Violet and her sisters were now safe from the storm, which had raged in its full duration for twenty minutes before it ceased. The havoc among the ret reating christian cecu columns was terrible. Multudes of the stoutest trees, were torn down, and stripped of every branch in a single breath, while a thick fog of rain hid everything from view. The very uproar of the elements was terrific, and everywhere along the retreating christian lines all trees were borne down before the cyclone. The Angolinians who managed to throw themselves on the ground were pelted by flying branches or killed by falling trees. In the full path of the terrific sweep of wind the havoc was terrible. The whole christ ian encampment abandoned by the retreating army had been struck. All the t rees there had at once been torn down, or blown away, not even the most titan object was able t o withstand the mighty force of the extensive tornado tornado. All the tents were blown away, everything was shattered to pieces, the infuriated elements seeming to come from every direction at once, indicating a full grown t yphoon of the Terrocian type. General Vivian himself had been caught in the full force of the storm, his headquart ers, deserted on account of the battle being picked up bodily by the wind and carried off like a hugebaloon, where it was dashed t o pieces against the ground a mile from its foundation. Indeed it was terrible to see the surviving soldiers of the battle struggling for life amid the throes of this terrible typhoone. In this awful storm which struck Jennie Gwen, scarcely a single building left by the battle stood, and thousands of wounded soldiers left behind were buried in the new ruins and smothered to death under the debris. The st reets after the storm were found to be filled with mounds of wreckage, telegraph, and telephone wires were down, thousands of whole residences lay crumpled up in the wreckage strewn streets, the whole city being at the mercy of the storm, and her wreckage was worse than t hat seen in the storm which struck Jennie Wren Gowne. All the houses had ben been shattered to pieces by the appalling force of the wind, and hundre ds of persons who had been blown away, men women and children, were aft erwards found several miles away, badly mangled, and dead, while thousands of others including soldiers had been swept away, of whom no vestige could be traced.

The very outbreak of the storm had filled the whole army with consternation, even greater terror than the loss of the battle, and to add to all this on over one million, seven hundred and seventy thousand houses in Mildred Carrie were leveled to the ground out of ten million buildings, and remnants of the wrecked buildings were found fourty miles away, while portions of pianoes and organs, were picked up by non-combatants two hundred miles away from th e battle field or from Jennie Gown and Mildred Carrie, while the sides of buildings not wrecked by the wind were pierced by heavy splinters, which were found to protrude like huge arrows. In the walls of other buildings big holes were noticeable, that seemed to have been made by big cannon balls. Even a long train of empty and filled box cars, and fourty coal cars, filled with coal to almost overflowing, including thirty cattle cars all loaded with cows were picked up from the Gig-Hollester and Pandora railroad tracks, and after being carried three miles dropped into a portion of Manleys lines. The falling cars killed fifty thousand Glandelinians and injured two hundred thousand and demolished half of the central [illegible] of positions.

No extensive tornado had displayed the most [illegible] force, for not a single house in the cities struck by the wind survivied without some damage or other. Many solidly building builded stone houses, and immense grain elevators were raze razed to the ground. Even a feature of this immense tornado was the unusual size of the hailstones, that fairly poured in torrents after the passage of the winds. Almost unbelieved, but some of the hail st ones were large enough to weight weigh three pounds, and measured the size three times bigger than baseballs.

Some others were found three times bigger, and these crashing through the roofs of the dwelling houses in towns and cities not even in the cyclones' path, left holes through which a v ocas head could have passed without difficulty. The whole region for miles was strewn with the maze of fallen trees, and wreckage of houses, dead cattle, hogs, men women and children, lying torn and mangled among the wreckage, horses, dogs and poultry, bedding, and wearing apparel. Even many large houses had been taken up by the wind, and carried past the batt le rê region, before the storm struck the retreat ing christian forces. Even so fierce was the wind that steel guns were wrenched wrenched from the firm grip death gasps grasp of dead soldiers grasp of dead soldiers and carried one thousand rods. The nizzle of one of the guns struck the ground and buried in so deep that only the butt was left protruding only several inches out of the ground, and where it fell the ground was hard and firm. Thousands of rows of tall hedges of every growth, were stripped bare and white by the violence of the wind, the bark and branches being stripped off, by whipping violently together. The feathers were blown off from thousands of chickens, found dead beyond the battle field, and even the sky of some of them were literally flayed off, and some of their bowels even protruded. In one of the houses several wounded rebel generals were lying awake in their room, when the wind lifted off the upper part of their strong de dwelling on the level of their beds, in which they were lying hep helpless, and blew it away leaving th em unhurte

So complete was the destruction of some of the country villiages that only a small amount of debris from the wrecks could be found after the storm, and not one of the human bodies of these wrecks were ever recovered. Many of the thousands of the buildings of these villiages bit or litt, little, were literally blown to the four corners of the archipelago, while the immenser buildings built of solid masonry or steel frame work, wwe were crushed or town like an ell egg shells. The thunder and lightning during and after the passage of the wind spout was terrible, and was followed by the heaviest rail rain and hail storm ever seen in Calverinia. Many thousands of Calverinian refugees, refugees of the batle were also caught in the path of this terrific storm, with many rescued child slaves, the great number of women and children being literally killed by the wind pressure, and indeed it was hardly possible that any human being could have ever survived through such an awful gale, had it been of very long duration. The wind spout was fifty miles wide wide, and four hundred longe. Even hundreds of thousands of demorilized Angolinian soldiers had tried to run or crawl along the ground through the havoc strewn woods , but they were swept to eternity, or buried under the branches of the fallen trees. The wind had literally tore the uniforms and clothing off the bodies of all of the dead or surviving soldiers, and millions of trees themselves had been blown to the four corners of the archipelago. The wind had seemed to have the pressure of mil lions and millions of tons of sand, tearing along at an unknown velocity. Indeed every molecule of wind seemed to have had the pressure of a mud bank or a rushing mountian, or to retain the wi weight and desity of water pressure All of the Angolinians millions of them who had been caught in the path of this wild cyclone, despi adespite all their most energitic exertions, had been xsent rolling about everywhere, or swept down into ravines, many thousands bleeding shapeless ecrpses. Indeed it was the most terrific t yphoon that the Angolinians had ever experienced. The wind had literally in twenty minutes torn down or blew away all the t rees and obstructions in its path, e even tearing away large pieces of ro ' rocks many tons in weifht weight from cliffs, and afterward many of the so,d soldiers may all of the surviving soldiers were in a state of stunned, numbed, paraylized collaspe, from enduring the impact of the tornado. Two whole christian columns struck by the storm had ben annihilated by the violence of the wind and waves of debris, and not a thing resisted the pressure of the wind, which had reare d and shrieked savagely. The noise was of millions of different plaintive howling sounds, shriekings, and strange rattlings all in one, mingled with the shrill serpent like hissing, and then with one burst of horrible thunder, which sounded like a million cannon, and which deafened and almost blinded the millions of surviving Angolinians, the wind storm had suddenly subsided, and it was a long time, even morning before all the survivors of the army caught in the path of the storm could recollect their senses, and resume the retreat before the enemy would be upon them. Many half stunned and gasping wretches who had attempted to crawl to safty ha had been swept away like chaff with the wreckage, and considerable number of cannon had been blown away also. Thousands of tons of debris had been scattered and carried for miles and miles, and the many fallen trees downed by the battle fire, had twisted, and squirmed and lashed their branches together in such a frightful manner, that they were all broken loose, and all these trees were afterward seen without a single branch. Even thousands of these fallen trees had been blown away or heaped into ravines

HOW THE STORM APPROACHED IN EMERALD CALVERINIA BAY.

DURING the day of the battle there had been unsual unusual fair weather with great heat for even a October Morn. The weather had also been unsually calm, and there was also an unsual transparecy of the at mosphere. On shipping in Calverine bay there had been high barometric warnings. During the evening of the first day of the battle the sky had along the horizon in the southwest assumed a strange red coloring, but this died out tward night time though no stars shone and it rained in torrents for thirteen hours with out abatement , with occasionally thunder and lightnings heat for even a October Horne. The weather had also been unusually calm, and there was also an unusual transparency of the at mosphere. In shipping in Galverine bay there had been high barometric warnings. During the evening of the first day of the battle the sky had along the horizon in the southwest assumed a strange red coloring, but this died out tward night time though no stars shone and it rained in torrents for thirteen hours with out abatement , with occasionally thunder and lightnings

On the following morning the rain clouds broke away with however occasiona occasional heavy thunderst orms during forenoon and afternoon. Then at five o-clock in the late afternoon the sky in the west assumed again the strange red coloring but this increased this time and did not di die away. Then followed an appearance of rudd rugged purple clouds which in approaching nearer from the southwest assumed the color of black smoke moving swiftly from both the southwest and northwest. The terrible typhoon had broke upon the bay the very moment the barometer fell, so that the sailors in the shios on the harbor had no warning or had no time to take any precautions, and after the storm thousands of ships of all kind were found driven high and dry upon the Kauffmann b beaches for two miles inland beyond the high t ide line. This terrible typhoon had really burated so suddenly that even the barcmet io warnings had been too late, and therefore the big waves rolling like mountians destroyed many large ships, and several monster Angelinian warships in the harbor of Galverine Bay were torn loose from their ac anchors and driven high nd and dry upon the lands. The centre of the storm had advanced through the outskirts of the city of Galverine, first leveling many houses on the southwestern section and then passed on without doing any further harm. Norma Catherine the northeastern section of Livian Wickey was also struck by a an outskirt of the storm but did not do much damage. The main p path however cut through the region where Jennie Town and Mildred Carrie stood, and its outer limits reached the christian army under King Robert Livian where the havoc was already predicted in detail, and then struck - northeastward and passed into the beyond.

Simultaneously to this another terrific cyclone much wider and more intense in force tore along the Angolinian sea coast and struck a portion of the city of Gertrude Angeline and plastered that section into a a sea of wreckage. The fortress Janet Wilkerson with the whole garrison of two hundred thousand christian soldiers under general Jack Markinchin were kioled or injured when it was razed i to its foundation, and the outer fortifications were blown away with all the artillery. The storm moving northward straight destroyed thirteen villages north of Gertrude Angeline and destroyed fifty transport c ships at the same city. To ps storm roaring with a din hard for miles in its approach, then headed for Angeline junction and Jennie Wren town. It suddenly swerved however and missed Jennie Wren town, but it laid the town of Dai Daniel Lun into a wasted run ruin and sweeping the sea in that region into a frightful fury struck Angeline bay and foundered many interned landelinian ships. Twenty t housand men women and children poished in Pullaway Ander, twelve thousand in the towns of Anna and pellen that were blown away, and of ninty thousand houses in Gertrude Phelamon not a house was left standing. The seas along the shore of Angeline Bay rose two hundred and fifty feet high, and rolled inland five miles, and fifteen hundred thousand houses in the big city of Gertrude Angeline disappeared from the shore and the streets of the whole city for two days was flooded three stories deep. In Gertrude Angeline twenty eartiquake proof Cathedrals, fourty big churches were ruined, and one million, nine hundred and ninty nine thousand one hundred and fourty thousand plandelinian prisoners held in a vast internment camp were killed when it was blown completely away. When the storm had traveled to the twenty sixth degree of north latitude it turned sharply around to the northeast, and made its way tward the city of Angeline Lubetian. Not any single portion of this city was saved. All the build beautiful houses, all the baking establs establishments, the magazines of the army camps, the barracks, and all the city itself was wrecked, and the storm shattered seventeen ships against the rocky shore of its bay, and out of ne ninty others wi which had broken from their moorings and drifted out to sea none returned.

Andrean Galverinia had also been struck by another storm but the few days before and many buildings had been leveled to the ground but no loss of life was reported. The sa however rose to such a terrific height that it destroyed a portion of the fortifications defending Andrean, and sent ships crashing against the broken barracks. Even coral reefs hundreds of tons in weight covering the bottom of the sea were rent and t ossed so that they were afterwards seen above the surface of the water. Abbisann also was struck by a twistor, and out of six mil lion houses in that city only four hundred thou s thousand were left, and here houses and people had been literally buried together. An outrider of the tornado was also headed for Livian Wickey but it only struck a portion of the Thumbelinia fortifications wrecking some of it. It passed over the top of the Lucillia Richsen fortifications, dashing cannons of all kinds to a distance of fifty thousand yards, wrecking many of the barracks, and many soldiers of the garrison caught in the storm were lifted into the air and hurled stunned and bleeding to the ground.

If it had not been for the fearful typhoon which really enabled the enemy to get away all would have been well. General Vivian hearing that Hanson and Gladerlinia had not been able to be driven from their positions during the terrible battle had rallied his command, and would have resumed the battle the next day, after ariving to support Hansons army, but there was no need to, the enemy were gone, and fleeing tward the sout north tward Vivian Wickey, and that another christian general by the name of Francis Mc-Whirther Vivian with a large christian army which had been ordered to stop the enemy advance on Oso Osmondonson had been driven back by the fleeing Glandelinian armies which attacked him in a desultory ,amanner every day.

BHanson, General Robert Vivian, and Gladerlinia were indeed very mad that the enemy should get away.General Vivian could not understand why it was that general Hansons lines after being driven back so mant many times had been worsted, hinself and been forced to retreat, and Hanson an d Gladerlinia holding ground to the veryl last and repulsing the enemy with the most frightful slaughter. Hanson doclared he was victorious and that it was only his brother that had been whipped in the battle, but nevertheless all the christian armies were able to advance, and the advance was directed in the shortest rout possible in order to intercept the enemy before they arived at Osmondonson.

Osmondonson.

While Hansons army was moving forward with theintention of trying to intercept the enemy at Osmondonson a terribly disaster happened to general Federals retreating army that encountered general Vivians army while being seperated from Manley by general Vivians vigorious advance.

The Glandelinians under Federal had been handicapped beyond hope of escaping and Federal was therefore determined to break his way out and so after morning did arive the battle at least with Federal was resumed and the Angelinians advanced like a vertible wall of purple coats against the Glandelinians, this christian line extending along the whole stretch of ten large farms, and though federals line was enshrouded in a long cloud of smoke from the horrible firing, the Angelinians continued the advance and attaced with great vo violence, and soon there was the most deafening up roar of battle ever heard, and a storm of shells swept down with their explosions a whole stretch of trees and mangling mangling many thousands of Glandelinians.It was the end. Federals force was compelled to surrender while through some trick Federal had managed to escape on a swift horse, and though persued for a hundred miles he enabled himself a good escapade.

At the same time the furious battle of Mc-Hollester Run was raging a horrible battle again raged for the possession of Mc-Whirther .The horrible black battleships of the Abbiesannians had started tward Wickoy Bay and came upon admiral Aronburgs great fleet of Glandelinian ships before any precuations could be taken of the approach of the dreaded Abbiesannians and in the sudden horrible inferon of guns in that bay thousands of Glandelinian ships were sunken or torn to pieces.The attack of the Abbiesannians which had happened so suddenly that the warnings of the shore signal stations were too late, destroyed many big Glandelinian warships, and several monster Glandelinian dreadnaughts regular floating fortresses were driven back so far that they stranded and were blown up. The centre of the attacking fleet which advanced in the form of a half moon advanced upon the plain Mc-Whirtherian bay itself and first leveled all the outer fortifications of Jennie Turner. It was a dreadful attack indeed but, nevertheless the battle was as desperate ad dreadful and as the outer section of the fleets reached the outer bay the troops landed, and tried to take Julo Callio and Norma Catherine the two big cities missed by the recent typhoon, and struck a large squadron of Glandelinian cavarly under general Jacksonia, killing thousands of them in the assault, and set fire to all their fortifications, and then pushing on they destroyed thirteen villiages, and fifty hundred transport ships, near Calverine tward the sea fortifications of Norma Catherine amid a roar and thunder of cannon heard for miles, and two divisions of cavarly by using gunboats and captured Glandelinian craft foundered many Glandelinian transportat ion ships on the Norma Run-River, and laid the city of Aronburg Sanderton in waste. Twenty thousand Glandelinians perished in repelling these desperate christian invaders suddenly coming from an unexpected quarter of the sea, and twenty thousand old men women and children were rescued from slavery, and in the town of Goldburg twelve thousand more Glandelinians lost their lives when the towns were blown to bits by great explosions, and over ninty thousand Glandelinians were slain by the vo bombardment of warships at Norma Catherine when the city was shelled, and where not a house on the outskirt s was left standing.

The outcome of the second battle of Mc-Hollester Run was very queer.Of course it could not be called a christian victory, because Manley escaped and was retreating tward the Angelinian boundarly line seat where Mc-Whirther and Calverine were situated, a retreat now moving southward, but just the same nevort heless it could not be called a christian defeat, even if general Vivian one of the highest of the christian generals had been disasteriously defeated, and then torn up by the storm that struck Calverinia and hit the large cities of Julo Callio, and Norma(Angolinia).

It was really only general Vivians army that had retreated for two days, but general Vivian hads retrived by smashing Federal at Abbiesann and capturing his whole army, though that darty Glandelinian general had escaped after being persued for a hundred miles.

It is also a great thing to know that the Angelinian boundary line extended clear across the middle portion of Calverinia, and that the south of the boundary line of Angelinia also a part of Calverinia was genera lly called Angeline Vine. Well though Angelinia was not invaded here after many more great actions and advances, there occured the bloodiest and most extensive seige in the whole war.The other seiges already going on were the longest but not the bloodiest. The battles around Evangeline Crania started first with general Bicknells christians and Shoemannias Glandelinians at Osmondonson, and terminated with the bloody and inconceivabl inconceivablely violent battle of Gedernins, and Phelantonburg.

General Francis Vivian had also in trying to retrive a disaster had also stood his ground at Mc-Hollester Run or Calverine, and was forced to fight a bloody battle also, but could not hope for even as good a hold out as general Hanson or his brothers army did, and he was compelled to retreat a typhoon of savage charcter also ending this battle which was twice as fierce as the second battle of Mc-Hollester Run and cost the Glande linian army the loss of over 20,000,000 killed and wounded, and twenty million more in prisoners, while the christian losses was a little over thirty one million.

He was compelled to retreat of course and then a most peculiar thing in the great war occured. General Hanson Vivian, and his brother, with Gladerlinia was persueing three large Glandelinian armies, under Manley, Shoemannia, and Bicknell, while the retreating Glandelinian armies being as it were between two fires was persueing general Francis Vivians army which was retreating tward the same region which general Hanson was pushing the Glandelinian armies. The persuit of the Glandelinian army was so vigorious that general Vivians retreating army seemed scattered beyond rally, and he begged Hansons brother to please slow u up for a time in his dashing advance but no communications could reach general Vivian and the two strange pse persuits continued.

Fortunately however great forces of Abyy Abyssinianning and Abyssinkilians were advancing to make a junction with general Bicknell and these hastened forward to do what could be possible to stop general Francis Vivians dreadful headlong retreat.General Shoemannias retreating armies had been far ahead of Manleys army and now as the persueing main christian armies reached the region the retreat, and persuit slowed up and preparations of the two enemies started for the greatest horror the war ever experienced in the extreme southern part of Calverinia far from Calverine. Shoemannia Bicknell was advancing with a great force of Abyssin kilians to stop Shoemannas advance for Eva Crania, and was moving his armies between Shoemannia and Osmondonson.

Whi,e While Shoemanniaand other christiana generals under Bicknell ww were watchingthe movements of Calmarrinia Shoemannia at Osmondonson Violet and her sisters had some thrillingadventures withcaptian Snakely a Glandelinian officer who was apirate aswell.He had spied onthe christians near their headquarters and achristianscli soldiersalso at that wasspying on Snakely ad and warned Violet and her sistersof the danger.See preceeding chapters.

I the author of this great story in this work intitled "The realms of the unreal" have already wrote much of this wicked uprising of the immense Clandelinia the Non-Catholci and Masonic section of Angelinia, the Northern part of the country, but all those words may be equally applied to the subject of the story further on "The war in the west" generally looked down upon as it is a still more romantic and forlorn effort to recapture the beautiful fort fortified city of Vivian Wickey.

How could any heart which loved its cause, and thought it just, not beat high and fast when it saw such a noble gathering of all the pitch and marrow of the Immense Salvation Army under-general Mansion under the Holy Catholic Banner of the Five Wounds of Jesus Christ just like the Catholci flags during the Catholic rebellion in England but of different designs? I think the most men who have written of the doings of that mighty host among war correspondents have credited it with just and upright purposes, and have seen its hundreds of generals, men capable of any work noble as it was to which their main generals put them at during the most tremendious seige of the child slave Rebellion at Vivian Wickey.

The tremendous tremendious fortresses of Lucillie Nicksen the most powerful of all fortresses in the world and had been built and owned at one time or another by the Abbiesannian King James Cannon and was twenty three miles north of Julio Callio and extended some way in front of the Norma Catherine section of the city of Vivian Wickey. It was situated in the southeastern corner of the State of La Falcon. A town close by was known by the same name, and a flanking section of the fortresses extended over upwards of six and a half acres in front of the town itself. A massive circular tower a mile in circumference stood perched like a high cliff righty to a hundred feet above the Norma Nun River the northern bank of which it commanded, and portions of the walls stood along the river banks for two miles. It strength was unhap aired in the story. It took its name from general Francis Lucillie Nicksen former who by the order of the Abbiesannian war thorities built it and each of the many great towers it contained were known as the Jennie Turner Towers, while the others were named the Lucillie Nicksen Towers.

After the attainder of general Lucillie Nicksen who at that time became governer of Calverinia (Shannon Vivian then being a very small boy three years old) It passed into the hands of the Calverinian governments from whom in turn it went to the enemy during the outbreak of the Child Slave Rebellions ever since despite the seige and the fierce efforts of the Angelinian soldiers it had remained in the possession of (The Devils Crown). The morning of August 8th 1918. saw already over 100,000 of the first advanced section of the besieging christian forces encamping within the vicinity of the fortresses of Lucillie Nicksen, with the purpose of breaking the foe line, while the greater part of the christian cavalry scoured the con country round for the distance of eighty miles to warn of the approach of Clandelinian armies which may come to the rescue of general Francis McAllister.

"Its a pity we did not come here with our armies just when the enemy captured Vivian Wickey general Mansion" Said general Mortensanna as they were attending to the arrangements in front of their section of the besieging lines and making preparations to assault the fortresses. "For I fear that general John Manley sent word to general Mc-Allister Stanck to let his artillery crush us at every point we would try to make an assault. General Manley whom we wished to capture has escaped us and made his way safely to Calverins or Grower Andream. Had we only been a little quicker we might have intercepted and captured him and the whole of his bloody army, the same as dashing general Markenfield did general Francis Saddlers army near Julio Callio at the beginning of the seige."

"Anyhow we have the main garrisons in a cleft stick, and from all accounts they seem much inclined to resist us with dreadful ferocity." Answered general Mansion mournfully."

"Midst hear brothers of Christ how some of our brave vanguards behaved on that July day as we came up on your right and filed in front of the Lucillie Nicksen Gates." Asked general Sampsonia laughing. "Our men called out in a roar of voices" "Cowards, cowards of Lucillie Nicksen and of the fiends come forth from the fortresses and meet us in the fields."

A good many times during the seige already hearlds had been sent under a flag of truce with the demand to the enemy to surrender Lucillie Nicksen as soon as all dispositions had been made but the truce bearers had been fired upon, and the Clandelinian commander had answered that he was prepared to hold the place against all the angels in heaven untill relief could reach him. On that on the Tweny seventh of August without general Mansions knowledge one of the main christian generals being insulted by the enemy ordered an immediate assault upon the walls of Lucillie Nicksen with ringing cheers that was deafening from millions of voide voices in one chourschorus the Angelinian soldiers in a long infantry line and supported by artillery fire of great intensity oo over a line of ten miles rushed forward to the assault, men many carrying scaling ladders. they were met by a most terrific hot fri fire from great guns, artillery and long lines of musketry and the roar of the sudden battle became extremly loud, and shook the country around exs excessively. General Richardson Mortenanna carrying high the banner of the Five Wounds, and urging on the desperate attack through all that fearful inferno, and belted around by some of his highest generals was killed by an explosion and his officers all wounded, and his divisions torn and shattered by a fierce counter charge of Clandelinians led by general Christopher Maxwell who was driven back pell mell to the shelter of its own lines with terrible loss and with their battle flags torn and in tatters. Other sections of the assault however still held on desperately, more christian batteries joined in the warfare of titans, and general in Chief Thomas Markenfielder led the main body of troops to the right. Thirteen desperate assaults were made, and were repulsed with wholesale slaughter of troops and generals. Again and again the devoted no beisgers swept up to the foot of the walls, plating their scaling ladders by the thousands, and swarming upon them, only to be driven back by the musket fire of the dev defenders, who also threw down great showers of grenades, and boiling i oil and pitch upon them.

As more immense forces was massing against the fortresses the battle grew in violence, and the cool quiet general John Darger, and Fiery George Turner sabres in hand at length headed the ascent of two of the big salients nearest of the fortresses, and seeming to bear charmed lives, both of them as they and their troops mounted the top and escaped the cannon and musketry fire they carried the tow natural ramparts and closed with the desperate defenders. Simultaneously they topped the battlements and sprang in between two of the works laying about them as vig oriously and drawing and firing off their pistols. The defenders thrust at the two christi n generals with bayonets while falling back before the fury of their onslaught. he main line of assault which had closed with the defenders were fighting fiercely hand to hand with bayonets, clubbed muskets, ramp m ramrods and the like and the Angelinians by the pressure of their numbers and the violence of the assault finally before the foemen backwards and cleared a large space to right and left along the salients. In other places also the immense waves of christian assailants equally well led won the summits of the immense sailents and carried all before them. Victory was almost assauled tward evening owning to their superior numbers, when just as general Francis had mounted and planted the banner of the Five Wounds in place of one of the Clandelinian battle flags their bugles sounded a retreated amid the din of the fray and it was seen that immense forces of the enemy were rushing forward to concentrate in overwhelming numbers at that line of salients. No doubt through this it was believed that some where among the Angelinians there was treachery at foot at work.

Nevertheless they would not have given way but the onslaught of the foe bore on them like a roaring tornado and so fuming with disappointment, and impatient anger and aroused and thrilled by the "Devil Yell of the Clandelinians the gallant forces of Cathlcics of Angelinia were forced to recoil, the foe following them hard, and making six sux successive assaults upon the christian works themselves before they were finally repulsed.

The forced withdrawel caused great discontent, but general Mansion the chief general who had ordered the withdrawel h gave as their e his explanantion that with the enemys main concentration starting he feared greatly to push the attack which would have meant such an excessive loss in troops that the seige would have easily been broken.

"What. Retire, when the wall of the fortress was carried?" shouted many of the christian generals dismayed over the disaster "when the enemy lines w as good as ours. What utter folly is this. No one ought to have heeded the succ ssions, this mad recall but ought to have pressed on and captured one of the towers of the fortress at least and hold it. Who ever was responsible,, for this blunder shall dearly, pay for it.."

Of course discipline had to be done before everything else, the orders having been obeyed and though no one could comprehend the meaning of the withdrawel when victory was almost gained. It was feared somebody had committed a serious blunder somewhere and had given the enemy the chance to concentrate,, heavily upon the christian assault and fight so savagely as to firmlly driven it back with disaster. All of the generals fairly fumed with anger and disappointement and vowed to hold hold the person who comitted the blunder responsible for the disaster which had happened.....

In those many grand and desperate assaults the Angelinian losses were not allowed to be given though they lost only five generals in killed or wounded, while over sixty seven Glandelinian generals and other officers were killed or wounded within the fortresses, i gallent chiefly by the christian artillery fire which covered the attacks, and also probably from the furious storm of musketry from those covering the actual stormers who planted and mounted the scaling ladders, or who rushed up the sides of the salients and at first carried all before them.

A great number of the garrison however had been captured and twenty or thirty divisions of another advancing christian army had actually appeared from seemingly-nowheres and joined the ranks of the besiegers.

General Mansion now ordered a close blockade of the fortresses by the Rivers and a severe bombardment, with the batteries of cannon of which in this vinicity had been concentrated a half dozen parks consisting of immense centemeters and other great motars, and many large brass pieces. The breaching of the stout walls of perfect ashlar work--hewn or squared stone and concrete with mined iron, by even such good artillery was a work of time and so the seige dragged on slowly day by day amid a contu continual artillery duel that was ra ing incessantly like a perpetual warfare of the Titans. Nevertheless considerable damage at times was actually being done but the enemy engineers always even under fire and-even at the risk of their own lives repaired all the damage that was being done. The Glandelinian general in command of the Lucillis Dickson portifications or at least of this portion had some six thousand six Hundred engineers in the fortresses on-spite of having sent many away to other quarters, but in his letter to Secretary General Cecil Santa Anna he told fully and truthfully that he really had the christian besiegers themselves in very severe straits, that his whole command had all the necessary midst and provisions , plentry of everything they wanted on account of being also in possession of Calverinia, and also stated that general Mansion would never capture Vivian Wickey. He was absolutely right. He never did.

For a time also it did seem bad for general Mansion for many of his men were in mutiny, seeking not only by great numbers to desert the christian lines and run to join the Angelinian rebels, but also by all means to betray the christian cause, and with open force to deliver everything and every information possible to the rebels. But these traitors were being rapidly apprehended day and night , while in the meantime the Angelinian raiders and foragers spoiled and looted the provinices within reach of the Glandelinians, looting even general purgatorians headquarters which he had abandoned at the approach of the christian besiegers and the grounds around Streeland, the region known as "the Grounds of the Wizard of Oz as well as other demesnes in his possession at Julio Gallio,, South of Norma Una, near South Gen Cadernins, Collyer and Stanck, and Ravenswood as well as St Vincents Park around Lucillis Dickson. The corn all about the region served for the millions of horses for the christian cavarly.....

This was already the month of July toward the thirteenth and the seige had been pressed with great violence by this time and the artillery firing all along the whole besieging christian line had not slackened not in the least. And yet general John Manley who had gathered a large army north of Calverine itself was afraid to make an effort to relieve general Mc- llister Stanck by reinforcements, or coming to attack the christian besiegers, on account of the strength of other christ christian armies that watched out for the approach of Glandelinian armies that would

"If we should advance any armies against Vivian Wickey and strike against general Mansion and try and make an overthrow, the situation would still be more dangerous as that Christian dog of a Melhound general Manson Vivian who is marching northward with two immense armies would capture Calverine and cut ofvall supplies for Vivian Wickey." "Said general Manlwy." nd it would be better for Her Majesty the queen of Glandelinia to spend a great deal of her treasures and sent her own armies to se succor Julio Gallio, than if we should give that advantage. Should we go to the rescue of Vivian Wickey at present, Calverine would be neglected and the sma small force there would fo fight only faintly, for if there is a ar army of Christian dogs on this side, there may be three or four on the other, and one brother with us and the other with the nationals. I If I move now against Vivian Wickey, to break the seige made by the christian nationals and leave Calverine in peril of capture the rebellion will be overthrown. and just now to make matters worse we are far more weaker in horsemen than the enemy, and our foot men have been very weakly armed during the last week and have not recieved sufficient arms untill now. And the two Vivians are moving northward to capture Calverine and another christian g army under that "Terrible Concentinian Aronburg is moving to ine intercept all armies moving to strike general Mansions besiegers a blow. So just now there is no means to stop the seige of Lucillie Dickson.

The siege of Vivian Wickey was still proceeding when on the afternoon of December 8th 1912 the Feast of the Immaculate Conception of our Blessed Lady of Victory, general Scipeonnia Portonia who acted as general Mansions aide and adviser and lieutenant all at the same time found his whole line assaulted desperately by the enemy, and was forced to withdraw his troops to beter shelter and then raced for-general Mansions headquarters close by Jennie's Bridge and told him that the Glandelinians were starting to breach his lines, that a fierce and heavy conflict was raging, and that the enemy was carrying all before them in the desperate assault they were making. Other generals excitedwer the scene came, also on a flying visit to general Staindrops headquarters reporting that general Raby Fir Phillham was wounded by a fresense squadron of Glandelinian horsemen who had carried his position and drove all before them.

"My Servant of the Immaculate Conception" Said general Mansion "I understand and I will telegraph to one of the main divisions not in action to meet the enemy there at the section broken by the assault, whilevI and my other offisers will concert plans together for the more active prosecution of the movement against the rebels."

"Let us hope then" said general Christopher Francianna that no one will blunder again like before and will not again overset matters in the very hour and tide of victory"

Thus the traid traditional day of the Immaculate Conception which was always ben honored with a feast from the twelfth century at least and only twenty thr thee years before June 1546; when the Council of Trent expressively accepted our Blesse Blessed Lady from the decree about original sin while the feat had been placed on the calendar two centuei centirues before was now celebrated by a roaring sanguinary battle of most savage character, both sides at this section of the battle line playing literally a gigantic tug of hell war, and the christian generals accompaniyn accompanying their troops started an immense concentration against the attacking foe lines driving a section of the foe line back toward Raby Turner Castle run with great slaughter, and on the following hour, the foe assault being overwhelmed by the heavy massing of christian troops began to recede at last.

Ja Angelinian troops would have followed and mad make a tremendous counter assault but the christian generals restrained them. During the lull of the terrific contest tward noon at least general Christopher and general Barnaduke and Fortonia were in one of the Knight of Columbus guildings hearing Mass attending Holy Mass with a large number of officers and soldiers, the Venerable father Obrien already referred to as ki nicknamed by the rebels "The Popes Patriarch" Saying the Mass, when a high explosive shell followed by two others crashed into the building at the very outer start of a tremendous artillery duel opened by the enemy, and everyone in the building including the two generals were killed under an avalanch of crashing timbers and stone and brick and mortar. The scene of confusion which followed was tremendous and while work was immediately started to get the bodies out a commendatory letter was sent to general Hanson Vivian then marching on to Calverine telling of the disaster. Hanson at the news p had published a proclamanation in these words;;

"To all My governers and other officials of Calverinia and to every one of them; "These are to will and require you and nevertheless in the Good Lords Name to command you that, immediately upon the sight thereof, you mobolise as quick as possible immense armies to be sent tward Calverine and elsewhere before me and My brother who are advancing on Calverine, upon Monday next, before six o-clock in the morning; and also to leave the government Buildings and flee to Angelinia bringing with you all and every such able man between the age of sixteen and sixty years of age as be within the reach of Calverine with such furniture of horse, uniforms and weapons as any soldier may have. Fail you not hereof, as you tender the main setting forwards of our proceedings, and will answer at your utmost peril. Given at town of Cumberland the ninth of December 19[illegible]. Let every man bring victuals for many months to serve with all.

General Hanson Vivian.
General Robert Vivian.

During the afternoon of the fateful day of December 8th 19[illegible] five certian persons had wished to see general Hanson and had therefore been admitted into his presence but under guard as they were strangers.

"We have a commendatory letter from general John i Piersonia brother to general Mc-phiersum and formaly one of our own number "Said one of the Strangers."

We are Americans and have come out to see you so as to if you will to be admitted to serve under the Christian Flag or the Banner of the Five Wounds to help crush the schism of this wicked rebellion the foe have started these few months past."

After some con counsil was held general Hanson admitted them only as war correspondents, but not to fight in the war with the infantry, as he declared that he did not wish any Americans to be killed in his command, and that they could see all the conflicts they wished without fighting in them. most of the five americans afterwards however in fear of being branded as cowards fought in battles anyway, and one of them publicly declared sometime later in the army chapel erected by general Gilberts engineers"

"I have these many days fought in the ranks of you soldiers of god, my good people, and will say that I have suspicions that it was the fault of the Calverinian governments that this magnificent city of Vivian Vivian Wickey had been so easily captured by the enemy. I do here renounce them before you all, and if general Hanson Vivian was wise he would cust them all b for their blunder. They have placed your holy nation at Stake and ought to be no longer your commanders"

Despite the fact, that the enemy forces were extremely strong strong and also the fortresses of Vivian wickey the conduct of the seige had very finely been handled, and since the last great storm of battle on the day of the December 8th everything had been excellently well, and already eighty thousand of the garrison had been captured during a set sortie made by christian troops.

Many of the sentinal sentries of the christian line one early Saturday morning were on guard at the main portions of the christian encampments but be near the main outskirts when suddenly they saw some eight or nine thousand of the Glandelinians appearing torush forward to make an assault.

"To arms to arms the enemy are making a sortie." was the universal all cry all around as soon as the sentires had fired their warning shots, and the entire christian infantry in that location immediately sprang into their trenches, the as artillery was rushed into their places or at the works, big guns were swung into position and everything was made ready to meet the unexpected or expected onset, the infantry men hurriedly le fixing bayonets. But before a shot could be fired, the supposed assailants throwing down their weapons and holding up their empty hands, shouted in chorus;

"Hold your shot. We are friends not enemies. We are Angelinians and Calverinians who fought our way to freedom from the prison pens in the enemy internment camps. Help us to secure the gates of one of the stockade fortresses and a portion of the great fortress will be yours."

"Forward was the order of officers all along the line and soon a whole surge of Angelinians were rushing and charging for the sailent and gates of the stockaded portions of the fortresses when a slamming roar of great intensity broke from the long line of distant parapets and gaps by scores were torn in the line of christian assailants. One of the bullets struck general Georges had from his head, and another struck him in the shoulder and still another went through his cloak without touching his flesh. Shells torn holes or immense avenues in the christian line, and the foe infantry now firing from every advantageous position tore the assailing christian force to pieces by a withering discharge of rifles and machine guns. Une Uncertain from that whether it was a genuine internment camp break or a clever ruse to entrap and shoot them down, the survivors of the immense christian column fell back in panic and confusion, and the chance of seizing the palasades was lost. The foe however did not counter charge and soon all the focus was over and everything was still again. The squabble lasted three hours. The break away of Angelinians and Calverinians from the Glandelinian internment camps was genuine enough and only the quickness of the officers and generals in charge of the salient and fortresses and immense divisions of real Glandelinians in closing the gates and firing upon the would be capters saved the situation for the Glandelinians so far as its defense was concerned with the loss of one million Angelinians killed or wounded. Surrounding the avowed runaways who numbered about twenty thousand in all, the Angelinians took them into their lines with their arms with the most rousing cheers. General Purgatorian himself afterwards explained to general Francis Mc-Allister stanck that this large batch of escaped prisoners disguising themselves as Glandelinians had suddenly secured arms when not watched quickly set open some of the gates of the stockades in which they had been confined and before antanything could be done to stop them went over tobthe Nationals. This great defection was followed almost immediately by a still more startling one. There was on the afternoon of that same day at a different portion of the christian line a mighty clamor, wild shouts and the clash a clasp of thousands of weapons, which made the besiegers along that sector stand hastily to arms as their comrades had done, expecting a furious sally, when over the salient and from stockades in front of Norma Catherine came w scrambling nearly two hundred thousand men dressed in purple and red and gray uniforms many firing attheir persuers, no one among them using ropes, three hundred and thirty five of them breaking their necks, legs or arms in the leaping, but with the help of a desperate assault made by the Angelinians the escaping prisoners were rescued and taken saftly within the christian lines.

"We have cut the leaden water o pipes of one of the stockades where child slaves are held so the small plav place cannot hold out." said one of the escaped Angelinian prisoners. "that stockade must capitulate now."

"And probably in another hour they will." one of the new arivals said most gleefully on being recieved within the blockading lines."

gure enough a half an hour later a white flag was hoisted upon the battlements of the wooden stockade, and two hundred and fifty glandelinian generals, some Earls, Dukes and Counts and barons rode forward, accompanied by a suitable escort and 4 herals. The main glandelinian general in command of the wooden fortress, his brother Robert Caxmount, and several other glandelinian "Gentlemen" appeared upon the roofs of one of the stockade towers."

"I am willing to enter into a composition to surrender the stk stockade and all the child slaves." The glandelinian general said sullenly. "If so many of your christian comrades had not escaped from the prison pens I would have kept this stockade and the slaves untill I had been relieved. But my water supply is no more, and I am scant of bread and other provisions. I ask only th at I be allowed to depart in peace wh whitherscoever I wish, with all the officers and men remaining steadfast by me, our am armour, weapons and horses."

The answer came promptly from the christian general in command at this sector.

"We will grant your wish on the condition that no children have been massacred by your men in Corna Catherine. And this has tobe proved or otherwise you all shall remain as prisoners of war."

It was found however that no one in the stockade had been guilty of any child assassinations and the condition was readily agreed to by the Angelinians generals, and the wooden fortress was taken possession of but as it was of no use to the Angelinians on account of being in the full range of the guns of the main fortresses the stockades were burned as soon as all the children and provisions were taken out. The salients however were taken possession of by the Nationals and the beautiful banner Banner of the five wounds was hoisted in place of the glandelinian Standard upon the salients flagpole, amid the most deafening plaudits of the most immense hoer assembled within and above thesalients, and the thundering of many pieces of ordinances. The glandelinian general Bowels and his garrison which once occupied the wooden fortress after being held for two days for investigation were suffered to depart, without let or hinderence, even given provisions and necessary foods and even some wine, and later their comment about the christians were; The Angelinians are considered mean, but they treated us like friends though we were treasonable rebels. They could have done with us as they pleased, for I would have to surrender unconditional anyway but they granted all my wishes in only three days when I expected to be held for investigation for months before allowed to go free. I'll never fight the noble christians again. The Banner of the five Wounds will have lu luck by and by By. I'm out of the war for good."

Though many christian armies were forcing their way through all opposition elsewhere much valuable time for the Angelinian aurthorities was being lost by this tremendous seige. During the nine days the battle of christopher was raging night and day almost the entire cathlic host had been violently assaulted hundredxs of time withlu without having any chance to recover any of their formations, artillery by the scores of thousands had been rolling and thundering in a deafening din f heard for hundreds of miles incessantly and shaking cities and towns to their foundation, and the Angelinian losses were excessively heavy, and though they finally did succeed in standing their ground to the last it id did appear as if a much smaller army of glandelinians could have more easly reduced them, while the main body of rebel troops could have been actively persueing operations everywhere in the line of repelling the horrible earthquaking seige of the rebellion.

The two main christian generals sur rised by the violence of the foe assaults had after their repulse ru returned back to their own headquarters tired and overworked in the evening and again a body of troops formed part of their train or retinue. even as the disconsolate glandelinian commanders who had seen their assaults go to pieces were being recieved by their friends at Cedernine on the Second sunday after December 8th after nearmy all the Army had Heard Mass, general Manson was making preparations to reform some broken lines near Vivian Wickey and norma Nun when there came a tap at his room door."

"Come in" Called general Manson thinking it was his orderly.

General Whilliams walked instead, booted and spurred and covered with mud and clay as if from hard riding.

"What ? You will? Welcome price welcome, though I hope you bring us no bad news. How g goes it nearv the Marcucian Fortifications.""

"""Some too weel well I am irised sorry to have to say..." Rejoined, general Whillian Gildhall throwing himself wearily into a chair. "I have come from the direction of those fortresses within littlemore than an hour of or so with a despatch from general Thomas who now commands the christian forces, in that location - a as he may know. Hearing you as here atthis section of the christian line I hastened to see you after daly delivery of my letter to general Sigunsery.?.."

"Nah any of the christian fleets arived?" "Tell us that please?" Wried genl general Marmaduke Maramduke."

"It has not arig arived nor is there any signs of the fleets either." was the immedi ate answer. "We have been straining our eyes to behold their welcome smoke wreaths but half a dozen of the glandelinian fleets lief lie off the ports of Vivian Wickey and a daily and nightly play at bowls with us they sending to us long volleys of tremendous volume and our artillery lines are replying to them with no better success than they have, for they keep too far out for anything lik like good practice. We are safe however from any forces they may attempt to land for we have more streng fortified our fronts even against the enemy fortresses of Marcui Marcucian. But there is ill news from elsewhere. Two rebel armies, offour million men each are converging rapidly toard Calverins which general Ransom Vivian intends to capture, so we hear. One ibcoming from Cremor Andreau under general John Manley and the other undergeneral Calmannia Shoemannia, and there are others also under Adolo-De Carvo joined by general Leonidia Ickesil with the Midland Counties rebels which had already three million men already near Calverins. If these three forces meet and march northward we shall see Ransom Vivian meeting a well disciplined army of over sixty million men, well furnished with cannon, and every other arm. If th He cannot capture Calverins he will not I'm afraid be able to push troops through to aid us in this seige."

"Alack the day. It was an evil hour we ever evacuated any section of ground ever an gained ground Julio Callic quitting all the ground we gained here." said general Manson nodding his head gloomily. "Nevertheless we shall and must keep up the seige come what may."

"Cheer up" Cried general Marmaduke. "This imminent peril may force our superior leaders into bolder measures into marching north once more and offering that Manley general battle and frust frustrate his advance on Calverins. I warrent me we will give a good account of our selves, we Catholics for the benifet of our nation if we do and the issue will be by no means a certain victory for Manleys generals.. We forget general Manson that general Robert Vivian who is also advancing to support his brothers army is now at Carlistle and once he can gather more bigger army he will help Manson to hasten in his plans of our reinforcing with every man they can call upon, and they will number a good fourty or fifty million at least"

A bed in an adjoining room was secured for general Whillian and the two great generals generals lay down to rest, after some further chat,, while he discussed a bottle of wine and a light supper and higher hopes of what the futire future had in store for them. Not so their under leaders in the stately rooms of their own headquarters. For hot upon general William Whillians message had come another later on to the effect that general Sam Manley had been at Calverins during the month of September and was now in possession of Calverins their united forces numbering something like eighty million men while Shoemannias army coming up apace to swell their numbers still more had disasterously defeated the two Vivians and was holding out successfuly against the seige of Calverins..!!!!

General Thomas Markeafielder had been as active in his operations of the many portionsof the great seige with the main bodyof the Angelinian horsemen, ranging throughout the Durham section of Jullio Callio during the nine days that the battle and seige of Datake occured and he had held in check with his artillery, infantry and cavarly general yesterannus glandelinians the Ga glandelinian governor general of the Julio Callio New Castle who had been joined and to relate by general Forsery Honeroyen and general Blessed Thomas rebels.

This glandelinian general gonryscain had some time earlier before the enemy gained po possession of vivian vickey so far abandoned his catholic religion thereon his own father, mother, and even his wife and children had perished on the scaffold for as to let himself be used by general Mc-allister Stanck as a great medium of communication with general John manley the savage and be bigoted glandelinian horesiarch who treated so many hundreds of thousands od poor little child slaves and other little children so ill. On the previous September first general John manley then moving on for Calverine to repell general ganrcas advance had written to general Mhurysenin advising him not to let the "Christian Pegs" outwit him in anything they do.

General Westmoreland had left the Abbiesannian general marshall Jhamis Mevilliesma to reforty and hold the wooden fortresses already captured and which had been surrend ered and also to hold it against the attempts of the foe to retake it, and the hopes of the besieging catholic forces were beating high once more, when came the evil tidings that the main royal commander general Mc-allister Stanck had effected a junkt junction with general Purgatorian with artillery and horsemen and infantry to this one object point of the dreadful seige and the combined forces thus at this location amounted to some twelve million men well furnished to advanced artillery, while general Warwick was hurrying from the fortresses of Lucillis Ickson to reinforce them with some five million more troops. General gansion Seeing this concentration of glandelinian troops at this one point was was cmpic suspicious and a council of war was immediately called at his headquarters, and every christian general was commnde.

"Let us push forward a great concentration of troops and artillery in full strength and give battle to these glandelinian hosts before general Warwick can come up.." Proposed general Markenfielder."

"Undoubtdly Undoubtedly that is our safest plan." Agreed general Richard gorton. "All other sections of the besieging christian lines is still with us and we know for a fact that general Purgatorian cannot trust his soldiers to be sent to other portions when Mansion is concentrating so heavily at all points of the seige, the greater part of them at least, and possibly, may probably the main left wing who so long ago brought a great movement against us to its climax by striking the first blow, and who suffered such a horrible disaster for it. In an any case we are surely equal man to man with this section of the glandelinian army confronting us, and our foot and infantry and cavarly are more better furnished, and our cavarly are far and away superior in every way to theires and will amply compence e compensate, for their better ordience."s.

"Yes" Said general Egremont. "Let us now pull all upon the hazard of one big fight, now that the chance is offered us. Is it not what we were waiting for gentlemen? Right and justice are surely on our side and not that of the vile rebels, for on theirs is every manner of wrong and wickedness. Let God do i Decided between us. To shirk the challenge now will surely be tempting Providence, seeking inevitable disaster. He Almighty Almighty helpeth those who help themselves, and armeth the hand of the patroit."

"I f we take not up the challenge." Said general Mevilliesarma "We may as well throw up the whole seige, and allow the enemy full means to win the rebellion and take shirt ship straightway from some seacoat of Abyssinkile for refuge on some other Continent."

General Mansion himself sat sorely troubled in mind and soul, it could be seen, but at first he refrained from saying anyti anything.

"By no means must we shirk the conflict with the Angelinian rev rebels." Exclaimed another christian general. "But would be more safer I think owing to the enemys strength in cannon, forces, positions and fortresses, not to offer him p pitched battle on an open field, but rather to let him come on and attack a portion of our lines on the banks of the Norma Run River. holding all the bridges and fords as we do except the Norma bridge of course, we can defend it with ease and even full security, and a check to the enemy rh there I'm sure will be as effective as his total overthrow, which indeed I see no reason we should not bring about the same way. Overthrow or hurl back general Mc-allisters Stanks troops on the banks of the Norma Run, and their utter ruin is achieved, and general Mc-Allister and general Purgatorian will have to fly with their forces ot share in the worse disaster they could ever suffer from".

This proposition was hailed, by the majority of those present with equql or even greater acclamantion than of the bolder one of forcing forward the troops and giving pitched battle in the field, the main plan having been to capture one of the fortified positions in possession of the enemy which if accomplished would give general mansion a chance to advance hid line of seige still closer. But general Roberts overlooked the very high probability that general Purgatorian and Mc-Allister Stanck will not come on until reinforced by general Warwick. "Said general Swineburna q quietly" he when their forces will be considerably in excess to ours whereas if we strike quickly, we may prevent the union of their forces near this fortified villiage, and scatter either in turn."

"nd general Swineburna forgets." Repiled the other sopkesman "That if we threw forward great forces again to attack the foe lines, we leave ourselves open to attack in the rear by the garrisons of the Mc-Hollewtinian and Cedernine fortifications and even from Fortress Vivian. We cannot afford to ignore them, and even should three counter attacking forces unite from these three lines of fortresses, we can even then stilll hope for victory as we have strong forces and better artillery, but by holding the line at Norma Run we we will shave l ourselves excessive losses."

This seemed to be sound reasoning, though it was put forward with an ulterior, the basest motive.

"Pardon gentles" "Cried general Markenfield. "When I said just now about our full strength, I naturally meant our fullest strength after detatching a sufficiently strong force to keept general Purgatorian and some forces under general Mc-Whirther in check. Mc- Allister stanck is also concentrating forces tward the rregion of the Sunbeam Creek, wither voluntarily detained there n or not, nothing that we know of, but I cannot believe he is remaining there of his own accord, and that he would dare abandon his advanced position but rather that he is warily biding his time to strike us a terrific blow somewhere and is actually waiting for general Purgatorian to reinforce him."

"You can rely on none that are not actually within our camp at this hour." Interjected general Strell."

"That is so." Said general Mansion himself." and I would remind you gel gentles, of the tricky part general Darces of the Glandelinians had played up to this. To my thinking he seems to want to hi hunt with the hellhounds and r n run with the hare, you cannot trust his positions. Better let the enemy assault."

General Thomas Markenfielders bold policy however, carried the day, as nearly every other general exsept three were also in favor of it , and for most of the time the superior general mansion had declined to enter into the discussion. Accordingly every available division of the immense besieging Catholic Army was mustered to the concentration over a line of fourty miles in extent, big forces being thrown on Gatherlayer and the other moors and wadies near the villiage for the concentration to make the assault upon the foe lines at Lucillis Ickson in general"

"The grandest of news." "Brothers " Cried general Samposinia who was s usual took the word to the rest of the army. General Thomias Makenfielder as chief general of the horse and cavarly troops however remainds behind to hold in check and attempt of the foe to strike general Mansion mansions rear."

However man proposes and God disposes. The Catholic forces were already marshalling in marching order to cross the pontoons of the immense Norma Run River to start for the foe lines near the villiage, when sharp upon one anothers hells, two messengers arived in the camp, one from the right of the besieging lines, and the other from Mansions headquarters. The first message was that general Hanson Vivian and his brother had been worsted in the seige of Vivian Vickeyo or Calverine, but had nevertheless in the retreat recieved troops so continually that their armies had become exceedingly stupendous in size and was already forcing a marsh and leaving his big parks of cannon to follow quickly as possible, had joined the advancing forces of Whilliamber gimmermanns and Ickmalls at Whetheranna outside of Abbiesann, and had pounded their way through another point of the region of Calverins and that their nation forces now numbering nearly tw two hundred million men was moving tward vivian vickey to carry out the plans imposed upon no matter what had to be done to accomplish it. the vivians with the fierce zimmermann were now threatening vivian vickey. Their artillery numbered as it was believed between sixteen thousand and seventeen thousand cannon of general vivians army alone. The second message came from general Dacres. General Hamson vivian marched out from Weatheranna December Thirteenth to link up with Sir Concentinian Aronvurg, and general Rb Robert vivian his brother and if they get to vivian vickey in time they will endeavor not only to capture Evangelinia Heights but will also place the besieged between the fire of many christian armies under the Banner of The five Wounds. As your true friend I passed a hint to general ansion who assembled his men for the capture of the villiage and the battle is soon going to begin. some glandelinian v generals however have discovered our plot and so you will have to be on the watch tmn when the battle begins to morrow."

"We must relinquish our first intentions of joining battle in the open with the rebel army in the face of its reinforcements by general Warwick." Urs the consensus of opinion expressed by the Angelinian leaders, an opn opinion ardently voiced by many officers and even privates. "We must make our stand upon the banks of the werma Run and from there press on untill we drive the foe before us. Mean while to prebent our own assaulting columns from being placed between two fires, let us reduce general Purgatorians army and the recreant general Mc-Allister Stanek."

Other generals also supported this pre proposition in the hope that general mansion would carry the battle to a terrific violence, a violence strong enough to put the enemy army out of commission entirely, and that it would need but their marching upon the fortified villages to make their garrisons surrender without any further fighting. the order of the concentration was therefore reversed.

Instead of concentrating tward the Lucillis ickson fortifications and the villiages the concentration was turned su southwestward toard the border woods of the great werma Run. General Christopher Novellianna was placed in command of an immense force of Abbisannian and Concentinian se cavarly left behind to watch all fords and crossings of the Werma Run, and to the infinite satisfaction of general Vanguard, with a strong body of horse, including the Tripongonlian soldiers under general general Northern orton, with general George saunders as his second in command, and Christopher and Warwinduker acting as lieutenants. General William Francis who had not moved his division forward ys yet from Evangelinia crania un and others stayed as reserves.

As soon as morning dawned the battle was on in full sway and after raging for sever several hours with great violence the whole glandelinian front extending for ten miles was final y pressed back, but gave the christian attackers a taste of inferno which was worth while to note. A portion of the villiages after desperate fighting at the same time was in the possession of the christians, but outside and in the streets the ground was strewn as thick as grain from the fallen nationals alone.

During all the time the glandelinian resistance had been terrific and excess tvely vehement and only by pressure of numbers, and by the drum drum-fire of the christian lines tearing their columns to more fragments did the glandelinians finally give way and slowly retire. Galloping ahead of the main advancing victorious cavarly columns along the high northern roads and over fields and moving tward the town still under fire of distant fos artillery the Tripongonlian troops which had led the van through all that fearful morning were now acting as outriders and skirmishers when they came in sight of a immense force of horsemen wearing hats like grecians but of black color and flying the glandelinian standards debouching through the town and rushing forward across the open field like a perfect mountian of horsemen and lancers. the glandelinian horsemen were somewhat superior in number of the Christians the glandelinian cavarly being Mc-wellestinians and terrific was the impact as the two cavarly columns met in full career like two monsterous waves surging together. Lances by the score of thousands were shivered in the collision with each other, the many scores of thousands of other combatants taking to sabre or carbine, dagger or pistol fighting furiously.

One of the Angelinian generals at the moment of the shock of the terrific collision unhorsed one of the rebel commanders his sabre preforating the hapless officers breast and piercing him clean through, the sabre coming out a good three inches through his back. General George to spitted his man in the clash but got killed himself by a pistol shot by a glandelinian cavalryman. But general Christophers antagonists avoided his fierce onslaught by a movement in the saddle. In the same instant he himself ducked his head and so escaped being caught in the throat. Nearly a hundred thousand men on both sides seperately had singled each out other out in a fierce sabre lance lance or pistol duel and the fury of the conflict was to terrific that some of the generals felt appalled and the roar of the horses hoofs fairly made the ground tremble as they dashed fiercely back and forth and the noise of the weapons clashing together, and the firing of pistols and carbines made a tremendous tumult and the yelling of the con combatants was deafening. It appeared as if two immense hosts of demons wearing ,redand gray uniforms were fighting furiously for the mastery of the infernal regions. General warwinduker and a glandelinian soldier he had sing singled out splintered their sabres in the wild insane clash together and both reeled in the saddle as their horses dashed in a thundering gallop past each other, and they were both helpless for the moment with the shock of the collision, their arms being paalsied by it.

The other christian officers and generals laid about them with their own sabres, no one of both sides no matter of how high a rank being able to escape the contest while general Christopher, unable to use his sabre again at such close quarters as it had been broken dropped it and snatched up the pistol that had been attatched to his back. He and his grayscated adversary had been carried pastons another; and were now seperated by half a hundred or more other fierce combatants. re Perceiving a rebel trooper making for general warwinduker unprotected side with a leveled lance,, , he deftly, though almost despairingly, swung his own horse in between the pair, and with a thrust of his own lance warded off the thrust at h his comrades heart. hen as the fiercely cursing and blaspheming fellow was carried alongside of him with the blind fury of the impetus general Christopher swung his other sabre round in front of his own face, and cleft open the others gorget like an eggshell. the keen blade sank into the mans neck, and he fell from the saddle bathed in blood.

"Thanks Chris. You saved my life that time." acped general Warwinduker." It was quite some desperate conflict indeed where many fell on both sides but after half an hour of it the glandelinian cavarly had been completely overborne by the headlong onset of the Angelinians, and seeing their two leaders killed, by three christian officers respectively, the survivors of the foe broke and scattered; then wheeling about their horses, fled faster than they came back up the roads and across the fields and meadows toard the villiages.

"urrah they fly." cried the Angelinian officers. After them. Follows thommy; and capture as many of th them as you can now. Take prisoners rather than slay. never let it be said that we did not show mercy when t we had the upper hand?.."

With an exultant cheer the immense bodies of troops spurred after the fleeing fugitives, but ere any of these could be overtaken, the bugles sang a recall, and it was seen the routed glandelinians were rallying to make a counter charge.

The villages extended along the main roads and in front of some of the fields but other more irregular lins of fortified houses ran along a portion of the river banks, also a brook flowing past them at right angles to the main streets, thus hiding the view beyond the charging christian cavarly. From an eni eminence in the rear general Thomas warwinfielder had descried strong bodies of more glandelinian horse and even foot men, under the rebel colors deploying rapidly from the woods and hills behind the villiage, and a strange roar of heavier firing at many different point and the nature of their sound told that the main christian line of attack was being rapidly forced back, that the main line of the foe had come to the support of the attacked, and were concentrating heavily upon the Angelinian forces. Although as we have seen this Angelinian general was a bold and a dashing cavarly leader.

he was also a very prudent one and had no wish that his gallent friends and comrades and perceptive brethern in law, should fall into any ambush the Angelinian cavarly drew rein therefore and awaited the coming up of the main or rest of the vanguard, which which in its turn halted within sight of the enemy untill the arriveal of the slower foot or main body. At this time the firing elsewhere had grown extremely wild, long lines of christian batteries were roaring and thundering in a insane manner and the salvoes of explosions was becoming strangely terrific and made a distant volcano of flame and din. General Markenfielder felt heartsick as he realized the grand attack of the main christian line was being driven back but here at this point both armies of christians and glandelinians mostly cavarly faces eax rac each other near the worm run. here there was a large brook running in a sort of large hollow dividing the two immense bodies of cavarly men asunder so there was no passage for them to convey their ordience or over and the banks on either side were steep and cumbersome. hereupon the christian generals in charge of the christian cavarly perci perceiving that the christian divisions of the main line of assault were disappointed of their purpose, would not however retreat from the spot and fought with both the foe infantry and cavarly a terrific contest for three hoursuntill they were so heavily outnumbered and had suffered losses so great that they were forced to make a slow reccil. ut they had inflicted dreadful loss upon the enemy and ten of the foe generals were killed and twenty sid six wounded.

the glandelinians who were fiercely pressing the advantage now, and cutting up the whole line of christian assault were as it appeared troops of zimmermanniams under general Purgatorian, and sir Henry Perceyton who having the intelligence of the intensed attack upon their positions near the villiages no doubt through the hel p of spies had issued forth immense reinforcements of troops tward the villiage with all their own cavarly and batteries of artillery. hey had also with them certain divisions og of Gargolian kurds possibly mostly conveyed by warships and transports, although it was pretty clear that while the intervening country of Calverinia wasin possesion of christians the smaller christian argies must have been overawed by the strong glandelinian garrisons that the glandelinian ing and queen had placed at vivian wickey, and which had been maintanlined in their midst in spite of the dreadful seige of lucillia ricksen. no where in all these accounts of the child slave uprisings did we see mention of the Angelinian armies having joined mansion in force untill general manson and others brought armies to hurl down evangelinia grania at the battle of gunbeam Creek, seen in volumns two. rather it would seem that general Ferryscenia thompson did not untill later muster more than his own personal retainers, ad although some time previously, he had set out fo for vivian Wickey with a considerable force of Abbicammians, Calverinians, and the Angelinians, it was more probable that he never got there, but an abandoned the journey for fear he should be cut off and taken by the rebel troops une under one of the dreaded Manleyns.

For some time the two immense armies of glandelinian and Angelinian cavarly confronted each other across the impassable ground at worm run, fighting the first bloodiest cavarly engagement of the war all of them firing at each other in raving volleys over the swampy ground, which flanked the brook on either side, and inflicted heavy loss. Many times despite the uncertainity of the ground both sides closed in tremendous da death grapples and general Thomas markendifloder led one division after another of the Angelinian dragoons in a bold dash upon the glandelinians with a view to clearning the way there for some of the foot to work around and turn the enemys flank, while general Radcliffis, with other divisions, attempted a similar manoevre on the other flank. he main troop of christian horse was with general Markonfielder. Cantering forward at the word of command, the fiercely ye lling squadrons found long lines of the rebel horse dismounted and posted as sharpshooters in the houses of the villiage, and in those along the line of the river bank. the head pieces or hats of the glandelinian defenders were all that showed above the foe breastworks and above the walls of yards and playgrounds, behind a bristling array of rifles and teeming cannon. ut in spite of the strongly intrenchedposition of the rebels, the gallent general markond Markenfielder sounded the charge and lee it led it, gorging his horses flanks with hus spurs as to urge the animal to top speed.

With shout of Holy church, and the Catholic faith, and down with Child lavery" his big surge of men sixteen miles thundered down the hill after him, through an inferno of tearing rending shrapnell ex lesions and grape and canister that o tore and shattered their lines and brought down whole windrows of horsemen and horses. he rebel infantry held their rifle fire untill the yelling assailants was close up, then hundreds of bugles glared their calls, and instantly a stream of flame ran all along the positions, from the walls and fences of yards and playgrounds, and from all roofs and windows of the houses, and on top of the walls. he storming leaden messengers of death whizzed in among the close set ranks of the Catholic cavaliers bringing down h hundreds of ranks of men and horses.

he assault was finally repulsed, but ten times with every renewed effort despite their frightful losses and in the face of a withering fire each time the christians rushed forward with the speed of storming - racers, and some upon the works and playgrounds were carried, the leading files of troopers closing with the foe in the playgrounds and other yards, and carrying all before them gallered with a thundering roar of a deadly avalance into the very streets of the villiages, and strew death and destruction all about them. promptly springing from their saddles seventy thousand of the horsemen repil pvroplied with pistols and carbines, to the still withering fire of their unseen advers aries in the houses, and behind the shutted windows of the buildings, while others of their number attacked the barricaded doors with axes and musket butts and battering rams, so as to force entrance.

he firing in the streets was fearful, the noise of hundreds of thousands of small arms being worse than a thousand cannon, and general john, george, christ opher and gormanlus, and gorton had all along with their resolute commandant come safily through the win withering fusillade of the rebel defenders, and were now most active into breaking into and storming the houses. under the thundering and shattering blows rained upon them, scores upon scores of doors were battering down, or sent flying in splinters from their fastenings and hinges, and in upon the foe men sheltering behind, or huddled with leveled bayonets and rifles upon the stairs, the christians finally burst.

within nearly five hours all of the villiage was after sanguinary fighting from house to house and street to street, finally captured and the enemy driven with excessive losses in killed and wounded and prisoners far beyond.

But now came the shrilling of nearly a thousand bugles down the many villiage streets, and also among the fields, and up them swept at a terrific charge a most strong body of glandelinian cavarly which had been held in reserve in some unknown section of the villiages. ortunately for the christian cavarly the main body of Purgatorians army was not moving forward at this point. general Markenfielder at his brothers bidding was forced after a fierce conflict to sound the recall, and the men after firing for a hour heavily upon the enemy and driving them back to a certain distance pu poured out ofthe many captured houses, and sprang into the sz saddle again just in time to recieve the second onslaught of the new comers.

Although the latter had the advantages of greater impetus the fierce Angelinian cavaliers met them so fiercely, and stood it so well, and inflicted such indiscriminate losses upon the enemy that the fury of the glandelinian charge was completely broken. hen after a few minutes desperate melee in which both general kristopher and another christian general were felled from their horses and killed, the former by a sabre blow upon the head, and thelatter by a pistol shot through the heart—the rebel horsemen fled precipitately. It was however a ruse to lead the desperate Catholic assailants into a trap or a worse trap, but the counter onslaught of the christian forces could not at that moment be stopped. Many parks of cannon had been planted at the junction of the main streets of the villiages and in the meadows and fields, and though further advance w would mean charging into the very teeth of the raking shot shell, and canister the column nevertheless having ex tended their lines and being too excited to realise their danger charged on. General markenfielder saw that unsupported by infantry and artillery as he was it would be madness to attempt anything further, he had orfered a speedy retirment but it did no good as the charging christian columns that moment could not be stopped.

The artillery fire which opened completely put the whole line of charge out of commission by tearing such huge gaps and to demoralise and confuse the calm columns and even when the survivors did start to retreat they did not get away in time to escape several more tremendous volleys of shell, shrapnell, solid shot, and grape and canister which was sent in a perfect storm amongst them, and some ten immense runs ranks and as many horses who were in the line of fire fell with the rest who had fallen before in mangled and shot to pieces corpses.

General Egremont Radcliffe had no better success on the left flank. He put an enemy two troops of horsemen to flight without coming to blows with it, but came into collision with a very st strong force of Clandelinian infantry and artillery, and his troops being driven back with their leader wounded, and with dreadful loss became entangled in marshy ground, swept by solid shot, and grape and canister and by a deadly fire of rifles and mortar cannons in the flank. He got round the marshy ground would mean a wide detour under this hot scathing - fire, when they could not expect to be supported by the foot, and finally the whole remainder with cut their leader recoiled and retreated back in utmost confusion to their own positions followed to the very encampment of the christians by the Clandelinians who stormed the line twice before a concentration of christian infantry and artillery cut to pieces the foe counter attacks, and finally saved the rest of the line from destruction. The noise of the conflict here had been deafening for fifteen miles. On that general Percy Thompsonin declared he would hear no more of the adventure saying:

"Quite enough blood shed had been spilt in this tremendious conflict when it is not gaining us any anything in the least but disaster. Look at the seas of our hundreds of thousands of killed and wounded men. I have lost my hearing almost from the din of the enemy rifle and cannon fire and they have counter attacked like a legion of demons. If you my general Mak Markenfielder presit in thes sacrificing lives in this manner I will make up my mind to sever connections with you and even give myself up to my enemies by riding forward alone."

He was so much in ernest as many of the generals saw that they reluctantly ordered their troops to give way, to abandon the captured positions of the enemy, the playgrounds and the villages, and retire back to their own positions, and so the order to return back to their own fortified works was issued. However at the moment the retirment began the enemy at all points having received reinforcements counter charged with great vehemence, and wild confusion followed, the most disintegrating dissention set in and was decidedly as well as most immediately encouraged for a time by colonel Constable and Captian Scully, who were literally shot down by the misled christian officers, and then all efforts were made to rally the troops and bring them safely through that screaming, roaring inferno. Many generals however believed that now the situation was so serious and terrible that it was plain that every man should look out for himself, that the disaster must have been caused by some pusillanimous generals who may have led their divisions off the field of battle before they received any orders to do so.

Other divisions being shattered to fragments after trying to make a bold and desperate stand, and having lost some of their greatest leaders followed suit, while other generals again like general Norton and Markenfielder, clamoured and beggedith with tears in their eyes to the men to make effort to ra, rally, and allow themselves to be led forward in an immediate general assault upon the heavily concentrated army of greycoats who were attacking with the ferocity of fiends.

"For Pity's sake my generas friends lets us not go back" Implored old general Norton Richardson. "We must take the villages, and swept the roads and enemy positions clear to the very gates of Puvillia Rickses, and we but persevere, make a general assault upon it. General Purgatorian cannot hope to stand against us, if we hurl our full strength upon that exposed foe flank, his positions will be turned, must be at any cost. Oh do not for our own dear Saviours sake relinquish the struggle now. I means the downfall of all hopes, the ruin of everything if we turn back now. We are also stronger in numbers than our assailants and it looks bad to be defeqted by such smaller numbers..."

Tears that were no disgrace to his still stalwart manhood filled his aged eyes as he urged his request. Ev ve general Thomas Markenfielder, John Gwinsburner, general Robertsonia Tempest and others intrv intreated also by all they held most dear, their hopes of restoring the badly shaken and broken christian lines, their love for their wives and children and ancestrail homes for their own personal safty not to give up their intention upon the villiages, and even had the flag bearers to go on ahead and fly their colors.

Vll to tell the truth the forces were fimally rallied, and all this was attempted the conflict raging on until night fall but now since they were once retaken by the foe they could not be regained by the christian assailants and general Westmorelander the main commander of the assailants would have gladly gone forward, for he was full of courage, but he could not get his troops to withstand the enemys dreadful artillery and rife fire, or their terrific counter assaults though the support was that some of the other great sections of the christian army had regained some of the positions lost in the morning. The army twq tward nighfull appalled a over its fearful losses recoiled tward the main christian positions, especially all that was left of it. The assault of ganions troops and of other generals was also broken down at other points with the same tragic ending, the enemy being totally victorious everywhere, and Mansion had to during the latter part of the night make a tremendous concentration with his main line everywhere, and keep up a horrible cannonc ading exposing everything to his horrible fire to prevent the seige from being broken.

General gorton and others felt convinced that all was lost, and were disheartened and disgusted with such results of the battle. The Angelinians had great resolution and would have been willing to renew the battle on the morrow with redoubled violence but Mansion would not hear of any further attacks upon such a fatal position.

eneral Christopher Montense wasnone the worse for his misadvang misadvant ure in the assaults upon the glandelinian positions and upon the foe in the villiages save for a severe headache for some time after it caused by his wild excitement during the bloody battle.. s for general Marmaduke it was found that a pistol bullet had grazed his shoulder, but had not lodged in it, though he was severely wounded nevertheless.

The wound bledprofucely, but one of his brothers whose name was Jon mis urmer who knew something something of surgery, dressed and bound it up c orrectly, and he sufered so little from it that he was able to sit on his horse on the retreat tward the christian positions..... christchpers headache was as nothing to his heartache over the forced abando ned attempt upon the villiage and foe lines, and the whole sale losses tat had occured to his own army and also the wholesale disintegration that had threatened to set in in the army and which had been stopped just in the nick of time. He and many of the other generals, his brothers, his father, and general Mak Markenfielder were the most disconsolate of human beings, as they rode back and forth among their lines which had been brought to the rear, and scanning the distant fields they had swept their troops across with high and ardent hopes. But all were too staunch, too chivalrous to dream of deserting o the cause, already lost though it seemed, or even to resign their commands which many another general would have done under the same circumstances. During those horrible assaults over ground of only four or five miles, the numbers of christian troops had melted away before the enemy rifle and cannon fire seemingly foot by foot, and more than less than half the strength of the christian divisions that had rushed to the assaults came back. General Mansion and all other christian generals viewed the dejected return with utter consternation. Dismay and despair seized upon the hearts of many, but general Mansion was bound to hold the seige no matter what the cost.

Of course astonishing disgraceful and also terrific was the defeat of the christian assaults upon the foe lines as already des r a described but nevertheless some of the Glandelinian generals were discouraged. They knew they had fairly "overwhipped the christian armies" as to say but they feared nevertheless as there was no telling what general Mansion might do next to avene avenge the blow struck him.

"Let's give battle to the christian dogs at all points simultaneously and force them to raise the seige." begged general Purgatorian. "We can easily hold all our own strong positions."

"Yes, yes ye shall all be sent ruined and lost irretrievably as wellas overwhelmed with disgrace——ay, ignominy—— and you do not wish for that." cried another heroic landelinian general in vain g trying to arouse the war s spirit in the gel glande linian generals some others whose names are not given here were for general battle against the besiegers, but general Mc-Allister Stanck afraid of causing useless bloodshed and anxious still as dar as might be possible to avoidytoo much fighting at present was desirous that the aurtheritiss in possession of vivian wickey cease hostilities for several weeks and leave the fierce christians alone.

"I have not taken possession of this immense city and all her fortresses to fight too fiercely against the christians without proper support from general Manley" said general Mc-Allister Stanck. "I hold the city only in defence and to remonstrate against the chrush scrushing down of our lawful child slavery and to fight against the misgovernment of the Calverinian countries."

He had looked rather for a triumphant procession through all sections of vivian Wicksy than to support a fierce rebellion which was to cost more losses in troops than he wished."

"Insurrection if it means anything, it if it is to win success, must mean desporate battle." In vain expostulated general Purgatorian."

Alas for theor explanandons the majority of the council decided to follow S general Mc-Allisters Stancks purpose and indeed his ideas were wiser. Had any general assault been made upon the whole christian besieging positions, general mansion had unknown to general Mc-Allistor and his rebels rebel generals many immense forces held in reserve and the whole landelinian army would have been crushed to badly that a surrender would have been probable right after the battle. But he did not propose to assault the christian lines, but to remain sorely on the defensive and let the christian besiegers do most or all of the attacking. and worse for him no troops were able to move to his rescue, by any portions of land all of the Calverinian country around the vinicity of vivian wickey and her sister sections was covered with immense scattered bands of Abbisannian and Calverinian cavarly, and the strong resoluted Angolinians. who great Catholic port surrounding Julio Gallio and other sections of vivian wickey consisting of over three hundred million men, had sixteen million or more men that had mustered under the banner of the five pounds scattered on hoe horseback, to ambush any force of landelinians that might dare to advance upon vivian wickey, or try to strike the besieging army in the rear. so though the seige was progressing slowly the besieged nevertheless were in a ticklish situation.

Oh it would surely have been the height of folly, the worse of madness, to assault the christian lines besieging the city without Manley forcing his armies to the support of vivian wickey, even though general Leonisarder Dacres and the other landelinian War lords had succeeded in reaching them and striking mansion.

General general Mc-Allister Stanck the main landelinian commander in charge of the fortresses of vivian wickey was very much worried over the fact that the day before general Mansion of the christian beisgers had made such desperate attempts to capture his strongholds in the vinicity of the villiages, and also the villiages itself. nd what made him feel worse was that the terrific assaults had almost succeeded, and that only on the cowardice of something like that of some of the leaders of the assaults, the battle had turned out in the favor of the enemy side. But nevertheless general Mc-Allister Stanck realized indeed that now general Purgatorian was in grave danger. general mansion on account of the recent defeat, had brought his many batteries u intio uncommon activity, and the artillery fire was doing more damage than was pleasant to see.

It was also feared that general Mansion may change his mind and mass his entire force upon the fortified works near the villiages, and this general Mc-Allister did not wish to allow him to do. In fact the christian besiegers was becoming excee excessively dangerous. they had drawn closer and closer since the time the seige had began, and many sections once in the possession of the landelinians was now again in the possession of the christians, and there was no hopes whatever of ever wver regaining them again.

General Purgatorian was so discouraged, that he was for leaving vivian wickey, claiming that general Stanck was not doing the dutiies he should and that was to give him all the support necessary. He claimed that the christians were mostly attacking him and his armies, andnot moving against Mc-Allister Stanck at all. Being a critised like that general Mc-Allister Stanck became desporate. He knew that th gh though he was the superior over the whole captured city of vivian wickeyWisky Wickey, general Purgatorian if he suspected him of non-support could make serious trouble for him, and also he was just as much in favor of beating back the christian besiegers as Purgatorian was, and so he rwsolved upon something that would prevent for a time the christians from aking any further such assaults. for should general mansion ever really attack en mass all would be lost and a disaster would occure to general Purgatorians whole command and might immediately result in the capture of the whole of vivian wickey, and then the rebellion would be lost.

During the night after the dreadful fray general Mc-Allister Stanck held a counsil and it was filan finally declared that the best means to prevent any desperate sorties on a the part of the besiegers was to cause through some means a gigantic explosion within some part of the christian lines that would bring on destruction enough to prevent general Mansion from following out any plans he would have in mind.

General Mc-Allister felt it sure was a desperate attempt, especially for those who would be sent on the mission.

He knew the results if any one was caught within the christian lines trying to set off an explosion of fatal consequences. they would without trial be placed before a firing squad and settled to the last. But if vivian wickey was to be held secure it must be done no matter what the cost. As no one was brave enough to volunteer to do the trick several squadsof men had to be drafted for the work, and the lot fell to fifteen engineersand two of their officers. To bring explosives into the christian lines it was realized was impossible. To make mines underground andunder their positions was just as impossible because no one could do the work without being seen as there was too many guards everywhere, and the whole country all around vivian wickey and as far as Jennie Turner and Gertrude Angeline, and even near Calverino was fairly teeming with strong hordes of scouting cavarly of Concentinians and Abyssinkilians.

It took about three days of counsils and debatements before it was finally decided what was to be done. Scouts belonging to general Francis Turneranna found out that within the christian linss occupying Peers hills , and the valleys as reserves was a long series of ammunition dumps of many hundreds of tons of explosives, and if these could be secretly set off, they could create an cart earthquake which would not only bury half of this position but paralize a part of general Mansin line of vesieging armies so far that he would be delayed for several months before he could make any further attacks, and this would give general Purgatorian good e ough enough time to establish his broken and staggered lines , and mend some of the fortresses ruined by the horrible artillery storm of the christians still going on with redoubled violence even now.

In these these valleys there was not hundreds of tonsof explosives as that was a mistake. I mean hundred s of thousands of explosives or tons of it and the dumps extended for miles. At first it was planned by the foe generals to blow these dumps by a fire of concentrated artillery, but the positions was so bonded in this location that not even the longest range guns would reach them and so if it was attempted without results, and a heavy fire of shelling would occur here general Mansion would get wise, and he would frustrate every attempt to make the blast.

So it was decided to sent the df drafted engineers into the christian lines in the disguise of christian officers or nuns, or whichever disguise they chose to wear, and have them set off the mines in some way. It took about four days for the landelinian engineers to work their way within the christian lines, it was so difficult on account of so many guards and scouting parties on the outskirts of the lines, but they nevertheless succeeded, but they were then within the lines nearly a week and did not as yet find out some way to blow up the expls explosives.

Other generals wished them to make some fire, which was to at least set off one of the dumps but to make a fire without being killed themselves was impossible.

Finally they thought of a p a plan . They were electricians, and they decided to secure batteries, and wires and under cover of night place wires under ground to every dump in many places and connect the wires to every battery they could secure from any point.

Thiswork went on successfully, but it took them about three more night to have the attatchment to every one of the dumps, and yet they could not find batteries. To bribe anyone was too impossible as none of the Angelinians within the besieging lines were disloyal here, not one traitor even could be found, and to take batteries by force would cause their detection and the whole plot would be spi spi spoiled and they would be riddled by bullets against a stone wall or somewhere.

Finally they decided to buy the batteries from some of the christian generals, but when this was attempted the generals refused saying that they could not sell anything to anybody who were total strangers. And such an answer made the spies alert for it did seem to them that now they were under suspicion. They finally became desperate, and one night when o most of the camp was asleep asleep they managed to secure only two batteries from a Service rent by overpowering the guards with gther, and to these six hours later they managed to some set the wires. The wires had been fixed so that they were unseen and run beyond the limits of the christian lines the spies haveing worked this through some wise plan, so that they had not been detected. They had wished to be away from the scene of the blast for there was no telling how terrific the expl explosions would be, and if they were probably w within even a mile of it they would probably be either buried or injured by falling debris.

as soon as all was in readiness, they decided to wait untill night before they would detonate the explosives. When they were set off it cannot be perfectly described the noise of the explosion or the sun scenes of the effects. Of course to many far from the scene even to general Mansion who saw it, they all thought it was some volcanic eruption eruption suddenly broken out. The first sensation that general Mansion felt, was the sudden shaking of his headquarters as if it had a literal fir fit, and a terrific roar that sounded as if the heavens was cannonaded by thunders from the end of the world.

He had rushed to the window at that moment and saw a series of bright arch like red flashes, and immense rolling clouds extending to prodigious heights just as i is seen during volcanic eruption, heard a terrible clamor of something like collasping houses and hills far away, and then sudden dark mass. A few minutes a ter he grew suspicious when the very air was prevaded by the peculiar smell not of volcanic gases, but of powr smoke in the air, and he found the steps of his headquarters covered with g dust to several inches, and the company streets also, and many of his batteries were partically shaken from their positions and the whole encampment was in excitement. Finally heard mr morning all learned what had happened. The results was terrible.. Except Especially where by the force of the blast of the ten ammunition dumps where mountians themselves were literally blown asunder as if they had been exploded volcanoes, and the sun shone dimly the air was so thick with dust suspended into the atmosphere. This written here is a an account of the great explosion and its result, especially near the provis province of Vivian Vickwy, ((Calverinia) which destroyed three hundred and sixty five thousand, lives.

Mountiansthat were literally torasunder asunder amid the crash of the terrific deafning explosion which was heard for many hundreds of miles, great landslides caused by the concussion, that literally eddied like some gigantic waterfalls crevasses suddenly opened from the vibration that swallowed army barracks, wagon trains and fortified villages, that were either swept away under a descending sea of los loose earth, or blown to fragments by air waves, and a cloudburst of earth and debris of houses and trenches, and showers of broken fragments of artillery tents, wagons, horses, and the like were a few of the terrible occurances that made the explosion viberated earthwunke one of the most appalling catastrophes ever described beyond all known in any history.

Though the tremendous explosion and the tremendous shaking up caused by the blast occured December Fifth first, 1912 the reports of it, and the effects of it and every other tragedy and dicaster caused by it was not allowed to be spread by the Glandelinian aurthorities of Calveriaia, especially beyond the narrow defiles which guarded the entrance into the Sun Beam Creek Region. It probably indeed would have been the most pr poorly advertized calamity that had occured had it not been for the efforts of the christian spies and was correspondents.

Of course the city of Vivian Vickey and all the fortresses around her a was within telegraphic reach of the rest of the world, but fa the details of the tremendous disaster had never come over the f wires as the Glandelinian aurthorities, in charge of Vivian Vickey and her fortresses prevented that, and the surviving pu population barracaded in their homes was too stunned by the loud noise of the explosion and the effects of the disaster and the relief workers were too buisy to give any description of the 'Mountians forced to dance from the shock of the explosion, and the vanishing valleys!''''!

General Roosevelt Josp Joseph one of the Angelinian feminism members who under fire with a party of scouts from foe artillery and snipers visited the explosion shaken area under the auspices of the Inter a International Famine Relief Committee, h had brought back to the besieging christian lines some of the first accounts of the devastated part of the christian lines and the Calverinian country around, and the strange things that happen when rocked by the mighty explosion of such powerful ammunition dumps, and a million tons of T.N.T adjoining it the earth for three hundred miles from Vivian Vickey turns itself into a fierce contortionist.

All building of any kind far beyond Mansions headquarters, and scores of miles from the scene of the explosion had every window blown out by the viberation, and reports came that every window in the immense city of Calverine itself so far from Vivian Vickey was shaken out, and in Vivian Vickey itself, many houses were razed and not a one had a window left, and the streets were partically smashed in debris and other wreckage caused by the concussion of the explosion. The city had rocked like a b^t baby's teeter totter bed, and three hundred million dollar damage was done and julio Callio being nearest to the scene of the blast suffered the heaviest but fortunately no one was killed or injured either among the imprisoned inhabitants or among the Glandelinian garrisons.

The area of complete destruction by the shock of the explosion was about one hundred by three hundred and sixty miles in extent, and contained ten to twenty large cities, and numerous villages that were razed by the concussion of the blast, with frightful loss in life that was not estimated. On account of the enemy not wishing the calamity to be known outside did not allow the names of the towns to be given, but nevertheless one of these was Scandinia, and the other still more seriously razed by the immense city of Randall Junction.

In the region of the christian lines, and especially within the christian lines itself was the heart of a great Calverinian loose country where on account of the drainage of the Erminie and Mc-allester, and seven run rivers the soil was a complete mixture of clay, soft earth, quicksand, dry muck, plain sand, gravel, and powdered quarat quartz. And a more narrower region more closer to the scene of the gigantic explosion was mostly comprized of the landslide districts, here from the, concussion, the sudden air waves produced by the force of so mighty an explosion, and the cloudburst of earth and dirt falling in millions of torrents over hil s and vale the loose earth and other debris cascaded down the f valley, or fell among a certain section of the christian lines in the valley itself and buried every one object in its path.

here were many who had witnessed the explosion at a more closer range. They declared that the roar of the explosion had been as earsplitting as a mighty explosion of a volcanic eruption, and that great clouds of smoke, and earth shot up wards to unknown heights, and that the secondary flash of the blast had lit up everything for the whole length of the valleys and to the hill tops, and simultaneously followed a sensation as if the whole earth was rocking itself to pieces.

Tales as strange as any that Roman Historians have told of Pompeii were recounted by the war-correspondents, and other visitors to the devastated sections of the christian lines..As three fifths of the dead were only Angelinian soldiers, the Glandelinian aurthorities claimed that the effects of the explosion, and the terrible visitation it caused, gave them now a good chance to hold out against the mighty hosts of christian besiegers with evidently good success, and that General Mc-allisters Stanck s plot had succeeded far more better than he had ever expected. He had intended to have the ammunition dumps blown up, and had caused the great store houses of T.N.T. to blow up simultaneously. The crash of the explosion had sounded like a world ful of cannon going off in two s distinct reports.

Some how many of the Anglikan Agelinian generals had indeed failed to deny the claim of the glandelinians with their usual vigor and had suddenly become surprisingly humble.

One one of the most dramatic espisode esposides of the disaster was the burial of general Benevolent's headquarters, a famious christian general and three hundred and fifty of his followers, just as they had met on conclave to plan a desperate drive against the rebel lines at julio Gallio and Norma Catherine. The doorways and other exits of the three story house in which they had gathered b was sealed by a terrific avalanch, while the group were argueing over the plans. By some miracle the guardsat the en r entrance of the headquarters escaped with their lives as well as the general and his followers, but others in the vinicity of the headquarters building were buried so deeply that the diggers could have worked for months and yet there would be no hopes of recovering the bodies of the thousands of their comrades.

In another explosion shaken district general Roooveselt and his party of Angelinians in investigating the explosion found that a whole mountian topped by a thick forest of trees and houses had slide into a valley from the shock of the explosion which occured ten miles from here.

And a little beyond to their utter surprise and utter dismay they found that a road bordered by many poplar and spruce trees had ridden the crest of a gigantic slide for sixteen miles and three quarters, without apparent damage to the trees or to even many of the birds nests in their brances. Of course this scene was still further from the explosion. One astonished christian general also out to investigate the cause of the explosion and the damage done by it had looked out of the window of his headquarters to find that a high hill appeared to have moved onto onto his headquarters topping its linesof march within a few feet of the building itself.

In another section of the christian line thus affected by the explosion the only maj mumber of soldiers left alive were a couple of generals, each over seventy five years old. They were saved from dea death only by the fact that several rescued child slaves displaying a strange game among each other had warned the generals just in time that an explosion was about to occur having seen the suspicious actions of the foe spies and engineers.

The deaths of so many soldiers andofficers within the stricken regions of that section of the christian lines was taken as evidence by millions of survivors in the neighborhood as thatthe concussion of the great explosion had had such force as to seemingly level whole hills, and towns and citiss, and forests of trees simultaneously, and dam up rivers, and shake everything down within both the foe and christian lines.

The most appalling sight of all was a region afterwards knw known as the valley of the dead, where seventeen great slides, shaken down by the force of the explosion, crashed into a gap in the hills three miles long within the north section of the besieging christian lines, killing every living thing in he the area except three soldiers and two children. It forun fortunately missed the christian positions at this section. The five survivors were carried across the valley on the crest of the avalanche, caught in the cross curr current of the o two other slides, whirled into a gigantic vortex and sap catapulted to the slope of another hill unharmed. unharmed. With them wn went houses, encampments, long lines of artillery,, wagon trains, orchards, br breastworks, and other positions, barracks, villiages of army tents, and a fortress, and the christians had since placidly began to fortify on the new locations to which their uninjured positions, encampments artillery and military equipment were so unceremoniously transported.

Near the city ofJulio Gallio where a hundred thousand buildings had been razed by the concussion of the explosion the chief Glandelinian mis magistrate was found inspecting the pertial ruins of one fortress razed by the concussion, thus showing indeed that the enemy got a share of it too. Whit within the christian lines two American Red Cross women were dw duel ling in a hovel with earthern floor and a tatchd too roof that wlu would have been scorned by well bred live stock. Though they hadb been offered better q quarters the Red Cross workers had refused to accept them preferring to share the hardships of the Angelinians.

In a small e section of the min christian line which was also effecteeby the explosion and its terrible concussion, on the highway leading tward the grounds of the main , m main Lucillio Jackson fortifications two strange correspondentshad come within the christian lines and put up at an a inn within the christian lines on the evening, for as being strangers, and not being known by any one, not evenchy the generals and ob other officers they were not given quarters in any of the barracks or the tents, and other army quarters. They had just prepared themselves for bed, after a slight supper when there came a roar like deafening thunder though it was far away, and to them was a din beyond anything they had ever heard before, and a few moments later everything seemed to them to grow dark, there was a terrific noise like as if an avalanche had passed by, and by the din of it all they were completely stupified and did not know what happened. Why didNOt they!

In the frightful terror and confusion that followed the explosion and the great earthquake shook the Angli Angelinians for a time completely forgot about their two strange guest. It was not untill several days later that some of the Angelinian officers happened to remember them, and h they immediately got many squads of soldiers and began work digging for the covered house or Inn. And when after considerable digging their room was brought to light at last, both men were found alive, but nevertheless injured considerably by the falling debris of the ceiling, and almost overcome with hunger and thirst.

However they had been stupified by the shock and knew nothing of what had happend happened, and imagined they had slept through an ordinary night. When they finally req red recovered and witnessed all that happened, they quickly set to work to take actual photographs and writrwritr wt write stories of the scene.

One of the districts that had sufferede mo most was the take tabl table land to the north of Lucillio Jackson known as the Calverinian bunch grass country which supplied the horse crops for pra practically all of the cavarly forces of the besieging christian lines. The soil was of some kind of unyeilding alkali, which from the shock cracked most appallingly since there was no loess cushion to m mitigate the force of the produced shock caused t by the tremendous explosion.

In on of the main towns not far from Jennie Vivian also in possession of the christians with a normal garrison of several hundred soldiers the military investigators, w war correspondents and newspapers and the like found only thirty survivors, and the town of three thousand six hundred houses looked as if it had been razed by shell fire. Indeed the loss of nearly two to three hundred and sixty five thousand soldiers on account of the debris thrown down hillsides by the concussion, and the total destruction of hundreds of immense encampments, and scores of towns and several cities, within the whole region, and even the parcially destruction of hundred hundreds of towns and cities far from the scene of the explosion called for reconstruction work on indeed a most staggering scale. Seventy five thousand Angelinian soldiers had been put to the work of reforming the wrecked sections within the christian lines had been sent there by the Angelinian and Calverinian International famine Relief Society in releasing many dammed streams, and thus preventing disasterious overflows which would make floods of such character as to probably hinder the seige of Vivian Vickey.

Their work and that of their brave superintendents, now nearing successful com peltion after several weeks toil with blasting and digging was a romance of adventure in itself. F probably there was no orphan problem as children in the devastated districts were so much in demand they they had been always promptly adopted by the survivors. Girl children were ad adopted more eagerly than those of boys especially all rescued child slaves who were usually adopted by the christian soldiers themselves. Of that most remarkable series of seismix seismic dist disturbances, which occured on account of the force of the explosion the most

phenomenal was undoubtedly th the greatest of the shock of the late morning felt fifty miles away from vivian Wickey. Owing to the usual character of the strange Calverinian Loess grounds under the immense desposits of which the concussion made the rock slip occur, especially the moment the exp, explosion roared, fantastic effects were produced upon the surface of the earth which gave the obe observer the weird feeling that he was on some strange planet still in the formative stange stage.

This terrific explosion played havoc such q as was never redoc recored recorded in the stores of blasts, volcanic eruptions, and earthquakes. Likl Likely no other earthquake in scientific action ever changed any physical geography of ap any earthquakes affected regions in our own worlds, countries not even the great Kansu cataclysm in Chinia. Anyway since the beginning of the seige of Vivian Wickey, th there had been many terrific artillery duels, tremendous infantry actions, great cavarly engagements, bombardments of shore batteries from river or sea, and many great explosions, causing all that time the region to be one of continual seismic disturbance, but local only occuring within the area where the artillery storms occured and raged, recording only earthquakes approximating the recent calamity in destructiveness, and yet none of these were ever caused by explosion of any great intensity, but mostly by artillery duels and the cannon firing proceeding some tremendous infantry battle.

One of the fir fiercest artillery duels of the seige of the first year of the war at least occured in the month of September the same date the battle of Calverins Hills had been raging this being a great artillery activity north of the south branch of the great Candardon fortifications, and the roar of so many thousands of great guns being fired in one minutes time, with really hundreds of thousands of gun in the action, and so many shells and mines exploding made a great roar heard or felt plainly for one thousand two hundred miles affecting most severely an area in the north off the province of vivian Wickey for the s distance of two hundred miles, and extending in the dire tion of the region affected by the recent explosion, and the other bombardment of concentrated artillery upon the fortresses near the Annie Aronburg Section cause caused an great explosion of ammunition ddum dumps and factories tearing a huge crater where fifty thousand houses forwly stood and the shock razed nearly every building in this section, and blew out all the winco windows in the whole of Vivian Wickey, ruined many other places, and caused incapable damage for thedistamce of one hundred miles.

The area mostly heavily affected by the recent disaster--what one might call the area of supreme destruction where no brick stone, or any army building of any size was left in a habitable condition was lying between the main regions of the Mc-Hollester and Worma Run Rivers one hundred and eighty miles long, and one hundred miles wide. In the centre of this section was where the great blast broke out.

It comprised of two distinct types of geological formations, at least on the sur surface, which fact added great variety and interest to the occurance, and made every one rel realised what an enemyhgeneral Hansion was facing in his seige of vivian Wickey. The southern half of this region stretching from the southern banks of the great Mc-Hollester Run river tward all sections of Vivian Wickey was with the exception 6 of the precipitious mountian range cutting it from north to south, and otherward northeastward not far from its eastern edge a part of the great Calverinian loess region which stretched from the central portion of the region of the Mc-Hollester Run almost to Calverine six hundred miles away.

It was in this loess regions that the immense slides out of the terraced hills occured simultaneously with the explosion and deluge of debris, burying or carrying away christian encampments miles long, villiages occupied by christian soldiers, covering level farm valley floors with a debris of unvegetated dust, damming streambeds, and turning valleys into lakes, and accomplishing those hardly believable fre freaks which the Angelinians named "The footsteps of Damnation"

It looked to them as if by the concussion of the great explosion the mountians literally tried to commit a motin as of working or moving forward without asking pemission or trying to pay an unexpected visiti.

The northern Alf half of that region of Calverinia especially within the christian lines from the Worma Run to the great Mc-Hollester Run River was a rolling alkali plateauof clay and gravel formation bordered on both sides byimmense forests known as the McHollester woods, a part of the Calverinian steppes stretching north beyond Vivian Wickey, to Pandor a thirty miles north of Vivian Wickey, and west to Calverine, and the Julio Callio section of Vivian Wickey.

In this distrct the soil being of brittle but firmer texture than the loess did not slide with the concussion of the explosion, but did worse, cracking into many immense intricate fu fissures.

Had the great quake and explosion disaster struck the main Calverinian provinces several hundred miles further to the north west or south the loss of lives would have occured among non-combatnants only and probably would have been negligible. As it happened the destructive explosion and the earthquake caused by it had to be selected for destruction by the beseibesieged enemy, the agriculturally ru rich loess country of th the southern half of the affected area, the most strongest portion of the christian lines and to the north several of the largest Angelinian besieging fortresses, encampments, bare barracks and salients and ram a ram a ramparts which were leveled by the concussion of the explosion.

Although the immensity of the besieging christian lines at this point was not more than one tenth of the other sector facing the Lucillis Hicksen fortifications, the loss of lives from landslides caused by the vibcration, collasped dugouts, and fortified cave homes used for shelter by the infantry during an artillery storm, and falling army barracks, generals headquarterstogether with death from being exposed to the falling torcents of earth, stones, and other debris thrown up six thousand feet high by the explosion, and also those from exposure of the unsheltered in this altitude to the fire of hidden ri rebel snipers, and to the many trees that had been thrown down by the concussion, was accordingly to the army official figures three hundred and sixty five thousand soldiers and many officers, and according to the estmiates of the foreign investigators and war correspondents more than twice that number more suffered from explosion, shock, deafen deafness, from the ear splitting crash, and heart failure from the pruc produced excitement caused by the explosions reverbrating boom heard for a thousand miles or more.

The first most serious damage by the force of the explosion and the great shock produced by it was found to be among the christian lines closest to the scene of the explosion not far from the banks of the Worma Run River itself.

In the region of the Lucillie Hicksen Fortifications some damage was done by the vibcration to battlemented towers and some outhouses and stockades, but there was no loss of life among the Glandelinians though later general Purgatorian declared in his reports that from the damage done by the shock his losses was about one hundred and ten million dollars in damaged army property and twice that much in ruined houses in Worma Catherine and Julio Callio and within the Glandelinian encampments.

Still lesser destruction was wrought in spots between the positions of the great Gedernine and Mc-Hollestinian Fortifications. Opposite these great section of the Lui Lucillie Hicksen Fortresses in the vinicty of Jennie Vivian on the banks of the beautiful Sunbeam Creek five or hundred six hundred feet above sealevel, cave dwellings in and dugouts near the Biffs of the Evangelinia Crania Heights collasped also with the shock causing great loss of liv life among the besieging christian soldiers, who did principl prindpally u occupy this sort of shelter when under heavy artillery fire from the rebel a artillery line.

ittle beyond this region was correspondents, and newspaper reports reporters and investigators found themselves in the belt of complete destruction, whore long lines of besieging fortresses as well as headquarters buildings for general officers, and immense cities of army barracks as well as cities of tents and other encampme nts suffered heavy loss of life, and all buildings were leveled or on fire .
wo of the hardest hit regions was very near to the Mc-Hollestinian ortif ications, though done to the christian lines. In this region any one could have ascended a smal fortified valley of so steep grade directly west of the great Sunbeam Creek where suddenly the high road for the length of two i miles and a quarter dropped out of sight. here was one of the gashes blown out of the earth by the explosion. It appeared to have been cut as if chopped off with a herculean an axe leaving the sixty year old oaks, p pines and poplars partly uor uprooted upon the edge of the explosion torn gully which was dug i eight hundred and sixty feet deep. and which u ocupied the position of the road. To all appearance it was like being on the edge of some gash cut by an eruption in the side of a immense volcano not far from the crater and in deed the desolation was so horribly far spread that it appeared indeed as if some titan volcano had fairly exploded.
The roadside water supply of a near by sector of the besieging christian lines had disappeared down the same gully. The soldiers were now getting their water from a new lake a mile to the wast in the centre of the valley where the main section of the e explosion had occured tearing in the ground a mile wide crater which was now filled with a lake of water.
Making your way over the rent terraces to this lake which had been prevented from overflowing by the damming up of a valley stream running into the lake by a four , mouthed slide from the hills on the opposite banks, y any one could have secured a freakish picture. The short fortified valleys in this sector k m joined one another like links in a chain. iding to the fortified summit of the divide which seperated the besieging christian forces from the next link, you could have been amazed by the immense panao panorama of a valley filled with the loess dust, and clouds of seventeen tremendous landslides which had come out of the many explosion shaken hills on either side.
This little fortified nook in the also fortified hills some six miles long known as "the ucillie icksen Draw" had become inverity the climax of the desolation.
ardly enough val evalley floor land remained for one good kitchen f loor or garden, several fortified positions lay with all the artillery buried beneath the debris, and one line of fortresses two miles in extent made of stone and concrete and also wood containing not a single christian survivor lay in ruins being razed by the concussion of the explosion. The only survivors of this "Valley od Death" were saved as if by some miracle. A general and two ofhis staff officers who were his sons, whose headquarters instead of being buried was caught upon the back of one of the tremendous landslides, carried half a mile down the valley to where it was divided into two streams of earth coming from other directions, and as the resultant of the two of forces was pushed another quarter of a mile up a small draw.
These millions of besieging Angelinian soldiers like all other persons were unaware of the nature of the great disaster which had overta en them untill the following morning. The shock and explosion occured within the very besieging christian lines at 8:09 P.M. December 16th 1912. when an severe artillery duel had been going on and when most of the infan ry were housed in the shell proff s dugouts and cave dwelkings.
A bitter cruel infantry battle, and a earsplitting earsplitting artillery duel raging simultaneously at seperate points at the same time as added to the horror of that black night when everything appeared like Dantes inferno. The survivors decalred that they heard the tremendous roar of a mighty explosion which seemed to fill the valleys and all the region around with with a million deafening echoes, and which seemed to tear the heavens from the volcano of flame and clamor, and they declared they felt the shock simultaneously which seemed to them to consist of a very sickening swing to the northeast, and a violent jerk back to the southwest, lasting the same few momn moments the explosion did. Simultaneously to this they felt a blast of wind that seemed to for a second rip and tear branches of f trees and blow out windows of buildings and other places.

they had made all ordinary efforts to save themselves and between successive explosions explosions andtremors followingthe main one huddled back into the ruins of their quarters to await the morn . Not untill day dawned and they crawled out to find neighboring encampments, trenches, immense villiages of barracks, long lines of batteries of cannon, besieging fortresses and immense cities of tents obliterated, armypositions carried away or buried, great streams blocked, and hills of earth towering towering above their compounds did they apprehend that the Calverinian hills had been toppled into gigantic landslides by the force and suddenness of the great concussion.
it was in this valley of death that one of the most arresting freaks of the cataclysm occured. Six sections of a well packed Calverinian highway highway accompanied by long lines of trees of every kind which bordered it, were cut from the line of road follow following the line of the side hill, swept thousands of yards over the stream bed and set intact upon an angle on top of the heap of loose earth.
It tok weeks to reestablish army communications over these breakages, to rebuild telegraph lines, red recover artillery and tents, to uncover barracks and fortified works and pack down roads on which horses would not sink to their bellies, ad and artillery whells wheels abve above their hubs.
The valley of desolation opened at its southern end into a wider more gradual valley of horseshoe shape, and at the junction of the valley stood child slaves Gap a town occupied by officers in command of the besiegers, in which one tenth of their number were killed, by collaspe of buildings, and army cave dwelling dewlliags, and dugouts, and the other nine thents werecsaved by a most miracal u miracalous stoppage of two bodies of sliding earth shaken loose from themother hill, and left hanging above thevillage, lacking only another half seconds tremor to send them down.
A thirdavalanche havingflowed from the hills on the opposite side of the valley across the valley floor, and the streambed was piled up in a very young mountian near enough to the villiage to overshadow the wall. Five enormous slides had blocked a stream forming three huge lakes. Some of the places scooped out by the series of great explosions were half a mile in width, extending back into the hills for a mile, and furnished enough dirt and debris thrown up to cover several square miles of valley floor. Some of the gaping crevasses made by the blast were as regular as if they had been made with a git gigantic trowel, while others were as ragged as if they had been ripped out of the hills by the teeth of some huge dragonic monster. In each case the earth which came down after being thrown high up by t he force of the explosion b bore the appearance of having shaken loose clod from clod and grain from grain, and then cascaded like water, forming vortices, swirls, and all the convolutions into which a torrent of water might shape itself.
One of these slides pouring down upon the lower section of a christian position ad buried everyencampment, except one to the right. This part was only half covered. Hay, gran, grain, trees, tents, baggage wagons, all kinds of provisions, artillery, and bodies of soldiers and horses were mingled and mixed with the earth over the distance of a mile showing how the dirt had worked in its descent.
On the opposite side of the slide, a whole encampment and a long line of artillery, had come down intact.
The horses had been so caught, that their heads or limbs protruded, and these had been cleaned by the packs of dogs which roamed the country. Ridge poles of army dwellings turned to sepulchers showed above the ground. Two other great slides causing the lowest of these blocka blockades coming from the sides of the valley, buried an encampment of two hundred and fifty soldiers, converted a shapely high loess butte into a ragged mound, and created several miles of lake out of rich valley farms. Thus the christian generals realising the dangers to the christian positions from destructive washouts if these block ades werd were not opened before the late fall torrents had before the arival of general relief made such pitably in-sufficient efforts as were at their commands, tward the release of the dammed up waters. their ad and Cedernine neighborhood fortifications were similarto the others already described..... There was probably no other area however where within a half circle of thirty miles diameter one may count twenty seven immense slides, great landslides shaken from the hills by the greatest explosion ever known of. Thirty miles further wee west near the Mic-Chirthian fortifications another bad slide district existed, and some thirty miles northeast of the same fortresses, three bad slides occured, one of which was responsible for a dramatic incident of the burial of general Angedonia Leonia' a headquarters, with his death, and the injury of seven of his thirteen staff officers to boot....

Beyond this area north to the great silverbell fortresses was the most hardest shaken section of all. Here the feeble loess gave way to the brittle clay gravel Ali Alki Alkali bunch grass and weed plains edged by immense forests and streams, this being too solid to slide but which cracked like a porcelain disk hit with an immense weight.

ave dwellings used by the besieging soldiers, all the towns in this region, without Exception exception gave way into leveled ruins not one bri k brick remaining upon an another and even wooden houses were razed to their foundations by the shock.

ven two small cities within the possession of the besiegers were also leveled to the ground. Even though the fortresses of Lucillie Ickson was far from the scene of the explosion a portion of her towers and walls collaspsd. In one trench full of dugouts and cave dwellings of eighty thousand two hundred eighty Angelinian soldiers sixty thousand were entombed, but half were dug out alive by fifty thousand soldiers. In another region of the explosion shaken region of the christian lines, eighty per centof the soldiers perish perished. There were so many dead horses pulled out of the debris that to prevent them from rotting in the lines, and as there was to suffisient time or means to bury them, they were put into many big piles and soaked with oil and burned. Such were the scenes of desolation caused by the mightiest explosive that probably went off.

Later when soldiers had to travel over these immense wastes of earth under whe which had been buries the villliages, farmsteads, streambeds, and roadbeds, and also railroad lines they were overcome by the weird feeling that they were on the flee of some immense volcanic eruption. All cavarly horses appeared to have an equal sense of the uneasiness of the situation and could not be persauded to leave the many trails which were being pounded down over the soft dry, treacherous earth.

The ad avalanshe had even plowed its way under the sod. The most striking freak of the shock which had been produced by the great explosion, was a quarter mile section of an old road with the big poplars which lined it was cut from the high way by a landslide and carried on the back of the river of earth for nearly four miles, where it was left in an almost natural position. All this took place in a few seconds of time. Its conformations and waves into which the swirling earth resolved itself was also a part of the freak. The shock of the explosion also made an immense dam of millions of tons of loose earth stretching from valley side to valley side, also in a few seconds of time. Even the terraced hillsides where the explosion literally occured showed hundreds of immense gashes, out of which had poured the loose earth deluging the valley floors and burying farms and villiages.

In some cases on account of the explosion which leaved gashes as regular as if scooped by gigantic trowlers and trowels the hillsides even slide away spreading out over the valley floor completely obliterating the original topography, including all the railroad lines, and encampments. The wave through and vortex formation taken by the torrent of earth was plainly discernible for a so score of miles. Even a scaly appearance was caused by the broken up valley floor sod. And yet all this d disaster did not break any point of the seige in the least. I thank you ladies and geltem gentlemen one and all for your kind attention."

General Hanson Vivian indeed felt very bad over his bloody repulse after the bloody battle on the Mc-Pooo Pollester gun near Calverine. Before it began and while he had been advancingon Calverine he had been so hopeful for victory and thought sure he could have succeeded succeeded in capturing the city of Calverine. Of course general Hanson indeed felt miserable, and broken hearted, but his brother and the other christian generals were in a rage ew especially against general Mic Ferren whose blunder had been responsible for the staggering defeat of so vastly a superior christian army. General Mac-Farran was wildest and during a counsil had demanded that general Mic Ferren should be removed from his command, but general Hanson foolishly gave the careless blunderer another chance though of course he had scolded him something fierce nevertheless. None of the other generals did hardly anything to console general Hanson in his distress, because they felt equally as bad as themselves, for they suffered the disgrace as much as he did.

He had already withda withdrawn his immense armies a considerable distance from the bloody field of recent battle, and was making preparations to abandon the seige. Nevertheless three days after the failure in the seige itself, poor heart-broken general Hanson finally sent one of his messengers to ask his neices, Violet and her sisters to come to his newly selected headquarters, so that he could explain everythingto them, as he felt sure they probably felt worse than even he did.

It was not untill the approach of evening before the messenger found the little girl heroines who had been out scouting and who had been just returning into the christian lines looking like dirty little ragamuffians with their disguises, and adressing the beautiful little girls h he told them all, and so they agreed to come as soon as they had changed their clothes and cleaned up a bit. And so within four hous hours and a half they arrived cleaned up and looking likelittle fairies i to general Hansons headquarters and was ushered into the presence of the great general.

They hadi had indeed felt bad over the outcome of the battle themselves, but the distressed look in their uncles face shocked them. He even(Big man as he was) appearex appeared to them as if he had been weeping.

"Why what is the matter withyou uncle dear!" Cried violet taking the chair he offered her. "You look terrible.— What(s wrong?!?"

Hanson for a few moments could not speak. He stood with his arm on a mantle shelf and as the little heroines stood clustered around him, he finally said;;;

"You all know how I felt when the foe took possession of the Calverinian city of Vivian Wickey,, and her gigantic fortresses. Well doing during my long forced march on Calverine whose seige I am now abandoing, it was my purou purpose if I captured Calverine to open a way to march my immense armies on Vivian Wickey, and fighting my way across the horse gun at Leighburg Landing, to capture the great heights of Evangelinia Crania and place to general Hansions support nearly my whole army and then take command of the seige myself. General Berger and other generals even my own brother and so on h gave me many good advises which I followed out with the best of faith, but nevertheless through the carelessness of one of my generals by the name of Mc-Ferren who blundered I lost the whole battle, suffered a terrific disaster at Calverine Hills, got wounded myself as you see, and was having my armies crushed at every point, suffering heavier losses than I ever expected, and am now compelled to raise the seige.

The night after the bloody disaster and defeat, I found my army in an awfully disorganized and demorilized condition. This will give the enemy a full chance to make some terrible references about me. I am broken hearted. I did not hardly al sleep ever since. I made every preparation for the big advance on Vivian Wickey— even had started some of my reserve armies in her direction. But the last minute after my defeat I had my wireless telegrpah operator recall those armies. They did not however arived untill to day, and I myself did not return to my headquarters untill after last night. I have not had hardly a wink of sleep since, and I have ate very little. I feel like giving up the whole war itself and allow the enemy to hold on. I am discouraged. I am brokenhearted——" And Hanson his eyes brimming with tears took out his handkerchief, and proceeded to wipe his eyes. Violet and her sisters had compassion on their poor Uncle and joice kneling in front of him as he sat down placedher arms around his neck and said pitero pitcously;

"Now please don't cry Uncle Hanson." Everythingwill come out all right yet—. I It's all for the best. You may find a way yet, and that general Mic Ferren who all the generals are angry at is not the kind of a xommander you should have in your army anyway. I and my sisters had always thought so--why not come over to our house for a while. We are only little girls but we can give you our home and love."

"And try to laugh." aid Violet."It makes us feel more miserable to see you so distressed. The defeat of your armies was just like stepping off a rock before they dyn dynamite it. Maybe you will have a chance to advance with your armies on vivian vickey in spite of it all."

General Hanson had oky a few more hours to stay in the region of the city of Calverine with Violet and her sisters, he was spending his last evening in their own headquarters, and by their cheery sh sunshiny ways had brought him back to his normal self, and their dazzling beauty,their happp p happy manners, their ways of playing with him so cheerful in any game he suggested and the like had for a time made him forget his misfortune. Indeed during the whole advance on Calverine it had been a most strenuous march for general Anson and his many armies, a bloody one a5 that, and sad to say a very profitable one for general John Jacken Manley and his whole rebel army.

General Manley had saved Calverine from capture by the Nationals, had held on successfully to his own positions, and had obtainedpossession of the trehon trenches and fortified hills abandoned by the christian armies. He was fifty million more men to the good, and had a new army of rebels advancing to his aid from the southeast. Ghosmannia and Nicknell themselves had armies as big as Manleys. Nevertheless despite this, by the consolation given to him by Violet and her sisters, general Hanson had recovered his composure,and was thinking of some new plan to move his armies against vivian Vickey, while other christian armies were to keep the enemy busy elsewhere. Being inspired by his pretty little neices, and their happy innocent ways he was determined to prove to the enemy that he was the same old rock of Gibraltar, that he would once more face the torrent of fierce opposition of the rebels, futile or not. Again he would show himself to be the fighter. As general Grant said!!!"I will fight it out along this line if it takes all summer."

"Well my dear little neices"said Hanson vivian, having two of them in his embrace"I have learnedmy lesson--I was fool foolish I guess to trust that general Mic-yr Ferren-you know the old saying. There's no fool like an old fool--and the other saying, blood is thicker than water--they both apply in my case. I'm leavingnow for my own headquarters to morrow moring, and after my plans will work out I will be moving with my armies tward vivian Vickey inanother rout instead of past Calverine, and Violet you were right and so was Joice. General Mic-Ferren is not worth being a commander and having given him only one chance, he willlose out if he blunders a second time from his carelessness. And I realize more than ever how near and dsdear my little e elestial lil relatives are to me-- Oh little children of Heaven, of God. Little human celestial beauties of heaven and earth. o happy and cheerful no matter what ever ahppens to you. How I envy you. I wish I was one of you little girls."."

There was a kindly look in general Hansons eyes that following night as he was seated and surrounded by by the little circle cok composed of the beautiful little vivian girls. Also a look of longing-- Hunger. As Violet played the piano while her sisters softly sang the old melodies he never heard such harmony. For a time he indeed felt at peace with himself and with the worlx world. Even their childish prattle was music to his ears. In the morning Hansons horse was soon called for, for general Hanson was preparing to leave to go back to his main command still concentrated before Calverine.

His old pal general Whilliamsberger Zimmermann had placedca special army at his disposal and was moving tward vivian Vickey with his own. The greatest armies ever seen were preparing for the great vivian Vickey campaign. At Hansons wish and command general Whilliamsberger Zimmermann was to take the main lead, clear to vivian Vickey and the line of march was to be kept open if possible. General Whilliamsberger Zimmermann and the two vivians were going through. At Abbisannia town another huge army was held for his convience.

"Well my dear little neices." said Hanson vivian embracing the little children, and lifting Jennie to his shoulder."I know you are going to do all you can for your great uncle when he has gone back to his own lines. Tell him all about your daring exploits. Brush up on your spying work. Learn to show the Glandelinians that even little children are not afraid of them. Learn to do many great services for your beloved country. you will have lots to do for us some day."

"I want to go to vivian Vickey and see thr sights too Uncle Hanson..." Said Jennie.

"dont worry.."Answered general Hanson. "You will be there with your fathers armies, for he is going too. But good be bye for a while children. I don't look dead yet despite my defeat do I. You know the rebels called me the "Old Whilliamsberger" Well I am tough. It takes more than a defeat, a machine gun, or a bullet to make a dent in me. you kno w the old saying in our family. A vivian may be down bo but never out."

And after embrach mbracing them once more he leaped upon the back of his fiery steed and saying"good bye everybody" raced off for his 1 own lines. The little girls now mounted upon their own chargers waved their handkerchiefs and shouted after him."Good bye Uncle. We hope you better success at Evangelinia Crania."

In the meantime inthe enemys camp two great Glandelinian generals were busy in a conversation.

"Well Manley"said general Calmannia Shoemannia"I want to con gratulate you on the way you handled the armies during the great battle. I heard a lot of comments. During the battle you worked hard to win. And you were sure conscientious. but I want to let you in on a little secret. You recall that little meeting my armies and general Hansons had on the Calverine Hills by that long stone wall that afternoon of the battle storm? Remember those series of charges, tremendous charges I made? Each charge just netted me ten thousand prisoners that is all, in heavy column of the realm. I had ten mi llion one hundred thousand soldiers, when I went over the top during the assaults o against the positions by that stone wall. That shows what a smalrt guy I m am. And I had orders to use them all if necessary. and when the christian dogs were beaten off they just handed me hundreds of thousands of their comrades as prisoners that's all--- a reward for my persi perspicacity. I've got brains when I want them"-----

"SAY"-----Interrupted general John Jacken Manley nudging Shoemannia with his elbow and giving a scornful smile"done make me laugh. done make me laugh. Old many brains. you say you had ten million men. You could have gotten just as far with twenty five thousand and not suffered such llosses in generals and troops as you did.I and my other generals watchee the movements of the christian armies all the time during that battle with the nationals. You could have gone over and settled with the christian dogs for anything without loss if you had tried. They were heavily overwhelmed by your troops at that stone wall and you did not know it. they needed reinforcements badly. If your Uncle on the christian side general Mic-yerren Shoemannia who blundered at that battle, ever blundered again during another fight and made it result like this one did for the christian armies, the christian dog general Hanson vivian would have grabbed his command from him in a hurry. He put the two vivians and their armies into a most desperate situation, and yet you foolishly blundered yourself and even also Nicknell, and drove the beaten christian armiesunder general Hanson vivian o-upon aline of heights that the whole world and all the creatures in heaven except god could not drive them from. say------brains! You just tossed away the chance of a most brilliant victory, a crushing victory at that, causing the battle to only end as a draw, and though it is over the christian armies are still holding their own and are going to leave just because they are going to do what I dread most, and I or my other generals just now are-not in the condition to do anything to prevent them. they will move on Vivian Vickey and we will have to refresh our armies and reglove reinforcements before we can campaign against them to save Vivian Vickey. And you just donated about four million prisoners to the enemy and onlycaptured really sixty thousand Nationals that's all. and you boast. Bah.''''''

Just before the advance on t e greatfortresses of Vivian Vickey really began, the pretty Vivian girls who had intendeec intended to go out scouting really had a very harrowling experience which indeed tested their nerve and showed that they were not afraid of anything no matter what it was. The seven pretty little girls though dressed in their own natural clothing and looking more beautiful and happier than ever and full of fun and frolic had halted their horses on the corner of a roadway not far from the outskirts of the main christian lines under general Robert Vivian inthe heart of the Calverinian section of Mc-Hollester Run two miles from the encampments watching the scenery, and viewing the movements of the enemys lines in the distance.

As the moments passed and nothing happened to cause any excitement, Violet and her sisters became impatient and felt like taking the risk of going into the foe lines under Shoemannia especially and learn if he had any intentions of for frustrating any f general Hansons purposes to make the cap campaign upon Vivian Wiskey. It was late in the afternoon since general Hansons departure for his own lines and Violet and her sisters finally decided it was time to get back to the christian lines before the advance started. he little girls had just started on their wa way when a man in purple uniform drew up a baggage wagon beside them and the driver hailed them pleasantly.''

''Heres a bad scene going on down the line of direction you are taking.''He said.''If you happen to be going my way, I'd be glad to take you along. Your horses could follow behind the wagon, and if you ride with me you will be shielded from the sun.''

The man tipped His hat his hat and smiled indeed indeed very genially. He seemed t to be a very good natured soldier of early middle age, a lieutenant, and his smile was so frank, that the little girls hesitated only for a moment. They tied their horses to the back of his wagon and hoped on the end. hey knew of course that accepting a strange mans invitation for any kind of a Ride was a rather unconventional and perhaps a dangerous thing, but he was no stranger and they felt sure of safty. And it was also daylight, they were together, fully armed and qu quick at their weapons, they were in a hurry, and the man was so kindly, that there seemeto be no qus questioning his motives. He was an Angelinian officer driving an a empty ammunition baggage wagon trying to do a good turn for little children for they knew he loved them all, had children of his own, and giving him their destination, they all got on the wagon and started in the direction of the christian lines.

As th they cme within sight of the christian lines, the little girls got up, gathered up their small packages and prepared to thank the kindly gentleman for his assistance in getting them to the lines so quickly. But instead of slowing up at the lines he suddenly changed his course, whipped the horses furiously, and the wagon shot past at a terrific rate. When from the rear at a great distance there came a vol lley of shots, and holes were torn in the canvass w which covered the wagon. Violet and her sisters became alarmed. he touched the driver on the shoulder.

''We have gone past our dewtination.''she called over the roar of the gallop ing horses. ''What is thematter?''

In another moment b fore he could answer there was a crash of volleys from another direction and the driver gave a lurch and topped from the seat with a bullet in his head. The wagon was persued by Glandelinians.

They happened to be a large party of Glandelinian secret service men or spies on horseback, and before Violet and her sisters could draw their guns to fire the foe had gained immediately upon the wagon, one of them jumped o onto the seat of the wagon, he huddled up in the drivers seat, and Violet and her sisters were quickly overpowered.

''You rascally Glandelinians dare not take us out of the way.''Cried Violet furiously.-Release us immediately. Do you hear.!''

For answer the Glandelinians relieved them of their weapons, and the drivers made the horses go their fullest speed.His figure seemed to stiffen. The little girls though not really frightened were throughoutly alarmed, and they fairly yelled to their capters to stop the wagon. Fully eighty of them had surrounded the wagon and were riding on horseback as fast as the wagon was going. The driver himself turned his head. hat they saw in his face caused them to huddle back in their seats in horror and disgust. There was no kindly expression in his face. In his face was a very wicked grin of hatred and ferocity. He began to curse, swear, and blaspheme. And suddenly Violet and her sisters realis realizedthey w r were riding in a wagon in possession of a swarm of Glandelinian spies.

Violet and her sisters clung to each other in speechless confusion but had no fright, and as the speeding wagon narrowly missed a gun cassion lying in the road the driver shouted. Then Violet and her sisters screamed commands to the driver to stop the wagon. without slowing down the driver turned his head to them once more. his time the wicked grin had vanished. Driving expertly with his left hand he slipped his right arm over the seat and pointed a large automatic pistol at Violet and her sisters.

''One more yelp out of you little female devils.''He shouted with a curse''And I'll shoot the whole seven of you. You are Christian dogs and so are our prisoners. We know you are the daughters of general Robert Angleic Vivian and I shall show you what will happen when we got you to the lines. We are going t over to Shoemannias camp and there we8LL we'll settle with you little girls for good and all.''

Violet and her sisters huddled together in the wagon treme trembling, with anger, dr derision and excitement. Go

''Go and shoot us if you will.''Cried Joice''We will not shut up even if you point a gun at us all day. If we were not tied hand and foot like this we would show you if we are afraid of you. owards to tie up little girls. hame on you. hoot us now if you dare. We defy you to do it.''

The man however driving recklessly with one hand kept the pistol before their eyes, while he drove faster and faster, tward the outskirts of the rebel line lines, the squadron following hard on behind. Violet and her sisters though they sat r seemingly rigid stuck their tungues out at him and one of the little girls kicked him in the back. He was infui in u infuriated but he could not stop to do anything in revenge though he cursed her roud roundly, and had to put away his gun for he saw they feared it not. Violet and her sisters hoped however that a force of Angelinians would soon be attracted by the spedding horses and wagon and the party of Glandelinians following it, and come to their rescue. But parties of Angelinians who had been out scouting and who did see the peculiar acting of the wagon and the Glandelinians folowing after it did persue, but were not unable to overtake the Glandelinians only, but were worsted. in the firing that insued, and finally remarked that it would serve the crazy Glandelinian driver right if they had axsmash up, and no other angelinian force of cavarly paid any attention to the foe cavarly and the racing wagon. Some fired at the Glandelinians but did not attempt to persue. But had they really known the Vivian girls were in that wagon, there would be some race believe me, a race which the Angelinians would have won.

Violet and her sisters peered from the rear opening i of the canvass wagon, hoping that some large force of Concontindan dragoons who might be suspicious would be in persuit. But there was none. Excepting for indignant Glandelinians on foot themselves imperiled by the reckless reckless driving, the roadway was clear. Violet and her sisters knew it would be useless to signal to these for they would do nothing, even though they shook their fists back at the driver, apparently thinking that after trying to kill them, the occupants of the wagon, the driver, and the following cavarly soldiers were adding insult to injury, by wavinb waving at them in derision.

Onward and onward continued the wagon and the horsemen untill with a sudden jar that nearly upset all the occupants, it leaped from the roadway, to a more narrower dirt road leading into the country. Four miles away loomed the m i immense encampments of the rebel lines. This road however was deserted though here and there pacing up and down were some Glandelinin guards. The last chance of rescue had passed. Violet and her sisters now began to realize that they were in the power of the Glandelinians. If they wondered what their fate would be they were not kept in suspense very long. ith a final look over his shoulder, the driver at the command of the officer in charge of the squadron slowed up, and turned sharply into a desert deserted lane, overrun with weeds and vines. after travei rbtraveling about a mile farther they came in sight of a low brick building, lookin looking more like a small fortress which was standing in the middle of a clump of underbrush.

The landelinian driverwith a still more wicked grin now stopped the wagon altogether.

"Now" He jeered. "whydon't you little goils scream all you want to. hy are you all so silent. Yell . Holler. see if anybody known as christian dogs will hear you. "

Violet and her sisters had tears in their eyes, but their looks were of defiance and derision. the Glandelinians all laughed so loudly that all the echoes of that desolate spot two miles away from the foe lines we were awakened.

violet and her sisters then theatened him.

" on't you dare to threaten me ye christian dogs." e yelled. "Go on and yell for hel help ifu want. ere I8ll help you yell. Help, help, help, the rebels have got us." He screeched. "Is that loud enough foy for you little goils." HEB HELP". Ha,ha,ha,ha,. He,he,he,. Go on and yell for help."

violet and her sisters did not shout or scream, but tried to run. mmediately the landelinians on horseback who were still near them whipped out theirvpos pistols and fired a volley into the ground at their very feet. bullet tore a wound in jennie's leg and she fel fell , then got up and limped. As j joice ran to her side, three of the glandelinians ordered them back to the wagon and forced them by pricking with the points of their sabres.

"Try to run away from us will you--you dirty little sneaks." One of the officers ch chuckled. I'll show you. We are going to detain you with the purpose of forcing you to give us information regarding the intentions of general Hanson ivian your christian dog os of an uncle and the movements of concentinian Aronburgs armies." And you will give it to us too or I8ll make you suffer..."

One of the landelinians then dismounted, and reaching into the wagon de drew out a long heavy logging chain, about thirty feet long. e looped one o end of this around the neck of join Joice, and fastened it with a heavy padlock. there were other loops to t the chain whock were fastened around the necks of the other little girls, and other padlocks were snapped through the links. he little girls were now strangely bound to each other with thirty feet of chain, and each had a few feet of chain between them. iolet and her sisters remembered reading somewhere, that the best way to deal with desperate Angelinian rebels when war infu riated, was to pretend that their conduct was quite senseble. o one of the little girls forced a smile, and asked the glandelinians if they were enjoying themselves.

"yes" One of the officers replied with a leer. "But not as much as y am going to. Wait. We8LL enjoy our experience with you in that fortresses yonder. ome with us and do not dare make a make any resistance."

The leader then took hold of the longest part of the chain and draged them tward the low stone fortress fortress. he little girls cried out in pain, but the glandelinians who followed only laughed, and the man pulling them jangled the chains. hen they struggled desperately, he pulled untill the ri rusty links cut into their flesh. The little girl realized they had to be careful, because the glandelinians were desperate on account of vivian ick y being threatened by so many immense national armies of Angelinia. f- vivian wickey was captured the rebellion would be lost.

"Run commanded the glandelinians now furiously. "And remember no resistance, or we will cut the gizzards out of you."

violet and her sisters stumbled forward tward the small stone fortress as their persecutors laughed, and tugged at their fetters. he small fortress contained one bare, and dirty empty room, void of furniture, but many kins many kinds of guns were hanging on the walls. heir abductor entered the building, and the rest of the landelinians then went on their way to camp, but two of them remained behind to gau guard the place. After entering the building the landelinian who had the little girls in his power shoved them into a corner of the b bu room, and then cooly locked the door, putting the key in his pocket. Now they saw that there was a strange sort of a trap t door in the centre of the stone floor. The glandelinian soldier raised it with considerable effort, and stared into the black hole that it covered. He rubbed his hands briskly and chuckled. He then rose and tiptoed like a cat to the corner. vi violet and her sisters clung to each other, and huddled against the wall. He chuckled again, and then uttered a curse terrible to hear as his arm shot out, and he seized the chain. The little girls clasped his knees knees in an effort to throw him but he being a strong man shook them off and dragged them over the floor to the hole. The chains had cut so deeply, that the little girls had been forced to let go of his legs, and interpose their hands between the chain and their necks. The landelinian then stopped at the edge of the hole, and pointed as he commanded; hen as they shrank back. "Do you hear me!" He repeated. "Do you want me to throw you in."

"Get down and be mighty quick about it."

"we will not do as you order." Said violet.

He shook them off and forced Joice into the pit. She had again clung desperately to his feet in an effort to throw him but the glandelinian soldier had twisted her little arm, untill she released her hold, and then he kicked her down the hole. Fortunately the fall was but only a few feet. But the weight of her body, jerked the chain suddenly taunt, and her sisters were pulled headlong after her into the pit, and they fell upon each othervin a heap.

All seven of the little girls lay for an instant dazed on the damp dirt floor. Then they awakened to see the dark silhouette of the rebel letting himself down the hole. He pulled the trapdoor shut behind him, and a'll sight were in utter darkness. A moment of silence, and then they heard him moving about. He struck a match and they could see his wicked face leering at them. He then lighted a tall candle stuck in a bottle and the cellar of the fort ress flickered into sight. In the hazy light they were barely able to observe the wet, muddy walls of their prison, and the contents of the pit. scattered about the floor however, were several huge blocks of solid granite, barrels of gunpowder, and many boxes of ammunition and bullets. The blocks of granite may have weighed several hundred o pounds pounds each. When after a few moments more of silence the glandelinian began to creep tward his captives. In the candlelight his face was distorted--- devilish. is eyes rolled with utmost determination. His hair had fallen over his face. He smirked, hediously. As he crept tward them cursing and blaspheming with his arms outstretched, and his fingers clutching violet and her sisters realized for the first time all the frightfulness of the situation. hey were in thevpower of a desperate glandelinian spy indeed, who was bound to force from them information if he had to torture them like the lost souls are tortured. hey knew he meant to torment them unless he recieved the desired information, and if they did not give it he might even kill them in some horrible way. they could expect now help- no rescue whatever now. And those who may miss them first, and that was the christian generals and their father had not yet time to become alarmed, and begin to search. Only a miracle could save them. As the leering figure continued to creep, foot by foot, across the damp floor of their prison the shivering children backed farther and farther into the corner of the pit. Soon they struck the clammy wall. hey could go no farther. ith a sob of despair they clung to each other, and watched the stealthy approach. As the wicked landelinian tormenter passed the candle, his figure became a crouching silhouette. Closer and closer he crawled. Suddenly he gave a curse and leaped.

The little girls scrambled to their feet, and started to run. they had gone but a few f feet when the c a chain about their necks tightened, and all seven of the little girls were thrown violently to the floor. The glandelinian pounced upon them again. Reason now almost gone, the chair seven children ran about in the dark like terrified rabbits. hey were followed by the wicked glandelinian, their chain cutting deeper and deeper into their throats as one dodged this way, and the other that.

The candle then was upset by one of them purposely and guttered out. he trap door, whe which had been propped partly open, was shaken shut with a resounding bang, that shook the ceiling above. he little girls continued to slip about in the darkness, bruising their little bodies on the blocks of gr granite, stumbling and falling, the cruel chain cutting deeper and deeper into their little necks. All the time they could hear the breathing of their tormentor, and feel his fingers, on their arms, their faces, everywhere.

At last the clanking chain tightened on all their throats at once. Thier persue had found it in the darkness. He pulledviolently untillt their heads w r were brought together and the seven little girls fell on top of each other. with difficulty he relighted the candle. hen he dragged his little prisoners to one of the largest blocks of all. An iron staple had been set in the Granite. And on the floor beside the great block of stone was another iron chain. The Glandelinian fumbled in his pocket, and brought out another padlock. He passed the new chain through the staple, ai and then attatched it by padlock to the chain around the necks of the seven little girls. This was of course done in such a manner that violet and her sisters were able to only kneel or lie prostrate. If they did try to rise the chain gouged deeper and more unbearably into their flesh. This finished the grinning glandelini n glandelinian spy took a seat on a near by block, rolled a cigarette, lit it and after taking a few puffs and blowing the smoke into their faces began to giggle. He then finished the cirg cigarette without any words, then hecthrew it awq away stamped it out, and then held up the candle, and looked into their faces.

"You little girls know why I brought you here?" He asked.

violet and her sisters were too weak to answer.

"I'm going to kill you, torture you to death if you refuse to give me any information which I shall ask." He went on. Then paused. "I thought you would be surprised. "He said after a little silence.

"What have we done to you" Cried violet.

"Nothing." Replied the glandelinian spy with an air of abrupt surprise. "hy should you do do anything to me. hy I never saw either one of you before iy in my life. I don't even know your names though my offi officer and comrades onfirmed me you are the daughters of general Robert vivian. But that has nothing to do with it. Somebody must be forced to give us glandelinians the desired information under any risk, and it might just as well be you. If you yeild you will remain prisoners. I will remove the chain from you and take you within the linss. If you refuse to answer my questions you will be sorry. I'm desperate and shall have the information no matter how I obtain it. If I can not force it out of you I will kill you and then enter the christian lines and find it out there. But your information will save me from making that h hazardous trip.''

''We have a father and uncle who is waiting forus---who wondering what has happened to us.''Doclared Violet.''A And you cannot force any information out of us.''

''Splendid indeed.''Exclaimed the glandelinian.''what makes it much the more better for me and the glandelinians. I can just see the many christian dogs and their generals especially your father wondering where you are, and the best part of it is that they will never find out. Never in the world. He won't even know you are dead, or a prisoner whatever it may come out with your decision. They will probably think you got scared of the war and ran away from the army, or beat it back home. Ha. ha. We surely know how to fool you christian dogs alright...''''

The blak hole rocked with his wickedderisive laughter.

''Imagine it indeed''He went on with scornful derision.''All the time your christian friends will be looking for you, you will be right here under the ground buried alive unless you give me the desired information. No one will think of looking here.''

Violet and her sisters did not answer, but by the shine in their eyes the rassal knew they were still defiant and he felt within himself that they were not going to be daunted by anything. But when they pretended to sob hysterically just to see what he would say they did not fail to get him to speak.

''Oh don't feel so bad about it little girls.''Urged the spy.''It's got to be done. It's my duty. The city of vivian wickey and her fortresses are in danfer from the armies under your father, uncle and that concentinian Aronburg. If they get there our rebellion will be lost. Try to be philosophical.''

He leaned forward and strokedviolets hair. She writhed in helpless struggles.

''Think you are too godd for us glandelinians eh!''said the desperate spy. He caught her in his arms brutally and said :

''What is hanson going to do concerning vivian Wickey. Tell me!''He added fiercely his eyes flashing fire. Voice only screamed with rage and like a little wildcat tore his face with her finger nails. Two of the little girls hpsec helped her. But it was useless. With one savage blow he sent them baskwards to the end of the chain probably cowering. When he tried to overpower the littl other little girls with his furious demande demands but without avail.

''Spunky indeed, aren't you?''He said at last releasing the last of the little girls, and wiping his bleeding face.''Well I'm kind of spu k spunky too. If I cannot f rce it out of you , will at any risk enter the christian lines and spy to get the information. Now is that.?''

Several times this terrible scene however was repeated but of no avail and the spy was angered indeed. After a few minutes he groped about the pit, untill he found a pisk and shovel. He returned to the little circle of candlelight, and struck his pick into the wet earth.

''Because you little daredevils refuse to give me the information I demanded I'm digging your graves''He explainl explained angrily and with a deadly nonchalance.

Soverterribly hot was it in that cellar that several of the little girls seemed about to faint and so the glandelinian stopped work, and using some old pail scooped up some dirty water from a deep pudd, puddle on the floor. He then threw it into their faces.

''There's is nothing to be really frightened about.''He said when they had recovered consciousness.''Just because I'm starting to dig your gave does not mean that I am going to kill you. I said that I was at first, but i I did not mean it.''

''You--you're going to let us go!''gasped Angeline.

''Oh no,no,no ''He answered. What I said was that I was not going to kill you. But that is only on one condition. You give me the information I asked of you and you will be save sav safe. Otherwise I will bury you alive. So take your chance. I'm dealing hons honestly and square with you. I would not ast like this but I m desperate. I must find out some way or other or I8ll lose my own life. Just give me the information and I'll take you saftly out of here and bring you to the lines. Does not that cheer you up any?!!''He asked.

Violet and her sisters only looked at him. Confusion, terror, and so on had wiped away the memory of words. But they were not going to give him any information and realising that they still obstinately refused to obey his demand he continued his digging. The sinister six foot hole in the cellar floor deepened now to a foot. Then again he stopped digging and grinned his wicked grin onse more. Of course ''Of course, of course'' He began again''What I would really like to do if I cannot m k make you yeild and give me news would be to wail to seven little goils up alive like they did to Constance de Beverly the Unforun or Unfortunate Heroine of Sir Walter Scotts Marmion. But brisks and mortar or slabs of stones and so on do cost a lot, and then at that it would be impossible to get any of those here, and if they could be obtained it would take a lot of time.''He went along explaining reasonably as one would to a child, the difficulties about some plesant plan.''And that is what I meant to do in the first place if you would refuse to give me the desired information.''He went on after a pause.''I guess if I tti tried I could tear down a part of this wall, and wall you up in it. It would be the best way. But before I brought you here or kid went out to kidnap you I had been looking around very carefully and found that this was not the right place for any work like that. If I started to pull down the wall, the whole building, the fortresses itself might cave in or come down, and the basement would be full of debris and dirt in no time, and we would all smother and I would be then unable to go within the christian lines and get the inform ation from there. So I8ll just have to bury you in the floor unless you give me the information I want. In reality I don't want to do this cruel thing but you see I'm desperate. I said before I must find out no matter how. Can't you see the point. Give in and I promish you before heaven and earth I8ll release you from the chains, and bring you to the lines as my prisoners.''

''But we cannot give you any information about Hansons plans.''said Kettie. ''And that would be murder just as much as though you killed us with your hands and outright. You would be killing us just the same, and it would be worse than killing us outright. You are not a spy. you are a criminal.''

''It is pretty wicked of you to try and persuade me to kill you myself.'' remonstrated the glandelinian spy. But when you make me bury you alive by refusing to informe me about Hansons plans, and the movements of Whilliamsberger Zimmermanns army it will be you who is killing yourself yourselves. Andit wont be me that will be stoping your breath. It will not be the weight of the earth, and no air either. It will be your own foolishness, your own recklessness. You refuse to me me the information I have asked of you and so you are taking your own chances. So when I get this hole dug about to the depth of three or four feet, I'll just bundle you seven little goils into it, and fill it up again as slowly as possible. I will thus show you how desperate a spy is when not only his own life is in sanger if he fails to obtain the nescessary information but also how great my own country is at stake. I am going to find out everything I wish if I have to torture hell itself for it....''

The glandelinian spy then went on digging for a few more minutes, signi singing a song to himself and at times wiping his forehead with an army handkerchief. And then he straightened up.

''That's the part I'm sure I like to think about most..... ''He chuckled.''Th that will be fun to show how desperate I can be when I have to. And I'll bet that after you are in the grave, and I8ll gi get some boards or something to fix fixthem around your seven heads so you can breathe for a while alright so I can prolong the torture, and when youuse that I really mean buisness you will give in alrightand tell me everything I kn wha want to know. I know how children are. They are stubborn o for only a certain length of time, and only yeild when they see they cannot get the best of it. And I know it is the same thing about you seven little goils. You cannot fool me. I know.''

The spy then paused to roll, and light a cigarette, and smoking it w ent on;;;;;

''Then if even I have you already in the grave and you still are too bold to yeild to my commands and threats I'll begin covering you up. That I will take a long time to do just to see if I can force you to yeild. First I 11 throw in a clod upon you, and then I'm sure when you see my meaness you will yeild. If not I8ll throw another in on you seven little goils, and then if the first had no effect I'm sure you will yeild after the second second. Butyou won't I8ll throw in still another, and another, and the longer you continue to be onstinate the worse you wil will feel. Remember that. I want you to understand that you can be as stubborn as you please for all I care, but nevertheless you will be sorry. Sob't be a bit backward in case you determine to yeild. For if you yeild I'll set you free from the chains as I promished and take you to the lines as prisoners of war instead, and only hold you for ransome.''

Violet and her sisters now began to almost realise that prayers, or any kind of pleading, or reasoningwould have a y cany effect upon their torturer. She realised that he was a spy driven desperate by the endangerment of his own life if he failed to obtain any i f information, and so they only crouched and watched him with eyes of fascinated horror as he went on with his slow grave digging. After what seemed to them many thousands of hours, the spy finally straightened up again, and went on talking as if there had been no silent laspe.

''Well?''He demanded. ''Have you watched me at my work. Do you realise what I am doing. Do you yeild now or are you still stubborn. Answer my question. What id the purpose of general Hanson and his officers concerning vivian wickey. what does he intend to do, and which rout is he going to take in his advance on vivian Wickey. How strong are his armies. How many fleets of s warships has he on the rivers in possession of the rivers. And what is the intetions of general Concentinian Aronburg, and why is he going to make a junction with Hanson vivian. And where will general Hanson vivian intend to strike the blowsfirst.?''

''We will not give any information whatever.''Answered the little girls haughtily. ''You can do the most terrible thing, make up the most horrible ideas in your crazy brain and you cannot daunt us. We can only die once.''

''Well do as you please then.''said the spe furiously. ''You are as free as any of us. I know that I cannot force you goils to do anything, but neither can you prevent me from doing as I have planned.I'll keep that up; that is the digging for about a couple of hours, and then into the grave you go. As soon as you are in "Bong"----will go a clod in the form of a brick on you. Then I8ll wait untill you yeild. I ll wait for ten minutes and if you still refuse" Yong--will go another clod upon you. Then again I8ll wait ten minutes. and if you refuse then " ong a third clod. And another, and another, and another and stil another untill you yeild or die for your refusal. I have heard you Angelinians say we Glandelinians are serious, that is dangerous when driven desperate but i us spies are worse than the whole lot. So you remember that clod after clod will be piled upon you" And on each fierce repetition, he pointed downward into the grave, grinning like a diabolical fiend of the infernal region." And if you seven little girls begin to smother too soon, I'll shovel some of the dirt out again, andegive you a trial again. If this is a game you are playing on me to try to see who is the bravest I8ll make up my mind to see how long we can keep it up. Who will be the loser. And I8ll bet it will be you little goils."

Violet and her sisters then leaned ward each other, and go began to pray for strength to resist his intentions. Then the Glandelinian laughed wickedly, defiantly. "Pray away. You little fools. But it will do you no good. You certainly no doubt need all the prayers you can think up, no matter what they are but it is all hocus Pocus. Say I m telling you that if prayers are really any good, I'll tell you right how now that nobody ever needed prayers, more than you seven little goils do right now. Pray to gaten himself. Maybe he will help you out and no one else. Those in heaven I8m sure do not keep their promishes."

The wicked blaspeher p blasphemer stopped his digging, and sat down on one of the concrete blocks regarding them fiercely, and defiantly.

"Anyway I was going too fast with that grave." He explained. "Maybe I8m not fair enough in giving you time to reconsider first. And if you little goils want to enjoy anything right, do it slowly. There's no hurry as long as your friends and their armies are not going to start any marching untill October. And anything else goes for eating, drinking, living or anything else. Remember anyway that the ne xt time you buy another box of ice cream give me some if you are still living. I m very fond of it too. Ha,ha...hat's a good one about the ice cream ain't it?"

Violet andher sisters did not pay any attention to him however, continueing to pray more desperately hoping and faithfully expecting that in some way God would answer them in time as he hadnot failed them in anything they asked of him Him yet.. The Glandelinian spy then arose and rested on his shovel.

"You little goils will never buy any more ice cream unless you yeild to my demands. But maybe if I give you any candy, nice cand y you will yeild I hope. I have plenty up stairs. While you are waiting to reconsider you might as well be enjoying yourselves. And maybe it is long past your supper time now. It must be around twelve or one o-clock to say the least. And think how your father and his generals and the whole christian army may be worrying now. I wonder what your father thinks!!!!"Haha. He laughed again.

He then stood at attention and saluting them, mounted aconcrete block, and slid up the trap door. In a moment he had returned with a double handful of sticky candy, but candy that would even tempt the devil, which he proceeded to force into the mouths of the littlegirls. When they desperately refused to eat it, he smeared some on their faces, dumped the rest into their laps, and finally returned to his grave digging. All that long night he dallied with his work, stopping frequently in his endeavors to force them to yeild to his entreaties, commands, and threatening all sorts of things, but failing. During his work he tood out one clod at a time, and patted it into the shape of large bricks.

"If we cannot wall you up for your stubbornness we an do the next best thing." He explained." These many mud bricks will make it seem real enough. I8ll just lay them in many tiers. I8ll cover your feet first, and wait for you yeild, and this will cost me touse the first toir of bricks. Then if you are still stubborn I8ll cover your ankles, then if w you stil won't give me the information I8ll cover your knees, and so on, and still if you don't yeild I8ll give you a good beaten on your faces. Then if you still refuse when I get up y to your necks, I8ll take my time to see if you will tell me all I want to know. If you are good and despecate and don't yell or scream real loud I8ll keep your faces outside for a couple of days, to give you time to make up your des decision, or untill you lose control of yourselves. But don't try to scream as it will not do you any earthly good as only Glandelinians will hear you and no one else no matter if you yell and scream untill you lose your voices at any rate. You can count on that fact at least. and it's a promish, so remind me if I forget."

He then tookoff his coat and folded it for a pillow. He then stretched out beside the block of granite,and ordering them to go to sl sleep untill the morning closed his eyes, and in a moment he was already snoring. Close beside him lay the pick with which the Glande,i Landelinian spy had been digging the grave to bury them in, if they refused to give him the information. The haft was indeed pointed toward his seven little victims, and was within eas easy reach of Violet alone. Her sisters at once consei conceived a desperate plan. Give me a few

"Violet..you are nearest."Said C atherine. "Grabe the pick while you have the chance.. nd kill him or anything. We must be free no matter how."

So Violet reached cautiously forward, hardly daring to breathe, for fear he would suddenly awaken and see her action. There was a loud tellit attle rattle of her chain and for a moment she hesitated. Then with one hand she held the links so they made s no sound. With the other she reached for the handle of the pick, planning to kill the spy and their tormenter as he slept. Her six sisters watchedher breathless, apprehensive she would fail, or that the spy would be aroused. Violet reached out as far as her chain would let her. Three or four tantalising inches remained between her finger tips and the handle of the pick, but by lying in still anotherposition, she found that the distance could be easily overcome. So Violet slowly rolled over on her back, and for a moment took a look at the sleeping spy. Her fingers finally stretched stretched out again.

They closed around the handle of the pick. Slowly , painfully, while watching him, inch by inch, she pulled the pick tward her. She wisked desperate, Glandelinian spy still appeared to be sleeping. Her sisters sat like stone. In a few minutes more Violet had carefully drawn the weapon near enough to get her hand about the half, and then finally pulled it all the wayto her side. Then joice who was the eldest and able to weild a pick, grabbed it about the haft when-----

The Landelinian suddenly sprang to his feet. He jumped like a cat, nd and uttering An imprecation wrested the pick from joices hands after some slight struggle with her.

"I know one of you little goils would be desperate enough to try that kind of a game." He said with a fierce scowl." That is why I closed my eyes. I was not sleeping at all. That was only a little trick of mine to catch you mapping. So would would try to kill me with the pick would you you little desperate wildcats! Now for that little trick you shall die last, and will witness the deaths of your sisters. But it looks as if we better settle things right now. It is not safe to look around! Give me the information right now for that trick or I8ll dragg you to the grave. Come now. I8ll not give you another chance."

The little girls however again refused and with a most furious look as if to kill a demon he reached for the chain. This time thevlittle girls screamed, and fought him with the last reserve of strength and strove to scratch his face and even tear his o eyes out every ounce of energy they had left went into that desperate cry and struggle. they repeated it wildly again and again, and fought and struggled vehemently, as the n w now infuriated Glandelinian dragged them tward the open grave.

"Well then will you yeild to my entreaties.?!" Demanded thr spy. "If so I8ll not do it. Come now be reasonable. Give in. You have only another few minutes. For the Love of Mike be reasonable."

"No screamed Violet. "We'll give no information."

In the meantime a scouting party of Angelinian soldiers in full dress uniform happened to be riding past the deserted fortresses in the night unseen by the enemy sentries. They heard the screams of little go girls, especially their cries and ordered and the leader ordered the column to halt. Then they listened. the cries and screams of little children were repeated. The officer who was a colonel looked around for the screams and cries. It seemed to him impossible for them to come from the direction of the fortresses, for he knew on account of the great battle just past it had been deserted for weeks. Nevertheless finally real zing that the sounds could come from no where else, he turned his horse and at his command the whole squadron raced around, and started to climb the little hill on which stood the little brick fortress. the noise of the galloping horses, poundi g along the dusty road like roaring thunder, came throuh through the doar of the little fortress, and into the black prison of the seven little girls. The Glandelinian spy heard it and dropped the chain with a curse. He however thought it may be a pa partyof his own comrades who may be coming to investigate the screaming. But at last as the sound of horses came nearer and nearer, he could-tell by the galloping of the horses, and the clanking of scabbards that they were not Glandelinians but the Nationals, a scouting party nevertheless, and he immediately with a curse and a oath leaped out of the pit, and cursing Violet and her sisters roudly and shaking his fist at them slammed the trap down door with a bang that shook the building, and brought some of the ceiling down upon the little girls. Then looking out of the window he saw twenty Angelinians coming and immediately drew his pistols and fired so wildly as to bring six of them down including their colonel who waskilled with a bullet in his head. Two more were then shot bu before the column became demorilized. Then realizing what was on the lieutenant of the small column of what survivied halted the remainder and placing them in a way to surround the house, ordered them to return the fire while he would go to one of the doors batter it down and flank the desperate Glandelinian.

"We must have some stolen children or child slaves." Declared one of the men.'

"Of maybe it is those Vivian Girls we are looking for." Said the lieutenant as he crept forward with sabre and pistol drawn. Seeing that he had n o more ammunition fr for his pistol and as he had no time togo and get some out of one of the rooms the spy went back to the cellar and went up again with the shovel.

As he grabbed the spade he had said to violet and her sisters;

"Your damn screaming has brought a party of Angelinian scouts to see what it wasbut I&ll fool them. And when I get done I&ll make you suffer for your fool yelling."

Then he hid behind the door with his shovel and waited for the lieutenant to approach. The lieutenant immediately rode up to the building, which was being almost riddled at other quarters by the fire of his comrades, and dismounting made for the door. It was locked. Picking up a stone of great weight, he hurled it again and again at the door untill before the continued blows it finally crashed in. Then the lieutenant drew his pistol, and entered the building. As he entered the single room of the little fortress the wicked Glandelinian spy leaped forward with a fierce oath and brought the shovel down with all his might over the lieue lieutenants head. Without a sound the officer dropped to the floor with his skull fractured.

A quick look outside satisfied the Glandelinian spy that the lieutenenat who he had just killedhad been alone, that his followers were at a greater distance away firing at the building and were recieving a response from the four guards. so he opened the trap and jumped down into the cellar after throwing the dead man down.

"Any Angelinian skunks who walk into my way will have to die."said the rebel "ut just how I am going to get the vivian irls to give me the information I tried to force out of them is a problem indeed. I realize now no matter how I threaten, and demonstrate what I will do it does me no good for they will not yeild.I'll have to think up some other way to get the information as I really do not wish to place them in the grave alive. It was only a threat. They were a lot of trouble to me and I was foolish to bring them here. If I had indeed known this I would not have brought them here. I think I&ll go to the christian lines, and leave them here at their leasure. If they escape during my absense I do not care, and if I am back and they are still here I&ll bring them into the lines and tell my superior that they gave me the information and I would be compelled to keep my threat."

He stui studied the d situation a moment while the little girls eyes him defiantly and curiously,, and while they tried to collect their senses.

"Then going to the little girls he said;

"That stubborness of yours is going to put me in bad as I realize you won't yeild no matter what I threatened, and I will not do it either. You are enk enemies of Glandelinia alright, but by God you are spen spunky, and your prayers have been answered, you have won the game on me. The Angelinians have seen or heard your yells and have come here especially that man I killed, and as they are besieging the place If I remain here I'm afraid i' I'll be interrupted again. I'll think I will just take his horse and run my do way down the river and go to the lines. I have to time to release you from the chains, so I&ll leave you here as you are and you can do what you like about it or the christian dogs may come and rescue you. By that time anyway while I&m gone they will be all here anyway and I&m not going to be captured. If I cannot get away I,ll sucide."

With that he climbed out of the trap door, and then looking down at his prisoners said;

"Good bye little heroines. After this for your bravery if I ever happen to come across you again we are friends instead of enemies. My threats were only fakes. God bless you all"And he was off. The seven surprised prisoners heard his receding footsteps across the floor. A moment later they heard a number of fr fresh shots, then heardthe horse start, and recede in the distance. As soon as they were alone they held a frightened conference. Now was their chance. They felt he was true to his promish but they not liking the looks of the guards who had been placed around the house did not trust them. If they came into the cel llar there was no doubt their ends would come. What were they to do. Joice and some h of her sisters tried their chains.

They were too heavy to break without tools. Violet herself looked at the staple staple It was embedded in the granite rock and would not budge before the strength of a hundred strong prize fighters. Joice then dragged herself as far as her chains would allow allow, groping about the muddy wet floor, looking for so e some tool thatwould be their salvation. After some anxious moments during which they spoke in excited whispers and expected every second to hear the heavy step of one or two of the guards on the floor above them, her hand encountered something that indeed felt like iron. She ran her fingers along its length.

It was an old rusty file. Joice uttered a cry of joy and started to work with thevfile at one of the links of the chain. She worked even desperately to bend the link, tormented by the thought that if the file itself should break, and if some of the guard came down and saw her trying to file herself free certain death awaited them all.

Beads of perspiration stood out on her forehead. Slowly the steel link became thinner. A quarter of an inch more. It was not enough. She strained every muc muscle. The chain gave a little more. After an hour of desperate work, the she had filed the iron chain far enough to detatch it from the remaining links. She was free except for the length of chain which remained padlocked about her necks neck.

Violet and her other sisters bg begged her to escape if possible and bring the s l soldiers who were still firing at the place as response continually came from the guards and for some reason or other the Angelinians had not dared to charge the building not knowing how many were in the place. Nevertheless Joice refused to do this he declared she would stay there and set them all free from the chains or untill some of the guards came planning to kill them with the file as soon as the Glandelinians would let themselves through the trap door. In the meantime she hacked away at the chain fastened to her six sisters but nothing would break it. they waited in breathless suspense what seemed hours. Although they did not know it night had come before the seven little girls finally decidedthat the guards were too busily occupied in resist ing the besiegers and would not come near the cellar, and so Joice finally agreed to go to them at any risk, tell the soldiers just how many guards were there, and have them rush the place and rescue them. The trap door was bolted however. ut fortunately there was a large concrete block beneath it, and by standing upon it and using a large piece of wood which was heavy Joice after half an hours desperate work, which exhausted her finally succeeded in forcing the door.

he ran all the way under cover of dark bushes and trees and out of range of the bullets to the besieging christians. She told them all and realizing this the officer in charge of the troop ordered a rush for the place. With a deafening yell the Angelinians swarmed forward and though the guards inside the building brought a man down for every shot, the remainder of the christians finally reached the building forced it and had the guards overpowered in a few minutes. Joice had ran all the way back to the cellar fearing that one of the guards may have gone down there during her an an absense. Her little brave sisters were still there------unharmed.

With the Angelinian soldiers, came some Angelinian military police, and this party of Angelinian cavarymen had been searching for violet and her sisters ever since their disappearan a dpeappearance. as soon as the vivian girls in their fetters were brought like prisoners still into the christian lines, army locksmiths were called, and within three hours work their chains were all filed all. And instead of collasping as soon as their rescue was certain, violet and her sisters only seemed to enjoy it all as an adventure and told general vivian and many other generals the whole experience.

All of the main christian armies, and all of the whole of Galverinia, whether in possession of for or christians alike,even Angelinia and Abbisannia, and indeed within a limit of time the whole world was aroused by the extraoridinary story. Believing that we at least the same spy was within the christian lines by this time striving to find out what he wished to know, posses of soldiers, were immediately orginized throughout the whole encampments by many an officers and the entire region, either within the christian lines or without was searched closely for this most dangerous of spy spies. It was also established throughout army photographs, that the Glandelinian spy was really Colonel Henrt Henry Dargin Saunders a most famious Glandelinian spy-of a, all Glandelinia, recently discharged from a military school of spies in Glandelinia, and the christinn aurthotiei aurtho'aurthoritios of every every city and town in the possession of c christians in Galverinia, and of every town and city of every other Angelinian state soldiers and police and governments aurthorities, were warned to be on the lookout. It was fully determined the spy must be captured at all hazards or otherwise he would frustrate all of Hansons plans and his campaign would meet with terrible disaster.

More than 10,000 rounds of pistol and rifle ammunition was found on the floor of that small two story fortress, with which the spy and his four guards had planned to resist capture by angelinians. Evidence of his desperation was seen in the fact that more than seven hundred pounds of candy, and other valuable materials was hidden in the place which he intended no doubt to bribe his captives into giving him the information, with. Experts examined it for posion but none was found. The candies were s pure and of the most expensive kind.

And while the desperate hunt was at its height saunders walked as usually down many of the company streets of the christian encampments, the day following the rescue of his victims.He was res recognized by some Angelinian soldier, who yelled at him and called for the military police. When the Glandelinian spy began to run he followed him and caught his coat sleeve but the spy knocked him down, shook himself free of other persuers, shot and killed three others, and wounding an officer disappeared before any one could overtake him. He dodged through many company streets while Angelinians persued him in hundreds ran up the back stairs of one of the generals headquarters probably that of general Jason Saundertonia, whom he compelled at the point of a pistol to give up weapons, and papers, and forced the generals housekeeper to cook him a meal. An hour later while still being persued, and still being being searched for he lef left the generals headquarters, and strolled again through many of the company streets untill he came to general Hansons headquarters. He walked up to the guards there and sp-k spoke to him as if he had known him in years, asked for the loan of ten dollars and then went off. It never occured to the guard who loaned him the money that this was the Glandelinian spy, whose picutre was in all the papers, untill he had gone completely out of sight. He finally not being able to obtain the information left the christian lines without ever being found, but nevertheless somewhere the glandelinian spy was still at large, probably possessed of the same grim determination---that he must secure the information if he had to die for it, or kill any one to obtain it. His cool appearance when within the christian lines showed that he had no fear whatever of the christian soldiers, and in every city and town in possession of the christians in Calverini s soldiers and police were searching every house, and barn, for some sign of the desperate spy. Fortunately nearly every officer throughout the country had his photograph andhis discription and t was believed and hoped for that his very boldness would bring about his early capture, unless he went back to his own lines where it would just now be impossible to capture him or know his whereabouts.

This experience however of violet and her sisters and their bravery in repelling the intentions of the desperate spy showed fair and square that indeed they were the gamest little girls of all, and that nothing could daunt them come what may. so if possible let this be a lesson to other glandelinian spies who may be mean enough to kidnap them just for the purpose of firi firing information out of them, the ham what am.

PRT ONE.

Some time after the two battles along the Mc-Hollester Run with general Vivians army as the christian armis had been compelled to halt for a while in their advance for Evangeline Crania and it was thought by general Evans that the only way to open the path to Eva Crania was to besieg beis besiege the enemys city of Jennie Turner in Calverinia and force the enemy there int o a surrender if possible.While the two and other great christian generals were making this plan two Angelinian drummer boys sat near one of the Army canteens.

"This is indeed a beautiful place this portion of Calverinia" Said one of the boys to his companion who was really his cousin and whose name was Ben."Let's take a walk tward our destination before we are missed."

Ben led the way by a roundabout rout and the two boys were soon walking along the beautiful c snow covered plains bounded by trees which were growing in groves. They left behind them the scattered fairy like houses of a small villiage and finally they reached a large lane of oak trees and as the weather was not quite so cold now it already being late in October they appreciated nevertheless a nice hot bonfire which they builded for themselves. There was scarcely any breeze from the west and the clouds thick and very heavy and leaden of color swpt swept across the sky.

Ned who was wishing to continue on his way on account of his fear of an oncoming blizzard storm they did not halt long but as soon as they had reached a thick clump of high bushes all leafless now they suddenly heard voices and footsteps approaching from the direction of the far distant enemy's lines. The new comers soon appeared. One was in the uniform of a Glandelinian captian his handsome curly head covered by the same hat the Omarian captians wear and he had a sabre scabbard by his left side. His companion was dressed- in the prevailing habit of the Mc-Hollestinian section of Glandai Glandelinia----------a long loose jacket of deep gray color which exposed a wide expanse of shirt, a broad and brilliant sash tied around his waist with the ends hanging free, loose trousers of white color with wide buttons sailor s style, but slits up the sides nearly to the knees and caught together with braiding and finally a picturesque looking sombereo hat more like Mexicans wear only of black and red color and the top not so high and covered with a flume of all colors. He wore a fierce looking mustache that scarcely concealed the sarcastic expression of his mouth. The word Evangelist seemed to fit him freely, but was he? They were talking together about something and the two boys listened intently.

"Whew but those Calverinian winters are cold."Said the one appearing to be dressed as a Mexixa Mexican."Let's stay here for a while by this bon fire somebody lit."

The other Glandelinian agreed to this and he sat down on a rock while the one dressed like a Mexican drew out a brace of revolverss and examined them to see if they were loaded.

"You say you are preparing for a trip to Glandelinia, and that on your way you are going tward the island-prisons and that our King as has requested that you capture the Vivian Girls and take them with you, and see that they do not escape this time?"

"You bet I am.If I succeed in this I will be rewarded for bravery, for it will be a dangerous attempt and if I am caught at it I'll be my last minute.You understand of course that a score of men me are coming along with me, and that two other children are going along also?"

"Yes I do."Answered the other Glandelinian who was dressed as a captian."But ain't lieutenant Jensinnia going also with us?"

''Pardon me Capt ian Snakely I forgot to mention him.Yes he is also going.We are to use our strongest force to prevent the christians from rescuesing the little snips. Had we not better?''-------
''Keep this a secret from the men untill the day to go comes?''
''Yes, you are a wise man-------- don't start laughing my dear friend----- I'll admit I'm another though of another class.I'm a man who can't help hating christian children while you-------but no matter I understand you thoroughly. You will give any price to see thosedrated Vivian girls brought to the Glandelinian island prisons where no man can rescue them, and I have bought your services, is it not so?''With a grin and a comical little laugh.
Captian Snakely looked suspiciously at him suspecting that he knew what he was going to do to poor violet and her sistw sisters.
''I bolisve you are cnto my scems.''He said with a smile.
''I suppose I am.''Answered the other.''You are going to make for them all the suffering that is in your power?''
''That's it and all the torture too. First we will go for Manleys main lines, and as for the Angelinians, Abyssinkilians, and Abbisamnians;;---''
F ''Fear not. We shall manage to get a large force of men with us that can face and weather all battles no matter how severs.''Interrupted Captian Snakely.''A nd I have also captured a great ship during the recent battle with the christian dogs and we could go in her though she is a warship.''
''Do you trust the ship on that dangerous river ?''Asked the other Glandelinian.''Suppose she should be stand stranded on an island or blown up by a mine or torpedoed.T You know the river is fully guarded also by Angelinian shore batteries as they say its full ent ire length throughout Calverinia.''
''You know yourself as we ll as I do how dangerous navagiation of any of the Calverinian rivers are now and this is war time you know.''
''Dn pan Dangerous? Good Gracious.What do we care for the mines torpedo boats and others.And she shall not sink. I have hd a had honest carpenters examining her and they could prove that the ship cannot spring a leak and look at all the cannon balls and shells that hit her during one of the recent battles on the River.Not a one had penetrated her sides, not even amark left.''
''Is the ship very large?''
''She is the biggest that ever sailed the seas.I''Chuckled Captian gnakely.''I have been having the builders make several new cabins, and the largest at least and so you will have to trust her or stay off one or the other.''
''You say you are having several new cabins builded on her?''Exclaim ed his assistant in astonishment.''Why you must know you are a cel clever man.But it will cost you a lot of money.''
''I have priv provided against that.You must think me a fool to pay them for making the cabins?''
''How have you provided against that?''
''Why the cabin builders have agreed to make them for nothing, if I allow them to go on the trip.''
''Indeed.Well what did you intend to pay themor allow them to accompany you?''
''Let them take the trip on the river where ever we go, and on the land also.''
''Will they go? I know those cabin builders. They are proud Calverinians and if you help they help your sailors in what ever they do it will be because they have the Glandelinian blood in them.''
''No, I would not trust Calverinians.They are Glandelinians. Ad f As for the cabins I intend to make violet and her sisters take care of them during the trip on the river, and believe me I'll make them work.''
''You are my boo boss of courseand have the right te give them this tremendous pleasure, and the welfare of Governer Vivians beautiful daughters will plead to no more effect than any argument of mine.''
''Their welfare is not only in the beautiful cabins. There are other things in store for them. The cat-o-nine-tails is going to be theirs, and you my friend will make them clean the big guns every day.Also I'll give them all the suffering they want during the trip.I'll makethem so u unhappy that they will never be happy again if I know it. They hve have suffered among us Glandelinians before, but this sudden no new blow will have them in such a grip that nothing whatever will make them hap happy again.''

''You a are a great man,p-p-p-pardon me---------a------ I mean a great enemy of-c-c-c-c-c-c-c-children.''Stammered the other Glandelinian.
''Don't apolize dea dear friend.''Grinned Captian gnakely as he rose t o go.''Let's go to the ship now.''
''Not yet .''Said the other Glandelinian.''The word applies as well t o you as to me---------- birds of a feather but in one way''.
''Say Capt ian''He added''We ought to start i on this trip right away. We could try to force the children to help us in all our scemes even if we have to chock them into submission.''
''I was about to say that you are a real hater of children.''Captian gnakely said.''So am I, but supposing the Angelinians know of the game which will be exciting we will have to be cautious. Also supposing the builds cabin builders know of the game would they not be afriad to join?''Asked gnakelys aid.
''You do not know their nature well enough.They would like to encounter any thrilling adventure that we set out up n upon.''
''You really expect to have them in the game?''
''I not only expect, but know that they would like to do so.''
Then you will perform a miracle But how will the game start?''
''I shall be commander of the ship in the disguise of an Abbisannian, and once I have the vivian girls in my power I'll make their lives the price of their fathers consent to withdraw his armies out of Calverinia, to abandon the seige of Norma Catherine and Julo Callio and let the child slaves retain their suffering without interruption from those dirty christian dogs, and make them die afterwards anyway.''
''If this really comes true are you sure he would make the sacrifice to save them, and not have us pursued as I fear will happen?''
''What a wise head for a fellow rascal-----pardon me you have. That is true they might persue instead. It is necessary to think of anything.''
There was a few mi moments of silences and then Captian Snakely said;
''I'll even make the vivian girls do as I say.''
''Do as you say?''Gasped the Glandelinian.''What mean you?''
''I'll make them yeild to every sin, and go to the Angelinian aurthoritis aurthoritios and arrange for the arrest of all Calverinian christian suspec suspects under the point of a gun.''
''Hw Have you thought of all that?''Gap Gasped the Glandelinian.''Why those little snips would not sin, even if you stripped them naked and cut out their vitials while yet alive.I knowthose little girls too well to be decieved.'' Captian Snakely grinned as he took off his hat.'
''Have I not said that I have thought of everything.''He said carelessly regarding the overcast sky.''In the game in which I am to play I will do anything possible to make them sin.''
''In the game in which I am to play how will you provide against the persuit that will happen?''Asked gnakelys companion.
''By giving the Angelinians no opportunity to do it.''
''How will you prevent them?They are not common men I can tell you but probably more powerful than us. And how are you going to get the little girls?''
''I have made arrangements for carrying them aboard my vessel toni ght. It is then when no one will see us.''
''You a are clever---ahem.''Cried his companion regarding him with great admiratio n.''Upon my word Captian gnakely you have m the cleverest head than the lot of us. Come we will go on as I fear a blizzard storm is approaching.''
So the two rascally Glandelinians passed out of sight of the two boys leaving them flushed with excitement over what they had heard.
''Goodness what a pai r of scoundrels.''Exclaimed one of the boys.''But we can go right at once and tell these little girls of thd their danger. This will be a fine excuse for ourselves to be introduced to those lit tle girls.When we have told them all we can, we will be befriended by them.It's lucky we came up here.''
''Very fortunate indeed.Ben Logan.We shall certainly call at general Vivians headquarters at once and expose this plot also to the generals.''
''The man who looked like a Glandelinian captian said he had stolen a vessel of some kind.He must be the skipper of it, and if he really succeeded in carrying off the little girls abr aboard and keep the respectable children there against their wills, not to speak of kidnapping the little girls and torturing them all the way to the island prison, this action will surely upset the whole Angelinian nation. His crew must be black hearted devils like himself perhaps. He may in secret be one of those Glandelinian raider chiefs. There are not supposed to be raiders in these days of war especially on land as the game is altogether too risky even for the money that is in it. However this Captian Snakeley would make a very fine raider chief h if he dares to embark in the buisness.Hehas all the qualificaions for the trade.''

''I believe it is true.''Said Ben.

''He looks it.''Maybe he and his companions do a littleon the sly. He would not have swe swiped a vessel unless he used it for some purpose. He probably carries stolen frieght up and down the Mc-Hollester Run Ri ver and uses that for a cover for any kind of rascally he chooses to indulge in.Well come on.We will go on to general Vivians selected headquarters where the little Vivian Girls are.''

They soon crossed a line of tents and a railroad and soon came into an open space within the christian lines and saw the opening of the grove of trees before them. Ned marched boldly up to it with Ben at his side passed through a snow covered garden seeing a man sweep some of the l loose snow off the sidewalk the snow piled three fe& feet high on either side. He looked up and favored them with a respectable salutation, the two boys returning it as they passed on. A very prett y Calverinian maid was playing with a handsome looking dog close to the stairway leading to the main entrance. He was the largest dog they had ever seen being four two fest tall and four feet long. Though having a pleading look in its face the dog was not as gent le as it looked to strangers and at first favored the boys with disdain, nd the and the maid had all she could do to restrain him from flying at them. The monster looked like a great Dane. As they came up the maid regarded the boys with considerable surprise. Ned asked for Violet and her sisters.

''The little girls have visitors sir. If you will wait here I will tell the them you two wish to see them.Will you please give me your names?''

''My name is Ned Perkins. I am a Mormonuism.I wish to see the little girls on buisness of the greatest importance and will wait untill their visitors leave.My companions name is Ben Logan. A Calverinian like yourself.''

The maid disappeared up the steps and while she was gone Ned and Ben tried to make friends with the great Dane and succeeded pretty well. In a few minutes the girl returned.

''Violet and her sisters will be at liberty in a short time.Ifthe litt young men will wait inside the reception room they will be pleased to grant them a short interview.''Said the girl as it now began to snow.

''I'll wait.''Replied Ned.''My friend thinks you are a prett y girl and he told me so.''

T he maid smiled and cast a goo-goo glance at Ben as she bid them both t o take to the reception roon room and get out of the snow which they did. Ben Logan raised his hat and bowed. The maid gave him another fascinating look and said something in a whisper. At that moment

Captian Snakely [illegible] only

general Kindernine made his appearance followed by one of his staff officers. Sr.Kindernine looked keenly at the two boys as they saluted, and answering he passed out and took his way to his hors his companion hardly looking at the two boys. The main rushed in to the hall and was gone some little time when she returned. Then she told Ned and Ben to follow her.They were led through the main hall and here in a parlor they found the blue eyes eyed beauties waiting to recieve them. Violet and her sisters wavered Ned and Ben with sweeping glances from their glorious eyes that a almost made the boys forget the nature of their errand. There were manisfest reserves in their attidude and a slight hauteur in the bow they gave the boys as if they suspected their visit a nervy attempt on their part to make their acquaintance. Although fav orably dis posed tward the two boys Violet and her sisters though children and a loving disposition, and very sainl saintly in character, and despite their age were prepared to let the boys understand that Angelinian eitquette did not permit of impromptu introductions.

''Little angels you will pardon this intrusion.''Said Ned with a bow.''But we have a very important communication for your pure ears.''

''Indeed Ned perkins.''Replied one of the little girls who was Violet.

Waving her arms she indicated the two boys t ward seats, and were clearly surprised by the boys command of the Angelinian language.

''Are you not a Mormomuain?''She asked.

''I am miss, but I have joined the Angelinian army at Jennie-Town and I can not only talk my own language, and yours but many others as well.''

''You certainly speak it exceedingly well.''She answered in a more friendly way.''But may I ask what this important communication is?''

Ned could see that she and her sisters doubted its importance thinking probably that they came for some other reason and answered;

''It has direct connections with Captian Snakley.''

''Ah ''Exclaimed Violet in a tone of surprise accompanied by a frown;''I was not aware that you knew Captian Snakeley.''

''I don't know him little gir, and I don't wat to. know him. He is a scoundrel, and it is to warn you and your sisters against him that brought me here.''Replied Ned earnestly.

''Warn us Ned? What do you mean?''

''Will you permit me to tell you what I overheard ben between him and his companion a man named Brono?''

Violet bowed, her sistes having a disr disturbed look. Ned then proceeded to tell Violet and her sisters how he and his friend Ben Logan had taken the Liberty of intruding themselves on their premises to look around. as they we were strangers at that portion of the immense christian camp. Then he went on to tell how they had taken shelter in a certain spot which he described and indicated, and how while there the two Glandelinians had come along and stopped within earshot of them. As near as he could remember he repeated the cov conversation which had taken place between the villains.

Violet interrupted him.

''What my uncle has lost one of hi s great warships on account of this man,-----impossible?''

There was a flash of indignant denial in the eyes of the little girls as Violé spoke.

''You are right little girls. The letters showing that he did, and which Captian Snakeley had in his possession were forged by his second mate called Donald Hansen as is the alleged assignment of the ship by your uncle.''Said Ben Logan.

''The rascal.''Cried Violet.''Then this is what he meant in his insult ing note conveyed to be by a Glandelinian prisoner captured when he wrote us he would do all in his power to ruin the armi es of my father, uncle and friends unless we do-----''

Violet stopped in sudden confusion as if aware she was saying too much.

''Ned I expect general Vivian or Hanson here at any moment. You will repeá repeat to them what you have just told me, will you not?''

''I should be glad to but I fear these great generals will not come soon.''

''Not come soon.''Exclaimed Violet in a startled way.''Why not?''

''Because-------pardon me for giving you a shock-----I heard Captian Snakeley say that he had by means of a false alarm caused your father and uncle to go to the extreme right of the christian line and while away have captured some of his best serving generals though he did not say it in a way for some to understand him for fear some one might be listening to their conversation.But I understood him I heard of it on the way to the christian lines and that they now holds them prisoners aboard the vessel.''

Violé and her sisters sprang to their feet with a startled cry and a look of fear and distress shown in their eyes.

''Oh boys you do not, cannot mean it?''Cried Violet.

''I'm afraid it is too true for that rascal looks capable of any kind of villiany. At any rate he declared the fact to his mate, but in Glandelininn.''

''Is that so?''Gasped Violet. The faces of her sisters grew white.

''What shall we do y to save them?''Asked Joice.

''Gwet the Ange Ange/inian soldiers to intefere.''Answered Ben.

''You have told me the truth?''Cried Violet starting forward and seizing him by the hand.

''On my word of honor little girl.Do you doubt me?''

''No, no, and yet this news is so88-------of heavens if my friends are in the power of that man we shall be forced to-----Violet covered her face with her hands while three of her youngest sisters were beginning t o weep, while Jackie ,Catherine, and Daisy seemed unconcerned.

''Don't gi ve way to grief like that little girls but take action to secure the escape of your friends.Theaurthirities of Calverinia will surely help you out.''

''Yes we will. We we will go to general Kindernines headqya headquarterd and seek the help of thousands of soldiss soldiers.But you must come with us to tăl tell all you know.''

''I'm surely at your services little girl. But as yet I have not told you all.''

''Ah there is some more?''Cried violet breathlessly.
''Yes but it concerns you seven little girls.''
''Us seven?''
''Yes Captian gnakely told Donald Hanson that he intended to force you little girls t o sin?.''
''Never.''Flashed the brave little girl.''Never will we become wicked or commit any sin.''
''He said he will make your father or uncle pay the price with your lives if they refused to withdraw their christian armies out of calverinia and make the other armies a abandon the seige of Norma and julo Caolio.''
U''What he said that?''Cried the almost frantic little girl.
''He di d, and furthermore to prevent you little girls from blocking his plans he intends capturing you seven to night and carry you abaord his stolen vessel.''
The little girls clasped their hands in terror.
''This he would probably have carried out but for the fortunate fact that his rascally intentions was discovered by us two.''Said Ben.''We have thus been able to warn you of your own danger as well as the unfortunate position of thosecaptured.''
''Oh Ned and Ben how shall we ever thank you.You are a brane Mormonian and so is your co companion brave.Ned dear you have earned our gratit ude and that ou of-our parents and friends. We will got ready at once and while seeing Kindernine about it I'll wire Gertrude Angeline to notify the Calverinian government and aurthorities.I will take two trusty squadrons of cavarly with us as we will have to leave this camp to reach Kindernines.I shall also order refreshments for you and your friend while we are preparing. Make yourselves at home. This is our present headquarters and you are welcome to our hospitality.'' Violet seized both of Neds hands impulsively and carried them to her lips. Then she called the maid and gave her hurried orders. After that they withdrew to get ready to go on the tru trip in the now pouring snow. Inside of a minute a servant soldier entered with fruit and sweet cake and the maid accompanied the servant with a flagon of sweet pure wine and glasses.
''Help yourself.Ben Hogan.Don't be bashful.''Said Ned. when they were alone.
''Don't say a word Ned.It is I who will do just ice to this feast.''
They ate with a appite for the fruit was of a fine variety, and the cakes extremely palata palatable.
''Ah it's a sweet tooth I have.''Said Ben as he munched the cake.''And it would be a pity to let any of this go to waste.''
''No fear of that the way you are getting away with them.''Laughed Ned. Bf Before Ben could reply Violet and her sisters with two soldiers entered the room while more soldiers appeared as if by magic from an opposite door. It was quite probable that the maid who also appeared was standing behind some portie res watching the boys with amusement.
''Come.''Said Violet to the boys.''The horses and attendants are waiting outside.I''I
'''It is necessary that we lose no time.''Said Jennie.
''We are ready to accompany you little girls.''He replied.
The party filed out into the porch and decended the snow covered steps and after leaving the camp some distance behind went into the open space between a ruined building and a snow packed garden. Half a dozen horses were standing there in the charge of several soldiers. Not far away stood the two squadrons of christian cavarly. T he party mou nted and started down the broad road tward an opening in the tall trees scarcely visi vi visible in the thick haze the falling snow was making. They had almost reached it when suddenly their way was blocked by a good number of rough looking Glandelinians led by Captian Snakeley.
''Ha.''The rascal exclaimed with a look of surprise.''Whither bound Vivian Girls?''
''That is a matter that need not concern you Captian Snakely.''Replied the child coldly.
''But it does concern me.''Replied the Glandelinian officer very brusquely.
''What do you mean?''Said violet.With a shade of fear in her tones.''Why have you intruded here within the very christian lines with those rough looking robbers.You are intruding as spies.''
''Because I am a here to take you to my warship.''
''Your warship?Are you mad that you talk thay that way?''

''We have tried to take your friends on board our ships but one of those old dogs known as Hanson Starring had proved to be a regular Sampson and we could not succeed.But we have a little buisness t o transact and the presence of you seven little girls is necessary to giveweight to it.''
Poor violet and her sisters gi ve gave Ned and Ben a quick appealing look as if they wished the boys to help them in this this ermenginey. The two boys saw the look and if they needed a spur to stand up for the lovely Angelinian children that glance would have been enough to fire the soul of both boys in their cause. The boys were no l older than eighteen, but still they were not cowards and wore good fighters as well. They weresurprised to see how quickly the two squadrons of Angelinians had been captured by the suddenly appearing foe. Captian Snakeley saw the look the seven little girls cast at the two boys and he curled his lip as he said impatiently and advanced tward violets horse;
''Come little girls we are waisting time.''
''We will not go with a vil, villain like you and I want nothing to do with you. You have tried to make prisoners out of our friends to suit your base purposes and you have not succeeded because Hanson starring was too strong for you. No, no heaven has warned us in time, and disclosed the plot you have woven to force us to committ sin.You are worse than any villain.If you take us you will have to fight hard first.''Cried the poor little girl excitedly.
''Ha, what mean you violet vivian.Who has been fil ling your ears and those of your sisters wi th lies against me?''Exclaimed the Glandelinian captian. He was clearly taken aback by her words and he flashed a fierce suspicious glance at the two boys.
''It is the truth I have learned Captian Snakeley. Your own words confirm a part when you say you tried to make our best friends prisoners & aboard your vessel.You tried to capture them on their way to the christian lines from a scouting tour and suffered for it because you did not know Hanson Starrings strength.General Kindernine——''
''Ha I see the purpose of this calavacade.''Cried the Glandelinian captian savagely.''You are bound for general Kindernine to take action against me.It is fortunate I came in time to head you off.We will put an end to this.I shall take you seven little girls at once to my ship Violet, where I trust we shall arrange everything amically.''
''You will do nothing of the kind captian gnakeley.''Said Ned who had dismounted, i nterposing between the rascal and his peizes.'
''Gracious who are you little puppy?''Cried the Glandelinian Captian angrily.
''I am a Mormonian and I throw the protection of the Mormonian and Angli Angelinian flag around violet and her sisters.Touch them at your peril.''Answered Ned resolutely.
The little girls flashed a look of gratitude at the brave boy.He had despite his size become a young hero——like the heroes she had always seen during the Child Slave rebellio n.How brave and handsome he looked as he faxed their enemy. Such were violets thoughts, and her breast heaved with excitement.
''A Mormonian eh!''Sneered the scoundrel.''A puppy bah. I care nothing for you or both flags.Stand aside or——''
''Or what!''Cried Ned looking him full in the face.
There is a power in the human eye when backed by an indomitable spirit and that power made itself felt on the Glandelinian captian, though he was no coward either. Captian gnakeley folded his arms nd and flashed a fierce look on Ned Perkins.
''Boy you are either a fool or mad, to dare to attempt to balk me.I could crush you with a blow. You are nothing to me, so therefore stand aside.I have no quarrel with you though you wear the damned Angelinian uniform, but by heaven if you continue in your interference you shall regret it by all means.''
''I know you to be a scoundrel captian Snakeley, and I am not afraid of you, and I shall defend these seven little girls with my life if need be.''
''What is these little girls t o you?''
''What is that to you?It's enough to me to know that they look to me for help in this emergency. No true Mormonian, or Angelinian would shirk such an appeal from such dear children.''
''Bah you talk like you were on the stage in a farve farce comedy. I will teach you a rascals lesson you dirty christian snubber. Here Crama Cramba, Brono, seize that young braggard, and take him aboard my vessel. He shall be truced up and treated to two hundred and fourty lashes that he may learn to behave himself.''Ordered the Glandelinian Captian.

Paying no furt her attention to the boy Capt ian Snakeley advanced to grab the bridal of Violet's mul horse.Realizing that matters had come to a climax Ned stepped back, and smashed the Glandelinian Captian in the jaw with all his power, felling him to the ground.

"Retreat back to the christian lines ad raise the alarm."He said. "I will hold them off with the aid of my companion, and you can send help to me."

He called Ben who had dismounted the moment he saw that trouble threatened his friend. When Ned felled Captian Snk Snakeley to the ground six of the eight hundred Glandelinians uttered cries of rage and consternation and drawing their bayonets attatched them to their muskets and began to advance while the Glandelinian captian rose to the ground white with fury.

"Cut the puppy down."He roared drawing his sabre.

T he two boys would surely have been sacrificed but for the intrepidity of Violet and her sisters who urged their horses in between them, and the threataing array of steel.

"You shall not harm him Captian Snk Snakeley."Cried Violet."He is a brave boy and I will not have him touch touched."

"He shall die."Hissed the Glandelinian captian."He struck me Bruno Snakeley. Shall I put up with a blow! No."

Violet reached forward and caught his uplifted arm with one hand while from some hidden recess in her gown she flashed a gleaming stilett o.

"Order your men back or I'll bury this in your neck."She cried with flashing eyes. At that moment three score of Angelinian soldiers having seen the occurance even from their own lines so far away came rushing on the scene to defend the little girls.Snakeley uttered an ugly laugh and with his left hand he grabbed Violets wrist, and then tore his other arm free.

"I have you now Violet Vivian."

Violet struggled and utt ered a scream, while Ned flung himself on the rascal and tried to push him away. Wi th a fierce impreacaution Snakeley attempted a downward sweep of his sabre, but Ben Logan was on the spot and caught the rascals wrist with both hands wrenching away & at it so that the weapon fell ringing to the ground.The Glandelinian captian uttered a string of commands to his soldiers, ad and thy rushed in upon the advancing Angelinians and a desperate fight ensued between the two forces. Both parties had their hands full w while matters were go growing exceedingly awkard awkard awkward for the rascally Glandelinian captian noy disarmed and assaulted by both boys.He was a powerful ruffian though as well as an active one, and he was very dangerous when aroused. Flinging Ned and Ben logan from him he seized Violet again and dragged her from her animal as if she were but a feary feather. Ben snatched up the Glandelinian captians sabre and followed Ned in a fresh attack upon the villain as he was backing tward the opening in the wall of trees. Finding himself in a desperate situation, Captian Snakeley shouted to his men to close around him and hold off the boys.They tried to obey orders though fiercely beset by the Angelinians but could accomplish as the two squadrons of Angelinins had also turned on them but at that moment another officer and more Glandelinians appeared at the entrance. He was a swarthy looking scoundrel of large built. He took in the situatin situation at a glance and sprang forward uttering commands to the Glandelinians who had accompanied him.

"Ha Donald Hanson."Cried Snakeley."You are just in time.Secure those boys and see that they are carried aboard my ship.Hurry before the Angelinians overwhelm us. By all that is holy or unholy they shall pay for all this trouble they have given me."

Donald Hanson was the rascals chief officer on his captured vessel, and a fierce bloodthirsrt ruffian. He was a host in himself and his very appearance took the cowed feelings out of the defeated Glandelinians and they tri ed to rally but in vain.But Ned and Ben were caught one in each hand by Donald Hanson and swung away from Captian Snakeley, leaving that rascal free with Violet Vivian in his arms. The poor little girl was powerless in his grasp.Her screams as he carried her to the clump of trees where he had his horse in readiness to bear her off made Ned wild with rage, but neiher her or Ben Logan could do a thing more in her behalf. Backed up as he was by the other Glandelinians sixty of which were wounded and eighteen killed and all the more dangerous on that account the Angelinians nevertheless were able to worst them and the Glandelinians broke and scattered over the region. Donald Hanson seeming to understand what was expected of him, called a halt in the retrest retreat, and then rallying the men gave some more resistanceand then led an orderly retreat to the main road six of the men carrying Violet 'svsistws with him.them. The two boys had been bound with scarfs, and Violet and her sisters with handkerchiefs. Captain Snakeley ordered a roundabout retreat to the little cove where he had a long boat in waiting on the edge of the big river left in charge of a single soldier. Ned and Ben were pushed along without regard to their feelings, while Violet and her sisters were carried carried helpless burdens on seven mules. The paty avoided contact with all distant tents and scattered houses close to the christian line within their view having outdistanced their persuers in the blinding medium of snow now falling and they soon reached the watsch waterside. The prisoners were handed into the boat, the litt le girls and the two boys roughly, and the crew taking their o oars shoved off and headed for a long Abbisannian warship, the soldiers on shore cheering them and wishing them safty on their trip. The boys were not in a position to hold commun ication with each othe other, as a couple of th the fiercest looking Glandelinians sat between them, so they had to grin and bear their hard luck as best as they could.And my wasn't it getting windy. The boat propelled by the sturdy rowers rapidly approached the immense ship which was anchored only a mile off the river shore, . A s the boy boys faced the stern of the boat they could catch a glimpse now and then of poor Violet and her sisters where they sat together beside a seat occupied by Captian Snakeley who was steering. It mad Ned and Ben almost desperate to see how unhappy they looked and to realize they were in the power of a unscrupulous rascal, who had shown his hand for Glandelinia at last and struck Angelinia a telling blow without ever caus ing a general battle with the christian armies. This made Ned feel like killing him. If he and Ben had failed to save the seven little girls even with the help of the Angelinian soldiers who had rushed from the camp to their rescue and who had ever even persued to the waters edge from a part of the scoundrels force of cutthroats, and within the very christian lines as it were, it did not seem probable that it would be pos possible to do anything for them on board the captured ship where Captian Snakeley hd had full power. But throughout the war as we shall see , those who persecuted the Holy Vivian Girls persecured God and had no luck whatevs, while those no matter who they were Glandelinians or not who befriended the Vivian Girls were as if they did the same to God and had more luck than the richest man has coins in his possession.

To Ned it seemed probable that he at least would be severely dealt with for his plucky defense of the little girls, and also for strik ing down the Glandelinian officer. The ruffian might even put him to death, in order to get full satisfaction. However Ned waisted little of his thoughts on himself.He was far more interested in the fate of Violet and her sisters.That they might be compelled to be Glandelinians was abhorrent to him. His reflections were soon brought to an end by the boat reaching the ship.

"Up with you."Cris Cried Donald Hanson glaring at the two boys as if he was a wolf gloating over his intended feat feast.

They were assisted aboard by a shove from a soldier, while Donald Hanson was on deck as quick as they. He had evidently recieved his instructions in respect to them, for grabbing the boys each by the arm he forced them over to an open hatchway, and ordered them to jump down. As they were slow about taking the leap, and also being gagged, and taking a leap in the dark void at that, and not knowing what they might fetch up against, he uttered an imprecation and tumbled them in bodily not seeming to care whether they broke their necks or not. They fell about nearly thir thirty feet and landed on a bunch of soft sailcloth which broke their fall.They lay there for three minutes without moving as they we were badly shaken up. Then they sat up but could not talk as they were gagged. But the boys managed to release themselves from the scarfs with which their arms had been bound, but for all that their prospects were not much improved.

"Are you hury hurt Ben Logan?"He asked his companion.

"My neck is twisted a bit."He answered.

Then they sat t ogether silently wondsing how rough a deal they were up against.They knew that Captian Snakeley had a trough gang around him, and if they were not really Glandelinian demons come up from hell they surely had the manner and features like them, and also they looked like regular cutthroats. Both boys were likely to fare pretty bad. At any rate Ned was, for that villain Snakeley had it in for him for that blow Ned gave him. A lready the anchor was drawn up and the ship prepared for a trip.

It seemed that Ned would be among the angels in another day for the ruffians might put them out of the way at any time. It was hard to tell what the crew would do if the captian once decided that dead boys tell no tales. Though there had been the worse kind of pirates known the Glandelinian captian seemed to be as villainious a man as if ever could walk a pirates deck, and being one of the horrible Glandelinians he was not to be trusted at all.There was no way for the two boys to clambor out of the hold so all they could do was to stay where they were and trust to the mercy of God. They heard the wicked sailors hoi se hoist up the sails which they had disguised the ship with then the engines were running and the motion of the vessel soon told them that the ship was under way. It grew dark rapidly and soon they could see nothing but the patch of cloud covered sky framed in the open hatch through which the snow seemed to be pouring like smoke from a fire, and whew it certainly was starting to get cold. Time passsed and no one came near them.The crew had their supper, and some of them turned in, but not the slightest attention was paid to the two prisoners in the hold. Thewind though gert getting cold was very high it usually being fierce and like a hurricane gale during a blizzard, and the ship made good progress through the waters of the Mc-Pollester Run River which was very rough and full of floating i ce now, and the ship which was a fast dreadnaught steamed on the Glandelinians having used the sails to disguise i t from the sight of those occupying the shore which on both sides was reported to be lined with shore batteries of the Angelinians. The two boys had no idea at all in which direction they were going but she was headed northwa northwest. A small villiage called Calverine Anchi Anchutze was passed, the dreadnaught rounded the island of Erebus and then headed well out into the river plunging through the immenserolling swells. They late lunch the boys had enjoyed at the headquarters of general Vivian pre vented them from feeling hungry and that was a blessing for they were to get nothing that night . Long before nine o-clock that night despi te the increasing cold the s two boys soon went into the land of drew dreams and they sa slept without int erruption untill they were aroused by somebody shaking them roughly by the shoulder.

"Wake up, and follow me on deck, and do not say a word."Cried a voice and opening their eyes they beheld the villianous looking Donald Hanson glaring down at them. He started up a rope ladder which had been let down into the hold. Donald Hanson awaited their coming and marched them forward through the deep snow on the ded decks to the cookhouse or gally around which the crew one thousand one hundred and fourty of them were squattered eating their breakfast seeming not to mind the snowstorm at all which was still raging. The moment the boys reached the snow covered decks they saw to their surprise that they were almost out of sight of land. Donald Hanson brought them to the gally door and ordered the cook to serve them out of the same provender that the sailors and marines had. The crew of the ship was exceedingly well fed however and the fare was more than the lads expected from the Glandelinians. However the two boys did not eat the good food in a hearty manner but managed to take the edge off their g hunger. They were then marched aft where Captian Snakely was pacing up and down neatnear the wheel. He was in a pretty good humer humor for things seemed to be coming his way, but however a deadly scowl settled over his face when the two boys were brought before him. The scowl l grew darker when he looked at Ned perkins. He did remember the blow the boy had given him, and being a wicked man that he was the blow was something that he would not forgive. He had already decided to put the boy to a cruel death though he had not decided on on the fate of his companion Ben Logan.

Hs asked the boys questions but they would not answer despite the threats of the Glandelinian Captian of hanging them to the end of th gaff. But Captin Snakely was bound at any cost to make them answer the que questions and he cried fiercely;

"Answer my questions or I'll swear that I'll kill Violet ad her sisters before your very eyes."What brought you to the headquarters of general Vivian especially t o interview the Vivian Girls yesterday afternoon?"

"Our buisness there need not concern you."Captian Snakely.

"Answer me or I'll carry out my oath."Cried Snakely.

"Well then if you want to know the truth I went there to warn Violet and her sisters against you."Replied Ned cooly.

"Warn Violet and her sisters agdnst me.What do you know about me."

"Enough to prove that you are more than a rascall."

"Indeed."Sneered the Glandelinian "You will tell me what you told them.?"

"I decline at any peril you mention to satisfy your curiousity."

"Decline to satisfy my curiousity. Do you not see that your life is in my hn hands.I am now the captian of this ship

I am now the captian of this ship which I took from general Hanson Vivians camp. I can order you to be strung up at the end of the g aff and my men will obey."

"I can die but once, and I have no doubt you have the power to execute your threa threat, but I do not fear you for all that."

Snakeley seemed a bit disconcerted by the boys coolness.He saw that the lad was really brave and not to be entimidated.He was anxious to find out if Ned Perkins had given Violet and her sisters the information about the attempted capture of their parents and relations.The men who were with Hanson Starring we were prisoners but to get Hanson Starring or his brother had been out of the question for him for Hanson Starring had disabled ove over thirty of his Glandelinians who were now in a Glandelinian hospital. If Ned has, he wanted to know how he came in possession of the fact, as Hanson Starring and his scouting party had been assaulted on a lonely road with a few cavarly men and an orderlie. Hanson Starring and his brother had proved too much for the Glandelinians and Snakely himself, but nevertheless the Glandelinian captian could not underts understand how this boy or any outsider had learned about it. Men of his stamp when confronted with a problem of that kind always suspects a traitor in camp.Captian Snakeley feared that one of his men had gone back on him, ad if that were the case it was necessary to discover-the fellow, so he could make an example of b him before the crew. The Glandelinian Captian intended to put both boys ad even all the other prisoners, i ncluding Violet and her sisters to their death, as their knowledge of his character and actions rendered them dangerous to him and the whole Glandelinian cause. He was also aware that he and the ship which was fully armed now were already under greve suspicion and that the aurthorities of all towns along the shore of the river on both sides were anxious to get hold of the evidence that would warrent his arr arrest, and total destruction. He had already narrowly escaped two Abbisanmian warships, and torpedoes, and even mines, the shore batteries had fired upon him once, and eva even now a line of warships were reported in persuit of him. If the boys and all the other prisoners were allowed to go after what the had witnessed and experienced they would be able to make a lot of trouble for him and his whole crew. It behooved him therefore to put them to death.There were many ways of which hecould get rid of them, and he had not decided which way he would adopt. First he must learn what this plucky boy had told the Vivian Girls, and how he had come by the information.

"Are you tired of life?"He asked Ned with a black frown.

"Then why take chances with me?"

The boy did not a answer and the man continued;

"I wish to know what you told the seven little girls and how you came by the information. Tell me without reserve and I promish your life, which I intended to take for the blow you gave me."

"What does your promish amount t o?"

Therascally Glandelinian skipper bit his lip ,for in his heart he knew he did not intend to keep his word, desiring revenge for the blow.

"You fear to trust me eh?"

"Well you are not a man that invites confidence."

"I swear by all the saints and the Holy Ones not to harm you if you speak. Refuse and I will kill Violet and her sisters before your very eyes."

"You have very little respect for the Saints and God himself, to judge from your actions."

"You do not know me Ned Perkins. If I promish you your life I will keep my word.U I am not fooling you boy...."

Ned saw tha the rascally Glandelinian was very anxious to learn certain facts and he baisved he would be safer if he would keep them to himself.

It was a sensible resolution, for Captian Snakeley would have no further use for him once he had learned what the boy knew. Accordingly he refused to make any disclosure.

"Take them away and tie them up in the hold, and leave a man down there to see that they do not speak to each other."Ordered the disappointed and angry Glandelinian skipper.....

Donald Hanson grabbed them each by the arm and led them back to the hatch way. He told them to decend by the rope ladder anf hury up at that.

Knowing that if they did not obey they would be t ossed down, they decended as fast as they knew how, while Donald Hanson and a nu number of the crew followed them down with some rope. The boys were t ied to posts facing aeach other. The ship was bound for some large river on the island, several miles aross from the eastern Calverinians shore. There were three larg large volcaic ilslands near this one and several smaller ones also being volcanic.

Captian had gnakeley decided to establish his headquarters here for a day where he felt safe fran observation and interfern ce from the christian persuers. The small island he had decided to take possession of was for the most part rocky ad and no one lived there. A big cavern opened on the sea o on the sea like river on the western si de, and this conneted with several smaller ones where the sun never penetrated. They slipped down into the r c rocky backbone of the island ad some of them were di rectly below the level of the ri ver. When the two boys had been taken back to the hold the ship had already covered half the distance and was half way near the island. The way the river looked any one would have thought that agreater part of the snow storm was coming. It was rough enough to make the great ship roll ad plunge violently. Ned was thinking to himself of the bravery of Violè and her sisters and of Violet especially. He remembered thà she had saved the lives of himself and his co companion and gnakeleys rascally men when they first advanced on them with fixed bayonets. Snakeley would never be able to force violet and her sisters to becane Glandelinians or side with the cause if he had to take his chances with them alone, but it was evident he realized the fact, for he had attempted the capture of their br best friends and others, had tricked the two main generals by causing them to recieve false reports, which he believed could have been used to sway their decision, but had he really succeeded then, he could not have forced the to sin for they were children who were willing to sacrifice anything than lose their souls. What a scoundrel he indeed was.!

But also he wasnot the man to take all the trouble of leaving the two boys like a pair of Robse$_{n}$obertson Crusoes on one of the islands to get them out of the way. It was simple for him to tie a shot around their legs ad and dump them overboard. He had some other object in his mind, and it was doubtless connected with Violet and her sisters.Probably he was afraid to go to extremities with them within the powe power of the Galverinian government or to near the christian positions. By carrying them some distance from the christian lines down the river he believed they would feel more whooly in his power.Horning wore away slowly to the two boys and the ship continued to decra decrease her distance from the island she was aprapproaching. At noon dinner was served to the crew and between that and one o o-clock one of the sailors brought the boys their mess. They could not eat with their hands tied up so he untied their arms and when they finished eating t he tied them t o the post again. During that time Donald Hanson came down and asked Ned pePerkins if he was ready to tell gnakeley what he wanted to know but Ned replied with a sneer;

''No I will never tell him anything.''

''You will be tossed overboard to the fishes if you don't tell him.''

''He might do that anyway after learning what he wants to know.''

''No, he swore that he would not harm you if you told him all.'

''I know that, but what does his oath amount t o? Nothing. I would as soon trust a snake as him.''

''Then you refuse to him him the information he wants?''

'I do.''

''You will regret it.''

''Perhaps I will but I have no faith in him. I'm-satisfied that if he intends to kill me, he will do it anyway wither I tell him or not.''

Donald Hanson grinned mà malevolently.

''We shall reach an island and to night we will find means to bring you to your senses. You will be put in a great cave of horrible death alone, and left t o a frightful fate unless t you speak. If the horrors of that place will not break your sl silence nothing will. Good bye for the present young prize fighter.''

In due time supper time came around and the boys got their share. The Glandelinian sailors who brought the food to them relie released them from the post and then returned to the decks hauling the rope after them. After eating as much of the food as they could the two boys walked about the unoce up ed part of the hold to stretch their li mbs. Then on the canvass sail they laid on under the open hatch where the air though cold was purer than elsewhere down there and gazed up at the cloudy skies. The island the ship was steering for was only twelve miles away at that moment but of course the boys did not know that. The heavy roll and pitch of the ship but put the boys to sleep at that, and while they slep t slept the vessel reached the eastern end of the island and came to anchor close to the shore.But the Glandelinian skipper made no attempt to land during the hour of darkness, so he and Donald Hanson remained in the cabin playing cards together and also drinking plently of whiskey and booze, and smoking cigars and cigareets, o Only one man remdned remained on dunty duty on deck the rest of the crew being allowed to turn in for the night. Violet and her sisters were in their staterooms where thy had stayed most of the time since they were brought on board. Whether they were asleep or not the chif of the-wicked Glandelinian villians did not know and they did not care.General gnakeley and his associate in rascally played steadily untill past midnight and then they retired to their rooms rooms and turned in and thus with only one man awake aboard the biggest ship in the Mc-Hollester Run river armed with two hundred and fifty cannon rode at her anchor like a throughout honest t rader..... The next morning thecrew of the ship was up early and to wwash down the decks with scalding hot water was their first duty to remove the nw new fallen snow.By the time their duty was completed and the planks even dry and clear from ice breakfast was ready for them. After breakfast donald Hanson ordered four of the men to bring Ned and Ben up outof the hold. T When the boys reached the ships deck and looked around they saw the island lying within a hundred feet of the ship, while the open ing of a large cavern stared them in the face like the mouth of some gigantic horn. It's floor partly hard lava as it looked, sloped out ward and the water of the ri ver cleaved at its entrance and a patch of beach showed.

The two boys had breakfast with the sailors, and then instead of being retu returned to the hold were tied up back to back against t he forward mast . In the cabin the breakfast was served at eight o-clock where gnakeley and Donald Hanson partook of it together, violet and her sisters being served in their rooms. But all the others who were prisoners on board got nothing that day. Aft er the meal the two chif chi ef rascals appeared on deck ordering some of the sai sailors to lower a small boat. Then Ned was released from the mast an and his arms being quickly bound behind his back he was directed to get into the boà. boat. Be, Believing that he was going t o his d'o doom he hesitated but donald Hanson with little ceremony gave him a shove tumbling him into theboat. The The skipper and mate got in and pushed off for the island four sailors doing the rowing. As soon as the boats nose grated on the shingle the mate sprang lu out and tied the painter around a rock....

''Now dearest Mormonian get out. ...''He said sharply.

Ned had to obey as he felt opposition useless.Snakeley stepped out ,ast last and there was a wicked lookin his face when he told Ned harshly to follow him., Donald Hanson bringing u t up the rear with a small coil of rope on his arm and a shovel in one hand and a lighted lantron in another. In single file the three entered the big cave and the skipper led the way to a dæ dark opening in one corner which proved to be an entrance to an underground passage. New would have put up a most desperate resistance if he had been able to use his arms, but it was just as well that this prevented him from doing it since he would have stood no show a against the h herculean Donald Hanson who was strong enough to handle any ten or fifteen men on board, and so they entered the passage and daylight vanished from the boys s ight.

''They may be taking me to the death cave.i''Thought poor Ned wi th a sinking of the heart.''I will never see Ben Logan or Violet and her sisters any more.''

As he walked along between the two men in the dark he wondered if he would ever see the sunshine g again.The passage was a very short one and terminated into a smaller inner cave filled with thestench of sulphurious fumes. This cave sloped downward and looked weird and gloomy in the lantren light.Snakeley wawalked straight across it and entered a second passage which sloped in the same direction as the small cave seeming to lead into the depths of the volcanic island. Neds unwilling feet kept pace with the tramp of the two rascals like a criminà criminal going to midnight execution. A few yards ahead and another cave just like the last one they reached, and it was of the same size. No pa use wa was made here either the party entering a very narrow passage pointing downward their arms brushing i ts rough sides as they passed through it. This passage was a long one and carri ed them way below the botton ot of the river. But it had an end like the other two terminating in a small rock ribbed chamber which had no other outlet. This was evidently their destination and Ned shuddered à at the thought of being immured in such a place. The slope of the floor was so sharp that the oppositeside of the cave was thir ty feet lower than the narrow platform around the opening of the passage. Donald Hanson hà held the lantren high above hi s head so as to illumine the place. At the lower side attatched to the wall was a seriss of big iron rings and to Ned's horrified surprise five small skeletons dangled from it clothed in female and male halreia ments. Near by were several naked half decayed little girls with their bodies having been opened and their inten intestines spread all over the floor by them.

''Well Mr Mormonuian, how do you like the death cave?''Asked Captian Snakeley wickedly.''Now will you tell me what you told violet and her sisters about me, and how the information came into your possession.''Continued the skipper.

''No. You have brought me here to do away with me and nothing that I might tell you would do me any good.''Huskily replied Ned.

''By all above I swear you shall return to the daylight if you give me the truth.''Replied Captian Snake S nakeley.

''I can can't trust you capt ian Snakeley.I can read treachery in your face any time. Do with me as you will for I will tell you nothing.''Replied the boy with the firmness of despair.

''You see yon skelet on and sliced up bodi es of the children? They died as you shall die in the darkness and by burning like a couple of roast ducks on a st ove. See here ''He cri ed seizing the lantren from the hand of his mate and swind swinging it to one side of the platform.Ned followed his motions and saw a large rill of molten lavalava running down from the rock. He had seen that before without the help of the lantren, but had not knw known what it was at first . It r an a yard or two in a narrow channel furrowed out of the platform and disappeared down a jagged crevice.

''That little stream of lava looks harmless does it not?''Grinned the Glandelinian captian unpleasantly.''And so it is if left undisturbed.But suppose i ts course is cut off from the large gulf, where will it run to.? Down into that slope which will within a few hours fill up to the lava level on which we now stand and flow over into the gulf.Any one tied to that ring now where the skepetons are would then be engulfed in the cooling lava and as a consequence must burn or smother to death. Understand?''

Ned undert understood.

Those bones belonged to four little girls and one boy.''The rascal continued in a tone of s satisfaction.They were prisoners of war.''

''Prisoners of war.''Said Ned with a touch of sarcasm in his tone.''Do you have to call children who were kidnapped to be assassinated in this cruel fashion prisoners of war. You are talking like a madman.''

''Yes prisoners of war you christian fool and prisoners during the war with Angelinia already going on.They were pretty children, almost as pretty as Jennie Vivian, one of the Vivian Girls.''

Ned winced at the mention of her name.

''I was then only a mate of a Glandai Glandelinian man-of-war.They had been captured and caused the captian and ten of the sailors on account of their old innocence as it is called to become christians, and so I vowed revenge on them. I knew of this cave and its possibilities and bided my time. By various means I brought on a munty mutiny on the vessel one night as she lay anchored outside where this ship now is with the capt ian and his mate and da daughter on board. I becamecaptian myself, and with the help of five of the crew brought the children, and these others here and then fastened them to this ring. T hen with a shovel I did this.''

He took the implement Donald Hanson had brought and took up a quanty of hard t urf that had evidently laid in the place for a long time and cast it over a new channel on the rill t opping it with a few shovel full of rock rocks. The molten lava ceased to flow away into the hole but began running over the edge of the platform and down the incline till it reached the mouldering bones of the five skeletons, and the opened corpses. Snakeley having heavy boots made of lead walked straight across it and entered a second in the lantren light . There the steaming lava stopped and collected in a mushy pool full of puffing bubbles and the pool slowly widened out and grew momentiarly larger.

''Now you can see how you will die Mormonuain.Do you wish to share a worse fate than theirs which was d drowning in water.It remains for you to say.''

He favored the boy with a malevolent smile which resembled that of Mephistopheles at the moment he sealed the fate of his victim Faust .

Ned however did not believe he could save his life by telling what Snakeley wanted to know.Had he thought so he would come to terms mighty quick.So he answered firmly;

''I have nothing to say.''

''So you d defy me to my teeth?''Roared Captian Snakeley his eyes flashing fire.

''Yes do your worse. I will never take water from a man of your stamp. It is only a question of time before you will see your finish. You expect to make Violet and her sisters become Glandelinians?Well-it strikes me that the moment you are captured by those on persuding Angelinian battleships you will be put in the island prisons yourself besides taking the little girls there.You have sneered at theflag of Mormonuai and

Angelinia but you will find that the fold folds of both flags protects Angelinia but you will find that the fold folds of both flags protects those born under it or who becomes citizens of both nations. You imagine you are the whole thing in this world because your word is law aboard a ship which does not belong to you. It is all right if honest Glandelinian soldiers during a raid captured it and made use of it as captured property and so on but you are a thief who stole property and use it to shel sheild your murderous actions.You are a little better than a pirate and there is plenty of law to cover your case. I have seen many thousands of Glandelinian soldis soldiers who in their rage and fury butcher children, I have seen many others prisoners ako among the christians in their surly dispositions but they are saints compared to you.And lê me tell you that no matter what you dare think or say God himself will defy you to lay a hand on the Vivian Girls. Once you try to do so your doom is sealed right aboard your ship. I warn you in time before he strikes you to death. That is all I have got to say to you.''

It was with great difficulty that Captian Snakê ey held himself in check while he listened to the stinging words of the Mormonuain lad. When Ned ceased speaking Captian Snakeley burst out in a torrent of abuse and impercautions. After abusing the boy to his hearts content he ordered Donald Hanson to kick the shelstons from the rings, and tied poor Ned to one of them.

''You shall die like the christian dog you are.''He hissed. as his mate proceeded to carry out his orders. In an hour the molten lava will reach your knees amid indescriable suffering. In three hours your waist sending steam tward your face in clouds.So you will feel a most horrible death creeping slowly upon you, and you will know that there is no one near to aid you. Then you will cry and shriek for mercy you dog of a christian but you will get none. I will return to feast my eyes on your dying struggles. I wi ll laugh at you when the lava bubbles about your lips and enters your nose and chokes off your breath amid deadly pains. Oh it will be a rare sight to see yo or witness your useless struggles for air and from the pain, and when the end comes then will my revenge be satisfied for the blow you gave me. Bah I sipte on you.''

Donald Hanson had now bound Ned to the ring with the rope he fetched along for that purpose having iron shoes on so his feet would not get burned with the lava. The boy stood on a high block of stones and the lava around this was already two inches deep and steadily rising, slowly disolving the rocks. Satisfied that Ned wa was completely help less and mus must meet his fate the ruffianly mate rejoined his skipper on the platform above whore the boy saw them glaring down at him as Snakeley held the lantren we// wl well up so its rays would rest on the form of his victim.

''Good bye my Mormonuain.''Said Captian Snakeley wi th a mocking bow.''Come Donald Hanson we will leave the brave youth to refelct upon hi s situation. We have the other lad to attend to perhaps we will bring him here to see his friend to say a last good bye. We will see.''

With those words Snakeley stalked into the narrow passage fol/owed by his mate. With their depatru departure went the dull gleam of the lantren and Ned was left in the dark to face a horrible death alone.

I will not attempt to describe the feelings of the lad as left to himself he began to realize the full signficience of his fate.He tried as desperately as he could to free himself from the rope which held him to the ring though he saw no chance of escape, but Donald Hanson had bound the knots knots that would not slip a and his struggles were fruit less. Utterly exhausted at length by his efforts he stopped and stared into the darkness of the cave.His eyes were now accustomed to the gloo go gloom and he could make out certain proh proje cting rocks here and there and his excited fancy tra transformed them into paphantom faces hoe hovering about the interior of the cave of death, watching him and counting on the brief moments of his passing span of life.

As he looked down at the glaring molten lava around the rocks he stood upon he wa surprsed to see that it was not go tting deeper but of course he did not believe it. After that he kept a kind of tab on its ri se wondering when it would reach his feet , and knees, than his waist, then his chest, then his neck, and then----- but the final scene of the tragedy was too terrible for him to dwell upon and so his th thoughts wandered off to Ben and Violet and her sisters.He wondered what fate would be meted out to them or to his friend at least for he did not believe that Captian Snakeley would permit the Angelinian boy to escape and become a witness against him and then he tried t o imagine what was going on board the large s hip with relation to Violet and her sisters.

CHAPTER THIRTY SEVEN.

CHAPTER [illegible]
BEN ESCAPES AND RESCUES NED.
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN THREE WARSHIPS ON THE MO-HOLLESTER RUN RIVER.

Would the sw seven little girls hold out against the scoundrel or would his threats to sacrifice their lives if they defied him intimidate them into compli ance with his wishes. He felt extremely sorry for the seven little girls in the hour of their terrible trial desperate as was his own situation.

In the meantime Ben Logan had his own troubles the chief one was of the seperation of his friend. He was tied to the side of the mast where he could have a full view of the mouth of the cave and he watched the two rascals enter its portals and then disappear through a hole at the ba back. He was now having serious misgivings con cerning the fate of his friend and dreaded that if they killed him in there it would be his turn next. He also wondered why heaven would let such a scoundrel like Captian Snakeley have his own way and wondered that something did not happen to the old white haired ruffian. He declared that it would be a dispend dispensation of Providence if a heavy rock fal fell on the head of the olf Glandelinian and made a corpse of him, then he would get his jue. To Ben Logan no attention w was paid by the crew as they lounged about the deck and Ben himself grew more anxious and uneasy as time passed away. As the weather grew colder and as it began to snow heavily again the sailors disappeared down in the forecastle only one man remaining to watch for the return of the captian and the mate. To avoid the cold blasts of wind ad the dashing clouds of snow that was beginning to fall he took up his position und in the shelter of one of the boats. Under thefierce blasts of cold wind and the stinging n snow Ben grew restive and thought of how the Glandelinians fr freeze their prisoners in the cold dingy child slave houses. Also he thought that if this was not like it he did not know what was, and that if he was kept there much longer there would be nothing left of him but a human shape in snow. One would have thought that these ruffians were from the northpole and were freezing him for a bed. He kee h kept moving uneasily about and one of his hands resting on a sharp part of the floor he gave it a involuntairly jerk as one would as he touched a sharp knife. His squirming had to his great surprise and joy loosened the rope which held him to the mast and the result was that his hand came free. He was then able to pull his other hand free. And then he looked around cautiously the loosened strands around his body enabling him to work himself around from the starboard side of the main boom to i ts port side. He could see no one but the man lu lounging under the big li fe boat and his back was turned to him,and the sound that came from the gally showed that the cook was buisy thrre there. He only came out once in a while to wipe his face or dump some peelings into the swill bu bucket.
Ben Logan shoved his hand into his pocket, pulled out his jack-knife, opened the big blade and cut the rope around his middle, and also now severed the loose rope around his ch est. That left him as free as the air and he hastened to make good use of his liberty. The lone watcher was now leaning on the bulwarks gaing shoreward the opening of the cave almost shrouded out of sight by the swaying clouds of snow, but Ben Logan glided over to the port bulwarks mounted it and let himslef drop lightly into the water. Then he struck out for a projecting part of the island despite the shock he recieved from the cold tempeture of the water, but the heavy waves helpled a him along fastv faster. He never thought that a sharpshooter might get him before he reached the island but he was a good swimmer however despite his age and made ligt little sound in the water, therefore if there were any sharpshooters on board the ship they were not attracted to him. He reached the rocky point without misadventure and the man leaning on the bulwark did not see him in the water his attention not being directed that way.

As soon as he landed Ben dropped completely out of sight behind the rocks congrat ulating himself that his escape had not been noticed. At that moment as a cloud of snow whirled in his fast Captian Snakeley and Donald Hanson came out of the big cavern and walked down to the boat.
"There are two of them wicked men now and poor Ned is not with them. They must have fixed him somewhere in the back part of the cave.Oh my I hope they have not gone and killed him.If they have I'll square it with them alright------ that is if they don't catch me before can do it."
Muttered Ben Logan watching the sailors who had come out with the two men row their captian and the mate toward the ship which appeared like a di dim outline in the snow ha ze. The boat was soon under the vessels si de and they all got on board but Ben could not see this the haze of snow being too thick. The solitary watcher however left the starboard bulkwark after the two villianous fo officers got back and then he and Donald Hanson glanced along the ships decks in which through the flying snow they failed to observe that the Angelinian boy was not where he had been tied, and they dived into the forecastle. Ben Logan however could dimly see that the ships decks were quite deserted and knew that he had a chance to slip into the cave to get his c clothes ta twawed out and see what happened to poor Ben. or Ned. He knew of those black guards and that if they would discover his escape in the meantime they would never suspect that Ben had taken refuge in the cave, so he could escape them. He quickly sneaked over and entered the large cavern but as that was fully exposed to the sight of any one on the vessels decks which he feared they could see despite the snowpall, he darted for the dark opening in the back and quickly found himself in the first passage which carried him into the inner cave.
"Are you here Ned dear?"He cried out.
He recieved no answer. It was as black as the ace of spades in there and Ben looked out by moving forward cautiously r that he did not fall into some hole or gulf. He soon came against the corner of the first passage and the next so he walked forward suntill he found what seemed to be another passage or cave. As his eyes were now getting accustomed to the darkness he could see somewhat though he could make nothing out.
"Are you here Ned!"He asked again.
Still no reply from his friend.
"If he is in here he is dead I'm afraid. But maybe there is another cave beyond."
Feeling about he located the low long narrow passage that led direct to the cave of death and passing through this slowly he came out on the platform. As he had not encountered any pitfalls in the other caves he suspected none in this and started ahead with confidence, but the result was that by not knowing that the floor deen decended with a sharp incline, he lost his balance, struck the smooth rock with a whack a and slide down smack against the helpless form of Ned perkins. The howl he utt ered was the first indication Ned had that someone had come int o the death cave in the dark. The lava on top had rapidly cooled and har dened and Ben went s/ sliding over the warm crust with a crash fetching up against the wall with one foot, and Ned with the other. Only his lower extremi ties got a few burns and scratches scratches, but Ben was at first scared over his sudden and unexpected tumble.
"Oh me oh of my where am I."? Ejaculated Ben as he scrambled onto his feet and stepped off the crust of lava that was starting to make his shoes smoulder a bit.
U'Ben."Cried Ned in joyful surprise.
"Ned dear is that you?" Then you are not dead?" Exclaimed the brave young Angelinian striding forward and avoiding the red hot lava with some difficulty and grb grabbing hold of his friend.
"Dead! No. But unless you can help me I will be."
Ben quickly drew his knife seeing that Ned was tied and cut him free from the ri ng. In less than a minute the two boys had scrambled up onto the platform and soon through the middle of one of the three caves and thence into the next the bi g opening or large cavern. T hey cont inued as far as the opening of the big cavern where they now could not see the ship at all with their naked eyes but they did manage to see it with the help of field galsses and they could see that there was not a soul on deck. They had not discovered Bens escape as yet but they soon would if the mate came on deck, but luck favored the two boys and they reached the rocks unseen the boys starting over the rocks and the way led them by degrees to the top of the great cavern. From this point they expected to get a full view of the island but it had by this time snowed heavier by many degrees and as they could not see for a hundred feeet they could not tell wherh whether it was a small or large one.

The nearest end within their vi ew was , low and covered with the vegation of the T emperate zone while at the left a strange looking fort could be seen.

''Maybe we will find some nuts t o eat down there or some g i bird.''Said Ben his mouth watering at the idea.''I'm hungry even though we have had decent meals since we had been prisoners.Its awful stormy but they cannot see us in the thick snow shroud.''

Ned was hungry too for despite the rations served to the crew aboard the ship had been satisfactory to him on account of his peril and of his thoughts of violet and her sisters he had eaten only enough to stave off hunger.

''Wait till we take one look in the direction of the ship with out glasses.''He said.

And so the two boys crw crawled to the edge and gazing through their poerwful glasses looked down. The wholecrew was on deck now despite the fury of the blizzard storm and there appeared to be some excitement on board. Donald Hanson was talking around the waist, and foun from the sound of his voice which was angry, and which reached the two boys despite the howling of the wind he was jawing the men blaming them no doubt for Bens escape. Ben Logans escape had been discovered. And every sailor on board were searching the vessel for him. Whilethey were taking in the scene Captian s Snakeley came up out of the cabin and his mate joined him. He wa was doubtless telli ng him about the disappearance of their second prisoner and that information put the skipper in a dreadful rage and he walked the afe after deck like an angry lion. Knowing that the Glande linians would soon be making for the shore despite the storm to hunt for them the boys hurried down to the level part of the island through the snowdrifts and despite the snow being whirled into their faces by the gale then blowing, and were soon among the trees trees may of which were walnut trees and the ground under the snow was still loaded with the luscious fruit .

They speedily gathered a bunch and divided it between them and after eating half a dozen in some shelter from the storm they started to look for a hiding place. The thick shurbbery offered inviting retreats, but oversecure ones if the Glandelinian sailors beat up the ground in a systematic way as they were likely to do under the leadership of their skipper and the mate. And it was no such secure place in such a driving gale and blinding snowstorm either.

''Hello there's a boat.''Cried Ned pointing to a ships gig with a pair of oars in her which had in some way long before floated to the island and grounded on the beah beach way up and perfectlyhfree from snow as none could lay here as the wind had a full sweep, and where the boys had gotten to as they were looking around.

''We can row away in that .''Said Ben taking a glimpse at the furious swells of the river.''But yet we might get swamped, and we would not get far before the rascals if they come this way would probably see us despite the thickness of the snow and give us a chace in one of their storm boats.''He added. W''With half a dozen sdlors at the oars we would soon be run down and captured captured.''

''Then what good is the boat to us.?''Said Ned with disappijtment.

''Then changing the tone Ned continued:''We will take possession of her anyway.Dump the nuts a aboard and we will get another bunch.''

When they had placed a second lot of the fruit in the bow of the gig, thy they got in and Ned taking the oars began pulling slowly along the shore, but having exciting times with the swells and the flying shroud of snow which buffetted them like sand blown by wind.

''Keep your eyes skinned for some spot where we can run and hide at least.''He said.''And also watch out for signs of the enemy.We cannot say out here long in such a blizzard.We would get frozen.''

Ben saw no safe retreat for the boat untill they reached the rocky part of the island where the wind was cut off a little and the snow fe fell more straight, and then he called Neds attention to a tunnel seen dimly in the snow shroud into which the river appeared to flow.

''That's just the place for us.''Said Ned when he looked a it with his glasses.'''It's as dark as pitch in there and the Glandelinians will never come looking for us here as they will naturally believe we are somewhere hidden on the island. We will be safe enough to remain in there and as we have the walnuts we won't starve for the present. We will have to remain here untill dark at any rate. When the storm lets up we could row for the main shore of the river.''

The entrance wa was just high enough for them to glide in with out hitting their heads but not wide enough to use the oars so Ned took them in after giving the gig enough impetious t o carry her out of sight. They were able to go in for some distance by pushing against the rocky [illegible] the actions of the waters[illegible] a tendency to float the gig

The entrance wa was just high enough for them to glide in with out hitting their heads but not wide enough to use the oars so Ned took them in after giving the gig enough impetious t o carry her out of sight.

They were able to go in for some distance by pushing against the rocky wall, but the actions of the waters had a tendency to float the gig outa again, but the boys easily maintained their position by holding on to a rocky projection. After some further time the boat was allowed to drift to the mouth of the water hole and there Ned left it and took his way cautiously over the half snow covered rocks to see if he could di scover what was going on with the searching party.Ned found a sheltered spot from the storm and where he could watch the ship which he could faintly see now again without running much risk of being seen from any part of the compass. Everything appeared quiet on board the vessel as there was not a soul in sight though it was about ten o-clock in the morning, the cook was doubtless in the galley prepaing the crews dinner. For a few minutes Ned watched and then it struck him that the rascals had come ashore t o search for Ben Logan. Wishing to see the beach in front of the cavern he worked around further, and there sure enough he saw dimly the two boats t ir tied to a rock with only one sailor watching them sitting on a flat rock whse the wind and snow could not reach him with his back tward Ned and seeming to be asleep from his attitude. Here was a good chance to seize the boat and get aboad the ship and run off with it before the searchers came back and suiting the action of their thought s he and Ned were soon rowing to the big ship and were surprise to see through the snow haze two others suddenly loom up and getting on board found the ship swarming with fierce looking men in scarlet uniforms. Some at first threatened the lads with fixed bay ocets and surrounded them, but they happened to be Abyssinkilians and as violet and her sisters suddenly appeared and inyervened the soldiers sullenly withdrew untill from further conversation with the little girls the Abyssinkilians were convinced that the two lads were the other twl two who had been made prisoners by the Glandelinian captian and their hostilities waned and they befriended the two lads telling them how they got possession of the ship and the lads told of their experiences and also how they escaped to the ship. On board the ship wasa an Abyssin kilian admiral.The Abyssinkilians had persued on ships all the way to the l island and having found the ship deserted took possession but had not known where the Glandelinians had gone.T he prisoners had been immediately released from their bonds and were treated with great care and , kindness. The Glandelinians had been foiled. Thus it shows that God frustrates the wicked.

CHAPTER THIRTY FIVE. eight

THE TWO BATTLES AND OTHER ENCOUNTERS WITH THE GLANDELINIANS UNDER CAPTIAN SNAKELEY.

The Glandelinians in the meantime had discovered the missing of the two boats.

''Go back some of you men and keep a-sharp lookout and signal us if you see the boats.''Said Captian Snakeley who ordered five of the Glandelinian sailors to swim off to the big ship and make some kind of a raft to take all hands off the snowbound island, not knowing that the ship had been captured by his christian em enemies. The five Glandelinian sailors started to obey when another Abbisannian s ship appeared around a curve. Soon it passed and to the surprise of the marooned marooned Glandelinians a Glandelinian warship suddenly made its appearance followed by te two others.Snakeley at once signaled that he and the others wanted to get on, and a boat was soon lowered. In twenty minutes the Abbisannian and Abyssinkilian ships were in persuit of the two Glandelinian ships that were firing as they retreated.

''Hellow what is that.''Cried Ned as a succession of excited cries came from violet and her sisters ad which broke upon his ears despite the howl of the wind and the hiss of the flying snow. He stood under the shelter of a cabin door while the sal sailors in the full sweep of the Calverinian blizzard was preparing to get their own guns ready to fire upon the retreating foe ships.

Along the snow swept deck dashed Violet and her sisters all excited and whose faces were convulsed in surprise.
"Oh Ned we have discovered that the Glandelinians a have another ship and had been signaling t o a while Glandelinian fleet and now the whole fleet is coming for us with full speed.We will be all killed if we don't go down into the hold soon.There is going to be a big fight."Cried Violet .
"What!"Cried Ned."A whole fleet of Glandelinian ships. Why thought there were no fleets of Glandelinian warships on the river which is in full possession of the christians.And you are mistaken child.Those are other christian ships trying to block the escape of the Glandelinians.See they fly the Angelinian flag. But those Glandelinians will escape I'm sure confound the luck. They would not have pla e plaed themselves in the danger if they hd not been fools enough to risk the river trip.They are big dragon dreadnaughts those Abbiannian war ships."
"Where abouts?"Asked the Admiral as he grabbed his eye glasses.
Violet pointed tward the southeast curve of the gigantic river and surely plainly visible through the snow pall even to the naked eye without the help of glasses was a long rakish Abbiannian cruser bearing for the retreating ships, and it was loaded with nearly fifteen hundred Abbiannians. The d admiral started off to climb the cross trees, when suddenly the whole side of the Glandelinian ship seemed suddenly belching smoke and a volley of shot fairly raked the decks carrying portions of the bulwarks away and wounding several of the men. The warships of the enem enemy was now s steaming away from the direction of the island and though persued the Glandelinian ships did not increase their speed but signaled to the second Glandelinian warship to come to the aid. When the first of the persueing Abyssinkilian ships was nearly upon them the Abbiannian warship on the other southern portion of the river was swung around to meet the Glandelinian both flags of each ship being quickly strung up. The two Glandelinian ships delivered a series of thundering boradsides this time but the shots were too high flying past the ships without doing any damage. The admiral now ordered his men t o fire and a fearful broadside from every one of the Abbiannian ships recked the decks of the Glandelinian ships carrying away some of the riggi ng and carrying down the main masts damaging two smokestacks, wreck ing the cabin, smashing the deck of one of them out of shape and damaging two gun turrent turrets.
"Good shot boys."Shouted the admiral."Give them another."
But before the guns were reloaded the two Glandelinian ships returned a heavier broadside at one of the nearest ships in their own front and the shots told on this Abbiannian warship. T hree of the gun turrents were disabled the ship was in a sinking condition, all the smokestacks we wrre smashed down, several portions of the main cabins were torn awah away and two masts were snapped like pipestems. At this time the other Abbiannian warship wa was ready to fire and then a broadside tha that fairly shook the ships thundered over the river in deafening echoes.
One of the Glandelinian ships got the full effect of the broad sides.
Her bulwarks were smashed in completely, and sixteen guns were blown up, and t wenty disabled and a hundred and fifteen Glandelinians were badly wounded, while sixty six of them were killed and twenty two mortally wounded.This ship struck its flag and surrendered, but the other two foes still tried to escape. A nother broadside was delivered at the escaping ships which did the same damage to the second warship excepting that another broadside t ore six holes above the waterli e waterline, and all the ma mast with the rigger rigging crashed to the deck ki lling two hundred and fifty of the crew and wounding the ent ire remainder thus rendering the ship helpless for further combat . This ship also surrendered but the one with Captian Blakeley on still fled on ward.
The admiral of the escaping Glandelinian ship was in a blinding rage over the destruction of two of the ships his name being Jensinia and he ordered his men to ram the christian ship directly in front of her with her boys, while at the same time they were to fire incessant broadsides at the persueing ships behind.But Admiral Hanson Handon who was on the warship in the path of the fugitive was prepared for that and as soon as the Glandelinian ship came speeding tward the center of the Abbiannian warship he ran his own ship in the way, and let the Glandelinian ship have a broadside that raked her decks fore and aft . The two high masts went by the board, down came the four smoke stacks, the cabins were blown up and the mast in falling carried everything down with it with a crash crash thus checking the speed of the fugitive ship.

But the admiral on this ship decided to die fighting if need be instead of surrendering like the other two and it still came on tward the warship of the Abbiannians aiming to ram her in two if possible by the force of the expected collision as her forward bows were very strong and able to damage any sh ship no matter how strong if struck right . But admiral Hanson Handon was alag prepared for this and he quickly steamed out of her way and as the Glandelinian ship passed on into the open sea space both sid ships simultaneously delivered a broadside but the christian fire was more effective than that from the Glandelinian ship carrying the entire front gun turret away with all those in it killing twenty men and wounde wounding a hundred, and fairly sweeping the Glandelinian ship from end to end. Another broadside killed a score more and wounded a hundred and fifty but nevertheless as the space was now open the Glande linians put on full steam ahead and as the ship was more than a match fo for the christians in speed if not in strength she rapidly steamed away not caring to battle any more with the Abbiannian warships.Three ships were left to tow in the wrecked Glandelinian ships, while two others immediately persued the fleeing Glandelinian ship. All the christian admiral hoped for was that the snowstorm would let up. Then something could be done with better effect, and he was fr afraid that in the storm the Glandelinian ship would be able to effect its escape.
Violet and her sisters had been returned to the shore however by some of the men and brought straight tward the christian lines and general Hanson or Vivian had not the slighrest thought that they had been missing from the christian lines having thought that his newph nephews had went out on some adventure for the sake of some thrilling experience.
A few days later general Hanson who had been concentrating his armies before the great city of Jennie Turmer de decided to make preparations for a seige and not long after all pre parations were begun Hansons couts noticed that tward the s now covered plains and despite the clouds of snow that was falling therebeing another blizzard raging there was suspicious movements among the foe under general Manly which had also concentrated to defend Jennie Turmer and the scouts knew that there would be a sudden change in the situation of the war before long, and as there was a battle threatening general Hanson decided to prepare for action.It was widently Manleys purpose to frustrate the christian generals at all costs and to prevent the seigeand s o was preparing to throw a desperate assault upon the christian line despite the blizzad that was raging. Violet snd her sistes seeing how hard it was snowing had no suspicion that a great and terrifying change was coming, but they were surprised indeed to see the cannons and field pie pieces far to the rear being run quickly into position by the trenches, nd they were told that the armies were preparing for an assault expeted expected from the enemy. By this time the suspicious movements of the enemy had seemd seemed to disappear but a great gray surge seemed to be moving forward through the snow haze and despite the snowstorm that was increasing fiercely the enemys guns began to thunder incessantly and within fifteen minutes a dull roar sounded in the distance far to the christian left while already a large force of the enemy was rushing forward as swift as they could advance over the snow covered fields. The dull sound to the left soon grew to a tremendous prolonged roar and clatter, and then with amighty bellow of fierce yells the storm wave of gray struck at general Vivians lines and the first of the assault sent the christian line back considerably consi derably, but portions wererallied as quickly as possible ad the Glandelinians wee thrown back again with tremendous loss the cannon fire tearing their main line of assault to mere bits.
Wave after wave in gray swept upon the christian line with great vehomence only to be sent back flying with tremendous loss.However there seemed no end to the pelting of the Glandelinian waves of assaults , and some portions of the christian line was again driven back before the force of the heavy blow struck by the Glandelinian fo army. Hanson howe however who viewed the struggle along general Vivians lines thought it too terrible to last long and expected that the struggle would soon slacken when the enemy had suffered enough losses, but insted of that the battle increased furiously the Glandelinian columns seeming to sweet forward with the same regularity of storm waves on the sea, and now Hanson soon feared that general Vivians line would ga give way before long despite its size and strength and sent instructions for all the batteries to run into position as quickly as possible and as his own lines was as yet not attacked he sent as much reinforcements as possible to the aid oh his brother.

For two hours already the battle had increased furiously along general Vivians lines, though generals Kindernine and others besides Evans himself reported that there was no trouble at all along their lines. Hanson reported also the same but added "There may be serious trouble before long I fear when Hanley starts more than this."

After another hour the assault along one portion of general Vivians lines had abated somewhat, but at other quarters it looked as if the prairies was swarming with fresh columns of Glandelinians and general Hanson who was on a signal station and where he was more safe than the other generals for the present saw that it was impossible for general Vivian to recover lost ground while the battle still raged so furiously and the artile artillery was too slow to be run into position on account of the deep snow, and he decided to sent some more reinforcements and extra horses to do something untill the storm of hell moderated, but nevertheless he made it sure that he did not weaken his own army as he feared this assault upon general Vivian was a fient and that it was their intention to make him reinforce general Vivian untill he had considerably weakened his own lines and if this happened the enemy would endeavor to assault him in his weakened condition, and to be caught in this condition would be bad. Hour followed hour and there was still no better change, the battle now still retaining the same fury but not abating. But as time passed the battle began to grow worse again, and this time an assault came so heavily upon general Vivians lines and the enemy fairly flew at the christian line seemingly withh the speed of a frightened sea bird. The assault was delivered with such determined vigor that the christian line was forced again and further back and the artillery was only just then reaching a favorable spot and then the gunners had to be kept buisy more than they espected in their vehement efforts to prevent the guns from being captured and the roar of so many cannons was incessant.

"I'm afriad this is fathers finish for a while as this is a severe attack." Said Violet when she and her sisters covered with snow went to the rear to watch the movement of fresh artillery. "And my the thunder of those cannons is horrible."

"I hope not." Replied Joice. "Though eva the battle does seem to be getting worse and worse." "Good portions of the christian line has been forced th but the batteries are holding ground in fine shape and appears to be having quite their own way just now and frustrating every attempt of the enemy to press forward. But anyway the batteries are liable to be swamped by a torrent of soldiers if once those big waves of graycoats swarms forward with irrestible force once the cannons have to stop to be cooled off. And then it will be good by with generals Vivians position for good."

"But the enemy just now can't catch behind us." Replied Angeline.

"Why not."?

"Because our flank is well protected and this cannot happen unless the artillery cannot hold its ground. I hope general Vivian can at least withdraw his lines to a better position-so as to successfully meet the following waves of Glandelinians. The Glandelinian waves of assaults seem to come with a certain regularity even in the worse or slight battles, and that is the reason why it goes so hard with the strongest Angelinian forces. The attacks of the enemy are too successive at once."

Violet and her sisters carried their conversation under great difficulty clinging to a tree and standing behind several b despite the flying snow to avoid being thrown down by the concussion of cannons or fr being hit from the bullets and shells. General Hanson did not however in this emergcy trust any general just now but Kindernine, himself and Evans. The only salvation for general Vivians army lay in the batteries holding their own ground and halting the immense assault which had almost carried all before it but half an hour before, and on the other case just now it would be sheer madness to allow the christian forces under general Vivian to stand its ground in that insecure position and so orders had been sent to have the army withdrawn to the complete cover of the christian batteries. There was also danger of the christian line encountering another Glandelinian assault at an unexpected quarter, and so general Hanson and many of his staff were keeping as good a lookout as they could, but anywhere else nothing could be seen on account of the pall of fal i falling snow. Hour after hour passed and the battle steadily grew worse but his orders had been carried out and the christian force had been withdrawn to better positions? Violet and her sisters did not believe that the battle could rage any harder, and even Hanson who had been through many severe battles in his earlier years in other wars and scores of battles at that looked solemn, though he trusted in the batteries holding on. If they failed he would have to throw an assalt upon the enemys lines

t save his brothers army from utter defeat. As the battle along general Vivians lines showed no signs of abating and the enemys yells were howling and shrieking worse than ever and the firing of cannons and musketry grew more general and heavy and as Kindernine now reported he was also fiercely engaged, general Hanson and the others grew alarmed. It was bad enough for general Vivian to meet such a tempest of assault in a strong position, ad and though general Vivian had a bigger army than Hanley could ever muster against his own the enemys assault however appeared to be infinitely worse than ever, for as one surge of Glandelinians fairly sank to or withered before the christian fire the remaining waves of assault rose like walls of humanity all along the battle line, apparently hovering for a moment as it seemed before before engulfing the christian lines, but just as they swooped forward the batteries again tore them to fragments and the christian infantry escape most of the Glandelinian fury.

As soon as a lull came the snowshroud still overspread the scene but not so thick as before, and also the outlook for the christian line became blacker than the caves of erebus as to say. Nothing it was believed could prevent the enemy from carrying general Vivians position.....

However also the lull was was of very brief duration. The Glandelinians were seen approaching through a very long lane and so swiftly were they approaching that they seemed to be flying a wild race as if through some vast tunnel of endless length with thought of victory spurring them on.

As soon as this assault was at its highs highest fury and the battle also raging with twice the fury of before. As so on as general Vivians right had on the adi v advise cha of Hanson changed its position and as the main lines of the batteries were swung around also to move to a better position a heavy surge of Glandelinians came up with the speed of a stampede and swept clear across the works yelling frightfully and pouring in fierce and deadly volleys, the christian cannon suddenly opening with a frightful roar but it was too late for the christian line was torn and gapped from end to end by the enemys sweeping fire, and the enemy rushing on carried all before them, from general Victors division down to every other command that went retiring back tward the rear in confusion and it seemed that all was lost, but suddenly the batteries that had been changing its position opened with a dreadful thunderous cra crash that went far above the roar of the other artillery storm and as the tidal wave of Glandelinians as such they could be called passed over the second line of works and carriec carried it also the artillery got a fair mark and shot down tens of thousands of Glandelinians in a moment tearing the whole surge to pieces in one volley.

The concussion of the artillery discharge was indescriminately terrific ad and it sent Violet and her sisters and everything else besides scores of dishes in general Hansons headquarters sprawling on the floor though the building was a mile away from the scene, and it was only the quickness of some of the officers and privates that prevented the other dishes from being broken. The terrible discharge withered the enemys main line of assault the terrific discharge terrorizing the survivors and they fled panic stricken and the works were soon free of the apparently victorious Glandelinians. The Artillery men still worked like trojans to keep their artillery active and excited almost out of their minds by the reports they heard Violet and her sisters forgot themselves and helped the artillery men clean the cannons as fast as they were discharged. Nothing more happened to startle till an hour after this assault had been repulsed with such frightful slaughter and when the works had been recaptured after three desperate counter charges. For a time the enemys line had gave evidence of breaking up and to make matters better the sky seemed to lighten up, and as the snow was not so heavy now the Angelinians began to take courage especially as the enemy now hesitated to renew the assault in general fury and kept at a respective distance firing heavy volleys.

Thousands of the Angelinians were nearly dead from cold and exhaustion and had to be withdrawn and fresh forces sent to relieve the others who had fought so desperately before. Two hours passed and then it was seen that the battle storm was not as bad as it had been about eight hours ago and at that moment general Hanson noticed from his point of observation that one of the christian divisions under general Hand had partly broken its lines for some unknown reason and was retiring hastily from its position before the storming attack of the enemy, and he ordered up three divisions to stop the rout and chek the enemy at that point.

The divisions started forward to do it. They had to go through a large glen to manage this ticklish job in this blinding blizzard with nly the support of the small handful of men which their leaders managed to rally and to hold ground against such a force of the enemy who were in possession of the best christian artillery. General Admiral even tried to lend a hand with his batteries, but unfortunately at that moment a portion of the assault suddenly changed direction and came straight on the flank of the three divisions throwing the Angelinians into the wildest indescriminate panic and confusion. They were just as well off as a beplle helpless ship falling into the trough of a heaving sea, the Glandelinians at this point having made a clean sweept of the works and caught on two sides and meeting a tearing withering fire the Angelinians here fled like sheep the enemy for a few minutes carrying all before them. The force of the assault also threw back thirt y Abyssinkilian brigades from their position.

Throwing out his arms despairingly oneof the Abyssinkilian leaders tre r tri ed to rally his men but for tunately a portion of the christian line was still clinging to its position which if they ha not would have been general Vivians finish, and also general Johnston and his forces still had a grip on the right of the position and thus the christian line was only seriously gapped but not exactly carried. Four divisions of the christian line clung to their works at agreat distance from each other.

One of the Abyssinkilian divisions was the first to recover from the confusion and disorder and rallied and they now stood their ground while the Glandelinians were scrambling forwad like monkeys. Then general General Hanson thought it time to lend a help,ling hand before the enemy got any further.

''Hold tight to the works every one of you officers''He wrote by wireless''And I'll pull you through or I'm no good at being a general.''Batteries to general vivians rear fire for all your worth. Let go with all your guns and spare no ammunition.If ammunition becomes exhausted more will be immediately sent.The enemy have got to be stopped.''

It took fifteen minutes for the order to be understood but however it was not necessary for the an gry waves of Glandelinians tuberlent with their yells were in imminent danger of being overwhelmed by heavy reinforcements sent by general Evans and the artillery having been silent now since the disaster began had waited untill the retreating christian christians had streamed to the rear and it seemed soon as if the enemy were facing an annihilation so fast they were being cut down by the christian guns. Providence indeed was watching over general Vivians army Hanson having now prepared to move his forces forwardvto threaten the enemy so as to make them desist in punishing general Vivian any further and now the situation lightened more and more during the passing hours during which Hanson had hurled three tremendous assaults against Manleys positions and finally captured them for keeps turning the guns upon the Glandelinian forces which was already frightfully wrecked by general Hansons furious attacks, and the generals were signallying for help from general Manley. Hanson who was keeping his sharp eyes ahead suddenly saw as the enemy receded from general Vivias lines something new looming up in the distance. He thought it was reinforcements for the enemy which would mean that that the enemy were preparing for a redoubled effort to crush him or general Vivian.It was evident also to general Hanson that the enemy were getting their main batteries into position to sweep his own lines.

''Then some scout h shouted as he came dashing up;

''Reinforcements for the enemy.''

''Reinforcements for the enemy?''Cried one of the generals with a thrill of surprise.''Where?''

''Dead ahead to your left.That is I think it is reinforcements.I can't be the same divisions already having assaulted us for I see no torn and lacerated flags, as they all look new to me.They look like a long wave of men moving forward through the snow spume.Sometimes I see it and sometimes I don't.''

The new Glandelinian column was closer upon Hanson s line itself than he a or any of his officers thought the snow spray and smoke lf of firing rendering the position of the foe somewhat indistinct, though it was really two hundred feet away. The heavy sweep of the Glandelinian Glandelinian waves were coming forward at such a rate that before general Hanson or his officers were aware of the effect the Glandelinians were almost upon the position, and they were Zimmermannians at that.

The crash was tremendous like a great collision of humainity, and general Vivian Robertson in a desperate effort to run his batteries into p,a place wa was caught in a jam of retreating Angelinians, but he attempted to rally them and succeeding started to face them about, but an onrushing wave of Glandelinians parhaps a hundred thousand strong gripped the Angelinian position in a torrent of humani ty in gray, and the christian line was flung back by the tremendous force of the charge and general Robertson amid the dreadful hurricane of firing that ensued fell mortally wounded while a score of officers of high rank fell with him and whole immense swarms of men.Then crash bang went the long line of christian art illery with a dreadful shock the Glandelinian wave was torn to pieces, and the survivors half floundering in snow drifts fell back, but most of the Glandelinians still surviving seeing the other portion of their division coming clung desperately to the captured works and the fury of the battle was ten times worse than before.

The Angelinians after ralying fired heavily upon the enemy for about twenty minutes then rushed headlong upon the shatt ered Glandelinian columns, there was a fierce exchange of volleys point back and the Glandelinians sullenly withdrew while other christian forces came rushing up to the rescue. The Angolinians crashed down upon the Glandelinians and there was a confused mic mixup and at this critical moment while the enemy were flying in panic Violet and her sisters who had wit nessd witnessed this thrilling exciting scene suddenly appeared at one of the guns of the christian batteries Violet with a flag of some regiment all torn to shreds however and she waved it, while her sisters wildly waved their hands at the Glandelinians who were retreating.A dreadful number had been captured by the Angelinians and thus that mighty Glandelinian wave nearly eight million strong had lost nearly half their number in prisoners while five hundred thousand had been killed and nearly a million of them wounded. What had appeared to be a disaster for the christian line ended as a fearful disaster for the enemy instead. This indeed stunned the foe. They had struck a blow and recieved a staggering one in return.

Violet and her si sters seeing that the foe was really ret reating retreating ran into the wave of christians coming sei zed a new fkag flag from a wounded color bearer and flung it to the breeze despite his vigorous protest that she was risking inconceivable danger in doing this, but she paid no attention.One of the generals seeing her bravery drew his sabre and waving it called to his men to advance and forward they rushed after the retreating enemy.

The Glandelinian columns were now shifting apart and large gaps could be seen for a moment here and there as they retired tward their own positions.These breaks became more frequent and larger a d soon the entire broken wave had really reached their own position as the Angelinians did not care to persue much further.

In the meanwhile while the battle was raging general Evans had concentrated hi s own army to another portion of the field so as to be closer to the christian position and as there wa was nothing else for most of his army to do and as the snowstorm was raging with great fury the soldiers most of them bega to feel the need of sleep and rest as they had been doing a lot of hard marching and as there was nothing else for many of them to do and as they were too far from the enemys position as yet to be engaged the most of them turned in for the coming night even some of the highest generals. General Evans directed the signal men to cal the officers if they sighted any signs of the enemy, feeling sure that general Vivians lines or Hansons would be attacked by the enemy despite the blizzard. It was tward the morning just while the battle was starting to rage with terrific fury Evans learned that a large Glandelinian army was moving tward the northwest when to his opinion it should have advanced southward. Many big columns of fresh troops of Abyssinkilians passed Evans camp but the generals halted no division bound in the same direction that Evans intended to advance. So the highest generals were left to sleep undisturbed for the few hours given to them and the army, and it was late in the afternoon when the battle was again in s full sway along general Vivians lines when general Evans awoke and opked his head out the window of his headquarters wondering where the sound of all the distant firing came from.

''How long have I been asleep he asked one of the guards jud judging that it had been some time.
''About two hours.''
''Two hours.''A 8''Yes.''
''And have you not seen anything of any section of Manleys army within view yet ?''
''Not a squad, and the army is still aleasleep and the storm of snow is on again.But there is some battle raging along general Vivians lines and it is reported the enemy cannot force him.''
Evans was greatly disappointed. He put on his coat and overcoat and went outside and listened to the roll of distant musketry and the boom of many cannons roaring now ad then and took a good look ahead and tward the location of the sound but he could not see anything wrong in that direction as the snow pall obscured everything.And the wind was blowing a gale. He then went to one of the high signal stations.
''Are you sure that you are keeping a shark lookout?''He asked the officer of the signal corps.
''Positive.''Replied the man.''The Glandelinian army must be concentrating upon general Vivian.''
''I doubt it because there are or do not seem to be any Glandelinian armies in this vinicity.''
''Then Manleys army must be ahead of ours still.''
''Is the officers of the Abyssinkilian armies making the best speed of their advance?''
''In this blizzard storm yes. Judging by the thickness of the snowclouds we have about f four hours of daylight left.''Answered the officer.
''If we do not catch up with Manleys army before another day it stands a good chance of getting away from Jennie Turner altogether.''Said Evans.''I had not expected that this storm would last as long s it i s raging and this snowstorm is indeed terrible. And as it is reported that the Abyssinkilians are getting out of privisions we will have to stop at some large ca Calverinian city to get it or stop at Evangelinia Crania where we could capture sup plies.''
Then suddenly Evans added;''To hell with Evangelinia Crania.I was mistaken at that. It would take five months for the largest christian army to capture that place held more strongly than Vivian Vicky Wickey though it is a part of her fortifications. We had better have the Abyssinkilian divisions stop at the nearest cities or towns and then they won't lose any time. What big town is that younder half hidden in the snowshroud?'' Pointing behind to the southwest.
''That's Bollie town.''Answerd the officer.
''Maybe the Glandelinian army we are after slipped us and had con centrated over there.''Said general Evans.
The officer shrugged his-shoulder as much as if you say that this was quite possible that the Glandelinian army had done so.
''If the Glandelinian army did then we are running away from it rather than persueing.''Said general Evans.
Evans looked long and earnestly tward the snow shrouded city for it struck him as a likely place for the Glandelinian army to go and avoid immedia immediate battle with his great christian army. He felt that he was on the horns of a dilemini a and the loh longer he studied the matter the stronger the impression grew that they had been foll fooled by the snowstorm, and that his army had been advancing on the wrong course. He would have gave orders to all his generals to come around and arouse the army on the march once more and head for the city, but then that was impossible for the wind was again blowing fearfully hih high the snow medium being blinding and to turn his army nd and face the storm would be too much on the tired army. H General Evans thought that the best thing to do was to move his army tward Calverinia Run and halt and wait untill the st orm should let up to sent back one qy quarter of the army to the city and make a search for provisions, and to have the scouts keep a sharp lookout a, along the shores of the Mc-Hollester Run River as best as they could for any signs of fleets of Glandelinian ships filled with soldiers of the enemy. He mentioned his purpose to his two generals but they said they would be ready to follow any directions they recieved, but that it would be probable that during the delay that the enemy would go off somewhere else, and then to resume the persuit would be in vain. Evans never knw knew that most of Manleys army was two miles away to his front concon trated to halt any further advance on his part tward Jennie Turner. The snowstorm had him snowbound and he did not kno know it.

It was now near four o-clock and the snow was still falling when a division of infantry came up to the town and were surprised to find no enemy there and that it was protected by a portion of Evans army nd and he did not know this either. Those soldis soldi ers did not go very far into the city as therewere great stores of all kinds on its very outskirts. They perchased almost a shipload of eatables as to cal it for the provision trains and the food was carried off in sealed boxes on army sleighs.The city was quite large and from one point lay within two miles of blanket Land while its western end was sixteen miles distant. If general Evans had intended to circumnavigate the region in the chance of overhauling the supposed fugitive army he had been persueing in that location he had quite a march before him for nothing and luck indeed seemed to play against him. He sent some troops in boats on the river already half covered with f, floating ice under the lee of the big island where Ned and Ben had been prisoners in the cave through a rough passage of the river for two hours for the vi ew of e e enemy ships without seeing any vessel or discovering anything belonging to the enemy.Instead the river was swarming with Abbiannian and Angelinian Rovers. So the trip on the river was abandoned. Soon a as the snow was letting up a little tward evening Evans saw in the distance to his far right disti nctly something like volcanic eruptions from the plains a great distance away.He heard nothing but only observed them. He gazed on this new scene with awe and surprise and suspicion.And from that direction all the noise was proceeding. He had advanced a portion of his army at this time tward a small collection of abandoned houses such as would be cal called a villiage and it was then that he had observed this scene. There were two or three small warfs at which some Angelinian craft were moored, but inquiring what the scene was beyond the officers with Evans were told that the enemy were attacking general Vivians line, and that early in the morning a great army of Glandelinians had passed by under cover of the woods tward the town of Jennie Turner but they were not sure if it halted there or continued on but that the army had been moving northward. The soldiers said they paid particular attention to the forces in gray and that after the line continued to pa pass for three hours and a half without seeming to end the last of it soon disappeared around a point beyond the Aronburg Ford. General Evans thanked the marine officer for the information and the army was put on the march g again tward Jennie Turner while Evans mounted a hi high rise of ground and proceeded to examine the queer explosions in the distance with his field glasses. He rounded a point of the hill and as it was getting quite dark he saw the glare of the explosions, and he decided to have an investigation made of the scene. Fifteen minutes found him approaching the western end of another town.Just then he saw with his glasses peculiar motions of some sort of huge moving forms imperfectly distinct in the coming darkness many long lines of fierce flashes and an increase in the number of the hundreds of explosions. He then watched for several more minutes without any further developement. Just then the lookout of one of the signal stations saw a long stream of flashes miles long in the samedirection and the noi se could be heard more plainer.General Evans summoned one of his officers and then he cried to the man of the signal m c corps who was waving a dark colored lantren;
''W Hello, what do you want?''
''Do you see those many series of long line of flashes?''
''Yes ''Answered Evans.What does it mean?''
''We can't make out because of the snowstorm.''Answered the signal man.''But the noise sounds like heavy firing.''
''And did you see any Glandelinian army a pass bound for Jennie Turner also?''Asked Evans.
''We saw such an army about four hours g ago but dreading the fos was concentrating for an attack we dared not to expose ourselves haand held communication with other signal stations to warn you.The Glandelinian army was headed for the northeast of Jennie Turner.However I could say that we do not know where the Glandelinian army was bound.It was under general Raymond Rivhardson Federal....''
General Evans had obtained the information he had wanted for the Glandelinian army was no doubt the one he had been persueing, and it seemed pretty certain to him that the army was bound to concentrate in force before Jennie Turner no doubt to prevent him from laying seige to the city.

The conflict that Evans was witnessing was called the battle of Bando-Pochain later. Securing the right course for the armys advance the march was resumed for about a mile and then the concentration of his own armies commenced while the snow slackening stio still more he again made actions to investigate the strange scene before him. Behind the hill he mounted the a town lay like a series of dark blots against the whiteness of the snow covered plains, a distant fire making a lurid glow. Ahead far to the west lay the halo almost sea like expanse of the Mc-Hollester Run River heaving swells glistening in the light of the conflargration, probably of a burning town. The only sail in sight on the river was an only abandoned bark.Two divisions of his army was in sight to his left pitching tents and throwing up breastworks of snow and ice and of rock rocks wood and diry dirt and then Evans made inquiries from some returning scouts concerning the scene he was witnessing in the distance but the scouts did not know having tried to find out themselves. It was the second hour since he had now observed the scene and he did not know what to make of it. Nevertheless he felt quite uneasy and wished to go nearer but some of his officers declined to allow him saying it was dangerous for him to go out too far alone.

Evans had soon however discovered the truth which led him to quickly move his army closer to Jennie Turner and which also led him to send the much needed reinforcements in time. During the night after the severeconflict along general Vivians and Hansons lines it became zero cold but nevertheless it had become very calm there not being the slightest breeze thoughit was st ill snowing terribly hard. Violet and her sisters had despite the cold did all they could in helping the redcross take care and dress some of the nearest wounded soldiers, and even prayed for wa warmer weather, but tward late night the storm cleared up it became more caml and colder and not a single breath could be felt. To the Landelinian army however the cold was becoming oppresive and g thousands of big bonfires could be seen in the direction of their lines while apparently the christian line had only what was needed for the sentries. Hours and hours passed passed and there came no change, and tward the next morning it being clear and cold queer murmuring sounds came from the direction of the enemys lines and continued for hours and also increased steadily and everybody was excited over the sounds. Tward eight o-clock in the morning while general Jack Evans was concentrating general Roswell Buster Johnstons lines a sudden and furious attack came upon his own right wing from the enemy, and the enemy had been seen to come forward in ten large gray bio billows of men. The first line of christian infantry was helpless before that apparently heaving seaof wild Landelinians, a and back they fell, but nevertheless they rallied and rose up again like spartians, and again plunged into the Landelinian columns. The ten Landelinian waves were one after another torn and mangled for the very ten charges and driven back in thewildest confusion but while this was occuring , elsewhere the enemy also started trouble and along general Roswell Buster Johnstons lines the battle broke in all its fury, but every Landelinian column was torn up fearfully and despite their own heavy numbers could not maky make any headway and suffered terribly from the effects of the violence of the christian fire and counter charges. In vain did the Landelinian force throw themselves fiercely into the desperate struggle it was plain to them that they would never have the chance of breaking general Evans lines, and the attacks soon slackened and there was a lull. While this was occuring to the eyes of Violet and her sisters who were in Hansons lines they noticed a yellow haze in the direction of the enemys lines under Manley and it had caused great curiousity and even violet and her sisters had watched it a great while, and Hanson learning that Raymond Richardson was assaulting general Evans lines felt sure he would be the next one to be struck and waited for devolpments. Late in the afternoon while Evans was now left alone the enemy came suddenly upon Hansons lines and the first indication Hanson had of the fact was the heavy roll of millions of muskets and the battle along his lines became nearly as bad ad as the day before the enemy charging furiously and repeating their onslaughts every hour without a pause in the terrible firing and wave of Landelinians followed in endless succession, while all that time every avai lable battery of general Hansons army thundered most incessantly the sky seemed filled with lightning from the bursting storm of shells and shrapnell the scene was shrouded in smoke and the ground torn and furrowed by fire fierce explosions.

Soon after the enemy attacked in the most violent fury, and each successive attack came as sudden as violent squalls of wind, and every assault came in full force each lasting twenty minutes without ceasing while the flash of musketry glared like a conflirgration, and still hour after hour passed and the great series of assaults of the enemy increased so fiercely that general Hanson feared that his lines would be overthrown and swamped by the wicked human torrent, and he feared indeed that the enemy would carry all before it.Sometimes it seemed as if the Landelinian columns would be swallowed up in smoke of c shells and canister and the smoke was so thick that it almost took the breath breath away from the soldiers. Violet and her sisters dreaded that one of the general and most furious struggles of the war had come, for their was no change in the situation, and general Hanson was sorry that he had left his second army too far to the rear for he believed if he had he could have had enough men at once to resist the hell assaults of the enemy, and then be able to close in on Jennie Turner which he wished to besiege, and which he feared now he would fail to do on account of the second desperate conflict. As the storm progressed on without abating a heavy column of men in gray came forward with a rush but the most terrific fire the enemy ever faced swept them down in scores of thousands but nevertheless there was no signs of the battle abating now at all the enemy appearing to be most determined and the struggle only grew so fierce as the Landelinian generals threw more divisions into the action that all the christian generals became alarmed and Hanson had to issue orders for the divisions far in the rear to come up and aid his forces to check the hammering onslaughts of the enemy. Never before before had he seen the enemy so desperate. During the meanwhile the roar of firing elsewhere even along general Kindernines front grew so frightfully heavy heavy that general Hanson had to dispatch generals here and there to keep the line any where from breaking, and gave orders for the reserve artillery to be plaed placed into post position.

There was fortunately a lull and while the short lull was on Violet and her sisters declared that it appeared as if the enemy was massing for a general assault. Indeed that was a sign that this was one of the dreaded battles which had occured without warning since the christian army approached Jennie Turner, a battle that rages so long that it causes the destruction of untold number of soldiers and even of nature itself before it ends. Everything after the storm of fighting seemed so sombre and mournful and at times the very skies seemed lit in the distance by conflargrations raging no to doubt in some towns near by. All had remembered that before the outbreak of the battle every thing had seemed to calm and now while the lull was on the dreadful silence along general Hansons lines was distinctly broken by strange whispering and other sounds from the direction of general Evans lines which did resemble something peculiar and which no doubt was some kind of a war warning. Violet and her sisters had been at first afrighted by the queer sounds and when they were they were not to blame for they had known that it was a fair warning that a general battle was raging along general Evans lines. Violet and her sisters had listened to the sounds which had died away once in a while but never ceasing altogether, and they still knew that the sounds were from the firing on both sides which receded and advanced and recciled, and which could be heard though the conflict still raging there was so far away at the time. Some times another kind of queer sound added that seemed unearthly and which sounded like millions of ghot ghosts whispering and chanting together of the doom of the christian army. It was completely terrifying, and at times the sounds seemed to come from every direction, and soon as the little girls werestill listening half appalled the situation ebegan to take on a change? A thick long wave of gray at first unobserved by any one had advanced while from a nearer quarter the firing which had stopped suddenly broke loose again.Hanson soon observing the wave regarded it with some uneasiness ad he remarked to his officers that he was afraid a great great onslaught was going to be made this time upon his lines and that if the enemy came on with great fury it might be difficult for the christian line to hold its ground. The christian line was making preparations for the defense when a volley of ammonia bombs exploded having been sent over by the enemy batteries and the little girls who were in the region got the full effects of the fumes and gasped in vain for air but they found they could not breathe. The very air itself was still and cold and added to their commencing agony for air.

Violet begged god to save her and her sisters from complete suffocation suffication and even now they felt they could not stand it without air any longer and they struggled to reach general Hansons headquarters to try and obtain help. But from the suffocation they were helpless and every attempt to arise increased their agony. Their hearts were beating fast and their suffering was getting worse every moment. They were almost almost black in the face and the eyes stared out of their sockets. They were now getting terribly dizzy and they sank to the ground with gaping mouths.

The pain in their lungs from the fumes wa was unbearable and they only could think prayers and not say them. Indeed their lungs already felt as if they were burning while the little girls had aburning sensation i n their nostrils nd and foreheads. They seemed already in d danger of dying their mouths slowly c closing and another half minute would be fatal. This was the worse kind of posion gas bombs ever hurled by the enemy upon the christian lines but violet and her sisters seemed to be the only v victims and they hd had- m just lost their senses when the gases subsided, and by the mercy of god a strong breeze sprang up followed by snow flurries and the little girls began to revive. For quite a while they lay in the snow unobserved by any one taking in deep breaths when general Bandertsen and several officers coming up on inspection of the art illery saw them just as a th terrific thunder of shells roared high in the sky amid their blinding flashes.

''Goodness the little girls have been gassed by shells.''Gasped one of the men riding up and dismounting he lifted violet upon his horse.

''It's all right they are recovering recovering.''Said another soldier who had also ridden up.''They did not get the full benefit of the posion gas.''

At this moment one of the officers p i pointed to a long grayish looking surge stretching along the snow covered plains and cried;

''The enemy are again advancing.....''

''Where away!''Asked general Harold Teen as he gazed in the direction indicated.

The surge of the enemy indeed did look thrilling but there was also a strange colored wave of something following them quite the color of a praire fire and which glowed with an oppresive radience, and the little girls who had recovered by this time knew the color was stra g strange smoke probably from torches which the enemy carried with them. Violet and her sisters l also knew that it was not only the single surge and though a certain section of it had an swift approaching motion tward the southwest nother portion seemed to move straight forward.

As some of the generals rode hastily to give the alarm violet and her ai sisters went to general Hansons headquarters where they were sure their uncle would be and found him on his horse talking to general Baldwin the their old time friend who had noticed the advance of the enemy as the little girls came up and made a remark;

''We are in for it now.''

''Uncle ''Cried violet forgetting to salute in her excitement, not notic ing Baldwins advance''There's the enemy a-coming again.''

Baldwin announced quickly that she was right but that probably the enemy was not so strong in force as before and that they were in for the second part of the mighty conflict.....

Generl General Hanson quickly sprag sprang his horse forward followed by general Baldwin and looked in the direction she pointed. But suddenly the main thing he observed was a terrible cloud in the nort hwest which resembled the clouds of some great burning world more ominious than thi that seen in any approaching Jengiglonesean Island Typhoon storm and it was full of convulitions which stretched almost over its entire form from the horizon up to its utmost edge which spread out in a thickened sheet or canopy and it already extended over the zenith and my how back it was. General Hanson quickly bawled out orders to his officers who had by this time found out their mistake, and were working like trojans to have the batteries placed into closer pois position and to remove the disabled artillery from the works, and then the infantry fell into position to meet the second storm of the battle. Hanson wondered indeed why the enemy always made such great fires as he witnessed and he wondered also what was burning. General Hanson quickly ordered violet and her sisters to go inside his headquarters, hile among the officers there was great excitement for general Hanson had announced that it appeared that the greatest part of the battle was apparently about to begin.

This wa not pleasant news for any of the christian generals who had been at tug of war for the enemy so long already nd who knew that such a desperate foe as general Manleys army was no silly thing to encounter under the most favorable conditions.The guns were swung around so that they could get an easy range of the fields before them. Violet and her sisy sisters were sacred somewhat and crouched t ogether in the corner of their room close to a window watching proceedings. The yellow glow under the immense cloud of smoke in the northwest had increased slightly and never had the little girls seen the enemy cm come rushing forward so swiftly their whole wave seeming to move forward simultaneously now while the clod cloud from the fire was like a gigantic mass of black vapor from some great volcanic eruption with a storm of white scull scuds rising from the middle of it and rushing swiftly upward to join the main mass above. As the cloud of smoke increased in size the upper section spread out like a huge straight wall above the giantic pilliar and the little girls or the whole preparing army had never seen so black a cloud of smoke. Was it possible that Jennie r urner was burning?

The cloud wa of the color of the blackest of inks but white cauliflower clouds moved rollingly with great speed outward and upward from under the erebus gloom a and spread the whole upper section out further.

Suddenly as the little girls were watching the cloud and the enemys approach a dull booming roar sounded in the distance which broke the sudden stillness, there was then a sharp whiff of sudden musketry fire from some unseen p i point and then right before their eyes there arose in the plai plains a great eruption of snow and earth and smoke mingled with a crimson flash which rolled upward like a huge baloon.The enemy had exploded a gigantic mine to make it impossible for the christians to move forward in that direction. Then from still another unexpected quarter thr there came another heavy squall of musketry, and fifteen minutes oater the enemy hurled itself forward upon the christian line right before their sight like a wave of horror and the whole christian line was suddenly swept from end to end as far as the little girls could see by a mighty sheet of flashes, and simuntaneously one hundred and sisty cannons let loose a roaring discharge.Seven big gaps were torn in the main surge of the enemy, and as the enemy came forward still but in fragment ry divisions the little girls were surprised to see Ned and Pen Logan suddenly come in sight each carrying a regimental flag, and then they were seen to fall while seven generals rushing up here and there at different points amid the withering storm of firing were seen to sink t o the ground.The Angelinians having edged in closer to their works let go their whole line of musketry again and again, the enemys line was torn to pieces, and within an hour of this horror the enemy receded still wavi ng their tattered colors, and after this the calm came again and all the christian cannoneers proceeded to clean their cannons.

With the fallen so closely in intermingeled for that short space of time and with the black cloud hovering over the sky and with the red glow under it it did seem indeed as if the world was approaching to an end. The dull booming along the main right had momentarily increased to a new roar mingled with an incessant clattering sound and soon added by a incessant screeching roar which no doubt was the yell of the enemy who were still attacking at a different quarter. The cannons along the enemys lines were already flashing and thundering in a terrifying manner and soon another gray line was seen approaching with astonishing speed nd and quickness followed by many others and now long musket volleys far to Hansons left was heard to roll heavily. Suddenly after an immense rol ling thunfe thunder from a an increased number of enemy cannons there was a screaming yell like that from a million frightened sea-gulls and the other assault came upon the christian line with astonishing astonishing ferocity. This time the struggle was tegrible, and though this assault was also repulsed wave after wave of the Glandelinians wild with fury and rage swept against the christian lines.Every minute at all portion portions of the entire main christian line the battle increased furiously, and before another hour the most fearful part of the battle ever seen wa was raging. It was more fearful than any ever experienced since the second battle along the Mc-Hollester Run called so many names, and so steady was the attacks of the enemy now that one bad gap in the christian line would mean the total defeat of the whole army at the sweep of one wave of the Glandelinian soldiery.

The roar of the musketry firing of both sides at intervals was louder that the din of any great waterfall ever louder than the roar of Niagara Falls sometimes almost deadening the loud crashes of the thunder of thousands of cannons.

The Glandelinians during the assault again swop swelled their yells to that of a million demons, and as their numbers increased, and greater number of cannons on both sides broke into ation the battle grew worse and worse, the flash of cannon and musketry being blinding and the roar of all of the enemys batteries swelled like the beating of thousands of drums. The din was now deafening at a distance of ten mines miles. General Hanson who was directing operations and the reformation of lines that were broken here and there declared that the enemy was fearful in their determination and he also declared that under no conditions was he going to allow the enemy to sweep his forces bak. The firing during the tenth great assault was at its worse and the slaughter of full waves of Glandelinians was worse than athrilling sight, and for hours the charges of the enemy had continued without intermission, attacking and storming with their yells and blasphemies so frightfully that all believed the legion fiends of hell had been let loss loose, and the little Vivia Girls were almost frightend at the sight and confusion of noise and never ceased their prayers once during all the bedlam to the Blessed Mother of God.

The screaming yells of the enemy, full of horrible blasphemies, inprecat ions and obscene language ad cursing and revilings, mingled with cries of derision and defiance and rage and frenzy was fairly fairly deafening, earsplitting, and universal, and general Kindernine whose army was also violently assaulted feared that his line would give way at any moment and begged Hanson to send him aid.His lines had been terribly torn and gapped by the pounding of the waves of Glandelinians, ten times his artillery had been compelled to withdraw to better cover, and every gunner had been hard at work in keping the cannons active as much as possible, while Kindernine and his generals continued their efforts to restablish his broken lines.There was no change when five o-clock in the afternoon came and though the enemys numbers failed i to increase their series of great onslaughts continued already for many hours, and sometimes it was reported by Kindernine that the enemy had to leap over their own mountians of corpses.

General Vivian was also fearcely engaged.For an hour after the outbreak of the battle storm along his lines the struggle had sted steadily grew worse as more divisions were thrown in, and the firing was so intense that desperate, frenzied, and reckless as they were the biggest Glandelinian columns could not make any headway and swept back torn to pieces and scatt ered over the plains in the wildest panic.

General Vivians army after the struggle lulled for an hour recieved the worse shock of the entire battle at just about five thirty. When the lull had lasted that time all the christian generals were excited to see what appeared literally an immense wall of graycoats almost upon their works , before the Angelinians had time to fire a shot.

But the christian cannons had been ready and they let the enemy have a fire that ground the first section of the gray wave fairly to earth, just as general Hanson ordered the panic stricken troops to the rear positions and to hold these works & all costs while he did his best to sent reinforcements to stop this assault on general Vivians lines. General Robert Vivian hinself rushed about back and forth in the rear of the line excitedly, while colonel Baldwin Franklin clugg to one of the big guns and discharged it killing and wounding sixty Glandelinians at one discharge. The wave advanced with a deafening yell of fury and a they appeared the christian infantry blazed with a withering storm of musketry. The wawave struck there was a stunning crash of firearms as both sides opened up in general, and a portion of the christian line was bended back but the enemys front was swept from end to end and the very deep snow was fairly buried under the bodies in gray. It was dreadful, but nevertheless the Gladelinian survivors were not checked and everything seemed to go, while general Francis Baldwin who was urging his men to support the chargeof his Glandelinians was fairly torn from his horse by sixteen bayonets of the Angelinians and he was only saved from being mortally wounded by the surge of gray that swept about him.

The Angelinians ad amid the dreadful carnage clung most desperately to their works, and though general Roswell Buster Johnston wa was wounded, and general Francis Schmidt with a broken leg, they nw neverthe less seemed sto stand well the shock of this tremendous blow which was worse than the swiftest irrestible tidal wave on the sea during a great typhoon. General Aronburg who had been almost surrounded by the enemy was rescued by his comrades.General Vivian had in the meantime brought up some of his reserves when this tremendous wave came and was prepared to meet it with all his strength.The firing of musketry along roared like a million cannon and was perfectly incessa incessant.

Many of the christian generals managed to reform their broken lines, and they yelled vehemently to the men to stand ground and not give way but just now no voi ce or even a cannon shot could be heard through the sudda sudden tremendous din of the enemys yelling batt lecries. Another section of the glandelinian tidal wave hd crashed its way over the works at the extreme left of general vivians line but before the christian artillery fire they went down in lines of men, and some sectiond sections of this wave as it tried to continue on were swept away. Simultaneously the christian mined the works in possession of the enemy and trees and everything went down by the board and the branches were splintered to bits by the force of the concussion and the enemys line had a horrible gap exposed. A scee scene of the wildest confusion was ensueing. The scene was ten times worse than along general hansons pesonal lines.
General vivian got slightly hurt on one of the incidents when he attempted to di rect the placing of a battery just as a torrent of men were literally mowed down by the enemys fire, the explosions se ding the soldiers rolli ng like balls and dashing them into the deep snowdrifts.
General Rickson was rendered senseless by the burst of a shell high above him, and general Hankerton who was trying to lead his brigade to the stormed works was mortally wounded by a solid shot. But at last when the glandelinian assault was checked and the cruel firing of cannons along the right ceased for a few minutes two christian generals called Hanlon Dogdger, and Charles Henderson managed to restore order in their torn and broken lines and got a glance at the angry enemy.
All they could see for a few minutes whole a wall of powder smoke and forms dashing forward only to disolve away while to their rear a large host of Abyssinkilians were coming thus hanson indeed was sending aid.
It was dangerous for any christian general to remain even within the rear of the christian lines so furious was the enemys deadly fire.

The shock of the assault had been fearful and the christian losses as well as the enemys was inconceivably terrific.

Though the glandelinians had finally been held at bay another section of the wave had struck Kindernines front some time later, and it was evident that at all points the battle had reached its highest fury, the enemy all the time during the attacking yelling their loudest.
It was some time before the assault could be even repulsed and even fifteen minutes later to the surprise of the generals they saw another great wave of glandelinians approaching with indescriable fury. The wave of glandelinians resembled a huge surge of men rushing forward during a great panic from some horrible event about to happen and it was moving in the direction of general vivians already badly whipped up army once more and extended as far as eye could reach. Another wave had been seen approaching but it mak made a junction with the main one and this column of glandelinians was the most dreaded, for their fury could never be told, and it would cost indeed to meet it hundreds of thousands of men. The wave was d advancing under thecover of their main barr batteri es which were keeping up a most terrible booming sound.
This time the wave advanced in a long thick parellel line and did not break into seried formation at all like the first big surge had. Then again the musketry firing became like the roar of hundreds of Ni agaras, but as it advanced the glandelinian force was continually torn up for some distance of their march, and this was a fortunate occurance for had it been able to strike against the christian line like the first s tidal wave those who were in the trenches to oppose it may have as well said their last prayers. The whole wave was counter charged by Abyssinkilian infantry and cavarly and repulsed. The next wave of glandelinians came in a perpendicular line but was smashed by the christian fire and second counter charge, and so fierce was this desperate melee that scores of officers many generals fell in that mad storm of hells supreme slaughter, and general Vivian Hendernos who righted a battery swept the glandelinian columns to pieces m just before they were engulfed by the counter charging christian forces, and only by gods mercy was this wave of glandelinians unable to rally.

The enemy columns seemed now not so heavy and there was indications now that the awful battle was beginning to abate. The glandelinian wave had collasped and fell back in confusion the Angelinians under general Robert Vivian having withstood the tremendous assajl assaults gallently ad and both vivians now began to fell relieved, and believed that the christia christian line would be able to hold out to the end without dangor of disaster after all as the struggle along kindernines front was reported to be abating for general, and that the enemy was retiring with astonishing rapidity.

But now as it was reported to general Hanson kindernines army was now nothing better off than a ship reduced to a floating battered derelict and general Evans himself had to send heavy reinforcements as quickly as possible to ret restore the broken christian line. The snk snow was fairly unindated by bodies of soldiers of both sides.It seemed as if awhole k nation had been sacrificed in thi s tremendous battle. One half og general inder nines force was ki lled or wounded, and he reported that he had möre prisoners than could be guarded. All his generals even not prostrated were suffering from injuries and still retaind command only for the reason to hold the line firm. Along general Hansons line the attack of the enemy wa still furious but not so ba d as before. This two desperate days of fighting reäly is called the battle of Landale and outside of Lucillie Jorden was the most bloody in the war up to this point being at least for the two dys nearly equal in its horrifying consequences.

CHAPTER THIRTY ~~NI~~. in NINE

THE CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE OF LAWNDALE.

The enemy sti ll howled their yells furiously but their attak attack had ceased, the glandelinians having halted and kep keeping up an incessant fire themselves.It wa s was now seven o-clock and all the christian generals not injured placed divisions of men into the line at points almost broken and hundreds of thousands of wounded had already streamed to the rear untill a full army of wounded was being attended to by the sergeions and redcross. In general Hansons head quart ers many dishes had been broken by the concussion of thousands of explosions, Holy pictures were smashed or torn in the building where stray bullets had entered the windows punte chured with many holes, nd statur statues of all kinds were de molished and bunks were piled on top of one another.Tables and books had been upset and scattered, one table had been demolished, and the roof of his headquarter had been wrecked and blown in by the concussion.

Though the terrible charge had stopped the enemy continued their heavy firing and only occasionally a column of men threatened to sweep forward to resume the attack but fell back without question. While the christian line was being generally restablished one of the officers went t o report to general Evans of the state of affairs reported along general Robert Vivians lines, and while he went violet and Jennie not thinking there was any danger as yet docided to go and see how the scene was now since they believed the struggle had now ceased. Just as they reached the rear of the christian line there was a great explosion in front of them as a shell burst in the snow and they were flung headfirst into a snow drift and a heavy showe of earth came down upon them burying them under tons of earth. Violet and her other sisters who had escaped this were terrified and while they ri tried to dig away the earth with sticks and some spades they picked up from an abandoned t rench not as yet having been occupied they sent Angeline to get help.

Angeline quickly ran for the nearest q groups of men. The firing in the distance was getting worse again, and she at times a as she came close had to dart from tree to t tree to keep from being seen by the enemy sharpshooters whom she observed close by trying to pick off the Angelinian officers. In the meantime violet and her other sisters were working as hard as they could to dig Jennie and Daisy out of the debris pile before they smothered under it. Indeed they worked fr frantically but the thay struggled in vain they being unable to work fast as the dirt was heavy and also the spades. They were unsuccessful in their efforts and their mental suffering only grew worse.Violet felt she could give a million dollars if she could once get her two sisters from under the debris, and poor Angeline though thrown down several several times by the concussion of sudden and violent explosions managed to reach the group of men who were officers watching the battle with excitement.

"Oh come quick some of you officers."She screamed."Daisy and Jennie are buried in tons of earth and dying from suffocation.Oh sve save them plase pe please."

"What's that ?"Gasped one of the officers."Daisy and Jennie buried in earth.Confound it why did you not stay outside of the range of the enemys fire."

He quickly snatched Angeline up a nd quickly yelled to about fifty men ordering them to come with spades and shovels.It was a hard matter for them to get along saftly on account of the concussion of shells ripping and tearing the very earth and several of the men coming with spades and shovels were injured by shell fragments. It was quite a walk to the place where the two Vivian Girls were buried and the soldiers dreaded that they would be dead before they reahed the spot. Already the other little girls were almost overcome with their exhaustion but they had dug a con ' siderable bit away but nevertheless their agony of suspense was terrible. "Oh ain't there any one coming to save them."Screamed joice nearly-fainting."I wonder what has happened to Angeline!Oh please Dear God save them.Don't let them die."

Joice did faint a moment later. The other little girls were still digging when the soldiers came running up but it took them fifteen seconds before they dug away the earth taking care not to run the spades int o the little girls and then the two little girls were lifted out unconscious but not dead and all gave thanks to God as they had been saved in the nick of time. They were quickly brought to their senses, but the little girls lay on the bunks in general Hansons headquarters thanking God joyfully for their deliverance.

Violet and her sisters were taken to a better part of his headq uarters and out of the way of any stray shells of bullets.The firing which had increased again was severe again but there was no sign of the enemys attack being resumed again and general Hanson to end it decid decided to counter charge the enemy and drive the glandelinians back to their own pe position. It had been very hard work indeed to accomplish what the Angelinians had and he decided to send the Abyssinkilians forward and they began to move forward gallently.

While the Abyssinkilians were moving forward Hanson sent as many officers as he could spare to close up the o gaps in the other portion of the christian lines, and from the fact that the Abyssinkilians was going to counter charge violet and her sisters did not think the battle was going to cease and thought that this was only a lull in the enemys own attack. It was about 8 eight o-clock now when general Hanson announced that the enemy was entirely breaking thier lines and falling back. He Hardly had general Hanson made this statement when there came a frantic yell from some officers that startled all;

"The Abyssinkilians are being beaten back."

General Hanson Vivian and his generals were against. Another Abyssinkilian forced however to his right loomed up behind them and rushed forward and started to rally the other forces as there was danger of a sudden disaster. General Hanson and other officers frantically shouted orders to the under generals and officers, and general Francis pushmann coming up with another force of Abyssinkilians rushed into the blinding battlestorm blinding battlestorm.It was all feared that when the Glandelinian attack would strike again against the Abyssinkilian force the Abyssinkilian army would become a total wreck, for it seemed impossible for even them to stop the enemys return counter charge now.The glandelinians had struck with a tremendous crash, and the first Abyssin kilian army had went to pieces like snow on a furnace.

The other Abyssinkilian forces seemed engulfed in a sea of graycoats which had swept forward wildly, and it seemed as if all was lost but by the tremendous din many officers had been brought to their senses and while the Abyssinkilians were being withdrawn the Angelinian cannon was once more massed upon the foeand with the din of cannons the ground shook like an earthquake.Not one column of Abyssinkilians for that moment could esta stand before the glandelinian attack and streamed to the rear the glandelinians making a clean sweep, but the main Angelinia Angelinian front were not in any danger and they prevented the Abyssinkilian army from going to pieces by covering their retreat and sweeping the enemys lines with a deadly fire.

During all this clamor violet and her sisters inside general Hansons headquarters not having had any sleep for many hours unconsciously fell asleep.

Sometime later violet was the first to awake and so she awoke the others. They were surprised by the quietness around them and so they at once realized that the bloody battle had ceased.They went up to the attac and looked out the little window. They found that they were quite a distance from the terrible battlefield and tha that the enemys lines in the distance loomed up seemingly without a scar for all the trouble hey recieved and took all those two bloody d days. T he whole scene around around was like a paradi ze of snow and they realized that it was about elevel eleven o-clock at night. A high wind was blowing and the distant ground within rays of light was strewn with some of the wreckage of the fallen trees and war mate materials and further to their left and right they saw the christian line still intact.So the enemy had failed after all! And how glad they felt . Realizing that the battle was over and nothing to fear they went back to bed again and slept the rest of the time.

During the second day of the battle a squad of soldiers had an exciting experience as they had went out to scout and see how the position of the enemys concentrated attack was.

The plains upon which they came upon was very large and as out spies headed for theplainsthey saw that it was bordered with a long stretch stretch ofwoods, and this they entered. T hey could not see any of the human wolves in gray uniforms but yet they fancied they did d see them and indeed it was lucky the woods was dense and yet by the shapeof the trees it was more like a paradize in the winter and the same kind of trees grew in Calverinia ad grows in the United States Of America. Evety Every one of the spies was armed with rifles and pistols and violet and her sisters were with these soldiers as they ha believed that the woods would not be as safe as they appea appeared. They trudged on for quite a while untill they reached a st ream frozen over, but which was nevertheless impossible to cross on account of the ice not being firm and that the stream a many places had quicksands .

It was true that the stram strem st ream was not very deep but the leader know by the looks of the sand under some of the water not frozen over as yet that i it was quicksand and the most dangerous kind a at that.AAFor a while they did not kn n know what to do but at least he the leader decided to follow alongside the stream and see if they w could find a safeplace to cross.

At first scenting the stream or the danger I mean the rest did not agree but the leader said that he would not do anything else and that if they did not follow him he would turn back and not go on the scout. Violet and her sisters were the only ones who had a agreed and the others were still reluctant when the leader who was capt in Capt ian Baldwin started up the stream.

T hey walked for quite a distance but the result was that the stream grew wider, and also it seemed as if they were entering a dangerous swamp. The rest rest feared this as als o and even refused to go any further telling Captian Baldwin that they would rather go back than cont inue on through this swamp they were about to enter. The captian thought that it was the bes t thing to go back as even violet and her sisters even refused to go on, and yet he would only do as they wished, tak taking their own adi advise. As they started on their way back the captian again fa fancied that he saw the gleam of bayonets in the distance. Then after they traveled about a minute the they were suddenly surprised and surrounded by a score of hedious looking Glandelinians. The captian had a mind to use his gun but one of the soldie soldiers warned him not t o as it might mean their destruction. A score or more of the Glandelinians appeared a at that moment and the christian soldiers with Violet a and her sistss saw that resistance was useless . They were giants in a size taller than the other Glandelinians and fiercer and looked very powerful. A certain Glandai Landelinian who appeared to be the leader stepped out of the ring and spoke to Capt ian Baldwin in a strange Laten language. Not one of the Angelinians knew their language or understood what he said and the other Glandelinians quickly took away their weapons.Then the leader made a motion to the Angelinians to follow him and his men. They saw nothing else but to obey s o they started the Glandelinians following in a mass about them as they proceeded in another direction.

Violet and her sisters dreaded these Glandelinians very much and yet to be captured by them was no fun. The captian and the Angelinians were thinking of how to get the children free though they themselves might stay captives.

How far they went the captives never knew but after walking for several hours and difficult climbing they came to an opening in the woods where they saw a long line of breastworks mounted with cannons and far to the rear a seemingly endless city of tents with several larger ones with flags flying over them. There were so many of the Glandelinians that they could not be counted by the captives and as they were-brought into the city of camps a general tumult arose. The yells of theglandelinians were bloodcurdling mingled with the noise of their bugles, and the tum tum of their war drums. Violet and her sisters never saw saw such hedious faces and though they were too frightened t o move the savage Glandelinians dragged them into the camp without ceremony. The soldiers and children were r brought before a hedious looking Glandelinian who appeared to be an old colonel of the twentyf twenty first infintry i nfantry. Hedious as he was l in looks he was not so in heart and he upbraided the other Glandelinians without mercy for dragging Violet and her sisters by the hair. Baldwin and the rest were brought to a large hut about the size of a barn while violet and her sisters were placed in a seperatehut hute beside it. In a an hour after Violet and her sisters Violet and her sisters were then brought into the hut where the soldiers were placed. Then t o their surprise they saw the Glandelinians come in with anothe another prisoner who was Baldwin Jacobson. He was also placed among them and then the Glandelinians left them to themselves .

''Well we are in a tight fix.''C Said Captian Baldwin.

''It is true.''Said one of the men.

''I bé believed the swamp would have saved us from these horribleconfounded Glandelinians i f we had entered.''Said Captian Baldw in.''But as you others were fools enough to refuse to accompay me this is our reward:You are a fine set of brave men the whole lot of you.Even you vivian girls got the backbones of y jelly fishes and backed out.I'm ashamed of every one of you entirely.I'll report this i f we eve escape to general Hanson vivian.'

''What can we do anyway!''Asked one of the soldiers.''It is of the little girls we are thinking of and not ourselves. The Glandelinians might take it into their heads to kill the children and then sent us to their internment camp.''

''But they showed respect to the little girls did they not?''''Asked a third soldier.

''Well I'll tell you something about the Glandelinians.''Said Captian Baldwin.''First I'll tell you how I got captured during yesterdays battle. The first wave of Glandelinians that struck the christian line under general Baldwin swept his lines way back for from their position and I was wounded and knocked senseless by the concussion of an exploding sha shrapnell shell. When I came th to this morning I found myself among these Gladelinians tid up tied up with strong twigs. As to the other story. I once was a captive among them once before and a child slave. I was then a little boy. I have experienced their ways before I was rescued by the Calverinian Child slave rebels and a fierce ro lot of little rebels too worse than the enemy in their own fury. They wereled by a rebel leader called Osborne Sandersburg a fifteen year old boy and whom you all know is now known as general Concentinia Aronburg. The Glandelinians of all sects no matter what species or Religion are haters of Angelinian christian children and will murder them under ny any conditions. They only kill the little girls more frequently but the boys they make slaves out of them.Most child slaves were litt le boys during my time. Violet and her sisters are in greater dange than us men realize and we must find some way to save them as these Glandelinians we have been captured by are the fiercer sect of all known and they are the fierce Zimmermanni ans.Their general of course is a little kind hearted but when the men decide upon any case for child slaughter they appeal to higher aurthority and he himself cannot save violet ah and her sistes s isters for his interference would cause his disgraceful death.We must oursel ves find a way to save them.''

''But how can we do it!''Asked Baldwin.''We are captives out ourselves and their weapons are too murderious and every one of the Zimmermannians are the ''Never Miss'' soldiers and so for us it is impossible to escape. We can only trust in God and escape at his will''. It indeed seem useless to rescue the poor children:

THE ATTACK OF THE BLENGINS.
SAVED BY ANGELINIANS,AND THE CLASH AGAIN
BETWEEN THE CHRISTIANS AND THE NEMY ENEMY.

For an hour no one came near them except some Glandelinians who brought them their stale meals and then captian Baldwin had been taken out and put in another hut. But he decided not to stay there under any condit ions whatever and also decided to make his way back when most of the camp worr were all asleep and when the sentries were not looking. It was late when the whole city of camps was in slumber but yet Baldwin wishd wished to go back to his friends and the children and help them escape for now he c saw a chance.

There was a full moon tha that hour which was midnight and th to the surprise of all it wa was growing fearfully cold and as Captian Baldwin emerged out of the hut a fast moving object making a dronning roar like a hundred aroplaines at once completely blotted the moon out of sight, spreading a black gloom over the city of tents. Baldwin declared to himself that i he had never saw anything in the sky move so fast before a and wondered what it was. But as he came to the other hut the moon shone again. But Baldwin reached thehut without arousing or alarm alar ing alarming the Glandelinians, a entered and awoke the others. Fifteen minutes later the dronni ng noise had i ncreased, there was a serie series of peculiar thundering noises echoeing through the whole sky in some thing like complete drum stroke signals, and the Glandelinians were all astir and by the incessant talking and occasional shooting of volleys the prisoners knew that something was going wrong against the Glandelinians and wondered what it was. Bad Baldwin alone understood theor their language, and told his friends that Blengiglomensean creatures were hovering for some reason over a portion of the camp and that the Glandelinians were in consternation. The din outside was tremendous, the thousands of signal roars from the creatures high in the sky, the dronning shriek of their wings, the roll of war drums, the yelling and jabbering of the foe, and the continuous clattering of muskets frightened Violet and her sisters.

Fifteen minutes passed and then a number of the Glandelinian soldiers entered the hut, and then Violet and her siste sisters were seizd z seized roughly and the Glandelinians were about to drag them out when the soldiers finding the cords which bound them loose managed to escape the bonds and sprang furiously as the Glandelinians and during the struggle a strange close loud dronning roar broke the other sounds of confusion outside sounding like an approaching arceplane but distinct and deafening and nearer.Simultaneously a tremendous hush fell upon the whole throng outs ide for they had scatered in all directions there was a flash of some seemingly fiery body dashing past and followed by a long thr thunderous roar whidh seemed to split the earth.T Then came the whistling roar of something flying through the sky the structure othe prisoners were in suddenly lifted int o the air with a rush, while simultaneously something rushed past the overturned hut and scattered the Glandelinians about unmercifully. The christian r prisoners lay flat upon the ground to escape the fury of the attack made by a great Blengiglomensean creature which to their surprise was an angel winged Tuskorhorian.The creature even rushed around in a perfect circle scattering the camp fires in all directions. It was also observed that a blinding snowstorm had risin risen ad as the snow was falling in sheeted clouds.Captian Baldwin knew how to manage things in these sudden Blengiglomensean attacks and told the rest to do as he did for it was exseedingly dangerous to remain where they were as they might be mistaken for Glandelinians and killed. Each soldier grabbed a long stick or branch thrown down by the tail of the creaturewho demolished a thousand trees in its first onrush at the camp and by the help of these they managed to drag themselves to a high steep bank where they were safe from the screaming creatures.Here they took shelter and stayed untill the attacks of the Blengiglomensean creatures which lasted twenty minutes was over.However for a time they did not dare to leave their place of shelter untill morning and when morning came the blizzmd was still raging though the wind was not so strong, but just the same the sky was still dull and grey and it was getting colder, the snow being mixed with hail of all sizes.

As soon as everything was all rightthey decided to make their way back t o the christian lines where they could make good resistance in case the Glandelinians wo would persue them and so started on their way thanking the luck that brough their freedom. But they h had only trudged for a short distance through the deep snow when they were startled by a hue and cry behind them and looking back they saw more than a hundred fiercer Zi Zimmermannians in f in persuit and thethey already began firing.

"We must run for it now."Gasped Baldwin as he picked up violet."If those shots hits one of us it is good day with him."

But the christian line was nearer than they had thought and before they knew it they were right in front of one of the sentries who recognizing them allowed them to pass and sounded the warning tn that the enemy were approaching. The Glandelinians were st ill in pe persuit and now they came clearing in sight but delivsedelivered a general fire as thy they saw the swarms of christian soldiers.Then to the surprise of the Vivian Girls it was seen that the very Glandelinians were in the command of Brone Snakeley and his lieutenant Donald Canson.Captian Snakeley seemed seemed to know that the Vivian Girls had escaped, and he withdrew proposing to have the Vivian Girls captured again at all cost and within another hour brought a whole brigade of Glandelinians with him to assail that portion of the christian line and retake the little girls at all costs.

It was seen by the Angelinians that some attack was being prepared for and all the battery men were already making preparations to get their artillery into action.These were traind upon the Glandelinians led by Captian Snakeley who quickly withdrew after asort of petty attack but the main column of Glandelinians seemed to have no fear of the christian art illery or infantry men and came on all the faster. It was completely necessry for the artillery to be turned upon them and so general Hanson being notified what was thratening the christian officers ordered the men to do so, while other christian brigades set to work to get the big guns into action, and closed the portholes of the sheilds of the centemetor guns.

THE BATTLE OF LUCILLE CALMANNRINIA.

From behind trees and bushes the form foremost Glandelinians who had been checked kept up a severe fissiladeof hundreds of thousands of muskets while across the plains a long line in blue gray was approaching swiftly a perfect wave of Glandelinians and t he wave seemed to be divided into three portions and each portion seemed to try and outstride the other. The main section of this part of the christian army hastily concentrated near the town of Lucille Calmannrinia, just as t he christ ia artillery opened with. The foremost columns of the Glandelinians were shot to pieces, and the survivors at seeing the dreadful carnage became panic stricken but nevertheless the main line still came on silently.

The second line of guns of the christian ba batteries hd had also been placed into position and prepared for any emergency that happened to come . For all that morning the battle raged with sanguinary fury the enemy in that short time making fifteen desperate onslaughts, and the last of which told fearfully on the christian line, and which would have ended in disaster if Hanson Vivian and general OOsborne Slater had not hurled forward reinforcements, while at the same time the second line of batteries swept and tore the Glandelinian tidal wave and sending the survivors flying bak in the greatest confusion.

In this desperate contest however in striving to get his forces throug the blinding storm of war Hanson Vivian was srruck in the shoulder by a shell fragment and s eriously wounded. Simultaneouly to this the main line of enemy batteris had opened a drum drum fire of the greatest intensity, and the big shells barragd the christian columns that strove to move forward to the counter charge, and then general Osborne was killed and his divisions driven back in confusion. Already the christian losses wad fearful. Of all the Angelinians seemed to be getting the worse of it for many brigades of Angelinians had to run back to their own positions, but fortunately as the Glandelinians again made a storming charge general Robert vivian brought up several of his own divisions, and just as the enemy overthrew the christian line in his immediate front general Robert Vivians reinforcements opened a deadly fire all along the line mowing the Glandelin inians down likegrain before the thrashing machine. The whole Glandelinian -surge was a target for the main line of christian artillery, and the Glandelinians were again driven back with frightful loss in men and officers. Violet and her sisters watched the thrilling conflict from the main headquarters to which general Hanson was being brought, and when any immense mass of Glandelinians were seen to move forward close to the christian position they seemed to hideaway in smoke and when the smoke lifted none of them were seen again. General Brann had a narrow escape from an exploding shell and his aid was wounded.

There was a short lull after the last repulse the enemy suffered and then on they came again. With mingled cheers and deafening shouts, the forces of the enemy came on to resume the contest under cover of the fire of their artillery, and and swept against the christian lines with blood-curdling yells and in the midst of the increasing pandemonium from the fierce din of the conflict a large division of Abyssinkilians came up and general Julu threw his forces west of the assaulting enemy mande a turning movement, and and came down upon the enemys flank driving them back once more in confusion. When over their line was threatend by the wicked Glandelinians the Abyssinkilians offered no commnt comment and hurrie dly all the Abyssinkilian divisions made their way to the scene of deadly conflict as quickly as they could advance, the men shouting and yelling, for their fighting b, blood was aroused by the disgrace to which they had been put by the recent fleeing of the Angelinian columns and they were eager to wreck their terrible anger in some way. Furthermore as the fray was to be waged with general fury they welcomed the battle.Stationing themselves in front of the advancing enemy who c had carrid the Angelinian position at this portion they awaited thecommand which soon came from leade leader to leader;

''Are you ready?''

''Yes''Was the answer and then came the command''Charge''

And instant ly the Abyssinkilian leaders raised their voices in mi ghtly shouts and the Abyssinkilian armies fell fiercely upon the Glandelinians. First the infantry poured a terrific galling fire, then the two lines closed and terrible, and frightful, and painful were the wounds inflicted during the sanguinary hand to hand contest, and above the terrible battle cries sounded the shrieks and curses of the wounded Glandelinians, as they fell gravely injured or dying.Many on both sides were killed in the desperate hand to hand struggle thousands falling instantly but it did not last long as the enemy could not withstand the onset of the Abyssinkilians and also they did not at all like the looks of the attaking attacking Abyssinkilians.The Glandelinians gave way but the remainder lay flat on the ground and despite the fact that their leaders feared the Abyssinkilians would overwhelm their men they stood their ground manfully for three hours without flinching and general Baldwin onthe side of the enemy though wounded held his clm command his own line of cannon opening upon the Abyssinkilians, all that could be trained upon them this causing someconfusion among the Abyssinkilians but the survivors behind checked the panic and prepared for a final onset..

Suddenly with a deafening uproar of yells worse than the devil yell of the Glandelinians, the Abyssinkilians rushed forward with tremendous fury. The advancing force was under general Tidue Osborneis and so fiercely t did they sweep forward that despite all their efforts and superhamn supe superinman efforts also the Glandelinians being overwhelmed could not ststand agi nst them and they felt fled pre ciptitately back to their own position. In sweeping forward the losses of the Abyssinkilians was dearly br bought for the enemy had scathed their line with a dead y deadly fire and later on the Abyssinkilians aft er more desperate fighting took a line of works from the enemy, a and though the leaders upbraided their Glandelinian forces declaring them as cowards for fleeing beforetheir bitterest christian enemies they could not hold and twenty generals fell in their mad efforts to rally their gray columns and check the advancing Abyssinkilians.It was all over.The enemy line had been crushed and though Manley had not been actually in the battle with his main force his line nevert heless was so badly breanche breached that he had to withdraw tward Jennie Turner but appealed for aid for he knew general Evans would lay seige to his army as soon as possible.

CAPTIAN SNAKELEYS PLOT.

An hour after the battle genral general Hanson sent out many scouts to see wha what the next intentions of the enemy was, while Violet and her sisters who had been not far from the outskirt s of the christian lines and who were walking through a grove suddenly came within reach of Captian Snakeley who was standing under a tree with one of his hedious companions looking mightly ugly. Fa Fearing that they might be captured the little girls scampered away while the general they had seen was asked by Captian Snakeley;

''Why don't you capture their navy?''

t The great Glandelinian general looked at the captian in a savage way.

''What in the hell do you think I am?''He answered in a voice of thun der.''I just had a talk with your lieutenant ad and he told me the christian doh dogs are looking for you and that christian soldiers are scouring the country for you and will not give up attacking us untill t hey get you. Why don't you fight your own battles with them, and not drag me int o a qurrk qurral with people I do not know.Curses on their warships and the hands that made them.''

''So the Angelinians are in persuit of us?''Asked Captian Snakeley.

The Glandelinian general showed his hedious teeth in a horrible grin.

''What is that to me?''He said.''They may get you and not me.''

''What tha---''!

''You seem to be their worse enemy interrupted the Glandelinian general fiercely.''What is it that maks you stay and keep us he here? Wh y do you stay and keep us Glandelinians hse here when the soldiessoldiers are rightly persueing you for stealing their child friends eh? I'm not a fool to meet those bloodhounds when they are not for us.With an over whelming force of christians in pe persuit of us because you stole the children for some revengeful motive do you remain asking me to help you to get away.The hell you are able to fight your own battles. Besides Glandelinian general though I am, and as wicked as I am I dare say tha that I do not blame the Angelinians for being after you. You had no right to steal the children who did nothing to you.You do not know those Angelinian dogs, and how they are when they are aroused, being like an army of fiends.Go a and fight your own battles. I gave you two of the ships that belonged to our own navy to fight your way down the river qi with so you could escape.What more do you want?''Hissed the Glandelinian general vehemently showing his teeth like the grin of some ugly dragon.

''I can tell you why right away?''Answered Snakeley.''May b my bitter hate, my burning bitter hate wither and strike the hearts of all the christia christian dogs.''

The fa face of the Glandelinian general worked in a convusl convulsive manner and in a savage way his fist cli nched.

''So there is some revenge in your story I presume.?''

''Would you know why I hate all the christian dogs?''He went on. Why remain and retain you and the rest of your officers so close to the christian lines watching for a chance that before a long time will be mine to end the lives of any of the Vivian Girls I can recapture first, with a blow at her heart.? Listen then Guebaum Manley and I will tell you all or go to Bail?''

''I never asked you for bail.''Answered the Glandelinian general with asneer mingled with an ugly pout.''But go on and tell me why.''

''I onceeas an Angelinian my self, loved my country)))))''

''Loved your country?Bah. ''Interrupted the Glandelinian general with a deadly scowl.''Do you mean to say you loved your country when you turned a traitor over a trifle.? Bah I spit on you.But go on and tell mewhy you was sys such a black hearted fool to become a dastardly old Glandelinian like you are?''

Snakeley would have said something that was not pleasant if he dared, but he was afraid of the herculean Glandelinian general who was strong enough to tear a rock from a cliff, so he curbed his temper and went on;

''I was once an Angelinian, loved my country, with all my heart, with all the intensity of my soul and-------''

''I don't want to hear anything about your loving your country again.''Interr upted the -Glandelinian general with a dangerous lookin his eyes that startled Snakely.''Please leave that out of the whole s o story.Idon't want to hear that word love again.''

''Drat the old fool.''Hissed Snakeley to himself.''I wish I was not a weak stripling and I'd show him a thing or two''---Then he continued;

''Before the great Glando-Angelinian war opened I was to become a great christian general in the army of Angelinia who were going down to help the Abbisannians capture Crowley, and I was whooly happy at the thought , but the evil day came upon me for that old general Robert Vivian that bitter enemy of mine made Kindernine general in mystead, because failed to come in time be cause it was said there could not be any delay.

He was whooly prod proud of his position in the army of the christian dogs also.He also had three daughters and they have been slain by the Glandelinian soldiers by this time and to revenge their death only yesterday I heard he struck his first personal blow at the battle of Stanoks Creek, and after his victory there in which both sides lost hundreds of thousands in killed alone he made his way to Bondonia Anderean and in seeking to elude his forces general Platories gl. Glandelinians shut themselves up in the town of Nellie Calvsine and also pounce-ces-woolia where they were again attacked and routed in the bloody battle of yivianana along t a portion of the Aronburgs run and where over three hundred thousand of the Glandelinians were taken prisonss prisoners.I was then serving in the Glandelinian army as I am even now and the complete defeat and slaughter of my comrades in the two da desperate battles enraged me, and t o strike a blow at hisheart I attempted to make a move on his army as really I'm general Snakeley but go by the name of Captian as a disguise against the christian fce but at the battle of Nellie Rickson I was overwhelmd overw helmed as the christians when almost defeated brought up a bigger force, all Abyssinkilians and my army was routed.So to revenge it I will kill the most favorite daughters of general Robert yivian, and also him too to prevent the christian army from besiging Jennie Turner and I will do this as sure as the sun shines this minute. He hat es me because I have become a Glandelinian.''Snakeley's hedious sounding voice died away in a vengeful hiss....''It is joy t o see him and his christian dogs defeated in the war, to see me and my comrades persued, and I will put up wit h it it for I feel sure that thehour of terrible revenge is at hand. I might have liked violet and her sisters four times since Ibve I've seen them during my service in the army if it had not been for the cowardly conduct of the Angelinians who persued me and for the interference of the blizzard storms.

But now that does not sa satisfy.Violet yivian, or any of her sisters shall meet their terrible death on the side of yonder volcano, where a great gulf seems to reach way down int o the very bowels of the earth.And when I hold her over that steaming chasm I will laugh at her cries for mercy, for they will be like music to my ea ears. I will taunt and revile her and then when I have played with the christian girls a long enough, I will let her drop like a stone and listen for the dull thuds , for the rebound of her hated body on the hot melting rocks below.Then will my bitter hate be sati sfied.''
General Huebaum Manly Manley had a man as he was, shuddered as he listened to the story of the wicked Glandelinian, Snakeley. That he meant every word what he said there clearly seemed to be no doubt . Clearly violet Vivian's life was in danger from this fierce Glandelinian officer, and general Huebaum Manley knew it.
''General Robert Vivian does not know that I general Snakeley will fix his daughters to the horribleschasm at the side of the volcanic mountian, and that her body will be scourched to ashes in the depths of the bottom less crevice.It is just that he who sows the whirlwind shall reap it.''
The Glandelinia general Huebaum Manley turned away abruptly and wa walked tward his horse followed by his wicked comrade, and now as they trotte trotted back tward the Glandelinian camp they talked together of some thing else as unconcernedly as if there was nothing of great importance on his wicked mind, and yet the great Glandelinian general was planning to himself to prevent Snakeley from carrying out his fearful purpose that very night if possible and even at the risk of his own dis grace. Wicked as he was, he was braver than a spartian and besides he was the brother of gene general John Manley who had taken general McHollester Johnstons place. General Huebaum Manley however was a man that was never ba beaten in any scene, and Snakeley feared he would have a dangerous enemy out of Huebaum Manley, if he once aroused him, so he de decided to carry out his wicked purpose on the sly and when the Glandelinian general would be away somewhere so he could not interfere.

While Captian Snakeley and his comrades were rapidly climbing the high volcano a boy about seventeen years old attired in the dress of a Mormonuian was seated on a stone close to a deser ted hut near the brink of the chasm in the bright moonlight which lit up the clearing and made the sharp pieces of snow covered lava look weird. His name was Joseph Deldon and as he saw no prospective shelter in sight he had made up his mind to pass the night in the hut.
''Gracious I was never so hungry in my life.''He said.''My stomach is like a baloon it's ful of nothing but hot air. It is clear that I don't eat untill I reach the christian lines to morrow and tell the plans of the enemy which I have learned.By that time I'll be hungry enough to eat three or four square meals at all one time.Hello there is somebody co ing this way. Maybe he will be able to direct me to a dinner.....''
At that moment another boy whose name was John Scanlon and with a patch of fruit on his back and sweating furiously despite the cold and puffing like a grampus dashed out of the wood into the clearing where the hut was.He seemed to be in a big hurry which struck Joseph Deldon very strange.
''Hello my heart.''Cried Joseph Deldon.''Where bound in such a rush?''
John Scanlon stopped and stared at the lone figure of the supposed Mormonian boy and seeing that there was nothing dangerous about him he advanced quickly.
''Who are you my m Mormonuian friend?''Replied the boy.
''Joseph Deldon but no ordinary Mormonuian but an Angelinian s py.'' Said the lad.
''Are you alone?''
''I was untill you came along my Abbisannian friend.''Said the young Angelinian with a grin.''You look as if you had been taking a bat h in the sea this cold night.No wonder of course, if you have been climbing this mountian in such a rush with that heavy pack on your back.What 's in it . A big lot of eats?''
''I'm an Abbisannian boyscout and my name is John Scanlon the son of general Scanlon of Angelinia army.But we must get out of sight my dear friend precious quick.''
''Out of sight? What for?''Cri d o Cried the surprised Deldon.
''There ais a crowd of rascally Glandelinians coming this way and if they see us, they may drop us down that yawning chasm there.''
''Goodness I did not know that this section to the rear of the christia christian lines wa was infested by the Glandelinians.Is the whole region swarming with Glandelinians?''
''I guess not but this bunch has fired general Hansons headquarters after making a raid, and stole the most prettiest little girl that I have ever seen.''
''You don't say? They must be a regular lot of Glandelinian m kidnappers to boot. Where shall we hide?''
''We might as well wait in this old hut untill those Glandelinians go by.Come on.I think I hear them coming in the distance.Give me a lift with this pack of mine for I'm almost t ired out with the hasty climbing.'' Josp Joseph Deldon all excited grabbed one end of John's bag and they quickly disappeared inside the hut shutting the doors after them to avoid discovery. After investigating that a queer wide ladder led t o a small loft which had a sashless window overlooking the open space in front they went up and after shutting down the trap door and packing the pack on t op of it they stretched themselves on the floor which was covered with grass and peered cautiously out in the direction where they heard the soud sound of approaching footsteps. Presently six ugly looking Glandelinians rushed out int o the open followed quickly by three hundred and fourty others and the Glandelinian officer Snakeley with poor violet yivian in his arms.Although the brutal Glandelinian had carried her for mils miles without even a moments rest he did not appear to be exhausted at all, as he was a very strong man. The poor little girl now seemed to revive, and laughing wickedly he laid her on the hard snw snowcovered doorstep of the hut.
''I hope these rascally Glandelinians are not going to stop here long.'' 'Said John Scanlon to his friend.''They might for sudden suspicion of enemis enemies within range take a good notion to investigate the this hut, and then they would overhaul us and mab maybe kill us and take our belongings.''
''Goodness but they are a wicked lot if there are only three hundred and fourty six of them.Goodness here comes a hundred more, and they are coming from the bushs bushes.''

PART TWO OF CHAPTER THIRT Y. NINE

SNAKELEY'S DESPERATE ATTEMPT.
THE VIGOROUS PERSUIT, AND THE RESULT.

Tward night time when all the christian camp was quiet and still, and the guards were pacing up and dow n a complete uproar and a hubbub arose in the direction of general Hanson yivians headquarters, and through the cold evening air came a shrill scream of a female child a at that, sounding very much like the voice of poor little violet yivian.Other female screams added to the tremendous excitement, while a swarm of flaring torches fluttered a around and vanished, soon there was some hew heavy firing of musketry for several minutes and soon a burst of flame lit up the plain in front of general Hanson s main position.

"Ho what does all this exc excitemeny mean!"Cried general Robert yivian starting tward general Hansons burning headquarters while yards ahead of him ran many of the soldiers alarmed by the thought that poor violet and her sisters were in danger. A bright glare brightened and illumined the wide plaij as general yivian and all the soldiers within the region dashed out on it as fast as they could run.One part of general Hansons headquarters was blazing furiously three hundred tents and six hundred huts were on fire, there was a confusion of volleys, and violet's sisters were screaming for help, while others were going on like mad. The rest of the Angelinians were no coming up on the run while the Angelinian governer general looked around for his daughter violet but could not see her anywhere. Crouching on the ground wounded, with her face buried in the snow he saw Joice almost crazed by indescriable terror. Grasping her by the arm he shook her a bit roughly;

"Where is your sister violet?"He asked furiously angrily."Was it she I heard scream so piteously?"

"Oh papa, my dear sisters, violet has been carried off by the Glandelinian Snakeley and a hundred of his crew demolished your no house while five thousand attacked and surprised your camp and fierce men they were.They set the camp on fireand also Uncles headquarters, and ran off tward that big mountian over yonder."

General Robert Vivian was more than furious with rage when he learned the facts and swore he would have Snakeleys life, and immediately the under officers organized a persuing party while all meas ure measures under orders were being made to vto intercept thefugitives so they could not reach the Glandelinian camp, and hundreds were prepared to go after the futfugitives and at once. The soldiers to persue were all armed with rifles and revolvers, and with half a dozen Abyssinkilians and a hundred Abbisannians to beat the bushes ah ahead the expidetion started within half an hour after the fire had been put out and the house saved. Some miles ahead of them Captian Snakeley carrying the unconscious little child in his stalwart arms and followed by his hundreds of wicked comrades was pushing his way up the sides of the volcano.Captian Snakeleys object in carrying off violet yivian was for the purpose of drawing general Hanson and his brother to the placewhere he now inte d intended to kill either one of them besides poor violet.He knew that his bitter enemies generals Hanson and Robert yivian would have him tracked and also track him and his Glandelinians up the sides of the volcano so he was aining for the spot, where he knew where the horrible abyss was to be. He did not expect that the governer generals would come themselves however after all but he had thus plans for seperating either his two enemies from their parties in his insaeinsane desire to decoy the leader of his persuers to their dea ths, but however Capt ian Snakeley did not for one sing le moment forsee the difficulties and danger he was bringing hims upon himself and his comrades. It is true that he did realize in a dim kind of way that a bloody encounter might take place between him and his followers on one side, and the rescue party on the other, but he did not believe that such a scrap would prevent his wicked plans.He and his followers were a armed with all kinds of weapons but their safty from a long fatal bloody death struggle with an overwhelming number lay whoo wholly in managing to get out of the way of those who came in quest of them.

Two of the last comers ran up to Capt ian Snakeley and reported that Colonel Thompson and all the rest of the Angelinian soldie soldiers and proceeded by Abyssinkilians and Abbisannians were coming up the mountian.

"Well!"Asked Captian Snakeley."Which path is the christian dogs following!"

"The christian dogs are following the path that la leads here."Was the reply he got.

"Good."Gritted captian Snakeley with a dark look.

Violet yivian recovered her senses at that moment and started up.

"Where am I!"She cried sadly and looked around in a puzzld puzzled way.

"On the sides of a big volcano violet yivian."Repi Replied Captian Snakeley grimly.

"On the sides of a bif volcano!"She exclaimed."And you have brought me here!"She added as she recollected what happened at general Hansons headquarters.

"I have brought you here."Replied Capt ian Snakeley.

"What does this mean!"Violet demanded impervously."How dare you who are nothing but a despised traitor and a Glandelinian carry me off a second time when I have done you no harm."

"My object violet yivian was to merely use you as abait to draw general Hanson or Robert yivian up here, but have made some changes in my plans since as I knew they would not follow but organize a persuing party."

"Why should you want to draw my father or uncle up here? What plan have you in view!!!!"

"To kill them or whoever I grab."Hissed Captian Snakeley savagely.

"Kill my uncle or father! Are you mad Captian Snakeley?"

"Ho I'm not mad Viole violet yivian, though the terrible wrongs I have suffered at the hands of the Abbisannians and the Angelinians during the beginning of this Glandelo-Angelinian war were enough to make me so."

"What wrong have the Angelinians done you.Hf If they have punished you it is because you deserved it."

"It's not the punishment I havesuffered from them, though providence itself knows that none of it were deserved. But any wrong which you little dream that causs causes me to seek the death of eit her one and you too if I fail on them: It is even more than a wrong, it is a crime that they even Hanson yivian or your faher fat her are guilty of, the weight of which shall this night draw either one down to the bowels of the earth."

"Captian Snakeley you must be or s arecertainly out of your senses to speak this way of my father or uncle. You yourself only have committed a crime in carrying me off against my will, and general Hanson will have you put to death as a traitor if you are caught.But bad man as you are I really feel sorry for you and would save you if I can from the terrible conseque ces of your bold rash ness.Return me to my fathers army or bring me to the christian lines at once and I will ask him to forgive you all your wrongs."

Captian Snakeley laughed in a sac sarcastic or scornful way.

"Were I desposed to do as you wish your efforts would be of no service to me General General Hanson yivian or your fat her would have no mercy on me because I'm a traitor, I know the dogs. But violet yivian you argue in vain. I have been planning this thing since I reached Jennie turner with the retreating Glandelinian army and now I'm about to carry it out.Soon the leader of the persuing Angelinians with his force of christian dogs will be here at this spot and then after my my comrades have scatt ered his men after a fight with them I shall make a prisoner of their leader and kill him or either one I have captured."

"You would not dare."

"You do not know me Violet yivian . I dare even more than that."

"What mean you?"

"I dare to ke kill even you if I fail to have revenge on governer yivian or his brother by foiling the christian persuers."

"Kill me if you fail to kill the Angelinian lader leader.?What madness is this.Seek not to terrify me by such folly.Remember that my guardian angel will save me and also remember the station you are placed in, and remember mine."

''I do.''Answered gnakeley with a deadly frown followed by a wicked laugh.
''General Hanson yivian shall lose his dearest neice and beside I will kill him the first chance I get.But that will not matter much to him since someday he will lose his li fe as well.And so will your father if he is caught.''
''I see that I have ben deieved in you.You are worse than a wicked man. I demand that you take me home, back to the christian lines.''
''And I refuse.''
''You will haveto as you cannot scape the Angelinian persuers.''
''After I have fulfilled my just oath and wipd en dther one of these enemies of mine of the face of the earth it will be necessary that I will fly from Calverinia and all is prepared to that end, ad you shall be a companion in my flight, and for a worse fate if you refuse to do as I wish.''
''Never . I would rather die first.Since you refuse to take me back, begone, -and le leave me to find my on own way to the christian lines Captian gnakeley.''
''Your -haughty airs will not save you Violet yivian.''
''But God will, and so will my courage.I fear not your threats or menacing looks.The blood tha flows in my veins comes from an ancestry that knows not fear.''
The ''The bold Angelinians ought to be driven to fear curse the christian dogs of hell.The bold front you assume serves to increase my ha hate of all christian dogs.My companion you shall be at all costs, or risks, so it is useless for you to try to avoid your fate.''
''Dog, rather would I die than accompany you.''
''One christian is enough to lose that way.Come -be reasonable since there is no escape for you.Let us swear to turn from God for all etenity.''
''Stand back, don't dare approah me.''Cried yiolet as the wicked old Glandelinian made a motion as if to grab her by the arms.
''Dare not? I your master? You shall see that my will, not your own yiolet yivian rules your destinty.''
He seized hs by the arms and was about to drag her tward the horrible chasm when from her bosom she suddenly flashed a small silver plated revolver before his v ery eyes.
''Release your grip or I will shoot you as I would a snake.''''She cried.
Taken aback by such sudden surprise Captian gnakeley recoiled with an ejaculation.Joseph Deldon and yohn gcanlon who had been for a few minutes interested obsr observers of the foregoing scene looked down on as thrilling a scene in real life, as any mimic one on a stage.
''Small as she is she is a corker for bravery.''Whispered yohn.''A regular little Angelinian indeed.''
''She has got him at her own mercy.''Said Deldon.
''Should say she has.''Answered gcn Scanlon.
''You see you rascal of a traiter I'm not as helpless as you think, though I am only a little girl.''Said yiolet.''The insults you have bea been guilty of tward me would almost justify me in shooting you down, but as I'm not a murderess and do not wish to kill you through mercy, I will give you your worthless life. To the christian lines I will now return alone.Seek not to detain me.If you do your blood will be on your own head.''
The brave little Angelinian girl now backed-away keping keeping her revolver leveled and her eyes on capt ian gnakele y. But unfortunately for her one of captian gnakeleys companions suddenly came upon the scene behind her.
''Ha Creole, you are just in time.Seize the ima impudent ,little rebel girl and disarm her.''Cried Captian gnakeley.
The new comer comprehended the situation and at once obeyed orders by spring at yiolet, seizing her by the arm and tearing the pistol from her fingers.She uttered a scream of utter dismay.
''You are in my power.''Cried the Glandelinian general triumphantly.
''Never, he/ help, help.''Cried the little girl frantically.
Whether the two boys in the hut would have answered her appeal er not no one could tell or would ever know, for at that moment an Angelinian soldier suddenly dashed from the bushes rifle in hand and sprang to poor yiolet's rescue. With a blow he stretched t he Glandelinian in the snow, and caught the little girl in his arms quickly.
''Germaine yensin.''Cri Cried poor yiolet re yiolet recognizing him and giving forth a cry of joy.
''Yes my dear little friend t he Vivian g girl.''
''You will protect me?''
''With my life if need be.''He replied absolutely.

Capt ian gnakeley was taken aback by this sudden turn in evenets but he quickly recovered himself.
''Down with that traitorous devil Germaine jensin.''He said to his approaching comraces oo comrades with a deadly scowl.
''Stand back.''Cried Germaine raising his rifle.''The first who dares to advance wil/will recieve a shot in the br brain.''
One Glandelinian soldier more active than the rest and cunning almost as a fiend quickly picked up a lump of ice and flung it with such good aim at the brave man that Germaine Jens in staggered back dazed and bleeding. Then five of the Gladelinians jumped on him and secured him.
Gag the little girl Creol e and away withbher to the rocks, whse I will join you soon.'' Gracefully the Glandelinian chief stepped forward and picked up the rifle that had fallen from Germaines hands.Then he grimly watched t he Glandelinians secure Germaine who was making fruitless struggles in the hands of four Guarians.
''Throw him int o that hut and shut the door.''He said scornfully after Germaine had been rendered helpless.His ordss was obeyed.
''Away now my dear comrades.I hear the approach of the enemy. Decoy them down yonder pat h you swabs while I will try to cut off one of the christian leaders and settle scores with him.''
After one shrill scream that echoed from rock to rock and reached the ears of the Angelinians and the rest of the persuers who with capt ian Baldwin and three of the Abyssinkilia s were coming up the path that led to the hut.Violet was gagged and borne off by a couple of the wicked Glandelinians.After disposing of Germaine the rest of the party followed them, while capt ian gnakeley retired int o the shelter of the bushes.
The sudden and unexpected overthrow of Germaine jensin took peldons breath away. He judged that as Germaine jensin had a rifle it would be b necessary for him and his companion unarmed as they w ere to ship in, bjt but at this unexpected turn of events neither of the concealed boys made a-move to discover themselves. Deldon would have made an effort to save Germaine Jensin but the odds against the success of any move he and Deldon might have made deterred him, for the ugly way gnakeley acted, showed showed that he would stand no more interference. So peldon and yohn watched to see what would be done to Germaine.When he was bound and thrown int o the hut and th the door shut upon him peldon chuckled.
''Just wait untill those Glandelinians go and we will set him free in a jiffy.'' He said.
In a few minutes the clearing on front of the hut was deserted.
''You stay here and I will attend to my friend bAowU'Deldon said to his companion.
He crawled back t o the trap, removed the pak, pack, and decended the ladder. Hardly had he gone when Capt ian Baldwin Hanson, Lued Lieutenant Robert Saunders, colonel Jimmie nderson and the Angelinians with the Abyssinkilians and Abbisannians dashed into the clearing. Hanson had expected to find Germaine Jensin here for his beloved comrade had ran on ahead, also yiolet, whose scream he had heard.But there was no onein sight at all.
''We must go further on.''Said Robert.''Forward.
The Abyssinkilians dashed ahead into thebushes ad Hanson, Robert , and Sergeat Gannon were following when there came the crack of rifles, and a score of the Abyss nkilians and ten of the Angelinians fell, then again came the crack of rifles, and Robert Saunders fell wounded to the ground. The report of the rifles, and his cry of pain and the falling Abyssinkilians halted the rest.
''Help me Baldwin.''He cried.''I'm shot.'' Baldwin much surprised went to his aid.
''Are you hurt much?''He asked.
Ere Robert could reply, Capt ian gnakeley dashd out of the bushes, clubbed his weapon and struck at Baldwin Hanson, but quick as a flash, Hanson dodged the swing and struck the Glandelinian officer in the jaw kocking out nearly every tooth in his left jaw, and stretching the rascal in full length in the snow. As he had delivved the blow he also slipd slipped on some i ce and slide part way down the mountian side colliding with Robert and another officer carrying them beyond the range of captian gnakeley.Had this not happened nakeley would have at last been a prisoner but before the Angelinians could reach the place whre he had been knocked down by Baldwin, he had gotten to his feet, and nursing his lacerated and bleeding jaw, made away with his rv revolvers drawn to shoot down his persuers in case thy came too near.

''Drat that Baldwin Hanson for a Smpskn Sampson.''Gasped Snakely.''I'll think twice before I will tackle him at close qu quarters again. He has a hand like a wedge of cast iron rolled up twice. I never knew he was so strong. Oh-h-h-h-h-h my jaw, how it hurts. Curses on him for that blow. He almost broke my jaw besides. O-O-O-O-O)-Oh-h-h-h-h''

Seeing that he was was bafled, he sep sped off with nearly six g teeth which had been knocked out of his jaw Cat ian Snakeley rushed off to where Violet had been taken and found her asleep.

''Sleep on Angelinian beauty.''He muttered with an ugly scowl as he remembered the blow.''You are going to die anyway in spite of all mankind and your own aversion.With the setting of the moon I shall gladly awaken you to the realization of your horrible and deadly position once more for I can dda delay your terrible death death no longer.''

He cackled very softly as if the prospect ahead pleased him? After that not the slightest sound did he make nor did he move untill the moon had hid her face behind a high long ridge that marked the distat defines of the valley beyond the volcano. Then he quickly aroused himself and catching Violet roughly by the arm shook her like a slave.

''Awake Violet Vivian, arouse yourself.''He said in as cross a tone as he could assume.

Poor Violet started up and looked around her in a dazed way.

''The trees, the sky, am I dreaming st ill?''

T hen her bo ue blue eyes rested on the hedious Glandelinian officer.

''No, no it'was theshorrid reality.''She cried shrinking away from him.

''We are waisting time''Said Captian Snakeley.''The moon had set and we must leave here for the ce crevice.''

''The crevace ?''She said with a sinking of the heart .

''Yes there you will have the permission to go to the bowls bowles of the earth.....''

''I will not go.''

''Yes you will go. You will go where I go. By sunrise you wil be lying a mass of broken bones and torn flesh in the depths of the crevice and then you will be gone blame you, and the world will be well rid of you.''

''You will murder me?''She cried with a su shudder.

''I will avenge my wrong, cäl it murde asyou will. I cäl it vengeance and i it will be a just one.An eye for a tooth, and a tooth for an eye, let the punishment be to fit the crime. At any rate you will get your deserts.''

''If you will indeed kill me God will punish you.''She cried looking at him with horror.

''Don't you mention his name again .''Hissed Snakeley vehemently and with a fierce pout.

''Heaven have pity on me.I realize that I m in your power.Why will you not have -mercy on me and relas release me?''

''Captian Snakeley laughed.

''Come ''He said.''It's time to go.''

''No, no.''She cried cri ed shrinking back.

''Come we have alredy lost much time.''Said Captian Snakeley with a scowl and seizing her by the arm.....

With a scream that w awoke the echoes of the mountian she broke away and ran twad the path.

''Stop that little girl she's got to die.''Cried Snakeley to the Glandelinians who had sprung to their feet .

Violet was recaptured and carried screaming back to captian Snakeley who grabbed her in his arms and with a laugh that was like that of a real fiend he seized the helpless little girl by the throa and chocked her with all his might to make her stop screaming.

''I have you in my power at lat.''He gritted putt ing his hedious face close to the sweet face of poor Violet.''You though a little girl have always known me, the despised Ca t Captian Snakeley.How I have dreamed of this hour.How I laugh at the futile efforts to pull away hand hands of steel which is chocking you good.I will kill you since I failed to do so t o ca capt ian Baldwin of the Angelinian colonel and for that blow that Baldwin gave me on the jaw. But I have no time to fool with you.For the rest of the christian dogs might be here at any moment and I would not lose my reveng e for allh the good gold that is in the world.Neither if my life wa was taken for it.Come tobyour horrible deadeäh death the death you have not yet faced throughout your many perils od days gone by.''

''But Violet is not to blame for it and general Hanson did not take your place as he had always before a higher position than you will or could ever get in your life. General Hanson and Robert Vivian told me themselves t hat it was all your own faui fault for not speking up for yourself.''

''But general Brono Vivian was the cause of it. I had to stay late to bid my wife and ch l children good bye and they were killed by the Glandelinians during the battle at Wickey Lason between the Glandelinian armies and the Abbisannians. Had they not followed the Glandelinians up to my house she and the children would still be alive and we would have been happy toget her.Oh the memory drives me frantic.''

At thä moment the other party of christians led by the other officers came rushing up. Captian Snakeley saw them and knew that not another moment was to be lost but in throwing Violet he threw her too far from his aim and she did not go near the abyss but before hecould go t o her he had to dash away as the Angelinians fired upon him but one of the other Glandelinians who was more rascally than Snakeley grabbed Violet and prepared to cast her into the crevice. Not know ing that she was in his grasp the Angelinians fired a volley at the Glandelinians just as Snakeley darted out of sight into some bushes. With a fearful cry the rascal threw his arms forward tossing the little girl from him and plunged into the crevice while quick as a flash a few comrades of his who wa was going to his aid turned and plunged into the bushes followed by the bullets of hundreds of rifles. After discharging his rifle Germaine Ja Jensin rushed to the edge of the crevice and heard the sound of the rax rascals body resounding in dull thuds from rock to rock in its decend into the fathomless abyss. That he was alrsady dead there could be little doubt aand yet he had died the very death he had attempted on poor Violet who lay senseless near the brink of the gulf on the other side .

''He is a goner.''Sq aid Deldon coming up.'' His was a an awful death. Both of these scoundrels must have been down on the poor little girl like a carload -of pig-iron.''

''He was.''Said Germaine lifting Violet.''But one of them died the very same death himself. The worse wild beasts are tame compe compared to the ferocity of these Glandelinians when driven frantic by sorrow and despair.''

The others had started in the chace of that Glandelinian and Snakelry and they could be heard tearing through the bushes ahead. There was a perfect fussilade for the foe kept up a running fight. Captian s Snakeley and his lieutenant however knew the range better than the christians and easily eli eluded them. They hid untill they had all passed them him and his comrades in the snug retreat to which they hä had retired with their fair prisoner before taken by captian Snakeley. Germaine Jensin anxious to help Baldwin and the rest determined to follow the path taken by the Glandelinians who had carried Violet off with them at Snakeleys orders before he came for her again to put her to that horrible death. It was Deldon who told them in what direction the Glandelinians had gone for he and John had watched them depart with the fair prisoner. Before making a start with Deldon ad and John who agreed to go with him, Germaine devoted his attention to the senseless child and they succeeded in revinig the little girl who was brought back by two stalwart christians to the christian lines. Oh how glad were the remaining soldiers and Violet's sisters at her return. The meeting was indescrib indescribable and they kissed and hugged each other for a long time. In the me meantime Germaine Jensin and the two boys took up the persuit of the fleeing Glandelinians who were cut off from the Glande linian e army. One hour passed away. The moon still shining in the western sky near the horizon shone into a small gorge in the mountian range inacessable except by a small path which led up through a dark mass of brush snow and lava and ice glaizers.At the back of the gorge was a rushing fall of red hot lava which fell like the sa shape of a fiery bridal veil a fuol two hundred feet without int erruption, and then formed a boiling rushing torrent that went its sinuious way to the rive river of molten lava below. This threw a dazzling glare seen and felt for a long distance in oppresiveness and the warmpth of the lava made the early December air like spring and below their feet the snow was a thawing slush.

Behind that hot lava fall on a level with the steam filled gorge t he rocks sloped inward in the form of a clift forming a narrow path or outlet from the gorge in the rear. Brono alone knew of this secret r ret reat and because f of it he knew he could not be cornered in this gorge by his enemies if they came upon him there.

He now let go his horrible grip on her throat and carried the st ruggling litt le girl and laid her face downward to the very edge of the horrible crevice where hot fumes which would suffocate any one within two minutew mimutes arose from its fathomless depths depths below.

''Look down.''Cried Captian Snakeley fiercely forcing Violets face down, so that she began to suffocate.''It is here where you will fall, and you shall fail to escape my hated intentions. Here you will meet your terrible death through my hatred you little christian dog. Sá gaten whom I ar adore had called for veg vengeance since that fatal day when I was banished for failing to report in the ranks in time.He had come to me in my fair dreams and urged me under pains of death to revenge the wrong. I swore g again and again that I would do it, and that some christian general or you should dis in the depths of some volcanic chasm, and since I fdled on a christian gensal now your time has come.'' Yiur bones will never be found for they will ly and burn to ashes in the jagged depths of this crevice you christian dog, and you shall be there if you wish or not, and shall find the lava you can burn in, and shall be there untill the end of the world.Where your soul will be I do not know, but I'd rather see it roast to perdition. Ah your struggles ¢ for air will not help you for I have you clutched in a grip of steel and you are at my mercy. You had no mercy on me you dirty little christian dog. Neither do you have any mercy on King Procile and you sha'll harenone from me you christian dog. How does that grate your soul.!''He cont inued shaking the litt le girl savagely.''This is my hour of vict ory. Look down and see the horrible death that is beckoning you.Ha,ha,ha, you tremble puppy dog for fright at your horrible fat e has struck you dumb.You ought to suffer from strangulation and al the misery that could be inflicted for all-eternity.''

At this juncture Germaine Jensin released by Peldon from his bonds rushed out of the hut followed by his friend and looked around. In the beautiful evening he saw the fug figure of violet vivian struggling in the cruel grasp of the avenger upon the edge of the fearful pre crevice. He at once understood the horrible sit uation for he himself having heard of snakeleys threat against the child did not forget it. He had such a great love for this dear little girl who had proved herself a human angel in many ways that he did not proposed to see her sacrificed if he could prevent it. Snatching up a rifle one of the fallen Angelinians had dropped he covered the Glandelinian chief wit h it and cried;

''Stop you cruel villain Captian Snakeley. You shall not murder the little girl.''

''Ha,haha, you have got free?''Exclaimed the Glandelinian glaing down at him.

''Yes and I hold your w orthless life in my hands.I do not wish to harm you without force captian Snakeley but at all hazards you must release the poor little vivian Girl ''

''Release the poor little vivian Girl?''Laughed Captian Snkeley.''I'll release her.''

He lifted the screaming, pleading little girl in his arms as if she were a feather and held her over the crevice from which a how hollow roaring sound seemed to come mingled with a strange distant booming sound as if the volcano was breaking into eruption.

''Hold or I'll fire.''Cried Jensin.

''Fire then and we will both go down togethse You cannot save the little girl Germaine Jensin. She dies as surely as the sun shines in the other side of the world. She dies if I have to dis with her.''

Captian Snakeley really meant what he said and G d God alone could only save her from this maniac of which he really was in wickedness alone. The rascally Glandelinian officer was even willing to sacrifice his own life to get revenge on the Angelinians by killing poor violet vivian. Germaine Jensin comprehended the situation ad he paused with his finger in an irresolute way.

''A h ha I see you refuse to fire.''Laughed the Glandelinian officer tauntingly.

''For heavens sakes do not d sacrifice the poor little girl in that horriba way.Remember it would be worse than murde.''Replied Germaine Jensin.

''Are not her father and uncle guilty of a bigger crime too?''

Asked Captian Snakeley. ''Did he not cause me to be banished from the raranks and from the country because I failed to come in time?''

Hissed Captian Snakeley.''I'm not a bit afraid of hell itself and I defy anyone living to send me there.''

One of the Glandelinians was on the pawatch in the pat h many yards away and the others were sleeping in the shadows of the rocks . Another prisoner a little twelve year old boy exhausted by the strain he had undergone was slumbering restlessly near the falls of lava while standing by his side in the moonlight was Brono Snakeley his tumultious soul ignoring sleep and fatigue. When the time came to continue the rea retreat tward the Glandelinian camp which he hoped to reach Brono awakened the prisoner and soon they all started tward the end of the falls where a log spanned a single steam filled chasm but intervened between the fiery cataract and the gorge.

The prisoner was struggling and screaming t o get away.....

''Be quiet you fool.''Said Brono as he stepped on the log.''If you cont inue your foolish and useless struggles we will fall on the hot rocks below and be burned to ashes in the lava..''

It was a dangerous footway that he started to cross but over they crossed just as the Angelinian officers and their followers rushed on the scene attracted by the screams of the prisoner. T hey saw Brono Snakeley proceed ing the escaping Glandelinians with the prisoner in their grasp p outlined against the glowing lava fall.With rifles cocked the brave christians dashed after them.

''Help soldiers save me.''Screamed the prisoner as he saw the brave officers proceeded by his hundred s of followers.

''Come back you scoundrels.''Cried one of the Angelinian officer officers aiming his pistol á at Brono Snakeley while suddenly the very Glandelinians who had crossed opened fire on them,,,,,, but the christians ha hastily returned it while the Abbiannians also opened fire bringing some of the Glandelinians down. Bronoe seeing his losses paused with his foot close t o the catara cataract of molten lava, for he knew that one of the persuers could easily put a ball nto him at that short range, but he knew also that the christians would not fire for the prisoners safty depended upon his own. Brono Snakeley knew that and Robert Saunders knew tha that though in his rage he felt like firing anyway as it was surely easier for the poor boy to dis by a bullet than be in the hands of the rascally Glandelinians.

''Well Captian Saunders.''Said Captian Snakeley cooly and tauntingly; ''What are you going to do?!!!!!!''

''Come back you villain and hand over that little boy.''Said Captian Saunders.

''I will not do so.''Was the answer.

''You are risking his own life as well as yours in that dangerous spot, for I swear I'll fire anyway if you don't come bak back.You dirty Glandelinian dogs cannot trifle with us Angelinian hell hounds as you call us. And you cannot escape to your own lines because the Angelinians else where will see to that. Your escape is cut off at every point outside and inside the christian lines. And there is but a foot between you and the lava torrent.

CHAPTER FOURTY.

THE ANGELINIAN OFFICER KILLS BRONO SHAKELEY DESPITE THE PRISONERS PERILIOUS POSITION IN HIS RAGE.

''You should say my dear sir that there is but a foot between me and safty.''Laughed Brono Banteringly as the firing on both sides now increased.

''Are you mad?''

''Do I look it Captian Saunders.''?

''Come back in the name of heaven for I will shoot you if you don't, no matter if it means the death of you and the rest including the boy, for I tell you once more us Angelinians are not to be trifled with.''

''You are wrong.''Replied the Glandelinian camly.''See?''

He stepped wholly on the rocky ledge, and then with the movement of one foot sent the lof thundering down into the chasm.

''My heavens what in thunder is he doing? They are lost now.'' Cried the Angelinian captian agash, his blood seeming to turn cold at the prisoners perilious position.

''Wrong again.''Laughed the Glandelinian.''I have simply prevented you and your followers from persueing me any further and also from following my other Glandelinian comrades. Good bye Robert Saunders, the dirt y christian puppy. Never wil you gaze on this little boy who is going t o a horrible dea death.''

With another laugh that bore a triumphant ring as the other Gla Glandelinians disappeared behind the fall of lava, leaving the Angelinians gazing in blank amazement at the vacant spot occupied by them a moment before, he started to follow but quick as a flash six of the Angelinians who were crack-shots brought their weapons to their shoulders and fired. Brono Snakeley dropped the boy and without aery pitched headlobg into the chasm below.
''Great guns where have those other Glandelinians gone?''Cried Baldwin Hanson.''Gosh but they must have been carried down by that terrible falls of lava.''
''No there must be some kind of a hole in that rock alright, for they seemed to vanish behind the t orrent of lava.'' Robert Saunders spoke so confidently that the others marveled.
''The rascal spoke so earnestly as if he was sure of making his escape with his companions and the prisoners prisoners.''Said a sergeant.''He would not have been such a fool as to kick the log away if he felt it would cut him from safty.''
''That is right my hearty.''Said Germaine Jensin.
''That Glandelinian officer whom six of my men just killed was as clever as Solomen might be, and if he isn't then I cannot see how hecould have caused his men to do such clever things.If there is a hole in the rocks that admits his escape we ought to try and find a way of crossing the chasm and reaching it too, so that we can follow them foe and rescue the poor little boy....'' Said one of the lieutenants....''
''I don't see how we can cross as things stand.''Said lieuten ant Gannon.
''Perhaps we can find another log.''Said Baldwin Hanson.
''It's not every log that would help us.''Said Sergeant Ganon.''The one captian Snakeley kicked down was flattened at one end so that it would rest securely on the rocks on bith sides.A common log without branches wou d not do at all. It would be likely to turn under us and drop us to the rocks two hundred feet below.'' Captian Saunders had to admit that his comrade was right. Still he was on pins and needles over the trouble tha the litt le boy he thought so much of was in, and something ought to be done to save him, and very quickly too.He felt that every moment of delay rendered his rescue more difficult.
''Let's look for a log of some kind.''Said Saunders.
They started ba back int o the gorge and f after some hunting they found a tree trunk that was long enough to scan the chasm easily. It was encumbered with small branches that captian Saunders thought would hold it steadily and prevent it from turning over. After consi derable difficulty they landed it across the horrible chasm fo filled with red hot lava beneath and after testing it as best as he could the captian ventured to trust himself upon it. He landed saftly on the other side.
Baldwin Hanson immediately followed him when captian Saunders announced that there was some sort of passage under the cataract of lava.The rest came over at last and then with San Saunders in advance they made their wy way along a wide ledge that offered them secure footing with the falling sheet of lava between them and the chasm. The lava cataraxt throwing the most terrific heat felt even where they were curved to the right and the cleft, followed it finally passing out beyond the cataract and connecting with a rough path that ascended the mountian with an easy but quite steep grade. Ca Captian Saunders pushed ahead as rapidly as he could for he believed that burns burdened as the kidnapper leadi ng in the plae of Snakeley with the little twelve year old boy wh whi who would certainly not go willingly with him that they would ere long overtake the pai r. The Angelinian officer was so far right that he had been acquainted with the mountian range he and his companions would have overtaken the Glandelinians and the boy before they reached the crater because the Glandelinian now that Brono had cut off the log bridge across the chasm bec before he was killed were not expecting persuit.The Angelinian captian however got mixed up in his cours e as a snowstorm started in up the mountian and led the rest off the right s scene scent. So the result was that they seemed to be unsuccessful in their quest. But at length they came in sight of the smoking rim of the crater and there they saw the Glandelinian fugitives suddenly disappear.....

CHAPTER T[illegible] FOURT[illegible]

A SERIES OF PERILS. AND MORE GREATER PERILS.

THE DESPERATE FIGHT WITH THE GLANDELINIANS.

GENERAL HANSON VIVIAN'S DEFIANCE OF GENERAL JOHN MANLEY.

THE BATTLE.....

T he nearest part of the crater was reached when Deldon cried;
''Look.''
A ll the christians looked and quickly beheld the hedious head of a Glandelinian peering over the lava rocks from a small bluff of black lava on their right .
''We are going to have a good fight now.''Cried Lieutenant Gannon.''Look out for them now....''
He wheeled~ about but the rocks and boulders and every side seemed alive with the Glandelinians. Two or three sprang int o the~pass before, and five or six behind them.They were hemmed in by the very Glandelinians they were persueing. Crack, crack, crack, went Baldwin Hansons pistol and with loud yells three of the wicked Glandelinians fell. Then came the crash of two hundred and twenty muskets in answer and a storm of bullets whistled past the ears of the persuers but being behind rocks also no one was hit.Gannon rushed tward the three Glandelinians left to oppose him, a pistol in each na hand.
''Bang, bang, bang, bang, bang,bang, bang.''Went the pistols of gannon. The last of the eight Glandelinians who had suddenly appeared and who had not fallen aimed a blow at Gannon with his sabre which he dodged, whih while in instant confusion as the Abyssinkilians and the~ rest came up and poured in a volley mowing down a score of the Glandelinians. Bronco one of the other Glandelinian leaders drew his sabre and flew tward a place where the air rang with shots and volleys and sounds of fierce strife.~ Soon & after a hand to hand fight there was cries of victory the Glandelinians being overwhelmed and ret reating down from the crater by a secret exit with half of their wounded with them. One & of the Glandelinians armed with a bgonet bayonet could not get away from the Angelinians in time and seeing them come he presented his bayonet to make a fight of it despite the odds.But he could not ta tackle all the christians at one time and four of the Angelinians including the colonel realizing the fact seperated with the rest, while others remained on guard.The colonel approached his ~enemy where the villain was ready for him while Baldwin Hanson and Gannon made for his side and Jimmie Thompson with a long knife between his teet h for his reqr rear.
''Keep away or I will kill myself.''Cried the rascal and seeing that the Angelinians paid no heed to him he stabbed himself, so the Angelinians let him lay. After they decended the mountian they proceeded back on their way to the christian lines and~ reaching it went into their own plae places, the remainder of the Glandelinians having escaped too far for the persuit to be retained too long.

Several days later while the christian armies having moved in closer to besiege the Glandelinian armies at Jennie T urner and as the soldiers who were guarding violet and her sisters dozed off to sleep, a fearful unearthly cry with a startling suddeness shattered the wintry air from hill to hill rechoeing throughout the snowbounds woods, and as even general Hanson and several of his generals listened their faces blanched as they gazed at one another in positive surprise and horror.

''Those horrible Glandelinia n Secret Socieities.''Murmured Violet Vivian who had been aroused by the horrible sound her voice seeming to come from afar off.

The positiveness of general Hanson vivian who was a self appointed leader among the brave Angelinian armies who had dared to brave with his brother the terrible dangers and hardships of this war in their efforts to overthrow the Glandelinian horror and child slavery wa was acepted by the other vivian Girls as the truth and they huddled down into their beds as though they would efectually conceal themselves.

''Heaven grant that those Glandelinian spies are not coming here.''Moaned poor Jennie.
But hardly had her pleading prayer left her lips than again the cry rang out more shrill and terror inspiring because of its nearness and this tim time it lasted fully a minute without interruption and dying away in a slow heartrending cadience that seemed to make the blood freeze in their veins.

"They are coming.They are coming....."Moaned poor Angeline and a chorus of groans from the rest who were within the building announced their a greement wit with her.

"Then let them come. We will put an end to their awesome mystery these Glandelinian devils have surrounded themselves with and end their reign of terror at once and for all...."Cried general Hanson.. "Get your guns you officers and stad by me to give the Glandelinian fe fiends a greeting of lead."

The courageous words raised a responsive chord in the officers except four of them. But the preparation for resistance recib recioved an effectiual check.....

"Nay, nay men make no foolish attempt to tward the Glandelinian soldiers."Warned a soldier."They have the charm of the evil spirits d no bullets cannot hurt them....."

"Keep quiet will you you old fool!"Roared the governer general who wa directing the othgrs to make resistance against the terror inspiring magician like Glandelinians as itw wa feare d t hey were. "Nay that I will not governer general Vivian."Retorted the soldier."I am older tha ny of you ad know better. From my father and grandfaher have I heard tales of these Glandelinians, how the Glandelinian secret Society members have a horrible cave far off on the coast of Calverinia and I know they will alwgs attack good people, and those who ae are christians. Some one among us must plead to them. A s the led er of the Angelinian armies I demand some of you fellows go forth t o plead at once that we might be saved from the avenging fury of the Glandelinian secret Socities....."

T he soldis soldier sprang to his feet as he spoke and raised his right arm pointing tward the door of the building.

"Go whoever of you who wish to plead before it is too late."

But er eany n one could move or speak a word word, there sounded a th underous knock on the heavy door ad a voi ce sounding very much like Brono Snakeleys though of course he was dead, cried;

"John and the Vivian Girls come fort h. In the name of Satan and hell I command you...."

As one of the soldiers and the children cowered before the dreaded summons their terror mingled with amazement at the names of those mentioned or sum, summoned by the Glandelinians of whom were indeed Violet and her sisters.One of the other officers sprang to his feet with drawn pistol from his chair.

"Now d n't you wih wish you had listened to my words and let the Angelinian officers surprise these scoundrels!"He hissed a the trembling soldier who but a few minutes before had bidden to some of the other officers t o go and plead for their saft y and had been called himself.

But the old cowardly soldier made no answer answ er for gain again came the imperat ive knocking and the terrible voice which seemed to ge be Brono Snakeleys repeated;

"John and the Vivian Girls come forth."

His face the color of ahses the cowardly soldier turned to seven of his companions.

"I and the poor children have been called by the ghost of the Glandelinian capt ian Snakeley and to save them I wish seven of you t o go.It is our fate."

Impelled by some power that seemed mysterious John and seven of the officers staggered to their feet, and advanced tward the door but before they reached it general Hanson leaped in front of them like a cat, and demanded;

"Are you eight Soldier officers crazy, or have you a brain fever.?Will you let such foolish traditions lead you t o know not what probable your death Be human and draw your pistols and defend yourselves like heroes.Quick.Use these piles of goatskins as breastworks and train your rifles on the door, ad when I open it shoot like blazes every one of you.Make a good volley and see that every shot tells."

"Don't listen to him."Wailed the cowardly soldoer soldier."We have been forced to take the places of the little girls, who have been called.And and to save their lives we must go at onc e. Once the Glandelinian secret Socie ties have called they follow their victims to the death.Come."

The other seven sa officers who had taken the places of Violet and her sisters who had been called, were not so ready t o lay down their lives in so blinding obd obedience to the superstitious fear of the secret Sect Societies of the Glandelinians, and finding that all the rest of their companions were willing to offer their lives to save them that h they hurriedly drew their revolvers and threw themselves behind the most convient convenient pile of goatskins ad awaited the opening of the door by general Hanson Vivian, the muzzles of their gleaming weapons being trained upon the casement.

"Fools, fools."Hissed the old soldier."In your rashness you are bringing the terrible curse of the Secret Sociti es of the Glandelinians upon yourselves and all with whom you may come into contact. As one who knows of what he speaks I bid you offic offer no resi stance and for the sake of the children let us go for they have been ca called and we must go in their places."

His answer was the sudden throwing open of the door by General Hanson Vivian.As the massive barrier s swung outward, general Hanson bounded back, dropped to the floor and cried;

"Fi re."

"Crash.

Wen t the vooleys from the i pistols the intensity of the reports being all the nearer because of the shooting being inside the generals headq uarters. But instead of being greeted by shrieks of pain, there was the terrible existance of the silence of a winter night after the re verbrations had did died away. A mazed and rendered uneasy by the failure of their bullets to find lodge,ent in any of the Glandelinian secret Sect Society members, all stared at one another.

"I told you lead would not injure them."Gloated the sa soldier who was a in heart a coward."

"Bosh they have got frightened and ran off."Retored general Hanson Vivian.

As he spoke of of theofficers who had with general Hanson and the rest of t he generals defi ed the tradit tradations of the Glandelinian secret socities leaped t o his feet.

"Come on men.We will give chase and follow the devils to their cave of mystery and take them all."

And without waiting to seeor not anyof his companions were at his heels the soldier stepped across the threshold.But here his foot touched the ground outside some object likethe hands of a man felled him in a heap.

"No persueing mortal can capture or escape us-Glandelinian secret Socit ies."Cried the voice.J""John and the Vivian Girls come forth."

Quickly general Hanson leveled his reve revolvers even at Violet and her sistersad cried;

"Move a step and you will wish you hand hadn't. None of you children are to go and neither are any of you officers no matter how long they call.They don't dare to enter themselves and they know it.It surprising how they got within the christia lines and I'm go n going to see to it tha they do not get out."

All of the seven men who had taken the places of the Vivian Girls now th ught of resistance banished by the fate tha that had overtaken them, and their rash companion. The seven soldiers filed slowly tward the door despite the vehement protest of the others, but general Hanson ad another bared their way as they saw a q uaer looking hand reach in and try t o close the door only to narrowly escape from being riddled with bullets by a volly volley delivered by those inside. The seven officers confronted by general Hanson and the other general, who with drawn guns bared their way now fell back, while too terrified by this mysterious displa right within the very heart of the christian lines a displa of seemingly supernatural power to move, Violet and her sisters were too frightened to obey the command sat motionless for some time, then curiously to lea learn whether or not their poor soldier friend had been carried off by the desperate Glandelinian Free Mas ion began to assert itself. D For se several minutes the group of generals exchanged opion opinions in hushed tremulous voices, then one of the officers crept to the door and with infinite caution shut it a few inches.

"The officer i s gone."He gasped. and then shut the door and a second period of awe inspired silence followed. Then with a cry of anguish Violet and her sisters buried their faces in their hands and rocked t o and fro.

"You too Deldon dear!"They moaned pitaously."Is it to be the fat e of us all tha we shall fall victims to these acursed Glandelinians?"

"Not while us men have the breath in our bodies to preventit."Declared the officers spring i springing to their feet, and general Hanson himself walked to the little creatures so raked with grief, and laying a ge ntle hand on Violet's shoulder as though to sooth her and despel their fears, and that of her sisters of such a doom.

''Right you are.''Exclaimed general Hanson.''And we will bring back Deldon alive and the Glandelinian Secret gocitiy members to morrow as prisoners, or God may strike us dead as li ars.And we might as well immediately orginize a strong persuit, and to warn all g uards also t not to allow any one to leave the lines ton night.''
They decided to do so and as they f nished their work general Hanson opened the door and every one of the officers including violet and her sisters who in tradition were to brave the dangers of the great war were about to watch the soldiers march off who were to take the trail of the terror striking Glandelinian Free Masons. Indeed violet and her sisters themselves were to m be made to realize the perils of the war.
Two days later while the seige of Jennie turner was a actually beginning some of the spies who had dared to enter the christian lines had been discovered and shot down without mercy but the remainder had as it was believed escaped despite the viligeance of the search.
''I've har heard some of the Calverinians say that the cave of these Glandelinian Free Mason spi es was to the north of a big snow covered mountian builded entirely of hard lava and the volcano which they h had first ascended before the outbreak of the war is the place where they take refuge in case of being persued too closely.''Said General Baldwin who was holding a conference about that night.
''Where about's?''Asked general Hanson.
''That I cannot tell you but there is a villiagethirty miles up the river and we probably can learn from the poeple there.''
In the meantime Violet and her sisters had been out scouting with some soldiers a and after having been successful in seeing the movements of the enemy had retraced their steps and had reached a snow covered field, which the Glandelinians had persued them across after discovering them, and here the q uartes paused to eat.
''How about camping here for the night and then push on brig bright and early for the christian lines in themorning.''Said one of the soldiers.I''It is snowing so hard now that we cannot see before out faces. Not a tree visible before can be seen now.''
''H'm I don't like the looks of the clouds.''Said Gorge. after a careful survey of the sky and the blinding sheet of the falling snow.B''But I think we would make better time in the end.Violet and her sisters during the pers it of the enemy who were after us had such a shock from the effect of their yells that they need rest.The enemy won't I'm sure cont inue the pe persuit in such a storm.''
''It will text their strength to keep going and they may fall.''Said a another soldis whose name was Ned.''We don't want anything to happen as at just the very time when it is of the greatest import ance that the little girls be well.''
The other soldiers offered no further obk objection to sleep ng where they were. And so the men removed their canvas from them and after necktying the faithful bloodhounds which they had with them they pitched the tent. This done they all got into their huge sleeping bags and laid them down on the heavy goatskins they had spread over the snow and soon all were asleep. But the sleep came night being the sleep that never ends. As the soldier had said the sky had grown more threatening and blacker and after the slumberers had lain for more than an hour in the snowstorm, the blizzard suddenly began to reach its worse and at the same time there arose a mighty mwind. Growing in force each moment with a sudden gust it swooped down upon the tent of the brave band and carried it off.The howl of the furi us furious blizzard aroused George and he sprang to his feet as well as he could encumbered by the sleeping bag as he was. So dense were the snowflakes however that driven with such blinding force thay beyond realizing that the canvas had been carried away he was even unable to see the dogs a few score of feet away. For a moment he thought of awakening the others, then he decided that it would do no good as there was no more canvas on the in the tent and to change theposition of the children and the others would be to get them too deeply covered with the snow and the insides of their bags wet with it adding to the already increasing cold, and so he dropped down again. Soon the wind became a screaming gale, the hidden trees in the distance making a tremendous roaras the wide tore through their maze of branches, and even trees began to fall by scores, and George fearing a rising hurricane with the furious blizzard storm became restless.....

On account of the fury of the sostorm his sleep was rest less and firally hows ever he found a numbness stealing over him..... With all his wil power he forc ed himself t o open his eyes, then loose the lacings of his bag and get t o his feet. Covered by some ten inches of snow piled on them i n a drift lay the other soldiers and so still were they that they were white mounds protruding half way out of the drift suggesting nothing so much of the snow mA mantled levations of new made graves.Violet and her sisters were up and standing still watching the storm in consternation.As the horrible thought flashed to his mind; he shuddered, then hastened to e arouse his cont comrades.But though George with the help of violet and her sisters shook each violent ly they could not awaken them.....
''The snow sleep.''He gasped..:...
Realizing that from their trying day and lack of being accostomed to the bitt er cold of the Calverinian winters, the terrible snowsleep from which many never awake would take the greatest hold upon his comrades and the rest, Gorge devoted his energies in arousing his lieutenant that he mi ght assist him with the m others. Seizing his sleeping bag with no gentle hands he shook him violently as a cas as a cat shakes a rat, now and again varing the performance by throwing the bag heavily to the snow.
At last he had the sat isfaction of feeling the body within the bag move of its own accord. Yet not an instant did he relax relax hi s terrific shki shaking and at last he heard a voice so faint that it seemed to come from far away excla exca exclaim;
''Wh at is it?''
But Georges answer was more vigorous shaking untill Lieutenant jimmie Thompason finally cried;
''Stop you fool, who ever you are. You——you—— you are——you- are——shak inf——————co————to——pi edos.What's wrong.?''
''Quick.Help me get you out of your sleeping bag.The snow sleep has attacked the other men..''
His t orpid senses having gradually ret urned to normal when he heard the words, Jimmie crawled from his bag.
''Did I have it t oo?''He asked.
''Yes you did but don't lose valuable time in asking questions?''
Untie Ned's head covering and hold his mouth open while violet pours some brandy down it.''
As George was giving these commands he was drawing his flash of brandy and handed it to violet who quickly poured a great dose of the powerful stimulant down her friends throat.
''Now shake him a about, anything to wake him up.''He ordered as going to his comrade Francis Gannon he rapeated the process of forcing brandy down his throa throat then shaking him..... Georgeand Ned worked frantically after he also was aroused on another comrade but with no appreciable results.
''More brandy.''Called Jennie.''I he can hardly hear Frank Smith breathe.'' Startled at the words George dropped Gannon and hurriedly administered a second and still more sizable draught of the brandy to the soldier and again Jimmie resumed s his shaking three of the vivian girls catching hols hold of one end of the bag and helping with all their might .
At last while the four were working so desperate ly to save Frank Smoth and Gannon and wewere discussing the advisability of pricking the victims of the terrible snow sleep Frank murmured;
''Go away and leave me alone.I want to sleep.''
''Thank God he is saved.''
''Thump him with your fists.''Said George to joice.
And as he spoke George rained a succession of blows upon Gannon.
''Here what in theworld are you doing.What do you think I am.''Drowsedly demanded Gannon in the midst of all the vigorous pummelling.
''You will surely be a corpse if you don't pull yourself toget her and wa wake up pretty soon.''Returned Joice herself increasing her own blows.Yet so befuddled was poor Gannon that he did not recognize the beautiful voice of her fr his friend joice vivian.
''I'll put a bullet int o you if you don't stop your foolish blows.'' Grow led Gannon struggling in his bag h to draw his heavy calibre revolver.
''Don't do that, it's I Joice Vivian.''Shouted joice in his ear.''
''George at the moment approached and also said;
''Come get out of your bag'' and unclap unclasping the hooks, George went to the -ther end of the bag, seized it by the corners and dumped Gannon out as though he were a parcel of flour, and the action succeeded in thoroughly arousing him.

Jumping to his feet like a s r spring and turning tward George furiously furiously, Gannon demanded;

''What's the meaning of this? Haveyou and the fool vivian girls t urned robbers, an d traitors.''U?

''Don't be a fool, Gannon.We are saving you from the slow sleep.'' Hastily returned joi ce.

''The snow sleep? My heavens has it got the older boys too?''Gannon gasped as thewords recalled the storiss of the dread slumbers.

''Yes and Ned and jimmie had it but they have come t oo and with your help we will be able to save the others.''

Staggering like a man who was drunk Gannon lurched to where Germaine lay and grasping his bag shook it in a blind frenzy.

''Stop that, stop that .''Soon cried Germaine and at last he aroused sufficient ly to assist his companion in untieing his bag which was of different construction tha than those of the rest, being provided with st rings which worked from t he inside, that the bag might be drawn t ighter about him. Soon the rest were aroused but one man a private and a man of old age was quite hard to arouse.At the first sound of georges voice the dogs had jumped to their feet shaking the snow from their shaggy hair, and stood watching the strange at ics of their master.

But their attention was soon arr attracted tward the north and they began to sniff the air suspiciously.Had either George or the rest seen them their fears would have increased all the more, but in the effort s to arouse their companions George and the rest were so abs absorbed that they gave the poor dumb creatures no heed at all untill joice hd had sudde nly noticed the dogs leaping about and baying.

''Why are the dogs acting so q ueer?''She demanded.

''George gave them one look and then cried;

''Get your guns ready,-ebery one.There is something coming, whether it be Glandelinians a or gargolians. But we must get ready in either case.''

''Can' it be the Glandelinians who belong to the secret societies, or Glandelinian Free- Masons?''''Breathed Violet.

''It may be.''A Was Georges answer.

The thought that they were about to be attacked by the very Gladelnians Glandelinians who had no doubt been searching for them since they persued them across the plains ws ws was the shock needed to throw off all the effects of the snowsleep and instantly all were alert.

Peering through the pál pall of the blizzard which had increased its fury in the direction tward where the dogs ws were facing , growling and snapping.

''Quick violet, you and your sisters, and some of you soldiers and Jimmie hide yourselves in such positions that you can use your guns.'' Commanded George.''Gannon and I will creep up behin d that bluff and see what it is.''

''Waiting only long enough to assist the children into covering themselves the rest of the men dropped on their bellies, and began to crawl over the snow to a snow covered w bluff. some rods away. But when they were less than two rods away the dogs sudden y began to bay furiously and viciously and jumped frantically about as if anxious to fly at somebody but two of the men held them. by the ch ains.

''Somebody must be at our rear.Somebody is at our rear.''Cried Jimmie Thompson in sudden warning and turning thesoldiers beheld a very queer long wi nged creature moving slowly twad them.

''Youcover that creature with your guns while I creep on him you boys.''George whispsed.''If it makes the slightest hostile move with its tail or wing shoot it down.''

Quickly the men t ook their tasks and as George got nearer and nearer to the oncoming creature every one of the soldiers were com pletely amazed that it did not seem to heed them at all. Then violet cried.It's alright.Its a young Rebonna a Blengiglomenean creature.

The mystery was soon explained for suddenly pausing to sniff, the figure called in Ang elinian speaking just like a human being;

''You are Angelinians as I know by your uniforms and so I will do no harm.I am only a young Rebonna.''

''Unable to believe that the creature could wander around ami d the awful dangers of the foe without the protection of these creatures George cried;;

''We just need you to protect the children against the Glandelinian scoundrels, and I do not believe any one can harm them with you accompanying us to the christian lines.With you with us the Glandelinians if they value their lives will try no base tricks, and tell me whether you have any companio s that are waiti ng while you reconnoiter.''

Later on aft er this s pu s urprising adventure a very quser figure dressed like a Glandelinian soldier stumbled tward the Angelinian soldiers who were tramping back tward the christian lines leaning on a long gun.

''You cover that Glandelinian with your gun while I creep on him.'' George whisperod to Jimmie.''If that Glandelinian dog makes even the slighrs sli ght est hostile move with that gun of his shoot him down.''

Quickly the men took again to their tasks and as George got nearer and nearer to the nearning gray fl clad figure in the Glandelinian uniform of an officer every one of the Angelinians were qui completely amazed that he did not seem to see them at all. But the mystery was soon explained for suddenly pausing t o s ni ff the figure called;

''Who ever you are I mean no harm to you. I am only a poor blind man.'' Unable to belieb believe that any one could wander around amid the awful dangers of the war stricken regions of Calverinia when blind George cried;

''That cannot be the truth you scoundrel, and I do not believe you. As you value your scoundrelly life try no base tricks and tell me whe ther you have any companions that are waiting while you reconnoi ter!''

''I have not a si ngle companion.''Answe answered the bent figure with an awful laugh.

''Nonsense, a man who is blind- could not roem alone on this terrible landscape filled with dangerous Glad Glandelinians.Tell me who you are and what you and your people want, or I'll drop you in your tracks.''

''If you don't believe me come and look at my eyes.''Retorted the seemingly Glandelinian.

''Go George, the Glandelinian may be telling the truth, and if he is he certainly needs our assistance.''Called violet while her sisters nodded their approval. At the sound of the little girls fair voice the bent figure cried eargly;

''Have I really found the band of little girl avengers!''

Before George could answer however Ned sprang to his feet and ran up to the old man and peered int o his face.

''He speaks the truth.''He cried.''He is really blind.''

Then to the poor old blind man he asked as kindly ash he knew how;

''Who are you and what is your mission?''

''Every one around especially the Calve Calverinians called me the ''Blind wandering Dad.''

''But how can you go about among the ice and crevices and avoid the prowling Glandelinians who are always out on scouting, and the devilish Gargolians as well.''Demanded John Scanlon having joined George.

''By my hearing and also my smell.All the Glandelinians around seem to know that I am harmless and leave me alone.But tell me have you a little band of girls known as Violet and her sisters, Jennie T urner, Jennie Riches, and Gertrude Ang eline among you?''

In amazement all the soldiers who had determined to brave all the danger of the island or Calverinia I mean gazed at one another.That a blind stranger calling him self''The blindin blind wandering Dad'' should have learned of the Vivian girls and their three little girl firneds and of their purpose seemed incredible to them, but little violet put an end to their surprise by saying.''What do you mean sir?We cannot understand.''?

''Why I have heard that seven little vivian Glandelinian girls with three little girls fir girl friends are always spying on the enemy and that you with your par y party of soldiers are setting out for the christian lines on your return trip and I would like to join you and lead you for I have been many t imes among the foe camps and know of their intentions.''

This answer astonished them all the more, more than the qu q uestion.

''Oh please tell us what the plans are?''Appealed Jennie.

''The enemy intend to break general Hansons seige of Jennie Turner by having another Glandelinian army under Shoemannia strike a terrifif blow at Evangeline Crania.H Manley intends to strike the blow by stopping Bicknells advance on Osmondonson.If he is successful the seige of Jennie Turner cannot be retained.''

''It's a folly, impossible.''Exclaimed John Scanlon.''And that statement shows that the old Glandelinian generals are either insane or seeking to lure all their armies into some trap or destruction.Well let them try it.Next time when you are within the enemys lines tell Manley and all his generals that I told him to go to holl and his whole army with him.''

''No,no don't interrupt him so soon and let him tell his story first.'' Said Violet amazed at his violent speech.''This is a country of strange things John gcalon.

''Sure and you must not use such speech when we are sound.'' Protested joice. with an appealing look.''Of course it is not a sin but we don't like to hear it.It sounds horrid.''

''What is it quick! Do not keep us waiting?''Commanded Violet . noting the change in the old man.

''Eighteen years ago I and my family a wife and two lovely boys and three pretty little girls were travl traväing to galverine on a train when to my grief the children were stolen from the train by Glandelinian kidnappers while I 3 wa in the smoking car.I was then bound for Angelinia where I rightly belonged.The children werefirst sold as slaves to a child slave master, was a second time sold to gapt ian gnakeley and his band for a handsome sum, and these glandelinians had placed them in a strange cave where they were engulfed in a lava torrent and died in grea suffering. Not long after I managed to trace these glandelinians, for co i coming to galverinia I learned from some friendly Gaoverinians that it was these terrors of galvsinia wh who had brought my children t o the cave to murder. So impregnable however was their main cave of refuge that I was forced to give up my desperate attempt, and set out to go to the aurthorities of galverinia to get assistance in men and soldiers or police to help me raid and capture it. Ere I reached there however one night I was attacked by what I supposed was ablack grizzly bear.Caught as I was some distance from my boat in which wowere my few weapons and food while looking over a cooling lava floe for some safe passage for my boat down the Mc-Hollester Run Ri ver. But I soon learned the creature was not a bear for i it rose straight on h its hind lelegs and with a sharp piece of rock stabbed me in my eyes, then left me, warning me to beware not to encur the wrath of the glandelinians a second time.''

John Scanlon was st ill sceptical over the story and he asked scornfully;

''Why did the fiends of glandelinia s pare your life then if they knew you ha had learned about the whereabouts of their hiding plae?''

''The only reason I can imagine is that either my dear wife as I heard was not really slain, or one of my sons all- of whom are wonderfully handsome had heard the members of the wicked glandelinians talking about my visit to the cave and had persauded them at some great personal sacrifice to spare my life. Having promished me this I believe they thought of the horrible pla plan of blinding me and leaving me on the lava floe confident that I would either walk into some yawning crevice or fall the prey to some hungry wild beastsof the country.I had intended to prosecute them for the deed.''

''Well w hy in the world didn't you.''Demanded john gcanlon.''You were a big fool to allow such matters to go without doing something for a retrive or revenge.''

''Because when I had the marvelous good fortune to be picked up by a party of Calverinians after I wandered about in a large circle for al almost twenty four hours, they did their best for me but the lair of the scoundrels could not be traced.''

''Do you think those Calverinians take us for fools?'' Snapped john Scanlon.''Well we'll find their lair if it is still esix existing if we have to go through hell and fire to do so.Nothing will stop us from our purpose.''

''Well I see from the tone of your voice that you are not an Angelinian, as real Angelinians are not that desper ate or determined. You are an Abyssinkilian and I do not and cannot doubt your words, but if the Vivian Girls are present I would beg you to leave that one word out of your sentence.''

''Excuse me I cannot help it sometimes.''Answered john gcanlon.'

''As I know you are an Abyssinkilian I will for proof lead you some day to their cave which has long been the mystery of Calverinia.''Said the blind man.

I''And lead them int o a trap more likely.''Growled john gcanlon.''How f could a man anyway who was made sightless, and wander about in this most dangerous of all regions for eighteen years and live, through only God knows what bear it without doing something to pay them back.''

John Scal Scanlon was indeed irritated by the sigh sight of the old man who wa blind for tho gh he said nothing to those around him the old blind man was his father. But now he shot back in words the most angry and furious;

985. b 738

''Look for yourselves you christian companions of mine and you the vivian gi rls.Look to whom the faithless glandelinian fools bli nded. If you think the old respectable gentleman is not my father, than he has not lost the sight of his eyes.I will prove he is blind''And quickly he approached the silent figure peered into his blank orbs and then flashed a match so close to the eyes that they expected the poor old man to leap back with an exclamanation of anger, while the other soldiers and the little girls gasped in horror.

''What did I tell you?''Gloated John Scanlon in horror.''He really is blind.No one could have sensed the presence of light so quickly as a man with good sight, and the fact that he did not jump back shows that the old man did not see it even though he may have felt the heat.This old man is not only a poor blind man but really my own father.He has probably been sent on t o find us so that he could be brought to the christian lines in safty.See he wears a Glandelinian uniform and here are some papers about him that proves despi te his blindness he is a spy.I'll wager a thousand million dollars that he is one of those that will have my revenge if I die for it.No Glandelinian hellhound of satan can blind any old person or even any relation f wit of mine without being made to wish he had never been born.''

This speech seemed to arouse his comrades to a frenzy while at the sound of John Scanlons voi ce the poor old blind man raised his right hand tward the sky talking rapidly in Mormomian.

''What is he saying!''Demanded violet.

''That I cannot tenn you in public it would not please you.'' Said George.Then turning full upon John Scanlon with a scowl George exclaimed with a vehemence which astounded all his hearers;

''If we had known the true nature of you John Scanlon we would have never permitted you to be a lieutenant of any party to guide the Vivian Girls.You deserve to be a general.As it is I'll give you my word to help him take you to the cave of those glandelinians and I will.But mark you this.Never fear to ask me any favors and the whole bunch of us will make the glandelinians keep out of our way at all times.There are always mys teries which such as f o fool glandelinians me never can understand.With the furious Abbieannians with whom my own father had fought during the battle of Ernal nie Creek a blind person of their side is as sacred as a God and fr om this mans st ory the same respect apparent ly exists among the Calverinians.' Besides the loss of this poor mans eyes hd not been more than recomprehended by the great power above by the marvelious developement of his sense and smell.He smelled the match and that is what we expected to make him jump back.''

''But me mark my words if this poor old man cannot accompa accompany us----''

''And howill, ve insist upon it.''Interrupted joice vivian.''And we will all help to get those rascals and cause their punishment as they deserve. We'll get Gertrude Angeline and the two other little Amazons to help us.''

Yet as George had spoken with a solemnity ad and positiveness that could not but impress upon the Abyssinkilian he never dreamed that the display of theblind mans old power would be the saving of John Scanlons li fe. Still smarting over the misfortune of his comrade John Scanlon and the old man who was really his fat her George turned to violet .

''We will give the poor old man something to eat and then set up on our journey to the christian lines.Jensin that is what he tells me his name is think w thinks we will soon have worse weather and probably a severe hurricane advises that we proceed wt with all possible haste.'' ''Surely we will feed him.Come Jennie and Angeline. We shall start a little fire and make some coffee. And we will make a good steak''-----.

''No you must not.We shall need the few cakes of meet we have much more later than we do now.''Protested George.''When we get back to the christian lines we can buy something in the canteen.''And putting his arm through that of the old man George led him to the sleigh where a col cold breakfast was quickly made ready.

When the breakfast was eaten t he dogs being fed at the same time George prepared for the start.

''Jensin and I are going to walk the way back to the christian lines as no horse can u just now go through this deep snow.''He announced. Violet and her sisters can ride on the sleigh.Scanlon we will have to start our expedition as soon as possible to show the glandelinians what we can do.''

As though it were not enough to show his anger at the Glandelinians by pronishing t o help his compnion in getting the Glandelinians, his intentions to get at t he Glandelinians sooner than expeted es expected was proof-pisitive of his changed feelings, for the tasks of chacing aft er such Glandelinians was one which required indescriable training and immense skill. As the two horses pulled the sleigh it bumped and slewed over the rough hard snow, and not liking it Violet and her sisters were about to pror protest against riding when George gave the orders to his men to start there being about thirty and they obeyed. He and his companions and the blind man set out on each side of the leq der which had been imported from the nort henr part of Galverinia. Vowing to himself that he would prove that he was equal to the task which he had determined to set upon against his enemies the Glandelinians John Manlyey Scanlon obliged to devote his attention to the jumping of the sleigh, but occasionally he arose his flashing eyes t ward the rear in the di rection of the enemys lines and then tward the old man and noted that he picked his way with almost the same cleverness as the leader.

"Do you believe the old mans st ory that the enemy under Manley intends to play all kinds of tricks to break Hansons seige of Jennie T urmer Violet dear?"He finally asked when two of the little girls was slowing the horses down when going over an unusually rough place by tightening on the reigns.

"Certainly I do believe his story."

"But why. Have you ever heard of Manleys intentions. Certainly no Glandelinian general whose armies are confronting such immense christian armies for such a length of time can expect such a move to be successful even if a blow is struck against Evangelinia Crania."

"But I have never seen the blind man before, though that cowardly sailor John did and dso my father met him one day, but not being able to have any conversat ion with him he did not learn who he was untill he ret urned to the christian lines after viewing the enemys position. But when he report ed his strange story and meting and wa told Jensins story also all t he officers believed every word. Manley can do anything planned with great success against any odds if we are not watchful."

This statement uttered in the simplicity of one who is merely repeat ing a well known trut h impressed John Sca Scanlon as no comment or argueing or discussion of the blind mans power could have done and he lasped into a shameful silence.

"I guess I'll go ahead and ask George and Jensin for more information."He exclaimed at last ."That is if you will kid i kindly get one of the men to take the reigns."

"I'll do that wil lingly enough as he is better trained at it, but if I were you I would not bother them now as we are in a hurry to get home of out of this blizzard."Returned Violet Vivian.

"But why not. It would not take very long.Should I not tell them my own plans to avert such a threatening disaster."

"Be cause men and women of Angelinia are different from you who are an Abyssinkilian and even the Mormonuians.Truth is of many other things, they cheri sh a true Catholic faith, and as you have willingly did all in your power to enlighten them they may do anyting anything you ask, but just the same do you wish to encounter Glandelinians out in such a blazzard.? And the enclusing of his fellow country men in the category of person is bett er to be understood."

A Her answer brought first a flush of anger to the young officers face and sia disappointment as well and then after a scornful laugh he placed his hand on his gun and said harshly;

"Then I suppose they will try to vent their enemity upon me in all manner of ways even to seeking my death as they had my fathers. Bah I defy hell and all on earth itself to dare any trick on me. We are true christians and fear no death of any kind. They have given their word to tk take me along with them, and all other things and I'll stick to them through thick and thin. Any ma man who t urns againsy any of my comrades or you little girls would bnever have b me as a friend again. Anyway us Abyssinkilians are different altogether from you Abbicannians and Angelinians and it is truely us that the Glandelinian skunks dread the most. Let them come on if they dare. I'll clean them out of the face of the plains."

During the rest of the hard journey John Scanlon was silent then as something went wrong with the harness George ordered a halt.They ha had just about prepared to start again when the blind man suddenly cried to his friend George;

"If I'mmot mistaken I think there are foes near by so be might ly careful as the Glandelinians arefierce in fury now."

987. 740

Scarcely had this announcement been made when the dogs suddenly began a vicious sniffing and growling, straining at their leashers as they leaped tward a bluff. The terrible monsatony of the snow of the small bluff had been broken before the paty made the few minutes halt by the right of a cluster of boulders in the distance where the summit of a small mountian made a bend to its very end, and it was tward this that the dogs were straining to go.

Quickly picking up his glasses John Scanlon scanned the rugged half hidden t rees near the boulders, then suddenly gasped; "There is a great swarm of Glandelinians just crashing through the half snow covered bushes.They are the biggest pack of human wolves that I have ever seen a and they are coming directly for us too. And the christian lines st ill two miles away yet ."

"Probably sees the little Vivian Girls were are guarding." Grunted George with a scowl. "Thodesire for blood will draw these human monsters for miles."

"How far is it to those boulders and trees!"Inquired Violet Vivian.

"About a rod away."Answered George"And despite the pall of the blizzard the terrible Glandelinians can see us that far."

"How awful."Cried Jennie.

But her announcement was forgotten in the sudden exclamanation of John Scanlon who had picked up his glasses again.

"Why the Glandelinians are dressed in hoods and regallas, and wears something that looks like yellow moons on the top of their hoods."

George then commanded them to be prepared for the Glandelinians. "They are surely the Gargolians one of the worse sects of the foe and for strength and ferocity there is nothing like them especially especially when they are persuing fugitives."He said."We cannot hope to battle with them succesdfully but we can shoot down some of their leaders and create enough confusion so as t o gain headway against them.They can't plough through deep snow as fast as horses can."

Waiting for a few moments the men members of the intrepid band who were braving the dangers of the war n on a mission of vengeance which would free Galverinia from the ever constant bogies of these Glandelinians, were to learn all well the truth of these words. The Glandelinians did not seem to dare to move against the party themselves in person but sent forward what even at that distance appeared to be a gigant ic St Bernard but which was surely a mad-dog for it had all the appearances of a rabid dog. Now rising on his hind legs the bett er to sniff the direction of his enemies, now on all fours covering the intervals bet ween the an xious band and the boulders and the scrub pines with incredible rapidity his leaps seeming to gain him a rod at a time, the huge mad-dog bore down upon the group.

"Everybody hold their fire untill I give the word."Commanded George."This immense dog is surely a mad one and yet a mad dog like his size is worse than a dragon was ever thought of being. You have got to hit him squarely in the chest to stop him, and then its something of a quarter of an hour before he drops. Scanlon you stand out on the west end about a rod. Violet and your sisters stand next and Gannon will be by me.Jimmie, watter Jennings, Baldwin and the others take positions in front of Violet and her sisters.Remember to hold your fire untill I give the word, but when you do shoot try to make every bullet count, and to pump them out as fast as you can work you your magazines."

Trying to control the anxiety and excitement their hands trembled as they held their guns at a ready for the soldiers and the little girls had never seen such a big dog-like this before and raving mad with hydrophobia, and the cowardly Glandelinians had sicked it ont o them.

"A lot of trouble they will be to me."Growled George. "I wish Jensin could use a gun, but perhaps Violet and her sisters will be of some account.If they ain't and master St Bernard takes it into his head to rush me after I've shot at him I'm afraid I shall be in a bad fix alright ...."

Not long did George have to worry over the fact that the whole responsibilities of protecting the par y party lay upon him however. Less than four hundred feet away was the terrible monster of hydrophobi a and as he drew nearer and nearer to the spot the oder of human persons was waft ed to his supersensit ive nostrils and his speed seemed to slight ly decrease. However he did not stop and was bearing down straight upon Ned and as the chap realixed the fact he lost all control of himself and blazed away with his rifle.

Supressing his comment untill he had seen whether or not the shot went wild Scanlon t o his amazement saw the mad-dog stop suddenly, and make a grab for one of his front paws then emit a short howl of anger so loud and furious that it was plainly heard by George and the rest .

"I hit him. I hit. him."Shouted Ned gloriously.

"Yes and worse luck."Retorted George with a sneer."Instead of now hw having a mad-dog to deal with, we have got a pain maddened devil. Why could you not wait untill I gave you the word to fire as I told you. All of you take aim, train the muzzles of your rifles upon the brutes.When he rises on his legs raise your rifles and then fire to the left side of his breast close to his paw."

Again however Ned disobeyed. The infuriated monster snarling and growling in bloodcurldling fashion leaped tward the group but without once rising to his hind legs, and as before was headed for n Ned. Unable to bear the strain, when the big brute was some fourt y feet aaway from him, the fellow fired a second time. For some reason the mad-dog had turned its head just as the lad pulled the trigger and the bullet plowed a furrow across the bridge of its nose. But the shot wa was the means of giving them the chance for which George had ordered them to wait. With a deafening terror stricking roar of howls the monster reared on its hind legs striving to wipe the blood which gushed from the wound away from his nostrils.

"Now everybody fire."Cried George.

"Crash went the tremendous volley from so many rifles of the party, and to the delight of all several of the bullets broke the bt ures front paw fr for it dropped to its side. But only for a moment did the joy last, for growling like an enraged dragon, and scattering a rain of blood all about him, the terrible mad beast blinded by furious rage, rushed forward on his hind leg s, and to the terrified children it seemed to be a as huge as a mountian.

"Fire."Again shouted George and again the rifles barked, but t o all appearance however not a single bullet had taken effect.

"Again and again. Keep on untill you have no more shells left in your ma gazines. We have got to stop him some way if we are going to save our lives."'Yelled George.

But so excited were his officers that though they obeyed their shots went wild. Just when it seemed that he must grappel grapple hand to paw with the mad monster George saw his leading Bloodhound leap forward with a storm of baying and bury his sharp teeth in the madd mad-dogs throat.

"Go t o him the rest of you dogs."He shouted and then holding his fire he ran forward tward the brute."

"Oh come back Ge orge please."Screamed Violet/ but her friend paid no heed. The attention of the furious brute was attracted for the moment by the big dogs, and taking advantage of the fact, and never thinking of the awful risk he ran, George with a shout rushed upon the struggling mass of dogs thirteen bloodhounds in all untill he was within four feet of them, then pointed the muzzle of his gun at the monsters hea heart, and pumped his gun empty. For a moment the enraged dog staggered as bullet aft er bullet went ploughing its way through its heart, then with a snort of worse rage he struck for his nw new foe.

% The instant he had emptied his rifle George had jumped back However drawing his pistols and firing them. After he did so, and ere the monster could reach him, the terrific dose proved too much, and he pitched to the snow the dogs leaping upon him as he fell.Eager to take part in the killing, Ned dashed forward knife in hand evidently deter mined to plunge it int o the dogs hide untill he had succeeded in cutting the animals throat but before he could reach the monster, George was upon him, seized him roughly by the nape of the neck and jerked him forwards.

"You fool don't you know that the beast would tear you to shreds before you could so much as stick your knife into him! Look at the way he is ripping up those dogs."

With his blood ebbing onto the whi te snow in smal streams the brute seemed to have recovered the use of his wounded paw and again rose to his hind legs and in a final desperate attempt to wreck some in u injury upon his vanquishers, seized the leader and tore him to shreds with his wicked claws.But the act was the dogs last, and ere hecould grab another of the animals he fell back dead. Yet had he tried he could not have rendered them a worseinjury, short of the death of one of the members of the party than in kil ing of the dogs of all the team the most necessary to them.

"That means I'll have to plg play leader."Snar a snarled George. "There is not a another dog in the st team trained for the work, but I don't believe we will have many of them to use they all look pretty badly done up."

And indeed such was the case. Of all the fine team of thirteen dogs all of the dogs except one carried the marks of the mad dogs furious attack, and now that the excitement wa was ended they limped about whinning and moaning.Cursing the luck which brought the mad monster upon them untill they could least reach the christian lines, George examined each dog carefully.

"How many are there we can use." Asked violet Vivian who done of those watching understood the s eriousness of their situation.

"Not more than six perhaps, not but five."

"What will you do with the others?"Demanded Scanlon.

"Put them out of their misery."Grimly returned George and suiting the act ion to his words he sent a bullet from his revolver int o each of the dogs wounded beyond recovery untill only four of them remained.

"M By taking this fourth one on the sled and nursing it I think I can brg bring it around."Declared George."When we reach the christian line I'll have them taken care of so they won't be in the danger of contract ing the rabies."

"But where will you put Violet and her sisters?"Prot Protested John Scanlon.

"On their feet."Snapped George."They are well and sound and even if we do not move quickly through the deep snow they will be obliged to walk and if any of them chance to get t ired I'll see to it that th some of the men will carry them by turns.I'll need these four dogs."

John Scanlon was about to make a vigorous objection when Violet Violet herself prevented by exclaiming;

"Of course we will walk and gladly."

The folly and rating ones abilities to withstand the vigors and difficulty of trudging through the deep snow made by the storm which was-still raging violently was ma pas passed unotin unnot iced by angry George himself and the little girls themselves quickly helped G Ge orge in putting salve on the wounds of the injured dogs and then bandaging them and finally covering them with firs.

"If you make such a fuss over an old dog what would you do if it had been one os us who had been injured?"Asked Ned with a sneer.

"I've seen times when a dogs life was worth more than twenty men, when it was necessary to run to a settlement to get grub and help."Retorted Scanlon himself sing c significantly and the young fellow fearing to enrage Scanlon a furious Abyssinkilian did not press his question.

"Going to halt here for a little while?"Asked Violet when the dogs had been made as comfortable as possible.

"Oh I'd like to ever so much."Exclaimed joice.

"Then we will do so. No I reckon we won't after all."Announced George sweeping the snow fogged woods to the north.

"But why not.Violet and her sisters want's to."Declared Gannon.

"And I'd like nothing better than to do it if circumstances were different."Returned George.But if we don't get out of here very quickly we shall not live even to talk about it."

"What do you mean?"Asked Jennie turning to look in the same direction as George.

"Take S John Scanlons glasses and you will understand."Rejoined George

Instantly Jennie did so and as she swept the seemingly unending expanse of falling clouds of snow tward the distant woods she cried;

"Why I can at least see a hundred Gargolian Glandelinians moving down t ward us."

"Exactly Gargolians."Announced George.

"But what harm can they do us?"Demanded Ned.

"Simply eat us up."Retorted George dryly."They have been out scout ing despite the blizzard and having been attracted by our presence they are coming as fast as they can to make us prisoners.Besides I've had all th e fighting I want for one day especially when there is a hundred of them against our thirty, but we will get it if we do not leave in a hurry."

The thought of another encounter and with Glandelinians at that and probably the ones seen before was no more welcome to the others than it was to George. And willingly they lent their hands t o get the sleigh under way again.From time to time during the swift flight

George had announced the progress of the flight to the blind man and when they had halted for a moment he moved over to where George was driving.

"I'm better fitted for such a task than you." He exclaimed. "I ca ca hear and smell the dangers in the footing. Be quick and allow me to do the driving."

George refused however saying;

"I am younger and stronger than you are Jensin, and besides a wonder ful man like you can give me and the others advantages of your knowledge by walking ahead of the horses."

And with Violet and her sisters walking on two sides of the blind man and with John Sca Scanlon to the rear and the band of officers and soldiers once more resumed their way and when they again paused at the end of some twenty minutes on a higher slope of land and looked back in the direction from whence they had come they beheld one hundred Gargolians moving fo forward aft er them while some had remained behind to examine the number of dead dogs and the mad one.

"By jove George you certainly have got a clever thinking piece." Exclaim ed John Scanlon in admiration of the manner of which George had proposed to escape the Glandelinians without a battle with them. But if he heard the compliment from the boy George did not show it.

ASuddenly the blind old man raised his head and sniffed.

"The christian lines is close by here somewhere." He exclaimed.

Taking the glasses from John Scanlon George hurried to a hummock of snow some three to thirty feet to the south and was just lifting his head cautiously over the top when he ducked back again, put down the glasses, picked up his rifle, and again creeping to the top of the hummock pointed the weapon over the further side and fired at the object slipping past the guards near the outskirts of the christian lines and which looked very much like that of a white bear. But to the surprise and amazement of all the party the shriek that ge greeted the discharge of the rifle was not that of a bear, but of a man.

"Ha it was a Glandelinian spy slipping out of the christian lines dressed as a bear." Shouted George as the guard in the distance leaped upon his victim. Instantly all even the blindman helped by the little girls ran to the hummock and as fast as they could through the deep snow ariving just as the guard and George wa was uncovering the face of a man. Then seeing that he did not know the man George searched the pockets of the dead mans gray uniform but not a thing did he find in addition to daggers and revolvers.

"Well thank goodness that one of the spies have gone to the doom he derse deserves so righly." Exclaimed Gannon. "I only hope we shall be able to capture the mysterious Glandelinians as easily, and avenge the recent kidnapp ing of the Vivian Girls. "

"That is what we are surely going to do." Answered George as they started back for the sleigh, and soon all pulled into the christian lines saft ly and sound and told of their adventure.

THE BATTLE OF WISCONSIN. THE BATTLE OF WISCONSIN .

During the meantime on the day before the seige of Jennie Turnor had started in full progress and it was the purpose of general Evans the main commander to force the eneays positions at the Wi sdo Wisconsin fortifications and so t hat morning when the little girls with the party of soldiers had set out on their scouting tour a great forde of Angelinians had moved forward to storm the fortif icat ion s and had no sooner reached within sight of them when behind a long line of breastworks general jimmie vivian who led the Angelinian wave saw a long line of gray coats rise and then drop out of sight, and some of them to his horror had several little struggling children in their possession, and by the aid of glasses a few minute later they saw the children suddenly appear stuck on pikes stark naked, and that the interior of their bodies had been gutt ed. There seemed to be more than a hundred thousand Glande, Glandelinians in this advanced position against his one million Angelinians wh is seeing the christians starting to rush forward opened a deadly fire for several minutes with musketry and machine guns, and then a portion of the gray line broke and retreated slowly to the second and main line of breastworks.

Seeing the ret reating foe the Angelinian generals threw the Angelinians forward to the a att ack before the retreating Glandelinians coulf could get very far. The line of Free Masons after showing fierce resistance for several hours were driven back successfully by the front line of the christians themselves and with considerable loos loss, and a prominent position was sei zed at the same-time by a sweeping force of Abyssinkilians, which cut the force of Glandelinians in two and left both the right and left wings vie virtually in the air. This position was occupied by general jimmie vivian and his brave division and the enemy behind could neither advance to the relief of their other comrades nor cut off the ret reat of General jimmie vivians brave Abyssinkilians if they were defeated by a final assault upon the whole force. Securing this point of vantage and leaving general Gannon behind to hold at all hazards the main column of Glandelinians under Hanson Stevens who was trying to recover the lost ground, jimmie vivian advanced his main line again to the assault against the entire force of Glandelinians still remaining in the works. After a des perate struggle of four hours duration in which losses were dreadful a long line of works and rocks were aba abandoned by the foe who fled to the main line for a final stand. The rifle- pits formed by the Glandelinians in front of the charging columns of Angelinians were cleared at the point of the bayonet by the Abyssinkilians them- selves, and thousands of rifles and great quanities of ammunition were captured. As the first column of Angelinians appeared over the top of one of the advanced line of works the whole force of Glandelinians opened fire with rifles and all their artillery and tore the Abyssinkilian force to fragments. Many of the poor Angelinians also fell in the face of the veritible hail of bullets shells and canister, but onward the surviving columns advanced & the double quick under this galling fire with an enthusiasm and fearlessness of any savages in we warfare. With bett er arms and cooler command the Glandelinians made g st ill greater havoc in the ranks of the onrushing Angelinians themselves, so entirely were jimmie vivians divisions exposed to their musketry and cannon, but dreadful were their own losses, ad the main havoc only began in the desperate hand to hand fight when the Abyssinkilians were driven back with the loss of more than half of their command. The assault of the other forces of the Angelinians was savagely cont ested by the furious Glandelinians who stood their ground manfully for three hours in the face of the heavier heaviest firing and again six great charges, untill suddenly rallied by another force which was sent to their aid from the main Glandelinian army they soon drove the christians away at the point of the bayonet .

By this time general jimmie vivian and the other force of Angelinians had gained the top of the slight rise of ground but the situation for the Glandelinians was well in hand, for general Jimmie Vivian seeing his flanks turned by reinforcements and his retreat threatened to be cut off, and the three other divisions driven back by the desperate charge of a force of new comers, fell back and scores of platoons of Angelinians scatt ered in great confusion. Then the rout of the christians back tward their own main line began in earnest, their abandon abandonment of the works and their flight to the rear being unusual. Many thousands were killed during this ret reat, and other christians brigades of them in their great demoralization jumped over the cliffs to the snow covered rocks below. Along a portion of the river fo front ttwo brigades of christians who escaped this fate rushed blindly back across the plains swept by the Glandelinian rifle men and most of these were killed in the hail of bullets added by shell and canister. The rest of the christians were ret reating across the Osborne Creek and seeing that a defense could be made they quickly reloaded their rifles and waited for the persuers to come well within range, some of the Abyssinkilians getting prepared also. The Glandelinians were almost upon them when the Angelinians and the rallied Abyssinkilians suddenly sprang up, and pour in a volley that tore up their line, and fell flat again. The persueing Glandelinians were certainly demorilized by this unexpected volley, but no sooner had they started to ret reat, when another bri gade of ret reat ing christians suddenly appeare appeared and charged them furiously, and in this desperate fight which followed almost all of the ps persueing Glandelinians died fighting.

The main column of retr eating Angelinians had also rallied near the positions of the main christian lines, and during the fierce resistance they were reinforced by more divisions and art illery and the Gladelinians soon drew off, and the surviving Angelinians had to let them go not caring to tamper with them any further that day as a blizzard was bg beginning and fearing that unawares general Manley and his main army would come upon them like a storm wave and wipe them out before they saftly reached the main line they all decided to fall back and make for the christian trenches as fast as they could the Avyssinkilians having been good builders having made good earthworks and trenches. As soon as most of the wounded had been collected and eve rything made ready they set out on their way, but they had a long way to go, and when the Glandelinians started to advance again they had just reached the main c hristian line. Most of jimmie vivians first grand division had been tired out du with their mornings desperate batt le with the Glandelinians at Fort wisconsin and as they were too t ired for further fighting that day general Hanson withdrew them to the rear and as it was growing dark and the falling snow thicker he finally decided to abandon the attack untill the next day, and then resume the attack in full force. It was only about an hour after they had been withdrawn to the rear when general Hanson who was inside his army tent was aroused by some sudden concussion and by the heavy tent of tarpaulin falling down on top of him and flapping at him with all its might like the wings of some huge bird. Then to his greater surprise the tent was taken off from him and carried into the air, and then by some flashing lights from the signals Hanson realized a gale of great strength had risen and that a blizzard of great intensity had started in. T ward t he left of his lines it seemed as if the very heavens was in a tremendous uproar of excitement.

"We are being swept by a great blizzard and I am the only one that is out within the lines in it." He gasped as a fitful gust of wind threw a cloud of whirling snow into his face. By the din of the sudden st orm and by some of the tents being hurled down some of the other generals were awakened. Six tents had been blown down, some trees had fallen, and the roaring and screeching of the winds through the branches of the millions of trees was something terrible, while the hiss of the whirling blinding snow on the ground blown h frantically by the wind could be plainly heard.

A tree had fallen narrowly missing the windows of general Hansons headquarters. General Hanson could do nothing better than crawl along the ground untill he reached his headquarters, and then some time after when the storm seemed to be reac hing i ts worse he wondered whether the Vivian girls with the party of soldiers had returned to the lines before the big blizzard set in. It was late in the night when some of the other officers awoke on account of the din of the storm and looking out the window they saw to their surprise and amazement a ship had been stranded on the beach of the river near them. It had been no doubt washed ashore by the raging waves of the river, and immediately the men nearest were aroused and they set out tward the ship and went on board. Those who did not get on first reah reached there on time anyway and they made a full exmanation of its interior and found everything in good order. And it was a provision ship for the Glandelinians which the storm had sent to them instead. The very decks had been loaded with logs and boxes of provisions the lower holds being filled with provisions of all kinds. The ship was at once taken possession of and so two days later after the blizzard was over the trophies was viewed. Violet and her sisters loved to remain on deck despite the cold and watch the surging waves among the ice floes of the river from the bulwarks. Two hours had passed that day when unoticed for a while a thick yellow haze had begun to obscure the horizon over the besieged city of Jennie Turner. A cold freez ing blast came on again blowing stronger and stronger every moment, and wa was tearing white white caps from the surface of the water where the ice had not wedged in thickly. A cold wave was coming on. As the weather cont inued to grow colder general Hanson regarded it with uneasiness, and as the gale was blowing from the northwest he feared a real c good cold snap. Also unoticed to all for the present heavy dark clouds of smoke mostly a strange dumnish color ha had obscured the sky under the mass of breaking snowclouds which above was convulsiv convulsive in shape and darkr red and more threatening every moment. Mo re fires were burning in Jennie Turner. As the day advanced when it was already noticed the cloud of smoke had become of an inky blackness as the fires was growing steadily worse, and the smoke clouds rolled upward with great speed, spreading and expanding in a manner that was appalling.

Since the beginning of the fire all the half of the northwestern sky was envlo envolved in the frightful blackness of the clouds of smoke. It seemed that nothing but fire could penetrate that could and shoot ing over the cloud were whiter masses in the shape of cauliflower seen in volcanic eruptions, and shooting under the cloud the gray light of the nort h where the black mass did not reach yet made the gloom beneath only seem the more sombre. The cl u cloud was indeed a fearful sight and seemed to be in the form of two gigantic wings spred spreading over the sky, and the winged shaped portions seemed to spread slowly in two simultaneous directions while the effects of the glow was awe inspiring in the location of the fire, the gale agat ing the whole surface of the big smoke cloud in tumultious rolling convulitions, while one of the wings was in tumultious billows, while the shadows it cast was seemingly supernatural and fearful fea rful like the dread ob scuri ty which marks an eclipse of the sun or moon.

The two wings of the cloud was as black as sackcloth and as the cloud had passed beyond the zenith a dreadful unea unearthly indescriable darkness seemed to overshawod the whole region in the direction of the city and the enemys lines, while through the lower portion of the cliyd which seemed more rolly shot forth every three seconds angry flashes qll along the horizon, fu followed by dull rumblings like thunder, whivh though far off in their roar were very peculiar in their cannonading salvoes, and alarmed general Hanson to the highest pitch. All the races of wind had now ceased, and the river had become very calm every thing being in a dread suffocating silence, safe for the booming of far distant explosions which grew more frequent. Soon as night advanced an angry sheen of fire red light as if it were the terrible eye of God himself was now above the northwestern horizon of the far distant city which never died out, but & other sections the city of the enemys lines were no longer visible, save by the fearful shine of distan distant camp fires, and by the occasional sheets of flames which darted fiercely through the dread and dangerous cloud, the sudden overspreading of the darkness being unaccountable as it was frightful. General Hanson believing t hat it was an act of t reachery on the part of the enemy decided t o shell his lines in general and suddenly after another hour passed a terrible shower of flashes spread along the christian lines like rivers and lances of fire which seemed to blast the air followed by a thundering roll of sound that was indescriable. Suddenly after this the very heavens seemed on fire, and the very sky seemed to be pierced by flaming storms of flashes there was a confusion of thunderous reports, and to his surp surprise at the same time a flash of other shell explosions revealed a wal of gray that was approaching from the north and then without the slightest warning a portion of the big wave of Glandelinians struck Germaine vivians lines, there was a roar of heavy firing at once, then came the second scho k upon Gannons main line and at the same time there came a discharge like a million cannon exploding at once.

Simultaneous to this came a terrible roar like many water falls rushing down crevi ces in ce caverns and another portion of the Glande linian tidal wave struck in terrible fury, but after an hour of desperate fighting the Glandelinian assault was repulsed with fearful loss. Another big wave of Glandelinians soon followed a half hour later followed by an increase of the furious uproar of the nights battle which had at last broke in terrible and general fury. The Glandelinian columns were fairly dashed to pieces like waves dashed into foam, and knowing it to be a general attack from Manleys army itself and that these great attacks were usually short general Hanson expected the enemy to desist in another hour, but when the time came, amid the explosions of scores of thousands of shells going off like some great warfare of titans the abattle was still raging with unabated fury, the ene ys assaults getting stronger, one after another only to be repulsed however. The battle ofv "T urpinstine Forest " had already been raging for over four hours every wave of Glandelinians moving forwa forw ard to the assault only to be cut to pieces and swept back in the wildest confusion, but soon a big sea of Glandelinians swept over a portion of Hansons works on the right from end to end, there being a pandemonium of tremendous racket for a few minutes, but this wave wa was soon like spray of a storm wave going back the Angelinians sweeping forward making a perfect washout of all the Glandelinians in the captured trenches and flooding the ground with the dead and wounded in gray.

CHAPTER FOURTY ONE

WRECK OF GLANDELINIAN ARMIES, DURING THE BATTLE OF CALVERINIA TOWN. AND DANGEROUS WORK OF CHRISTIAN GENERALS, AMID THE APPALLING FURY OF THE TREMENDOUS BATTLE.

A few mi nutes after all of the christian generals became aware or definitely conscious of a might y roaring sound, a volume of sound so great r that their ears seemed quite unable to take it in. Coming from the direct ion of the east the sound was attended by a distinct if subtle concussion whike another million cannon like roar seemd to fill the air as another storm of flashes from exploding shells from seemingly eve everywhere seared the sky. General Hanson dimly used all his powerful vision and perciived suddenly a hedious dark wave of moving objects advanceadvancing straight upon his own center and he was u surprised for then where did the strange sound come from. The advancing wall of fierce Mc-Hollestinians t urmerannians rapidly showing its si ze and extent bore a regular crest of flags and banners, the peuliar booming and roaring being deafening.

The canister as the gathling guns let loose upon them hissed like nearly a hundred thousand snakes. All of a sudde with an indescriable roar of wild universal screaming yells that was fairly earsplitting the whole wave struck against the christian center d riving back the most immi immense divisions in the greatest panic from their irrestibleonrush and even sweeping the christian lines back at all points amid the crash and uproar of firing point black.The scene of conglomeration of confusion was fearful, and even the main second line of the center after it had recieved the retreating columns to the rear shuddered and rolled back in confused masses, while the christian bā teries high on the precipice beyond roared and thundered with a deafening noi se, every portion of the glandelinian wave being swept clean through and through with damanating carnage horrible to behold.The glandelinians went down by tens of 5 housands per second but it seemed as if nothing could check them now the fierce yelling Mc-Hollestinians being in the lead. The entire christian center under general Hanson vivian was cut to pisces, and went backwards in wildest panic not being able to stand before the catastropic force of this might y avalanch of glandelinians, while the glandelinian columns still moved onward roaring in their yells like a great cyclonic vortex. The glandelinian attack had struck with such a shocking crash that the whole christian cater had been fairly crushed, and torn int o many parts scattered wide, and amid all the horrible indescriable din, nearly a score of officers had fallen in frantically striving to check and the panic and confusion. Speeding with the force of millions of men on a race the glandelinians had carried all before them and in a moments time the rest of the christian center had given way ad it seemed now as if the enemy were going to win the battle completely. During the meanwhile a lot of trees had been hw hewn down to be used as breastworks and abatis and most of the fleeing christians sought refuge behind this but the captured cannon was trained upon it by the enemy and the abatis were as good as provisions on board a ships decks being swept off by a heavy sea.

A shell had exploded among some of the abati s the abatis flying against each other as they were swept in āl directions, and simultaneously a tree had been thrown down by another explod explosion and held fast between the unmoved portion of the abatis but another shell burst with a thunderous report and by an upward movement the convussion swept the tree down as rudely as a downward rol of some huge ship, and then another explosion hurled it high into the air like a great bass leaping for a fly. During the time the tidal wave had struck general Hansons center the other portions of the christ ian line had been in an indescriable chaoss of confusion and here the whole line had been smashed and broken up like an eggshell. Great fragments of lumber, provision boxes and other pri provisions had been captured by the enemy who had met a storming o fire for three hours and every christian colu n had been forced by the irrestiless force of the glandelinian ons laught back two miles beyond their original position.

General Hanson seeing the terrible disaster had ordered all his barr batteries of the heaviest cannons to be massed upon the assailants while all efforts were being made to fairly churn the glandelinian waves with havoc and destruction and soon all the cannons did open fire and hewed avenues in the enemys lines but still their advance was not checked and general Hanson requested general Evans to sent him aid as soon as possible. Violet and her sisters terrified for the first time at the fury of such a bloody battle clung to general Hanson near a pile of crushed boxes and lumber, which some Angelinians had used as a sort of sailent. However as fortune would have it the enemy attack at some points had been slight ly checked, but nevertheless the trouble was not over though it was not so terrible as before and thirteen new divisions all Abyssinkilians had arived and barred all progress of the enemy and tearing their line up with a dreadful annihilating fire.

Still one great portion of the glandelinian surge still advanced. But they were advanci ng que quiet ly now. Crash bang went all the christian artillery and as the Abyssinkilians also opened fire the din and chaoes was more horrible than before but more worse for the enemy who were caught in the abatis and the landelinians had to cut their way through to avoid being either trapped, captured or annihilated.The damage of the glandelinian columns was horrible. The main line had been badly galled and had to be rallied by force t by their frantic officers while all the cut up columns under general Calmann Shoemann had to be withdrawn as it only made it dangerous for the main line in facing a christian fire like that to oppose the fierce Abyssinkilians in such a ragged condition as this, and if they did so good night with the whole glandelinian wave.

It was the most terrific onslaught ever seen during a battle before. The losses of the glandelinians was terrific but doubly terrific was the christian losses. Though the battle was still raging in its most terrific fury and the enemys onslaughts still more stronger and vehement some of the most galled glandelinian columns appeared to be breaking up and retiring, and as the Abyssinkilian cavarly had rallied most of the panic stricken Angelinians a,ll the generals now bā believed that the enemy was soon going to retire in general. Gae General Hanson alone did not bāeve so though the situation was not so black for him as before and he had the opinion that the retiring glandelinian forces had only been torn apart by the violence of the christian artillery fire which was dominating the whole plain beyond. The detonations of a hundred thousand cannon made noises like the same number of horrible explosions tearing the earth open and the darkness was whitened as the snow by the thickness of the powe powder somke.

It indeed was thunder of cannons but the most terrific the Angelinian generals had ever heard and general Hanson who had been frantically directing every motion and operation not iced another huge dark wave of Glandelinians at a far different quarter of the battle field rapidly approaching direct down across the plains not reached by the christian artillery.The firing along other portions of his lines by this time was so fierce and deadly that it seemed bent on destroying nature i tself. So furious was the storming christian fire, that with the fury of yells, the thunder of cannon, the flashes of firearms and all kinds of big guns, the terrible numbers of fallen and the thickness of smoke and flying wreckage and snow clods that it seemed as if the world was spinning to its doom and a great expectance seemed to possess all the christian generals.

"If I ever can succeed in forcing back the enemy under these grave conditions we are safe."Said gensal Hanson."We are I'm sure fighting against half of our own numbers and even then they are as bad as ten to our one."

The great cloud of troops was hurrying forward across that portion of the plins covering as it seemed half of it, while from the direction of the enemys position a weird reddish light and others of all colors seemed to diffuse with the darkness and grayness of the smoke filled atmosphere. At times as the firing would increase furiously breaths of cold air would penetrate the sweat reaked soldiers like a shiver of a fearful ant icipaion ant icipation while the dark cloud of advancing men was now close twad t wa rd the christian left but before it scudded rifts of wildly flying masses in seperated columns.They were the skirmishers.

"Wonder who they are going t o attack!" Thought general Hanson.

General Hanson was all the time on the scene but where the shots from the wildly attacking enemy could not reach him and stood looking into the heart of the threatening cloud.of Glandelinians moving upon someboyd some bodys christian x army. He was surprised to hear still more queer thunder ing noise, the dark cloud of moving objects suddenly formed int o a long wave and every strip of the plain which had been covered by the cloud was suddenly clear except where the wave was moving across in double formation, while along his own center thefiring of both sidesxseemd to be increasing with redoubled fury. Then suddenly another furious waveof the foe struck against the brave Abyssinkilian forces and in an instant went surging over the captured works in a backward floe driven back by the fury of t he resistance of the Abyssinkilians. General Hanson striving to rally some br brigade of Angelinians was caught in the torrent of panic stricken refugees and carried bodly bodily backwards but nevertheless by frantic efforts he managd to stem the confusion and rally thm at last . The cloud of smoke fro the firing was blinding, st ifling, and despite tt he rushing charge of the enemy wi which came again with tenfold vehemence general Hanson finAly gained his p own position with great difficulty and closed the gaps made, just as a scathing surge of wild Mc-Hollestinians from the scond part of the Glandelinian surge went- ta tearing at the christian columns tho throwing the Angelinian and Avyssin kilian forces together intermingled in a great mixup in a confused mass while the other portion of the line s r s urged to and for fro for a half hour.

The howling surging Glandelinian columns threatened during the assaults to even force back the Abyssinkilian divisions and so fearing that some thing would happen general Hanson went to all parts of the line frequently to see that there were no breaks while all the generals were given orders to look out for any signs of breaks, and orders were also given that the rallied Angelinian forces were to be thrown to the support of the Abyssinkilians. Not a moments pguse had been in the wild battle of ''The Turpentine Forest'' and the Glandelinian wave had swept forward one after another so furiously and the pressure of their attacks had been so strong that when the Angelinians went to stem the current of disaster in placeof those fallen back it was found impossible to stand before the Glandelinian onslaught and & at times the foe threatend all with annihilation that dared face their firing.

The wild uproar was frightful. For every charge the enemy screeched and yelled like a hundred million dmons demons and when they were repulsed their cries were of derision and defiance. During one of the charges a great flash of firing along the enemys lines almost blindd the blinded the Angelinians and Abyssinkilians and the crash of so many thundering cannon almost made their very teeth ache.One great blast of firing followed another keeping the whole batt lefield illuminated with an unearthly glare.

As the battle became general the crash and uproar was seemingly ih every direction while by exploding shells many trees had been snapped by the concussion and hung brokenly like fo flowers on their stems. The thunder of many thousands of cannon of both sides roared incessantly while the furious avalanches of Glandelinians kept up a an ever increasing fury of their attacks. Many trees from the fierce firing fell over into the christian breastworks with a great clatter and were swept and torn to shreds by the fisce converging fire of musketry, shell and canister of both sides. The dangling branches were torn off by the flying storm of bullets and c, shell explosions makeclouds of white smoke as big as big baloons.The christian line seemed to be gap gapped every three mimutes but the enemy suffered frightfully and would roll back after striking their blows and then rise to resume the violent attack once more. At one point of the Abyssinkilian front a big gap was exposed on account of the annihilatio n of one brigade and the enemy swarmed like a surge of water through this gap, while a perfect hurricane of firing on both sides gushed suddenly.General Hanson rushed great reinforcements of Angelinians for that gap, and they disolved into fragments from their losses as they strove to drive the enemy back, and general Franklin Turner was wounded and his aid Frank Smith wounded in the thigh. Again general Hanson tried to fill in the gap and again with the same result.At this unfort unate moment a new force of Abyssinkilians came up which gave general Hanson with the help of his nephew and nearly ten brigades of infatry infantry to shut up the gap and drive the foe back a considerable distance by main force though it cost wholesale losses, and then greater reinforcements were hurled forward to prevent the gap from coming again.

The lightning flashes from long streams of discharged muskets musket ry and gathling guns, and other cannons and exploding shells gave forth bright beams like furious fiery rivers and jagged forks, and even the enemy made a tremendous roar at times with their yelling still like the screaming and howling of a million de o demons bent upon the destruction of the whole christian army. A ll at once another great assault struck the christian line of general Hansons right forced it to reel and bend slight ly t o the right. The first of thebigfest waves had burst into fragments from the effects of the christian artillery fire-before they had struck however but the second series of furious waves of Glandelinian soldiery had sent some of the christian columns baow backwards again and after this receding wave had went back crushed t o fragments the third terrific wall of Glandelinians which had also struck against the christian line qith seemingly crushing force had become like an onrushing mob which in an infuriated way had handled the christian troops like demons handle lost souls doing more damage than recently written but had resulted in a repulse by the Abyssinkilians who tore up their columns and sent them flying back with greater confusion. The fourth wave had been some five hundred and fifty six six thousand strong and had made a most furious sweep of the christin lineline but their own dead and wounded were piled in a confused mass, the Abyssinkilians counter charging and penetrating the Glandelinian surge to the very rear, the Glandelinians fleeing completely in wild panic.But the fifth Glandelinian surge was simply awful and in striking against the christian line swept forward with such tremendous force that all would have been lost if all the other forces had not come up at the right moment bursting the surge to pieces and breaking the whole line and cutting down many of the survivors as they retreated hastily to their own point of attack.

General Hason feared that by the pounding of the Glandelinian attacks that more dangerous breaks may appear in his line which was Aready again thrown out of its position, and even the condition of his whole army was now regarded seriously, for the attacks of the enemy were now so furious that it began to cause serious concern. Instead of growing better the situation of the christian line was growing worze, and the danger of the outcome being a more serious one, for the height of the battle was now reached and the crushing force of the desperate attacks of the foe wa was increasing, and the yells of the enmy had again and again burst forth in redoubled fury. The yell of the Glandelinians made a roar like a great tornado, and aga as they again struck against thw christia christian lines the rushing torrent of Glandelinians completely poured over the positions.

For a few moments the christian line was in the midst of the seething storm of human beings in gray but nevertheless supported by the Abyssinkilians the Angelinians soon also repulsed this mighty wave, and counter charge only to return into the midst oof the tremendous chaoes then to tear their own way through the whole Glandelinian column, and overwhelmed by the Angelinians who had made a clean sweep of the once captured works, the Glandelinian survivors retreated once more the Angelinians under general Jimmie Vivian who bore the brunte of the attack carrying all before them and tearing the entire Glandelinian wave opposing them to pieces.At times the very Glandelinians in their panic seemed to scream like hundreds of thousands of children dying of fright, and the whole battle line itself was in an ibdescriable vhac chaoes and uproar.

After this general repulse all was over for a while along general Jimmie vivians lines. General Kindernine having been vict orious at the migh midnight part of the struggle advanced his forces to the aid of general Hansons badly thinned line where the awful roar of the conflict st ill cont inued and the noise was so terrific at the highest fury of the battle that it seemed as if all the oceans w ere falling into the bowles of the earth.

T he Glandelinian losses were already I0,000,000 in killed and wounded while those of the christians was over I6,897,764. And still the fur ious batt le raged and general Hanson becoming apprehensivewarned general Jack Evans of the danger and told of his losses. Evans requested him to appeal to his brother whose army was nearer. General Hanson realiz ing that his whole army was being t orn to pieces decided to do so and a messenger was sent immediately. The attacking Glandelinians were so furious in their onsets that the bravest of the christian columns did not find it so easy to stop the Glandelinians, and there seemed no end of the awful conflict and soon a seemingly endless wave of Glandelinians were again seen approaching.

As the firing of all the christian bateries was at its worse, and as the Abyssinkilians were already ploughing the retreating foe forces through and thrug t hrough and through with shot and shell and canister no one seemed to notice this tidal wave of Glandelinians untill general Hanson vivian had wired the order to all the surviving officers;

"Everybody hold their ground at all cost s.General vivian will send us provisions and reinforcements as soon as possible as he is not engaged."

T This monsterous wave of Glandelinians seemed almost too large to be real, which seemed to stretch far beyond the length of the very plains itself, and at times it was whitened into invisibility by the firing of their own muskets the wave advancing in a psallel line and as the christian batteries again let loose with a roar the mightiness which no one can describe, it still came on though torn and river riven extending as far as it could be viewed. As it reached the christian works there was a fearful uproar of firing never heard before, a pat of the wave broke and rolled back, but nevertheless t o the christian line the shock was equally terrific, the whole christian front being thrown out of its position.The Glandelinian wave however as it broke resembled something like a sea wavebreaking up against a strong breakway breakwater the shock having been quite s erious to both sides.

Every one of the remaining Glandelinian columns recoiled simultaneously after being st unned by their losses and the earsplitting crah of christian musketry and with their wounded who could follow going after them the whole Glandelinian surge was swept back with terrible loss to boot. A mi nute lat er another struck against the christian line being of the same strength and the results was something fearful.

The whole wave encountered the main fire of the christian batteri es first and then the whole line of musketry at one time, and broke back in fragments and the crash and din of this collision was beyond describing. Hundreds of thousands on both sides had fallen during this one single charge, but the foe had again been repulsed. This time again the firing had roared like a million cannon and soon again headed for the christian lines was another large column of the foe and nothing yet roared so loud now as the firing on both sides, and general Hanson seeing that his brother s aid did not come yet became more apprehensive. Yet even now the effects of the Glandelinian assaults was more dangerous but even now fortunately one of the waves of the foe drove its way through a portion of the christian line and got itself seriously handicapped, the firing on both sides having suddenly burst with a blinding roar, and a great deluge of dead ad wounded Glandelinians paved the snow covered ground, and the cannons thundering with all the violence of their fury soon checked the foe and again repulsed them.Yet another huge column of Glandelinians was advacing and as it struck the christian line and then broke back in fr agments the ground was seen to be covered with fresh numbers of the fallen for a great di stance, this wave of Glandelinians being fairly torn t o fragements.

But still the Glandelinians were not daunted for another furious column of Glandelinians struck a terribleblow and receded.Then another came almost wrecking the christian line. Then another still which made the very firing increased to redoubled fury. Then still another. Then another of more greater fury. Then an attack of the most tremendous force all of which resulted in crushing repulses.But still how long could the christ ian line hold out.?

Never before had general Hanson or the rest of his chiefs seen such fury in a screaming battle which now really had mounted to its highest fury. The screaming yells of the combatants was fairly deafening and the whole batt lefield was fairly covered with the dad and wounded of both sides, ad and still the big waves of Glandelinians swept against the christian lines without intermission and it was a ,iracle that the christian army of Hansons was not defeated yet.Again and again general Hanson had sent pleading notes to his brother t o hurry up heavy reinforcements even by wireless but it seemed that he did not take the interest t o do so. Without the slightest pause the battle raged at its highest fury and the outcome of the situation was just as black as ever.

Violet and her sisters who could not sleep at all from the din of the horrible srr strife were speechless with fright at the horrible scenes of the struggle and they were not to blame for general Hanson and many of his officers brave as they were, were very apprehensive and never ceased praying as long as the furious battle continued. It was theworse kind that general Hanson and the rest of his generals had ever seen and yet it seemed to have no end whatever, the attacking foe screaming louder in their yells louder than any demons of Indians could yell even out-rivaled the uproe of cyclones and they could be heard plainly despite the crash and uproe of the firing of both sides..... It was another hour after however that the battle did seem to show signs of slight abatement th for though the Glandelinians still attacked with great force and fury the roaroar and crash of firing elsewhwe was not so heavy now. General Hanson and the others who had strove amid fearful perils to kee keep the lines t oget her had hopes that the battle was abating as general Hanson detected a weakness in the strength of his lines now and neither was the yelling of the enemy so loud.Sometimes the firing would threat en to increase still more, then show more signs of abating, and then would abate a little more, and then grow a little louder again. Some times the problem about the christian losses became very serious, and had Hanson fear that all would be lost if the enemy increased their numbers again.

But then as the battle showed real signs of considerable abatement the prospect ahead began to seem a little brighter. There wa hope for general Hanson that the attack of the enemy would soon cease, and their hopes was increased when the far distant firing showed more signs of abatement, and the Glandelinians though at longer intervals still swept against the christian lines in desperate attacks, they ceased to roar their yells so furiously and the sound of their cries was not so loud and more feeble. But then again would come the disqi di squisting scream of the Glandelinian devil yell which would continue stedily for fifteen minutes, but practacally abated a little, and every sign began to be a cheering one. The battle really did show signs of abatement but yet though there was slight abatements it was not sufficient enough to remove the grave apprehension that general Hanson or his aiding generals felt.

However it had to happen that several waves of Glandelinians having made a union formed int o a quite large one and struck against general Hansons left wing and the christian line drew back and recoiled and so thick was the smoke that nothing could be seen.Some of the generals who had went close to the rear of the firing line with the slight abatement of the desperate battle threw themselves behind trees as the gust of heavy firing broke loose so suddenly but the ground lurched from the concussion of the firing of a whole line of cannons and these generals being caugh caught off their guard were torn from their grip by the shock and sent rolling about untill they were brought up with a sudden jolt against the wrecked maze of fallen trees and bodies .Sheepishly they sere scrambled to thei r feet and limped back tward the further part of the rear to get orders remarking by telegraph to Hanson that the battle seemed to be getting worse again.

The angry yells of the enemy though receding in its fury still con timued viciously, and the Glandelinians were soon again driving and plunging and rolling heavily against the christian lines, and sea after sea of humanity ripped the christian line only to fal back.While the generals were praying for success another surge of humanity came screaming upon the christian line fairly mingling with the christians in a desperate hand to hand fight only to be driven back again. Another, and still another struck the christian forces back in quick succession, but each time the christian columns rallied and stood manfully against the staggering blows chacing the retiring Glandelinians viciously every time they repulsed the foe, hurl ing themselves forward and rushing on untill recalled, and leaving the Glandelinians like a ship wallowing in the backwash. Nothing still could be heard above the screaming of the Glandelinian "Devil Yell" and the hiss and roar of the shells and firing of all kinds of guns and the smoke still enveloped the battle line like a white shroud despite the black darkness of the night which was very cloudy. Only the bravey of the Abyssinkilians and their artillery fire of all the batteries kept the whole christian line from being broken beyond rally. Yet already Hansons whole force was in fragments the Glandelinians having attacked his line in an ugly quarter of the main christian position and had at the very first almost sent the whole army reeling under the force of the blow.

In their ragged condition the Angelinian columns could no longer expect to hold out successfully as the enemy still attacked in solid fresh masses, the columns of the foe sweeping forward with tremendous force. Every blow made the christian line su shudder and tremble as though it were a frightened child but still the christian forces stood their ground boldly sometimes to be lost to view in the smoke shroud and flashes with fire. The whole christian line were spumed in smoke occasionally and often the solid columns in purple were swept back by a blow recieved by them from the enemy and after every sweep of the attack

the survivors rallied and plunged into the Glandelinian columns driving them back but nevertheless with no aid coming the whole of Hansons army felt itself in dis distress and general Hanson reported the fact to Evans. At that hour it being exactly three o-clock in the morning the ground before the works being already piled up high in bodies of the slain, a portion of the christian line had again broken and the terrific force of the Glandelinian attack sent huge columns of christians back flying in grea great confusion. Two minutes later some officer discovered fire in every one of the generals headquarters and among the wooden breastworks and abatis of the christian lines. Roaring flames shot out the upper windows of every house, and the abatis went like oil igniting the dry dead leaves of the trees still standing and it looked for a time as if the christian forces would have to abandon the works but the fires in the houses were easily put out and the abatis burned out without causing any trouble whatever. Meantime the results of the battle still could not be termed and not long after the fire it was discovered that a good portion of the Glandelinians were ret iring but at other points they had gained a good hold of the christian position, and all the despi p desperate attempts of the christians to regain the positions failed. As a last resort the Angelinians let go all their longest lines of cannons in a general discharge.This action was respos responsible for the three more hours of desperate battling which followed among many of the very generals themselves where they strove to check the foe at all costs and regain the positions lost tg them. To general Hansons disgust all attempts were failing and the Glandelinian fire was fairly combing his columns and sending every one of the survivin si survivors flying back for their lives. With their progress somewhat arrested however by the furious counter charges of the Angelinians the Glandelinians Glandelinians began to hold their own ground forming in parellel line and hugging the works as close as possible.

At this time the main christian generals under Hanson having heard news from Signal station Number One, discovered the situation, and these generals having left their horses behind, and knowing that the strongest force of Abyssinkilians could not live in facing the thunde thundering cannon in possession of the enemy, followed the sit uation as well as they know how, trying to think of some p plan and depend ing on other signal stations for informations and war appa ratus. Also in the meantime the wreck of the Glandelinian forces was seen by the signal men of station Number Two the officer being Lieutenant general Failen who quickly ordered his men to signal other stations of the situation. The Glandelinian force who had made the success was about half way between the christian rear position and before their own position s at Jennie T urmer and also between the two stations at this time, and at one side more christian forces were moving to throw the foe back.

As I said before the battle was still raging fiercely and in addition to this and a snow riven gale that was ariving the tide of disaster to the seemingly victorious Glandelinians was becoming exceptionally full and as yet they did not realize it. The christian shell fire dominated the entire plains which was nearly four miles wide and ten long, and it was covered with floods of powder smoke from the bursting shrapnell that never faded away before another bursting cloud of smoke took its place. Between the shell swept plains which was torn up by the shell fire of both sides ad and along the edge where it was necessary for the christian generals to reform their still confused Angelinian divisions driven back by the first great onslaught, it was necessary for the christian forces to travel through deep snow formed by the recent blizzards and to face death in all its forms as the thundering shell storm cont inued to burst around and receded with gripping swiftness and to resume again carrying disaster and ruin everywhere.Scattered profusely on the plains were huge masses of driftwood and fragments of wreckage of trees and shattered parts of human bodies that imperiled the lives of those who ever would dare to cross that deadly "No Man's Land."

Through all these perils with the furious onrush of the foe clutching as it were their very li ves, tearing them f back from their positions, and hurling them struggling into the dangerous jumbleof wreck age and snow drifts and human bodi es, the Angelinians still fought on with the encouragement of their generals the Abyssinkilians dragging the heavy artillery, and those of the Angelinians who h were having the li ghter traveling were almost having as hard a time of it. The enemys fire still tumbled in across the plains a never ceasing sweep of musketry, cannon ,and machine guns.The low hills, the dismal plains and woods lay flooded with w wreckage and dead and wounded bodies. Often the generals of the Angelinians and the Abyssinkilians waded through three feet of snow in level depth sometimes to the top of their waists in drifts in trying to encourage the christian soldiers not to yeild to the desperate enemy. A ll were drenched in sweat cold as it was with their desperate exertions, their uniforms crackling on their bodies stifly like tin. But they hung desperately to their task. It was between four and five o-clock that morning when two more divisions of Abyssinkilians arived, and reports came that general Vivian was advancing with his whole force to help having recieved the last message sent by Hanson and not the others.The horses pulling the artillery had refused to ford the small st reams and sluches of the river between the hi lls of snow and had been left behind the men not marching pushing and dragging the ca cannon themselves.The big Angelinian columns at bay before the enemy was still holding off fur ther attacks and still drifting backwards and forwards along the whole line, and the fresh columns of Abyssinkilians now joined forcees with the rallied Angelinians in a strange and terrific part of the battle.

Four hundred yards ofv off the Glandelinian front was the christian works partly abandoned by the enemy some of the Glande linian brigades still defending it and their generals also, but all along the line their fire was still hot and heavy, st eady, and sure.The brave Abyssinkilians at once placed their advancing batteri es into position but when they fired the shells fell too far way out of reach of the Glandelinia Glandelinian forces and the artillery men were swept away so fast by the fire of the foe that they were not enabled to fire another broadside. A nd even before another could be fired the Glandelinian artillery broke loose in a general discharge and the artillery of the Abyssinkilians had to be withdrawn out of range. Reloading the guns and other war apparatus, they started again to find a batt er position for their aim laboring manfully in the deep snow to keep pace with the advancing christian reinforcements.O In order to do this they were obliged to proceed at what was almost a run.

Aft er breatless work lating over twenty minutes they were again in the position the guns were once more planted and another volley fired. But as the position of the ground was low and the only point of vantage from which the guns could be shot was the top of the knolls on which the effect was made was in an indentation they again unlimbered the cannon for it was further from the foe and the volley had failed to reach the foe and so once more they staggered on.As the advance now led onward the condition of the battle line became w orse. The next hill was seven hundred yards fart her on and the position that lay in front of it was well nigh impassable on account of the raging foe assault and storm of firing the foe here attacking vehemently and furiously the situation being all the more dangerous and so after twenty eight mi nutes of grim effort it was finally gained only to find the ran ge still too long but nevertheless the guns were placed into posit ion and carsful observations were taken to make this volley of shots successful.

That it would have been successful is probable had not the range been too short . It is difficult to describe the discouraging outlook that now faced the nervy men of the artillery. Once more grimly they reloadee reloaded their guns and resumed the movement through the furious blizzard of fri firing and now they could see the position half buried in dead and wounded christians with the forms of officers laying among them. One officer a small one was hanging downward on the sailent held by the lashing around his feet where they had slipped when he froze to death and fell. From first to last the terrible difficulties of the Glandelini Abyssin,kilian artillery men and the perils which beset them never slackened for a moment but increased. The wheels of the cannons sank so quickly in the infiltrated so snow that the conveyances had to beconstantly unloaded and portions of the apparatus carried by men on stretchers to lighten the guns sufficent ly enough to make progress possible and at other times the men would have to fling themselves upon the wheels ad and push them with all their strength to prevent the cassions and artillery from being stuck by the inequalities of the snow covered ground.All the while the fury of the enemys fire had been gradually tearing off and smashing the upper branches of all the trees within the vinicity and scatt ering off the branches t ogether with the bark. This fury of hell cont inued stead ily and the plains was full of this debri s which was constantly u hurled up into the ai r right in front of the advancing christian batteries. The air seemed full of flying splinters every time a broadside of shells from the enemy bursted and also wreck of cordwood, ad in fording small streams the atta attention of the artillery men was about equally devided between steadying and hauling through the snow and avoding the full range n a of the enemys fire.

On the less inundated ground the danger continued, the whole region being swept by da dangerous missels.A sudden outburst of fresh firing added by great explosions here and there and flyin flinging through the air greq great clouds of wreckage, sticks or stacks of wood upon the artillery forces and many times men were knocked down by flying shell fragments. The escapes were numerous. It was with great difficulty tha that the artillery men could keep their feet in this constant onslaught and pelting of wreckage thrown in all directions by the exploding barrages of the enemys shells.But not a man fell away or flinched from the work before him but bore the raking labor with the same courage and com posure and the same disciplined obedience to the direction of the leader every mind bent upon getting back those captured works. Of their tasknot the least difficult was that of keeping the lines of christians within sight and especially the guns and powder dry in the unusual drench of flying snow all around them thrown upon them by explosions and it was difficult to understand how they continued it for aside from the number of actual firings when ever a momentarily pause of the enemys artillery, or slowing of the christian charges offered a chance for action. At least a dozen times the artillery was hastily unlimbered and dmed aimed in the nearest point the guns planted ad the shot and shell arranged for the effort when the Angelinians would suddenly roll forward tward the enemy within range of their own friends, and the A byssinkilian men would have to reload their carts and toil on again after them in this way and with these interruptions they worked down along the great plain tward signal station nu number two and a quater of a mile beyond it, when a chance was offered for another broadside but the shots flew too far to the rear of the enemys lines. The artillery men moved again stubbornly on and suddenly the officer seen hanging so long over the edge of the sailent fell and was out of sight . It was now five o-clock in the morning but the artillery men still watched their chance with unslacked activity, whn whenthey saw mother christian officer drop in the front of his lines as the enemy poured in a blaze of musketry upon the christian assailants. Yet the artillery men moved on still to a point three quarters of a mile below the signal station where they got another chance to fire a grodside broadside which however fel short the glandelinians having withdrawn to a certain distance to their own rear, and also the fury of the firing had forced the artillery men farther a d farther back on the hills ad they advanced and the artillery too being weighted with frozen snow and moister. But again the cassions were reloaded and the march resumed. A little below the station they had another chance to fire a broadside, and this time it was a success. The volley of one hundred shells flew through the branches of the tree tops sweeping the gray lines to pieces amid a horrible roar of explosions. As the christian infantry still con tinued to roll forward nothing yet could be done to fire a second volley with such good effect but while the greater part loaded the guns again and got them ready and trudged on with the assailants for a closer range and kept pace with the advancing Angelinians. At the end of nother another quarter of a mile the Angelinian forces struck against the foe lk like the t idal wave then suddenly melted away into fragments of men l left and recoiled under the pressure of glandelinian reinforce ments. At last the time had come and another broadside was fir fired with good aim and tore the enemys line to fragments a second time causing confusion. The Angelinians rolled backwards but a giant column of Abyssinkilian infantry rushed through the ranks of the recoiling Angelinians and moved forward clearing the first line trenches of the graycoated soldiss soldiers, the glandelinians receding as swiftly as possible but never once slackening their fearful musketry fire. Not a one survivied in the front ranks of the Abyssinkilian infantry so severewas the enemys fire, and many a brigade had gone to pieces.Believing now that the christian wave was about to break up fourteen of the generals commanding the fresh divisions of Abyssinkilians and Abbiannians despite general Hansons wise warnings advanced their forces against the receding enemy thinking victory was already won, but none of them came back to tell the tale having met complete annihilation. Meantime general vivian who had arived with his army discovered the stranded condition of general Hansons army a quarter of a mile to his own front, and he also discovered tha the signal stations were signalling for help from the next division Roswell Buster Johnstons army.

One scene of the battle was a tremendous tragedy. A large force of the Abyssinkilians were in the wildest confusion. General vivian had thirteen great divisions and thirteen great generals and so these were thrown forward not knowing of course the dangers of counter charging the Glandelinians known as T urnerannian s.

These divisions which were nr new ones and all Abbiannians were one million strong and theplace for the launch was to be made was covered by fresh Angelinian artillery and these divisions reached the panic stricken Abyssinkilians and ralli ed them without trouble. For about twenty minutes it seemed as if everything was going to be right as all glandelinian forces were fleeing before their advance in a panic not- able to be stopped.It was when the first line of suddenly appearing gargolinians came suddenly upon them that general T urner Hanson founds that his estimates of the T urnerianians not being fir fierce and sanguinary Glandelinians had been a err. From the glandelinians a dreadful fire wa was opened boiling the scene into a seething caldron of hell.The first six divisions of Abyssinkilians were swept and torn to pieces by the close quarters engagement with the gargolians and then the whole surviving line having its left annihilated was hurled backwards despite the fierceness of the resistance. The monsterous hooded glandelinian column shouldered the Abyssinkilians charging them as violently as if shoot ing down a ttrough and ten general officers trying t o rally their columns fell wounded. Ten aciously with the hardin hardihood that the service breeds in t he Abyssinkilians the christians stood their ground manfully and i nch by inch worked their torn and mangled lines out of the tremendous melee and repulsed the successive waves of the glandelinians amid frightful slaughter, but it was entirely for oven the reinforcements helping them for the Abyssinkilians themselves to stand another hour against these fiercest of all glandelinians entirely.

Completely worn out by their exertions the soldiers were unable to stand ground any longer against the terrific sea of humanity in gray and there was nothing left to do but turn tail and run for the rear.And ann attempt was made to rally after the retreat continued for a certain distance but a furious sea of Turnermannians rolled upon the christ ian line in broadside fashion, the slaughter being redoubled and general Jebsie of the Abyssinkilians was mortally wounded-as he tried to get his frantic men to retire and leave the screeching gargolian fiends alone.

This als o was a diffuc difficult task. A quart er of an hour pa passed and but a few hundred yards had been made in trying to stem the furious advance of the sea of Glandelinian soldi ers. Then general turner Hanson seei ng the strength of his own forces giving out consulted his other generals of what should be done. General John Nelson decided to try counter charging the enemy again.

By this time the whole plain was half covered with fresh fallen of both sides and also the christian line was getting jagged making the situation very dangerous and keeping many officers all the time striving to keep the forces together thus taking all their own strength and courage to do this. Watching his chance general Hanson shot his columns forward to the rescue and checking the first onrush of the wildly attacking enemy upon the panic stricken troops gained one hundred yards ahead and driving some of the divisions of the foe back before the next onrush of the fresh divisions of Glandelinians caught those who were demorilized. This column of Glandelinians was also checked with great loss and half the distance that had been lost was recovered easily as it seemed.

But the peril was only about to begin. Before the hardy christian generals now lay a sweeping t idal wave of Glandelinians whose onrushes were very continuous. There was but one thing to do, and that was to hold the christian line together against each onrush and trust t o the arival of more cannon and reinforcements to carry the christian success home.The scene only worked for a moment then suddenly close to the main line of earth- works-----so close to permit the Abyssinkilians to see the whits of their eyes a huge wall of T urnerannians crushed their way forward with wild yells, the whole Aysinkilian forces was literally overwhelmed and sent flying back in confusion through the maelstrome of smoking peril like a piece of wood in a rapids. T he generals were wounded ten of them, some thrown down by the onrush and then with the remainder of the forces began a terrific struggle for life. General T urner Hanson was killed as his own line was overthrown and his body wa found later a mile from the scene of the conflict an ugly blue brus bruise across the forehead perhaps from the blow of a glandelinian musket butt or the blunt part of some Gargolin sabre. The other generals at first tried to rally their forces in order to regain t he lost ground but seeing their retreating lines going to pieces in the face of the furious fire of the advn advancing enemy abandoned the efforts and struck out for the rear.

Thi rty seconds later general Jeole and another high officer of rank was carried from the scene of wild battle half dead.

General Nelknis was within ten yards of the rage of the enemys fire as he also strove to rally the men but the strong force of the retreating christians carri ed him backwards with their to t he rear flow and for twenty minutes the arvi ariving Calverinian forces which had arived in the meantime watched him fighting a desperate struggle to restore order a hundred yards beyond their own reach. He finally gained some con trol over the men a mile south of the terrible disaster. General Hansel was next to rally his own forces a half mile farther than Nelkins. Three others followed but they were killed in trying to restablish their own firing lines and resist the enemy s headlong attack all his own men fighting to the last and died fighting. General Solomon Glader was the first to recieve his mortal wound he being another with a blue mark on the forehead. The rew t of the christian generals withdrew their shat tered divisions saftly to the rear only one divisions still remaining the in the fields of damnation.The division of Abyssinkilians made a gallent struggle for its existance while the crowds of Calverinians were preparing to meet the oncoming enemy.The division was reinforcemed by exceptionally strong columns of rallied Angelinians.The limit of the situation now came. T he Glandelinians rushed on wildly tward the christ ian lines and st ruck strong certain blows and pressed on so far that they were almost within reach of the christ ian art illery far in the rear which suddenly opened a destructive fi re, and torn to fragments the Glandelinian wave receded. Once more the Glandelinians came on only to be again caught under the artillery storm and swept back several hundred yards by a terrific counter charge. This time as the foe charged those of the Calverinians not iced that their blow was more feeble. They got within fourty feet of the christian line and remained there for twenty minutes echanging terrific volleys with the christian infantry without ceasing fighting the last grim and losing struggle.Gradually their efforts became more feeble untill after fifteen minutes more the survivors gave wg way in confusion.

Along other portions of general Hansons battle linehis army was still like a ship aground in a heavy sea while even though it wa was now day a heavy pall of smoke hid the most nearest trees in the woods surrounding the whitened plains covered so thickly with bodies, and as most of the generals had really lost heart over the terrible situation in that furious battle of Calverinia own or turpentine forest it was believed that no help could reach them not even from general Roswell Buster Johnst on as they had heard that general Vivian in coming tobthe aid had been defeated entirely and this dubious prospect so alarmed the generals that is some of them that they prepared tovgive orders for a general retreat and abandon the fight. General Hanson Vivian who was watching every movemat-movement furiously ordered them to stand by the colors believing that god would surely send help before his whole line went to pieces, but so terrified were the officers that for a time they paid no heed to him. Dashing back and forth in the rear of the line they start ed to write the orders despite commands, threats, and at last entreaties from general Hanson who set an example by exposing himself to rally the columns already broken and in disorder. At this moment shame of the foolish act seemed to reach the manhood of the officers who enduced general Hanson to bring up more reserves. Seeing that if he refused all the officers would probably desert him through anger, and that there would be no possible means of escape in case of need, general Hanson yeilded and hurled forward a perfectly strong force of Abbiesnnians.

As general Hanson and some of the other superior generals were about t o move other Abbiesnnian brigades the fog of smoke for a moment became thinner revealing a long line of Gargolians and from the s moke of firing the seried lines of the foe indeed resembled to him a white stretch of breakers storming and rolling with fury, and general Hanson all at once saw that it would be entirely impossible for any division of Abbiesnnians large as they were to hold the foe back successfully without their lines being smashed to splinters.He was about to command the inact ive artillery line in the rear te come up close and pour in their fi re when suddenly a giant wall of Glandelinians crashed against the new reinforcements throwing the line back in some confusion. Lying across the second line of works was a small batt ery unfit for anything but the smoothest sham battle but general Hanson did not hesitate. He ordered the artillery t o be loaded with grape and canister to the very muzzle and with a prayer leaped among the confused masses to rally them. In some miraculous fashion the ti ny cockshell of a battery held the enemy at bay and t ore a monsterous gap in the line of gray.

Then ten t imes the small batt ery was discharged full in the face of the enemy at a range of three hundred feet and how the men managed to keep the small battery from being captured in the storm swept sea of humanity was a miracle but they did so tearing gap after gap as fast t as they discharged the guns and after a terrific effort at a closer range finally staggered the enemy with a deadly discharge and it was the work of a moment, before the enemy at this point began t o recoil just as the main batteries arived and taking position opened fire and raked the foe lines to pieces.Ad as the weight of the christian line at thi s portion was suddenly withdrawn t the retreating columns were engulfed in a huge torrent of Glandelinians that sent them flying in the wildest con fusion. General Hanson vivian himself seeing his officers many of them in the last stage of exhuastion threw forward another division and while these covered the retreat of the panic stricken columns the fleeing fugitives were withdrawn t o saftly safty. The storm of battle continued on elsewhere a howling roaring conflict of horror while the violence of the Glandelinian onslaughts had dented many portions of the ri ght wing of Hansons army. T he meadow lands were covered with the slain and so fierce was the firing along the enemys lines that many of the Angelinian generals could not see anything through the thick haze of smoke but by shailding his eyes and looking across the plains with the help of field glasses the dim outline of the retreating christian columns could be seen.. These generals quickly ran for the rear and after raising the alarm quickly led their Abbiesnnian forces to the rescue. Baffled by the two feet of snow which lay thick on the plains not yet reached by the bloody battle li ne by the shock of explosions that tore seams in their faces and by the intense roar of musketry which shocked all who heard it they ploughed on and when one of the officers saw that the large christian brigades were driven back by the foe and was coming head on in panic stricken fugitives for the rear they deplyed their own divisions to stem the enemys advance but before their artillery could be placed into position the enemy running furiously to the charge came up close to the rear of the panic stricken fugitives struck with terrifi terrific impa impat impact and mingled with them in the wildest con fusion. When the shock came a torrent of Glandelinians fairly mingled with the retreating Angelinians swarming over the entire region and soon everything was hidden away in a storm of smoke. When the panic stricken columns came up and streamed to the rear the artillery prepared to me meet the fussiladeof thundering Glandelinian surfs and just opened as the last of the fugitives fled to the rear. At this time all the artillery men were ready with their guns while the Calverinians and Abbiesnnians crowded to the support and then both lines of artillery and infantry opened up with the roar of hell all along the line.The shock was terrific for the enemys line was torn through and through and showed scores of big gaps in their biggest columns but the discharge had been too late and they closed with yells that was simply deafening heaven itself from the din . In vain did the christian officers signall and shout orders of all kinds amid the tremendous confusion nothing could be heard for the uproar of the battle and the sora screaming of the Glandelinian "Devil Yell."

At this moment many of the christian generals were filled with horror. The Angelinians were now coming prepared to take terrible risks a at Hansons commands.Something must be done to stop the attack of the foe. Meanwhile all of the nearest Glandelinian columns had been broken up and were being swept and torn by the severe christian fire and the firing was so severe that it well ne nigh insured the death of any musber of persons who were exposed. In a moment many of the christian guns fouled and disregarding the shouts to wait one o of the officers clad only in a pair of trousers sei zed his sabre and began to work his way among his troops who were surging forward, and a few feet ahead of him the enemys , musketry roared and crashed. Suddenly a giant surge of gray caught his troops in its grip and hurled them back over the works. He hung on with the desperation of despair but as he tried to get his men to go forward again and as the men acrossed the works and moved forward a column of Glandelinians caught them in the flank and he was abandoned but nevertheless most of the christian line was drawn as tight as a banjo stri ng and in a moment the ill fated Glands linians would have been anni hilated entirely had not the other forces withdrawn and allowed them to ret ire to a safe distance.Rushing forward with the now successful Angelinians and other forces a sergeant seized a regimn regimental color and as the Glandelinians rolled backwards swung it to the breeze.The next instant both were caught in the path of a withering fire delivered by the enemy and though wounded, by a terrific effort the sergeant succeeded in regaining his footing and still clutching the flag carried it out of range of the ne enemys storm of bullets. While this desperate struggle was taking place two more divisions had reinforced the th torn and bleeding christian line. General surfmann Bruntlaw sprnag among his half demorilized men to prevent them from being thrown back by the enemys attack but was swept from his feet by the concussion of a great explosion his life hanging on a straw as he was fully exposed to a deadly fire from the enemys main line of batteries. He was carried tward the rear dangerously wounded and placed in the army ambul ance. At the moment of Bruntlaws peril was recognized by many of his comrades general Bernard surfmann his brother leaped to his assistance only to be himself severely wounded and as he lay i on the ground struggling to get to his feet a tree fell torn down by an exploding shell and held him there pinioned under two feet of snow. For fully a minute he lay there helpless in sight of his comrades and was slowly suffocating.At last nearly dead a number of men managed to get him free. Meantime another general was torn from his hold of a t ree and killed and mangled by a machine gun right in front of him. General Glader Han derson went for the other wounded generals and brought them f t o the rear.They were st ill laboring in the face of the fierce firing when a good portion of general Vivians advancing army hoved into sight.

The Glandelinians at this time had been making a most tremendous charge of all in the bib biggest column of all and as it went against the christian line there was a redoubled roar of musketry and cannon and the survivors recoiled once more.Seven o-clock came and still every thing was wiod in nature itself it seemed.The left grand division of the Abyssinkilian force had been broken in two and twenty guns disab led by a broadside of Glandelinian shells.The Angelinian generals under general Vivian now launched the first biggest of their divisions to the rescue of general Hansons army.It was a terrific pull through the furious battle storm but the Angelinian forces with the help of a cover ing fire of 10,000 cannon which tore and swept all before it accomplished their purpose and had possession for the first time since the begginning of the battle of their works.The generals then directed the other officers to bring up the artillery and to hold the recaptured position at all costs.

But it was here that some serious trouble became. T So fierce was the firing on both sides that everything seemed enshrouded in a sea of smoke. Six of the christian generals exposed themselves to the receding fire of the enemy and dropped in a body. Some portions of the enemy had in the meantime rallied and again struck a blow that almost broke the reinfor cing christian line and the noise of firing was ten fold greater than before. Every regiment had their flags fairly torn to shreds by the storm of bullets and new flags and banners were quickly ripped up.

In addition the captured works was crowded with soldiers of both sidesstruggling most desperately and it was in this maelstrom of hell that it was necessary for the handicapped offices of the reinforcements to pull their forces out of the danger zone and they made a swift and able attempt to accomplish it.At the instant the officers were rallying their men the shock of the great charge came and that was a signal for a panic among the twelve brigades of Angelinians that before it subsided cost many loss of officers. The Angelinians in a frenzy of fear recoiled in confusion and before they could be ralli ed the next shock of the onslaught caught the panic stricken Angelinians on the rear and turned their whole flank. Then as the Glandelinians intermingled with them there ensued a most desperate death struggle. A hundred yards to leeward as to call it the furious Glandelinians were smashing their own columns to pieces against the Abyssinkilian columns.There was just one chane chance in a million that the Angelinians could be rallied before the sea of Glad Glandelinians carried all before them. Once the foe succeed ed in carrying all before them again it would be all over then. Hampered by the fury of the firing the Angelinians fought too desperate ly to describe in those fifteen minutes left them to hurl the enemy from their midst.Three times they flung the enemy free from them and strove heroically desperately and stubbornly to hold them back but in vain.They seemed to be fighting the last tragic fight when again the Glandelinians recoiled through the smothering bath of smoke and snow. At that instant ten christian generals including twelve Abyssinkilian offices officers of any rank went to their deaths in striving to rally the confused Angelinians and reform their shattered and broken line. Eighteen of the hardiest of the generals still clung desperately to the hope of stemming the advance of the foe and by a superhuman effort general Pi nlow rallied a portion of his men but a shot made him join those who had already perished. General Farrow was the next .

"Good bye boys."He gasped as he fell. This left general Dad John and the other surviving generals who were fast losing strength. In a brief lull in the furious storm of firing general Eli e crawled to the works. Below him a foot at coast was another general who was wounded a friend of his since boyhood. At the risk of his own life Elis tried to carry him out of range of the enemys fire. Twice he was wounded and after los ing and regianing his grasp on his friend had his whole side torn by a shell. Only Elis and general Hans the latter a big and strong man were left . In this desperate moment general Hans ttried to hold back the foe with the help of field guns and fought desperately as in a dea death grip. For minutes while the sea of humanity battered the christian lineand the smoke almost stranglied them the officer fought his last grim fight for life by that battery of artillery, the enemy to break the frenzied grip of the artillery men, and Hanson Hans to retain it . Suddenly when it seemed that most both must annihlalated annihilate each other the artillery men were picked off so rapidly that the battery was so-n overwhelmed and captured and Hans severely wounded. His strength then left him. His arms l relaxed, his eyes glazed.

"I'm going."He gasped and sank to the snow.Elis the only surviver of these generals of the Angelinians crawled out of range of the enemys pitching fire and succeeded in dragging a fallen regimental color so that he could get hold onto it and better maintain his position. The pall of s oke from the firing was so thick that he could not see anything now at all in the distance untill glancing tward his rear he saw a color bear waving a w flag through the haze stagger like a drunken man, try to move forward, and then pitch on his face. Brave Elis did not hesitate.

"I'll save that poor fellow and the flag also."He announced cooly. On the ground near a wounded man lay a water bottle.Kicking off his heavy boots Elis despite his comrades who begged him not to go as it would be certain destruction in such a frightful musketry inferno, ran forward only to fin find himself wounded in the ls left hand. Grasp ing a marlin pike and some rasps he fize fixed them onto some large boards and covering it with a thick matress and blanket used it as a sheild and then twaring a gun from the hands of one of his comrades who tried to restrain him Elis leaped forward tward the fallen man in the face of that storm of bullet bullets on an errand the only possible end of which meant death. It was very fortunate that the rudely made sheild was just large enough and he rushed forward with terrific speed. Twice he fell tripping on a branch or root under the deep snow and how he kept himself from bin being hit by bullets those who watched him could never undes understand. H But he was not in the least touched and at times the smoke was driven so thick before his eyes that he saw nothing untill suddenly out of a mist the fallen man with the flag was seen a dozen feet away. He rescued both the wounded color bearer and the flag and then with the unsconcious man lying limp.He had reached the fellow but the hardest struggle yet lay ahead. TO attempt to reach the rear of the christian lines under such a fire would have been folly. To try and run across the lane would have been sucide. There was only the naked shore of the Mc-Hollester Run Ri ver ahead and here the battle was also raging furiously and for a moment the steeled nerved Elis held back desperately hesitating before the last grapple with death, and that momentary pause saved his life and that of the flag bearer.

In the direction of the firing line a swarm of figures was hurrying tward the point where the color bearer hd had fallen.Elis saw it and hung on against the furious possibility of being exposed and crawled forward dragging both flags and the man with him.He was a big and very strong man but when he reached the point he aimed for their was blue marks on his arms where the blood vessels had burst under the skin in that last mighty effort . Three mi nutes-----perhaps ten minutes passed--- and then with some of the men who had come to the rescue running tward him to render aid and soon the two were dragged to safty. Elis gainec gained his feet and as the men attented to the wounded color bearer Elis took a look at the terrific firing which still coupled with that of the enemy. Without hesitat ion Elis sent the alarm to many signal stations, and ordered the Angelinians to stand more firm but the attack of the enemy was so heavy that the christians were thrown back behind their works. Time and again general Elis led his volunteers into the storm but each time they were beaten back and many survivors cut and bruised from the buffeting and pummelling they recieved.

For an hour more the christian line being reinforced by general Vivian had stood its ground without resting, fighting the furious enemy and repulsing their charges and causing them crushing defeats. The hands of thousands of the Angelinians were frozen others were so weak they could hardly stand, and all were heartsick and desperate with despair. The next time the counter charge was attempted the Angelinians fell like matches from a big box and the whole line was shattered like matchwood and general Elie strong as he was narrowly missed having every bone in his body broken for he had fallen from a horse he had mounted and there would have been no more Elie to talk about. When the general pulled himself toget her again he got a blow in the side from a flying rock hurled at him by the explosion of a shell. He crawled upon a slab of stone and then wounded seriously he struck out for the rear. He asked his aiding general to help him to the rear as he knew him to be an excellant man at heli helping wounded comrades but he said that no one could hold out in the face of such a fire of the enemy and he would stay where he was. Elie had already made good his progress heading a little down tward the shore of the distant river. Several times he rested for he had been growing very weak. He saw a gap in the christian line behind him two miles to his left. When about three hundred yards from the rear where the tents were in sight his right began to fail him and soon again he could see nothing but he kept right on crawling. When his hands struck the deeper snow he held on all he could and crawled untill he could no longer fell the snow and lay down. He was so weak that he could no long er recover his f feet. He recollected somebody saying;

"For God's sake Elie dear is it you come ba back to us in this fashion?" And of his taking him up. He knew nothing more untill he found himself in the base hospital. It was only crawling that enabled him to reach the far distant christian camp and the crawling was the only thing that should have been done under such graveconditions. Elie told the wounded in the hospital about the rest of the generals who had been either wounded or killed knowing from experience that it was impossiblefor any general to face such firing without fatal results.

The losses in generals was a tragedy. Two were wounded and nearly frozen to death before they were brought to the rear. The first general to perish was general Saunders shot through the head as he strove to make his men move forward against the enemy. The next was three other generals who had been wounded, and lay on the ground untill they froze to death. The other four generals died in the trenches late in the morning while some other officers were fighting to save them! One general died at six o-clock his aid following twenty minutes later and an officer who was his son frenzied with grief dashed to the rear and took rf refuge among the wounded where he threw himself down and would have died also had not the doctors attented to his wounds immediately. So ends the tragic story of the terrible death of so many christian generals. But unspeakably fearful was the loss of general offices on the enemys sides, the Glandelinians having lost sixty six in all. Had it been warmer when the umusual battle raged there would have been a possibility that every one of the generals who had been only wounded could have been saved as it was the freezing to death that caused the deaths of so many generals and soldiers. General Hansons gratitude for the victory that was won with the arival of his brother army cannot be des cribed. It had been one of the worse battles that he had ever seen and probably one of the worse battles ever written in his experiences up to this time. The battle had raged fully seventeen hours and even dur ing that screaming conflict the christian encampments had been crowded with wounded soldiers streaming to the rear. He had not heard of the generals who so madly gave up their lives for the saving of the Salvation Army of Angelinia and who had pers perished in trying to rally the christ ian line time and again untill the other generals told him of the t ragedy. General Hanson, his brother and cannon, Germaine vivian, his brother, general Walter Jennings, and violet and her sisters had been a full witness of the battle since its start with the great fire in Jennie Turner. Violet and her sisters thanked God for the safty of the christian army once more. The army of the foe who had raged the batt le had receded a bloody helpless wreck. Hamleys intentions of the assault had been to immediately break the seige of the christian army which had begun. He had followed out his plas first by making the great fires in Jennie Turner and then by preparing hi his forces for the final clash with his christian enemies along the Mc-Hollester Run, the battle of which had first been known as Calverinia Run but which was propertyly called "The Battle of The Turpentine Forest. The christian loss was 18,900,000 in killed and wounded. The foe was 25,678,000 in killed and wounded and double that number had been engaged in thirteen charges.

Violet and her sistss thanked the surviving generals for their bravery during the battle in such a sweet manner that the generals were touched to the heart. So swiftly had the wounded been picked up during the battle that when it was onl over only most of the slain still remained on the battle field.

"I reckon you two majestic looking generals are governers of Calverinia." One of the generals said late that afternoon producing a sheet of paper after general Hanson had sent many forces of men out to bury the dead of his own side with the statement "Ia let the enemy bury their own dead" "Here read this." He added handing the pp paper to general Hanson. Hanson took the offered sheet of paps and read;

"Goverge governer general Hanson vivian and his brot her fought with Manley a most tre mendous battle at Calverinia town in the Terpentine forest and fairly shipwrecked the Glandelinian army despite the fact that for many hours it seemed as none of the largest christian forcs forces could stan d against the raging assaults of the foe. The battle was worse than any that had ever been wit nessed by the correspondents who saw i t and which put thewhole region on in terror throughout its durat ion, and hundreds of thousands of houses of some city is reported to be prostrated by the concussion of cannonading and that thousands of lives had been lost in the t own of Calverinia which had been bombarded by the enemy. Whether any of general Hansons general officers were surviving has n ever been found out yet though it is said that one hundred and ninty of the Glandelinian generals fell in that mad struggle. Gover ner general Hanson vivian and his brother are well noted child slave opposers and if this battle had been lost the whole of Calverinia and Angainia would be in sorrow."

Well the christian army of mine has been sav ed." Said general as the general Hanson as the dry clothes were offered him." And I alone am the governer general of Calverinia."

After the generals were all fixed up in dry clothing having been wet from sweating from their fierce exertions they decided to telegraph to all other officers to watch every movement of the enemy and to barr all regions against their further advance in any direction. General Hanson stayed in his headquarters that cold night and after eating a light lunch only selpt for several hours for he could not sleep much after his trying experience and then early the next morning some of his off icers told him that he was wanted in general Evans headquarters as soon as he could get there.

"I see the plain plains are still covered with the dead Glande linians." Remarked the officer as he helped general Hanson with his big army overcoat.

"And the sky is becoming overcast." Remarked another officer. "Whew whose beautiful little girls are those there?" He asked as he caught sight of violet and her sisters.

"They are mine." Remarked governer general Robert vivian suddenly appearing. "And if you t ry to steal them I'll put you in jail." He added with a laugh.

"Oh I have no desire to steal them." Laughed the officer in return.

"But they are so pretty——"

"As flowers." Interrupting their father shaking hands with his brother whom he ha had been seperated for a long time. After bidding all good bye and other good wishes general Hanson and his brother set out with the high officers for general Evans headquarters.

It was a long trip to general Evans headquarters but after an hours trip they reached the magnificent building. The officer first showed general Hanson the reception room which was a grand one having having rich furni ture and decorations. After waiting for a minute general Evans appeared and saluting said;

"Your excellency I have recieved one hundred million dollars from every rich person in Calverinia and Angelinia and we have been requested to spend it in all our attempts to put down the Child slavery horrors which have increased despite the progress of the war, and also I'm surprised to tell that I have heard reports that the whole of Calverinia is on the verge of a new rebellion as the Glandelinian aurthorities are oppressing them terribly. Six hundred rich porple have sent this to me by means of ar airships and not only that but some of my divisions of men have captured atown and seventy five child slave firms and plantations and those who have wished to get rid of this wicked trade which they really hated betrayed others, and then besides all this ten villiages outside of Jennie Turmer are in our possession and are given over to you by the Calverinian aurthorities here to make fortifications to carry on the great seige, and though they were poverty stricken villiages the owners would have done all they could only the wicked Glandelinian aurthorities for bad them under pai s of death. However these good owners betrayed them se cretly to us knowing that we would be good too the poor inhibatants in spi in spite of the foe and that there would be a human cyclonegoing on if any one of the Glandelinians would dare to interfere.Though captured, and as they are property of Calverinians I have trid to pay for the villiages but the Calverinian aurthorities would not take a rod cent, though I have tried to force them. So I thought I'd call you over and let you know."

"I'm very glad you have let me know this general Evans."Said his superior. "I want to to move your armies closer to the enemy if possible and not allow them to maky any kn kind of move."

"I will do so."Was the answer.

The next day was dark and gloomy and general Hanson with twenty of his generals and a full division of cavarly and with his brother also went to inspect the t owns with the purpose of making a string of fortificat ions out of them and which would enable him to press the seige of Jennie Turmer closer. One glance at the buildings which were close together on one street of the t own of Vivian tolf general Hanson that if they were once afire there would- be no chance of checking it, and yet he had recieved reports that Glandelinian aurthorities had tried to send fire bugs through the christian lines under the orders that the villiages captured were to be set on fire so that the christians could nt use them as fortifications and that they were to be fired with al w o were within.

Thry were also awful looking buildings seeming about to decay so h old ' they were and Hanson had doubts if he could use them as fortifications. Hanson entered one with his brother and the inspectors and after climbing the first rickety steps of the colo cold interior general Hanson knocked on the first door that he came to. Of course it did not look much like a door to him and the filth of the place was worsethan anything he had ever seen in Poverty Row. He knocked at the door almost thirteen times and recieving no an swer he burst in only to be confronted by a mi ser able little girl on crutxhes and dressed in rags who had been about to answer his knocking. Despite her attire she was a very pretty little girl, having quite the resemblance of littlecatherine vivian, one of the Vivian girls. But she was quite taller than any of violet and her sisters.

"Mama cannot pay the rent."She said in a horas hoarse whisper knowing that it was the new poss esser of the villiage as the christians had taken it from the foe."Oh please do not put us out.Mama and I are very sick."She added tears coming to her blue eyes.

"You will have to move out and quickly too."Answered Hanson."But not because you cannot pay rent.I'll have to makouse of these houses to bring the seige closer.I'll see to it that you will obtain better shelter and warmer quarters in the christian lines. Where is your mother ?"

At the question a ragged woman appeared.

"All out ."Said Hanson."Sorry but can't help it.All in the villiages whill have to move. The soldiers will escort you to the christian lines. Every building in these villiages are badly damaged and not fit for a rat to live in.Every window pane and roof is gone and here and there are hundreds of wooden buildings and bricks rended to fragments by the retreating enemy and the roofs were torn off from the strongest buildings. To the christian lines you must go.I'm going to make for tifications out of these villiages.I'm g oing to shell Jennie Turmer in another week."Then turning to the poor weeping child and then to the mother again he said;

"I did not come for any rent but to see what kind of condition these buildings were in.And you people are a great deal safer among my lines. You can bring all your belong ings with you that ca possibly be carried and the cavarly will escort you saftly there.I'm turning out the whole region for this good purpose. You people need shelter and there is no shelter here and you all are half starved in the bargian. And I have seen enough now to be confirmed that the Glandelinian aurthorities were trying their best to interfere with my plans for they have made some fires here already and so I'm going to see that it is going to be put to a stop and that is by getting ahead of them. By noon these villiages will be in possession of the soldiers. Have you not any better furniture than the scenery you have got here and where is your husband?"

"My child used to work in one of the child slave houses and got crippled by an accidental fall near the dagerous machinery when one of the Glandelinians struck her for taking a rest."Answered her mother.

"And you call it an accidental fall!"Gazped general Hanson."And in child slave places."!

The mother only nodded her head.

"I'll end this child slavery before I go back to Angelinia or my name is not Hanson Vivian."He added to himself with a scowl which the mother noticed."Humph two cents a month and yet starving whilethey work and get hurt in the bargian. I'll get hold of more of these plass if I have to seize and destroy them all and drive every master and child slave driven to hell and Glandelinia can howl like a cat till she want's to.I'll put her armies out of Calverinia if I have to carry the war with main force to her very gates."

"My child-------"

"Is not going to work or starve any more."Interrupted general Hanson. "What factory did she work in before she got hurt!"He continued taking out a roll of bills.

"She worked in a tar factory captured just yesterday with the villiage, and so did the rest of the children who lived in these tenements." Answered the mother.

"Tenements are not the words for these horriblebuildings."Said one of the inspectors while the other one scowled his approval."It's like a prison in wa time and they will cause a lot of work to make them into fortifications too."

"Here is something instead of rent, and it is a five hundred dollars in bills."Said general Hanson handing the woman the money."It is to pay your passage to Angelinia as soon as you see the opportunity to go."

"For me!"Gasped the woman."How can I ever thank you!"

"The only way to thank me is to keep keep friends."Wa his answer.

"Now go and make preparations for the trip to the christian lines.There you with the rest in the villiages will find plenty of warm shelter and get something to eat and warmer clothing will be provided for you."

General Hanson was about to proceed for the door when a win dow casing being broken fell out lett ing out a whiff of frosty air and a cloud of snowflan s snow flakes.Then the door below opened and general Hansons nephews with some of other generals came up and danced across the hall hall with vlasped hands caoling gaily untill they stopped with a low bow before the disgusted general Hanson Vivian.

"Hello Governer general Vivian."They chorused!"Doing good to the poor already."Come we will celebrate for coming Christmas.Don't you know it is two weeks before Christmas Eve.I've seen the paper. We are off to be jolly good fellows among the poor refugees who are fleeing tward our lines.Come along."

"I'm not true through in these villiages yet."Grimly returned Hanson."Go on and do good as much as you can."

"Listen to general Hanson."Laughed jimmie Vivian the most ha handsome and youngest of the group as they started tward the door."I'll see you again. "They shouted as they went out.After general Hanson and his brother had inspected two of the villiages and seen to it that the inhib atants were well on their way tward the christian lines they prepared to go to the next villiage.....

"I wonder where those other generals went!"He said."Of course they must be around somewhere, but I wonder where they went."

When he reached the villiage he started tward an old stone tene ment house in the interior of the villiage walking briskly untill the chimes of the church bells of the villiage rang out and then he stopped near the building and inspect its size and shape.'

''I wonder whe where they are?''He repeated. And in answer came a chorus of ringing shouts;

''Lets help the poor/
Let's help the poor,
Let nothing ye dismay,
Merry Gentlemen.''

Then they came captering hilariously along laden with baskets and bundles. When they saw the two governer Generals and the inspecting generals they formed a ring and danced around them with uncontrolable joy.

''Hail to the good ranks of the christians, who do good to the poor and unfortunate and help them from the path of ruin and misery, and save them from the enemy.''They shouted.''You are just in time for this our last call. As we had made four. Come in.Honey my boys is the best thing for all the poor when we got it. Hurry u up so we can hie us back to the camp with cam calm cons consciouences.''They urged wishing t o get out of the blizzard that was commencing.

Not ashamed yet strangely int erested general Hanson and his brother and the inspectors followed the group up a rickety stairway through a dark ill smelling hall, into a tiny kitchen lighted by s a sputtering lamp. A quick silence fell on the noisy group as they saw before them the pitiful scene. So far their evening of good fellowship had been a merry lark, but all jest did di ed away in the face of such suffering as they saw here within their newly advanced christian line. As they entered a wan faced woman putting some clothing in a trunk that looked more like a busted box lifted her head, but as she trid tried to speak a paroxysm of coughing stopped her words. Fivechildren dressed in the foulest rags and half naked clusted around her the oldest girl trying to sobbin to sooth a sobbing child who was shaking with the cold. The child had just came in from the blizzard swept street where she had been begging. Her little hands which still clasped the tin cup she had held out for pennies, were chapped and blue, but the cup was empty. The abvious distress of this family was so pitiable that the good cheer of the visitors was for a moment checked. Not one pe person spoke. The children stared in awe struck surprise aat the men who began to quikly put down their bundles. But when a great turkey was produced his yellow legs bursting from their wrappings the smallest child broke the tension by rushing forward with a happy cry.

''Look, look mama.''She cried.''It's a truely turkey. It ain't a drema.'' Every one laughed then and while the rest of the gifts were given out general Hanson stepped over to the child who held the tin cup.

''Here's some money''He said dropping a numbe of ten dollar gold pieces into the cup. Then as the starved little girls eyes beamed at him his own eyes grew misty, and he made a sudden rush for the stairs.

''Oh mama look what nice big shiny pennies.''And the generals piling out after Hanson without wa waiting for thanks heard the mothers glad cry;

''Pennies!Why child they are ten dollar gold pieces and there are fifty of them.''

''Where next my merry gent lema men?''Queried Gannon when they reached the street again and stood still despite the whirling snow all about them. It was decided to follow the refugees and the two gover ner generals to the christian lines and to have the villiages at once garrisoned th ad and the work started upon them. The blizzard was at full sway when all reached the christian lines and the refugees from the villiages were at once given good quarters in the big warm tents and well supplied with army bedding and given better clothing and other things which had been secured . No sooner had all this been done when violet and her sisters had a trying experience.No sooner had they came out into the company street to go out scouting on the enemy when a thrilling cry rang through the snow swept company street;

''Mad-dog.Mad-dog.....''

Again and again the terror stricking cry rang through the company streets and suddenly a ferocious looking Dan with glaring glassy eyes and bloodshot as well, and ropy brown mucus drolling from his mouth came jogging along slowly through the deep snow showing no signs of excitement and avoiding all pesons passing back and forth. But one of the refugees a little girl and who had ran up the company street out of sight of general anson to buy something from a canteen tripped over something in the snow and sprawled right in front of the rabid animal who without a any signs of excitement gave her a good bite on her leg and resumed his solia solitary trot. A stick just missed the dog and the child terrified from the bite she had recieved staggered to he feet and ran blindly for the tent where her mother lived screaing wildly for her mama. Violet and her sisters who were with some cavarm cavarly men seen seeing this howling victim of rabies headed straight for them drew their revolvers while just then a stone hit him in the side producing only a faint unearthly howl.... Another st ung him as he plunged along in bewildered flight and now its paw was cut by a broken b bottle. Close behind the mad dane violet and her sisters saw as they crossed the street out of harms way pu h pushing forward an avenging crowd, pelting and pounding him with anything it could lay its hands on.A few minutes of wild persuit followed, then the bruised panting dog frantic with rage and suffering, turned and made direct for the crowd seeming to fairly leap as it gave forty piercing howls. Con sternation prevaled among the crw crowd of soldiers for the annual mad-dog scare was now on a prehension of Hydrophobia in its most horrible form took hold of the crowd, and vivid descriptions of mad-dogs and their raving victims seemed to confirm them, and they scatt ered like chaff before the gale. Violet and her sisters entered one of the big tabours no one of course know ing that the little girl across the way had been bitten and neither did her friends or pa parents for as she did not feel the pain or the wound very much she did not say anything, tut they prayed to God that sh she would be safe from contracting rabies.

She wa not frightened or pseudo-hydrophobia would have set in. It was the sixth day after the child had been bitten that during the night when general Hanson vivian had been visiting the tent with the little vivian girls to inform of the friends of the success of making the towns and vil iages into fortifications that violet noticed that one of the little children there occupied a certain bed next to the older ones was quite rest less often getting up only t o lie down again, changing her position impatient ly, turning from side to side and con stantly licking or scratching some particular par of her head,limbs or body. As the mother had said the child had continued this all night long at inervl intervals and now when violet and her sisters spoke to her she only turned and looked at them. Violet noticed at this time a glaring glassy look in the child's eyes and at first feared that she had went insane. And to the horror of all her voice had changed to a hoarse peculiar sound which was almost impossible to describe, but which if any body heard it quickly recognized. At that time the child began to chew wood and swallowed some small stones lying on the ground of the tent and which she had also plac placed under her pillows. The two governer generals also seeing this was horrified and notified the army doctor by teleph telephone right away.

When they again entered the tent with the doctor they saw that the child was biting wood at every opportunity and chew the splinters rapidly.

''What is the matter with the child!''Asked general Hanson as he start started tward her. But the doctor pulled him back.

''Don't molest her.''He warned.''She has contracted rabies from a mad-dog, and may bite you.''

The governer general gasped in horror... ..

''Rabies?''He gasped.''Is it impossible to save her!''

''Rabies is known to be an incurable disease, but I'll do everything I can for her, but whatever you do do not let the mother leave the child move away from this tent.She must be strapped to the bed when some of the soldiers gets the chance.''

Governer general vivian by some quickness manged to succed himself in strapping her to the bed, but she suddenly became irritable and some how or other broke loose and dashed at the governer with a drawn dagger and then at the doct or, and also snapped at objects which she imagined to be near her. They could not do anything with her, so they quickly left fasteni ng up the tents entrance after the mother and other inmates had withdrawn.

The governer general at once had all his generals assemble about him including his brother and two nephews and said;;;
"You know that mad-dog we had seen six days ago? Well he must have bitten the child, for she is showing signs of rabies. The doctor says he will do all he can for her, yet she is unmanageb u nmanagable little though she is. Before then there were no mad-dogs in my lines and from this one I suspect trickery from the enemy. Watch out for any sus picious persons within our lines and watch every dog running loose and if they act suspicious shoot them on the spot."
Every one wa was struck with horror and sorrow when they heard this and rushed off to do as they had been advised. Violet and her sisters were almost weeping when general Hanson said sternly;
"At a any risk some one must strap her to the bed or every one in this vinicity of this camp wh will be her next raving victims...."
The others agreed with him and some of the soldiers unfastened the a entrance of the tent and gurst in with fixed bayonets to recieve her in case she would spring. But fortunately the child had recovered her reason for a few minutes and knowing hesherself to be thevictim of rabies permitted herself to be tied to the bed in redoubled coils of rope.She complain complained of an excessive thirst and though water was given to her it did not give her any relief. The next day during the viv visit of general Hanson a glandular swelling about her jaws and throa throat was not iced.
The doctor then who had come also pointed at the child with an exclamanation of terror and all saw her vainly endeavoring to rid herself of a thick ropy pucus dhscharge from her mouth and throat. Also her eyes were staring and glassy, while the rpoy brown mucus drolling from her mouth made her look hedious. She could never attack any one now but many a time snapped at those who dared to come near her. She was not just now a bit afraid of wate as t rabid victims are pictured, but when it was given to her she plunged her face into the filled basin and lapped he it with her tongue. As mad-dogs are predicted to swim a stream, so she could still talk cry, or scream. But now her once sweet bird bird like voice had changed to a thick hoarse dog-dog like howl. The only sound she had ever admitt ed since general Hanson and tha doctor had been in there was an unearthly howl of distress. General Hanson and the others with him had expected her to froth at the mouth but instead that very day they found her vainly trying to tear away with her hands, or to wash away with water a thick ropy mucus of brown color which was clinging to her lips. Her lips and tongue after a dangerous examination appeared, dry, foul and slimy after the wash in the water, but in only a few minutes the mucus came back in a fearful discharge. General Hanson also discovered that a part of the bed stand at the head at its edge, had been chewed clean off or down for several inches from the top. That afternoon the child's condition was worse than ever, and she became quite vicious.General Hanson and all who heard of it were still hopeful when the physician returned and announced offically that the child's condition was terrible.The problem of removing the deadly mucus was becoming a serious one and the dangers of her vicious actions and beginning of heart failure s increased.
Shortly after two o-clock during theoutbreak of another heavy snowstorm the doctor detected another fearful glaring of the eyes and this began to arouse him for this terrible glaring of the eyes showed that instead of growing better the childs condition was growing steadily worse. Her pulse fluttered and weakened, and the rabid child began to sink to a collaspe. The end appeared at hand and though restoratives were immediately applied they did not at once prove fes effective. General Hanson then tenegraphed for two other army doctors as trouble began through the desperate attem att empt to prevent her from chewing the ropes apart in her ravings. She had been chewing at her pillow and ropes for hours before she had been discovered and the partial failure of artificial means had led to the adoption of desperati desperate ones. Though they tried to tie her arms which only had been left free, she became fea fearfully irrita irritated and vicious and snapped at the doctors, and at general Hanson and endeavored to scratch them. Then the doctors tried to fasten a cloth over her mouth but she struck such terrific blows with her little fa fists that the doctors were forced to stagger from her covered with brusi bruises and scratches which had to be treated immediately to prevent infection from the deadly salvia which covered her hands.
The alarming news was reported to the anxious watchers by the doctors who complained of the childs fury, and announced that hercondition was rapidly becoming dangerous.....

IOI5.

But there was still hope that the poor child would recover by god's powe power, though her condition put h all her fi friends and mother in serious apprehension. The pulsations h of her heart was wild and the deadly ropy salvia seemed to fill her mouth like glue. The disquieting pulse actions continued for hours. Two hours afterwards the snowstorm increased in a heavie downfall, a blusterous wind blowing it from the northeast to complete the cheerlessness of the day. Shortly afterwards the child again commenced to rave furio furiously howling like a dog in distress and soon her heart action became weaker, while her pulse was fluttering and weakening still more, and again the end appeared at hand. Again restoratives were quickly applied and the doctors fought the desperate battle with all the reserve forces of science. Action was immediate and desirive. Digqutablis and Strychnia were admininistered and as a last resp resort saline solution was injected in her veins at the risk of being biten and treated again. The restorat ives at first did not prove effective at once and it was realized that the child was in an extremely serious condition. That realization with thes shadow of death behind it led to another call and that a summons to the chief physician.The scene about the tent and the storm swept co p company streets streets was dramatic in its action ad and setting, and the mess messengers who return ed with two more doctors and relief nurses were hurried up after the chief physcian and those who were absent from Calverine telegrams conveying the frightful news were quickly transmitt ed.
A messenger before darting outside in the whirling snow and whirled away on a swift horse, gave general Hanson and all the anxious watchers the first initmation of the great increase of the disease. It was indeed a confirmation. that was hardly needed for the fact had been given out by act ion that needed no words. Violet and her sistes and thousands of the soldiers nay tens of thousands went through the dismal day of sorrow as only the broken hearted does.
Their eyes were overflowing with tears. When the childs serious condition was realized the same doctors were again summoned and came as quickly as the storm would permit them. The news that came hour after hour was still of the gravest kind for nothing more than a fight ing chance was cond conceded by the doctors. The most noted child specialist in the country was summoned during the early part of the afternoon.The fact that the child was going to die was for a time kept from general Hanson and the other officers including poor litt le violet and her sisters. Her heart was responding poorly to stimulants and her death was expected at any moment as severe suffering had already set in for she writhed in agony and fierce convus convulsions.
Indeed the end seemed at hand when the doctors announced that evening that the conditions of the child was very bad, in fact seemed as if it could could not be worse, and that her suffering was something terrible..
Little by little general Hanson and the others larned of the coming pains. These were alarming devolpments. The doctors carefully scaned every evidence of the disease, breathlessly watched their little patient every moment, learning that a relaspe had come. They battled fiercely against it. But the poor child was rapidly sinking. All through that blinding snowy night that battling for a little life went on, the patient a little brave uncomplaining patient of hydrophobia was unconscous ly subjecting herself to the control of the kind doctors who were exhaus ing the possibilities of medicine and surgery. They were doing all that living man could do. They were rendering such services to the poor child as kings cannot command. They could not undert understand that the thick ropy mucus had settled even on her stomach, and that death was at his feast in the childs body as it seemed, and it was even possible that nothing could check the progress of the disease.Nothing it seemed could spur the heart to combat longer and restore those pulses to normal beatings. The child was really dying despite even the prayers that were offered for her recovery.Her friends, and relatives, and brother and sister including her old father and mother had hastened to he her bedside in the hush of an awful sorrow, for the child faced a grave and menacing crisis.The worse of the furious snowstorm was sweeping the a city of camps when the first ominious announcement came from the doctor.
"Thelittle girl is dying. She can only live two more hours."
But even then her limbs was growing cold and her pulse were fluttering with feeble efforts and sounds of unchecked weeping waited for the dawn daw dawn while the child writhed in convulsions and screamed and howled in mortal agony and screaming at t imes;

88f ''Fire fire.It's all aaround me.Put it out. Put it out. It will burn me.Don't bring me no water. They want to give me water, wate water, water,''And then she raved like a demoniac. Violet and her siste sisters could no longer stand it and so they went outside of the tent bareheaded without coats on despite the raging snowstorm to go to the K.of C. building to have a mass offered for her recovery.The snow and wind was terrific but the little girls ploughed through the deep snow undaunted..... All of a sudden when they had left one of the city of tents behind having lost their bearings and being blinded by the blizzar blizzard of snow, and to their dismay the ground trembld beneath their feet then suddenly caved in li letting them down upon something hard and slopy with a thud. The little girls rolled off unhurt, and when they recovered their feet and gaved upon the object they gave a start of surprise. It was a plengiglomenean creatur which had been awakend out of its sleep by their fall on top of its head. Violet and her sistes never saw this kind of a plengiglomenean creature before it being an agle Winged muskorhorian being quite as big as a crimecian Gazook but more brilliant in color and more powerfully built.For a few moments violet and her sisters and the creature gazed fixedly at each other, then the serpent suddenly said;

''I believe I know what makes you seek the Catholic Church to have a M Mass offered. Some little child you know has contracted rabies, and though though she is no relation or sister of yours you have compassion on her, and wish to save her.....''

''Yes.''Said violet.''And we are glad that we have found you. You alone have the means and remedies to destroy any incurable disease.''.

''I have if lock jaw does not add to her misery.''He announced. But only to the vivian girls would I grant this favor. And yet as I'm much too large to even get my foot into the house without making devastation I'll send one of my little ones with the remendy and w without delay.Now climb onto my head and you little girls can easily climb out of the hole you fell into so.''

Violet and her sisters obeyed and soon were outside in the wb whirling storm again but the little girls were not alone for the smaller one had come out of the hole with them, and the whole eight started back twad the christian lines.At last the camp wa reached, then the tent and as they reched the entrance they were met by one of the doctors who failed to see the little beauty in lizzard and serpent form with the beautu beautiful wings and colored body.

''The last stages of the rabis have arived.''He announced sadly.''Her suffering is so terrb terrible that the slightest noise and the slightest shock makes indescriable pain.Locked-jaw had added to her misery, but its open locked jaw for she cannot move her jaws, or shut her mouth, which is completely filled with brown mucus;----''

''I'll break the locked-jaw and destroy the disease.''Suddenly inter rupted the plengiglomenean creature forcing his way past general Hanson.

''Goodness gracious where did that dragon come from?''Gasped the doctor in fright as he dashed from the door.

''Calm yourself I'm no hedious dragon.''Answered the plengiglomenean creat ure amused at the doctors fright.''There are no such things, and I'm not dangerous to christians but useful.I'm dangerous to the plandolinians who had wrecked our homes and molested us and harmed the lie, helpless children whom we love as only a mother can.''

Nevertheless the doctor quickly went inside, reported to the other do ct doctors what he saw, and general Hanson had a thrilling job preven ting a panic. Yet the doctors were too frightened to stay, and to escape they crawled under the tents canvas outside through the deep snow wb which alone kept them from injuries.The little lengiglomenean serpent forced his head through the entrance with great difficulty, and not without ripi ripping the edge of the canvas considerably. General Hanson brought him directly to the childs bed, the poor child now writhing in mortal agony. Suffoca suffocation, strangulation caused by the mucus getting int o her windpipe increased her misery, while she was in raging convulsions. The first thing the plengl Blengiglomenean creature did was to produce from a slimy bag in its mouth a red thick salvia like fluid which she squirted on the deadly mucus in her mouth. The effect was marvelious.It was quickly disolved and ran like watery paste which general Hanson caught in a small pail to prevent it from getting on the bed.

The terrible agony had made her helpless so every one was as near to her as allowed, while one of the doctors who bravely remained and who knew wh at the beaut iful creature held her head over the pail. The stench that came came from the disolved mucus was enough to drive every one out of the tent except the plengg plengiglomenean creature. T he powerful stilument produced the deadly salvia into that horrible smell which would be dangerous if drawn too much into the lungs for the fliud the creature was injecting into the salvia was venemious as a snake in case of being injected into any ones blood.As it was not all removed the creature floodeflooded her mouth with the powerful drug which cleaned every bit out even from her throat and stomach causing her also to leave her windpipe. The next dose removed every trace. Then with some other powerful poison the creature fumigated the room, caused the flapping s of the tent to expand and within fifteen minutes every trace of the horrible smell was gone. The slightest drop of another dose of the same drug on the child check destroyed the locked-jaw and stopped the convulsions.Then the creature put a dose of the powerful drug over her pillow and also filled a bottle with h it. Then two bottles of green colored medicine he caused to be laid on the table and next general panson brought int o the room some spp p of the tent some spoi spoons and the creature told him to see that the child get got a dose of either kind every hour until the disease was gone.

''It only requi res two bottles.''She said.''But do not give but three doses a day of the green fli fluid and for your own safty as well as the childs do not inject any into her blood as it is very posionous ans surely kill her.Its not dangerous to take internally though and even safe and better. And give her some heath healthful food when she recovers.But by all means dod not let that thick mucus discharge return for it is dangerous and causes the return of the disease. T he bott le full of the red fluid will do the work right along and is the only prevention of the return of the mucus discharge. Inject the whi te fliud I put int into the bottle on your right but not the red or green.And be mighty careful that not the slightest mistake is mak made for it it is then I even cannot do anything further.''

With this the creature disappeared out of the entranceway of the tent and general Hanson had the mother brought before him and told her what the creature had said, and then sent a messenger to the doctors telling him to tell each that the c cause of their fright was gone. When general Hanson returned he gave the child another dose of the power ful red drug the hour being up, but he recieved a bite in the hand for she was raving again, as she had recovered from the agony as the worse of. the diseasehad passed.

Quiokly quickly general Hanson went to a water trough outside the tent and put it under the faucet and wahed it throughoutly with the object of c leaning the wound and preventing any inflamanation from any dirt or foreign substance. While howa doing this the mother of the sick child brought the bicarbonate of soda and some clean rags and lint. With water a cream pa paste of the soda was made sufficient to plater the wound well, then putting some on a rag, he applied it to the wound, and bound it up. Then general Hanson returned to her bed side, gave her a dose of the medicine that was to destroy the disease by means of careful injection, the white colored flo fluid for this kind was dangerous to k give it to her by the mouth. An hour after when general Hanson was wetting the rag on his hand again the messenger returned and reported thathat the doctors were too frightoned to come.In the course of two hours the application seemed to be drying so general Hanson dipped his hand into the water and let it soak through to the soda.

T he next day when general Hanson went to visit the tent , the lit- tle girl having recovered a little more, he then went to visit a little o ame girl who lived in another tent and who had lived with her big brother James, and their youngest brother and sister in one of his wretched tonements where their poor mother and father had died of consumption,,.She knew that general Hanson was a good merciful governer general having saved a neighbors cil child from the ravages of rabies, and having heard from him in the newspapers, and also from a kind heart ed woman in one of the other tents, who had helped her through her illn ess of her own poor mother and whose window had on it a box of gay flowers which was the one bright spot in that gloomy building and the delight and envy of her heart. In her own window she had not been able to put any plants for they had opened upon a brick wall black and slimy, and the plants would have died there for through those windows the sun never shone.

Therefore when she had heard that the inspectors of the wealthy Glandelinian - owner wxwas making the rounds with the owner of the building she determined to beg them to ask him to make improvements so that they could have more air and sun shine.But the wicked and walthy Glandelinian aurthoritiss were not disposed to let the owner or allow him to make changes litti little dreaming that sooner or later general Hanson himself would soon be in poss ession of all those villiages and which had happened. In vain she had pointed out the deficencies in light and ventilation, and tried to impress upon the necessity of making many much needed repairs. In vain she had pleaded with the Glandelinians to improve the conditions of their crowded quarters, but the Glandelinians were obdurate

''There is a window in your room as the law requires, what more do you want!''They said.''Though your infernal window is small with pieces of papers and boards covering the broken pa panes it matters not ing to us. Though your few articles of appailrel hanging upon the wall for lack of closet room absorbing the oders of cooking and the gathering of dust of the ill kepmt room disturbes me not at all.The city had been making it possiblefor you people to have a roof over your heads and yet you child slaves are not satisfied.Well you will have to be or move out and live in the worse places known as the mi lls and outhouses. There are plenty of other slaves looking for a place to lay their heads.''

And they were glad to shake the filth of the place from their own feey and step in their waiting automobiles. Meanwhile sorrow had given plae place in the little lame girls household. At the outbreak of the war her big brother had been out of work for sometime so that thdr savings had to be spent for food and consequently he had not been able to seethe doctor about his severe cough. When he recieved word from captian heart u during Hansons seige of K Jennie turner to report for duty being drafted into the Glandelinian army by force he desoddeserted and joined the christian army instead, and his plae faced sister felt more joyful and her face brightened at the thought that perhaps the country air and hardships of the army would cure his cough and when the war was over send him back strong and well.

The lad was only three days away when he fought in the desperate battle of Calverinia Run or Turpentine forest that wrecked a portion of both the christian and Glandelinian army and every body in his brigade was wiped out including her brother.The same few dayw had changed, or brought changes in the crippled little girls home.Insufficient food and living in the room which had not been fumigated since the death of her parents had developed the dread disease in the already susceptible children and a visiting nurse had appeared to remendy condit ions on the very day when the little crippled little girl whose name was Jane had been brought home unconscious from the rea rear of the battlefield during that terrible battle where she had gone to see her brother who was reported mortally wounded and had learned of his untimely dea death with the brigade of Kindernines division.The next day the bitterness of her sorrow was still upon her as she saw that the other villiages had been captured by some troops whom she knew not whom and that the inhibatants were sem seeming to flee. She soon learned that the christins had seized the villiages from the enemy by force but that the villiage she was living in was not even touched. However general Evans had told his generals not to skip a single villiage but three divisions of Manleys armies had showed furious resistance and drove away the raiders from that particular one saying that the Glandelinian government would soon see to it that the other villiages were retaken that such houses were not even good a enough for ththe dirty christian dogs.However when general Evans made a sweeping assault with greatly overwhelming numbers the Glandelinians were annihilated when surrounded and the last of the villiages taken possession of and all the unfortunate inhibatants taken to the christian lines, well clothed and fed good rations.

Several days after the seizure general Hanson had learned of the condition of the little girl and had her brought into his own tent to be examined -by doctors and however at the same time she was brought in two Glandelinian magistrates who had been spying and who had been captured by some Abyssinkilian squad entere his tent under strong guard and the girl recognizing them as the old time scoffing Glandelinians a terrible bitterness took possession of her and the fury of her wild denunciations knew no bounds.

''You''She cried to the surprise of general Hanson as he noticed the newcomers.''You.You.You. The Glandelinian fools who caused my parats parents to die for want of sunlight and refused to repair our tene ments and now tried to butt in when they did not belong to you any more. Who willfully would not listen to our entreaties and scoffed at the warnings of the Calverinian aurthorities and tried to drive off general Evans armies when they came to take possession of the villiages and found you could not do it and suffered the annihilation of your troop of soldiers instead. Take care the death of my parents and brother lies at your door. Ha and one little neighbor contracted rabies from your mad-dog you purposely let loose into the christian lines, and my little brother and sister were starving and I----I----I----I---- ------shall die like my brother------like my parents and it shall be all due to you----you----you----you---- and---and---and---and---''

In a terrible rage g general Hanson turned savagely upon the Glandelinian prisoners.

''So this is the way even you Glandelinian magastriges do to people you have no right to intef inetefere with eh!''He snaled.''For aweek general Evans had been trying t o get possession of these half rotten tumble down villiage of child slave factories and tenements which should be more than repaired and you thought you could drive the Angelinians back. Who are you that declare yourselves not in the war dare to interfere with our d oings and spy on my troops at the same time Do you know the penalty is certain death?''

''It is none of your buisness.''Retored one of the Glandelinians.

''So you were the cause of their starving and of gott ing the Terberculossis through your continual interference with other peoples propery propert y in time of war even and so you are the owner of the mad-dog you purposely let loose into the christian lines to imperil the whole army including violet and her sisters.Why in the hell did you let it loose purposely for!''

''I tell you it is none of your buisness.''Answered the same Glandelinian a and got a rap in the face from Hanson that made him stagger.

''Talk like that to me again and I'll knock your brains out.''Hissed Hanson.''Answer my question or I,ll have you shot immediately.''

''The other Glandelinians however answered;

''All Glandelinians hate christian children, and that if general Hanson did not in tent to his own affairs and withdraw his armies from the si seige of Jennie turner he will bring ruin on the Calverinian nation on his own account.''

Hanson gave a sneer at this and said;

''You may be powerful Glandelinian magistrates but just the same you shall pay dearly for this interference from you as no christians will stand for any iny interference from any one who profess that they had no part of the war.You broke the law of muer muetrality by violating it in interfering on the christian generals of spying on us and trying to frs frustrate the plans of general Jack Ambrose Evans. Its evans who will deal with you and not me and you did it to him. And he'll make it hot for you never fear.''

''But''

''As for Calverinia being in danger on account of me I do not care what you say for anything done in Calverinia by you Glandelinia will e be made to pay for. And for the sights I've seen here since I8ve been in Calverinia makes me feel like making away with all the prisoners I have in a wholesale execution and so your threats will do no good anyway....'' Besi de I'm going t o give you a taste of one of the worst Angelinian prisons. I have been wondering why it took Evans to fight twenty desperate battles to capture those villiages and now I have found out-from the lips of a child whom you fools wronged.''

The two Glandelinians were for the moment in a maudlin rage for this rebuke and threat of their christian enemy who had struck them such a terribleblow.

''What ?''Cried one of them.''Do you mean to tell me that we shall pay dearly for this and go to an old christian prison.''?

''Yes.''Answered general Hanson on in tones of thunder and with with a deadly scow scowl. ''And any move on any part of you may mean immediate death of one or both. I'm not in a mood just now to be trifled with and any hostile action on the part of t you two Glandelinians will make me do some bloody work for right now I have the murdering spirit in me.Look at these poor refugees in my ca camp scores of thousands of patients having been in danger of dying in crowded unwholesome quarters where they now are getting well and stronger under proper treatment. And if the terments had been in better condition all would have been well and I would not have so much I020. trouble in rebuilding them and using them for a certain purpose of which I will not reveal. These villiages on account of the interference of you two Glandelinian magistrates were swarming with dust and worse of all with t ubercu lossis germs and before the war the Angelinian government paying even you Glandelinians money when you do nothing for them. If you two prisoners dare to try and make resistance you will think a cyclone struck you. You -are going to the Angelinian prisons alright and I do not care what your Glandelinian government may say or do, and if they want to make anything umusual happen in Calverinia let them start it and I'll give them all the HELL they want.''

Dreading by the scowl that governer general Hanson Vivian was a dangerous man when aroused the two Glandelinians recoiled and were agai n seized by the Angelinian soldiers while one went to the telephone t o call on more soldiers to seize all Glandelinian tribunals and tribune buildings and to clean out all the magastrates in the vinicity of Jennie T urmer a and to frustrate any attempt at interference with general Hansons plans.In a few days more more soldiers came into the lines with several other Glandelinians and these were also marched away, while the little girl and the sick children and pesons among the refugees were taken to the private army sanitarums where a few weeks time would see them well on the road to recovery.When they would return they would be amazed at the transformation of the villiages. For general Hanson had not been satisfied to repair many of the old buildin s, but they had been completely torn down and their boards made to use as framework for sailents and breastworks and abatis and in the place of the villiages stood a f regular stream of fortifications and a second line of christian sailents and positions with plently of garrisons and forces to guard them well supplied with artillery and so on.The christian lines had thus edged in closer to the besieged city and general Hanson was making full preparations to bombard the emmys enemys lines.

''There are no better fortifications like these confront ing Jennie T urmer.''General Hanson truthfully boasted to the little girl Jane on showing her the work of his army as he also led the happy pair to show them the new positions. ''This will surely end Manleys boast that he can lick bigger forces than his own.If he can drive me out of my impregnable position then there is no hope for success in the war.''

''I'm sorry that those old mean Glandelinian armies treated yours like they did near the T urpentine Forest t hat awful day.'' Jane said.

''Oh it was nothing''General Hanson declared.''There are no Glandelinian armi es whether it be led by the King himself that can interfere with my plans. w hen I gather my army aro nd.''

He then bid them good bye and then left. After this general Hanson went into the other tent to see how the other little girl was getting on who had been suffering from rabies .The chi child though she was still suffering severely had recovered her reason by this t ime and the medicine though curing slowly was working wonde- fully and the doctor had declared that the child would be entirely well inside of a month.'

''Well that is certainly glad news.''Hanson remarked.''How is the childs mouth.''Does any more of the thick ropy mucus appear.?''

''Not so bad for the powerful drug is doing wonders on it. She cann t talk yet but she seems to know where she is for when you mention her name she nods and beco beckons.''

''Well I'll go in and see the poor child.''Remarked general Hanson.''Is she still tied up in bed?''

''Yes the Blengig,om Blengiglomensan creature had been here again and advises that she be strapped in bed untill the rabies entirely disappea disappears.But the rops are not so tight and she objects to our taking it off anyhow....''

''Well what did the doctor do about the stones she swallowed?'' Asked general Hason.

''He caused their removal by making her vomit.And yet they were very small.T
The only sound she can emit when she suffers intense pain is a moan.''

At last they reached the room or ten I mean and the s ight of the child was enough to stir any ones soul to pity and love.General Hanson noticed that she had been put into another cot or bed and her hands and face had been cleaned the child having bea given a good bath by her mother. Her normal beauty had not been destroyed by the rabies germ and the terrible glaring of her eyes had disappeared.

Violet and her sisters who had come along with general Hanson w ere watching I021. at her bedside but arose as general Vivian also appeared. General Hanson spoke to the little girl but she only nodded and made signs with her right hand that she could not talk. Violet took up a sheet of paper and handing it to general Hanson said;
''The little girl wrote this and want 's you to read it.''
General Hanson took it and this is what he read;

''Dear Governer general;

Is the rabies getting w orse? It seems bad since yesterday after I permitted you to tie me up with ropes.And what is all that brown stuff in that bed over yonder?!?''

''Why my child.''Answered general Hanson.''You are getting better instead of w orse.You had this disease for a long while since I last tied you up and all the brown ststuff on the rolld up sheets of the discarded cot is your deadly salvia which is going to be removed and burned.It was one of the Blengiglomenean creatures who saved you.''

The child nodded with with delight and then a few minutes later she suddenly suddenly fell asleep and general Hanson left the tent followed by dear violet and he her sisters.

''This is -the first sleep she has had during the disease.''
Said violet .''But I have heard from scouts that our camp is swarming with rabid dogs let loose upon us by enemy spies and our good normal dogs will be bitten and contract the disease and then we will be in awful peril. I believe you had better have all the army dogs keep inside and have all stray dogs seen shot down and also I wish we could leave for Angelinia soon t oo for I h ate this old region of a cold weather and all this old snow.''She added.

That evening when another blizzard was setting in on account of the Angelinians making all kinds of preparations for t he pressing of the seige ad by making preparations of getting their artillery into range for the prepared bombardment the enemy armies again became very threatening in their manners ans ways and so hardly any of the refugees went outside even to play in the snow as was their wont as they all feared the enemy would sooner or later try to make another assault upon the christia lines to prevent them from pressing the seige too close. General Hason Vivian and some of his highest generals warned Evas to watch the movements of the enemy and then went about to watch operations of their own forces and to see to the placing of the big machine and seige guns and to the erection of extra fortificat ions and sailents, general Robert Vivian alone being inside before the threatening blizzard began to grow worse When the storm grew worse and worse general Hanson hurried back tward General Kindernines divisions in the teeth of a strong rising wind, but also decided to stop and see the little sick child. As he continued on in t he face of the gale hehis coat tails tails began to flap like the canvas of some rudderless ship at sea. She was stio l asleep in bed worn thin from the decreasing pains of rabies when h he came in and not wishing to stay long for fear of a storm he hurried out and soon reahed Kin dernines position.

E violet and her sisters did not like the dreary Calverinian winter with its short shadowy days and the many furious blizzards already past though it was only anow a few days before Christmas. The great snow-storms that they had already experienced awed them. Some Carnations stood in rows in flower pots on the window st sill in front of Jennie who had bea been the first one t o be in her smug warm bed . A beautiful Angelinian bird peeped and twitteredperpetually in a cage by her bedside. Thus which ever way little Jennie Turned or looked an artici a rtificial summer charmed her with its bright and tunfu tunefulcface . Her father entered the room quickly and quiet ly and drew to the door so that even its click was stifled for if she were sleep ng sleeping it were good for her after her trying days and the events of his home coming could not be heard. Still he could not resist tiptoeing to her bed with its grills of white bars and lifting a stray curl from he her face a sweeter face than before puffed like an angels in sleep.With his touch not skilled as a mothers she swoke lightly, and the knowing bird filled the air with song.He lighted the gas which gilded the oranges that he playfully rolled on the counter pane. When he rose up suddenly and closed up his hand to his pistol pocket to bring out in a very threatening manner a fat yellow banna and she laughed with him at the pantomins and fell to eating it slowly.....

In the meantime the mother of the sick litt le girl sat down on the edge of the bed and watched the movements of her ch ilds cheeks and throat . It was a long while though before she rembered the medicine and as she turned to measure the oily stuff a sad look filld her cheery face. for a moment to be off again as she retur ret urned with the dose and the child swallowed it with the help of lemonade. Then her fingers relaz relaxed in her hands and lay soft like warm feathers. The next moment her father permitted her caressing fingers to drop the on the stem of a beautiful red Carnation into his botton botton hole and h the look in her happy fave he or her mother never forgot. The father of course was to stay up all night with her to see that nothing whatever would hurt her and at midnight amid the din of the clickering hail and cold sleet and snow against the wind w window panes a loud knock ing came upon the door and Doctor Loganna entered furred to t he eye and his shoulders and camp covered with snow and hail.
"How is my little lady feeling to night?"He asked as his entrance awakened her.The child was quite flushed from her sleep and her eyes looked dull and tired.
"Better."She said slowly."Papa always makes me feel better."
"And in the day time?"Asked the doctor.
"I don't feel so good."She admitted with her white hand over her little chest."Something hurts me dreadfully here."
Her father fedigeted while the stete stethoscope was being adjusted.The doctor sexplained however that the pains were from the sudden abatement of the disease and would be over soon if some more of the drug was used for he believed that the real cause was of some of the deadly mucus remaining in the stomach. As the doctor left, her mother gave her some of the medin kedicine which made her vomit, but an hour after she complained of a strange weakness.Two hours after when the snow and hail was more fiercer her eyes grew large and wistful and she lay in the bed like drooping a drooping Lilly. The next hour the doctor came again and the mother plied him with repeated questions.
"Does she need more nourishing?"He asked"And companionship?"
"Her society is enough but excellent."Said the mother.
"And for her nourshment I can suggest nothing more."Said the doctor.
Doctor Logannas words hesitated imperceptibly and on the last word the childs mother stepped over to him.
"Yes you can."She meanced.Y"You are keeping something back. Out with it doctor for I fear she is under the full spell of the disease again as before."
"I had hesitated."Commenced the doctor"Because your circumstances may not warrent I'm afraid."
"Nix with it man, let me know."Cried the mother sternly.
"Well then give her three spoonfuls of that medicines every hour. It may pull her through...."
He counted the short gasps which stood for her breatin n breathing then turned away shortly.Then catching the moister in the doctors eyes the childs d mother sprang at him and clung to his sleeve.
"No, no not that."She pleded pleaded."Tell me anything but that."
"Give her this."Said the doctor in a muffled voice."She is passing beyond the fury of the disease and my eyes are only motioned with tears of joy.She will be well in the morning.So well that she will be able to talk."
After agood hard shaki ng he her mother managed to wake her and as her hand fluttered soft ly on hers she gave her the medicine.

As the governer general looked into her eyes he saw that it appeared as if thaight of reason had departed from them, and he had an ideathat thr ough the grid of her daughter recently having had the fiecre fierce rabies she had lost her reason. All the while the sick childs sister had been brought in she cont inued to la laugh. When they brought her in and laid her softly on a warm cot in the tent jear the child she was calmer and laughing soft ly now. The little girl climbed on the bed and nestled on her sisters breast. Theother l ttle girl stopped her mub mumbling and looked at the sick child with startled puzzled eyes.
"Mama, sister I'm getting better, I'm better mama."Said the child.

Her little sister turned her head & this then closed her eyes w earily and when she reopened them she starr stared around the room in surprise, and then at the nestling child. And ever so gently her hands stole around and enwrapped the littlev one to her breast.Then she bent her face half fearfully as though she feared it were al a myt myth tward the curly head.
"My precious little Annie."Whipsered hermother."Your little sist sister has had a terrible dream but it is all untrue. Precious, precious little Annie."

General Robert vivian was about to leave the happy woman and children, but he asked how the weather was, for one of the children who had been outside had bee come in and there had not been any snow on her cloak and cap.
"Annie's father announced that it was still snowing heavily and that the child had only cleaned the snow off so that she would not get her shoulders wet.
"But it is snowing in fine flakes now...."He sdd said."And with pretty big ones intermingled....."
By the time the goverver general left the tent for his own headquarters it was snowing heavily with big flakes agin again, and by the time he reached his headquarters it had increased more and more. By six o-clock in themorning the storm was in full sway and violet and her sisters who had wa ax awakened a little after six expected that the snowstorm hd ceased, but what was their surprise when they saw that it was snowing all the hard w harder, and snowing so hard tha that nothing could be seen for less tha than a hundred feet. The wind itself having le up several hours before had changed to the nort heast and was now blowing furiously like a full grown hurricane.General Hanson himself had declared to several gensals that several officers had reported of a big battle raging far out at a place called Osmondonson and that the enemy had won the first da of it driving the christians back but int o an unassailable position and then had attacked this and met disaster. Also reports had come in that a great blizzard storm had also been raging far out in the northeastern part of the Calverinian seas, and it had been reported headed southeastward for the country of Calverinia. Well it had struck and there seemed no end to one of the worse snowstorms of Calverinia's history and the weather man declared that it still extended all over the northeastern and western seas and was driven upon Calverinia by a swirling typhoon o far out in t he Mc-Whirthian seas.For an hour during that morning the great storm increased and genea general Hanson delcared it could not snow any harder while the wind was so high that it blew down trees as fas tas they could be blown down while high snowdrifts were forming in the company streets and in the plains and this was Hansons most greatest desire for all this snow would afford him an unassailable position.
Tward ten o-clock that morning the st orm was awful. The wind was blowing a screaming gale piling down tress by the thousands, and the snow was blowing in swirhling clouds of great thickness and nothing could be seen for twenty feet distant. As the enemy were on the outskirt s of the besieged city they wee having a terrible time from preventing the fierce blizzard t storm from blowing their entire encampment away, and many of the soldiers had been killed and injured by fallen trees. The storm the christian army alone enjoyed fisce and dreadful as it was and they admired the thirty foot snow drifts ha which had formed over p les of fallen trees while to the disconfiture a se of the enemy a very severe cold wave was setting in the tempature already being 20 below zero. So heavy was the snow falling in fine sandy flakes that nothing could be seen, the nearest objects being obscured oven a tree ten feet away from general Hansons headquarters only showec itself like a faint blur through the snow fog? The wind was believed to be blowing at the rate of one hundred miles aw an hour whirling the snow in great clouds ad making aterriblechaoes and general Hanson fearing that the windows of his headquarters would literally be blown in shut the storm sash and doors. Right in front of general vivians headquarters a few feet away was a high snow drift fully ten feet in depth and near its base lay a child who had wandered from its own quart ers and got lost in the blinding medium and was almost in danger of the snow sleep.
V Without hesitation one of the soldiers without waiting to put a coat or hat on quickly went to the door of his tent and out into the furious blizzard.

Around this snow driftthe ground wasswept clean by the furious wind not only of snow but of loose pebbelesand dirt and the sno solder was forced to crawl on his hands and knees to keep the screaming gale from carrying him away. He stood the cold blasts alright for he could stand the most intense coldness without thick clothing, but oh the raging wind storm. It fairly ripped the blinds and roofs from the houses and the snow seemed to be flying at him by the wagon load and now nothing could be seen for the distance of ten feet at all and it seemed to be coming down at the rate of half a foot an hour. It was blowing two hundred miles and hour and was growing stronger and stronger every minute and thesky was growing dark and slaty gray. How he could have stood it in that whirling storm of snow and wind that fairly smothered him was a wonder but he managed to reach the child after a succession of rolls and sprawls caused by thewind striking him. He grabbed it by the arm ad gently dragging her after him crawled twa tward his tent but it was much worse now for him for he faced the gale. The whirling clouds of snow struck him in the face in complete blucket fulls blinding him and four t imes he histate hesitated fearing that he would not reach his ta tent in facing such a dangerous snowstorm.

His mouth was filled with snow and also the inside of his coat collar and he sistained bruises from flying boards and brances branches and tree limbs and even broken fragments of signs blown from trees hit him in the head. But after a terrific struggle against the wind and snow demon he managed to reach the ste s of general Hansons headquarters, and staggering up with the child in his arms was ushered in by the guards inside. It took him an hour to be fixed up while the doctor took means to bring the child to her senses and soon succeeded placing him heher I mean in a nice warm bed after a hot bed bath and covered over with warm heavy blankets. That afternoon when it became exceedingly cold the storm had slackened considerably being not quie so fierce before in snow only however the wind still shrieking and howling like lost souls and just then a dog seeming to be suffering from rabies was shot by one of general Jacob Baldwins guards aft er it had frightened tn the refugees who had been outside during the storm that afternoon looking for wood to build fi res to wa warm themselves. About six children ald boys running in front of general Hansons headquarters took refuge there when another apparent mad animal rushed at h them through the pall of snow.The laboratories experts in the snow swept christian lines had been called out to examine two hundred and thirty two dogs cap tured within the christian lines and every one had proved to be danger u ous cases of hydrophobia. The prevalences of the rabies germ had been shown by these examanations to be dangerous. The two hundred and thirty two mad-dogs had bitten six hundred persons. One had bitten as many as thirty eight persons before being caught and it was necessary to notify all of them that they were in danger of infliction by hydrophobia and to advise treatement before it was too late.

It was stated that Glandelinians sneaking within the christian lines in disguise were letting loose all these mad dogs and general Hanson had been requested long before the outbreak of this blinding snow-storm to enforce the dog- shooting or muzzling law and rid his company streets of the stray dogs, and if he did not the Glandelinians would succesd in making a great spread of rabies for as the case of rabies among dogs had kept y up almost st eadily during the few days past indicating h that the disease had grabbed a foothold in the whole region of the entrenched christian lines and that it was expected to de devolpe into a fearful spread during the coming summer unless preventive measures were to be taken at once.The sit uat ion was grave alreadybut it was nothig like it would be but it was nothing like it would be when the warmer weather would come on.

One of the doctors recieved a patient who had been taken from his tent a victim of hydro ho hydrophobia and who had died that very morning the victim of the bite of a mad-dog. Death had come when the raging snowstorm had been at its w orse. A t the end of a violent derlirum during which in night attirethe victim attempted furiously to wreck w everything in the ward of the base hospital and to leap from the second story window. This patient had been bitten by a big wolf hound.Six weeks ago the germ wa was not present untill one evening at five oclock when he hd had been hurried off t o the hospital and almost as soon as he entera t ente reed t h the ward where he was put with several other patients he became violent. It took twenty minutes to subdue the furious victim, when he jumped from the bed, hurled chairs and tables about, kan knawed his shoulders , produced mucus from his mouth, scared other pa patients and then attempted to leap out of the window.

T he man was the first person to die that month from such sudden attacks of rarabies and the christ ian camps were facing the danger of a spread of rabies among dogs which would result in many more deaths unless preventive measures were taken at once.S Dogs of such kind should be annihilated and the glandelinians who purposely thrw throw int o the christian lines rabid dogs ought to be shot down without mercy if ca caught and foun d guilty. During the night before the day when the storm reached its worse another person a soldier was bitten in the leg by a bull dog and was badly injured.The dog was caught by another soldier and held for observation but in this case no rabis rabi e s germ was found on him it being only normal ugliness.

In Jennis Vivians room the hail was making more racket than ever that following evening and her father general Robert Vivian looking out noticed that the ground was white with it. Two big bull dogs with ropy mucus drolling from their jaws and with glaring eyes were sitting in the hail near the fence in front of the generals headquarters while another was pas passing by slowly.

''Gracious I've got to get rid of them before any one comes in or they may let those germ laden monsters in here.''He thought to himself.''For they will bite every one of us. And dangerous looking bt brutes they are too.''

K It was hailing worse now and yet one of the bull dogs was already coming up the stairs. Without hesitationthe general threw up the window drew his revolver and taking good aim at the dog joggling t ward the door fired the shot being true to its mark and the dog rolled down the steps breathing its last . But the loudness of the det onation awoke all in the plac except little Jennie and before they had recovered from the shock the governer general fired at the second dog which made a headlong spring for the window snarling and howling like a fiend incar nate. It was the very bull dog which had bitten the little girl and in his excitement the governer general missed.But the governer gensal general with great quickness replaced the trigger took sure aim at his eye ad and fired before it had nother chance to spring, and after another shot which brought every one in the house on therun the dog ceased its struggles and breathed its last . The third dog was out of sight by this time and so soveral of thw soldiers were ordered to remove the dead dg dogs. They dragged them away by means of ropes and covered them up with the hail. Jennie alone had remained asleep during the excitement and her father declared that it was better that she had not been awakend awakened.

''Well the bull dog which had bitten the child is dead.''Said the governer general.''That was the one that bounded in.''

''It's lucky you shot him as quickly as you did.''Said general cannon who had been in the same building at the time.'' General vivin then went and closed the window.

''When I first saw the glaring of their eyes a chill ran through me.''

''The governer general retorted.''I knew of the pe peril if any body should come in at the time we would all be in bed and let the dogs in. That is why I started shooting at them. T here were three but the other whih which was a blood hound went away down the street . But I will shoot him if he appears again. The rabies had its full grasp on him too for I could tell by his mouth and eyes.''

''Was it a big dog too?''Asked violet who had just come into his room from her bed room looking like a human angel.

''No it was a blood hound''Said her father. ''I would rather meet a mad bull dog than a blood hound in a fight.''

It was an hour after before the others could go to sleep again and general vivian placed some sentries to watch out for more mad-dogs.When morning came eve everybody was up early and noticed that the hail was fairly pouring down.. Violet and her sisters who had been looking out the windows at a clump of leafless trees in the far distance saw them dis appear beh in a white pall while large flakes of snow began to mix with the hail.She knew that this was the rear portions of the big blizzard coming on and a few minutes after the very air wa filled with large flakes of snow.A strong ferocious howling wind was still blow ing and the snow was increasing rapidly.

In less than an hour the wind became so strong that it shook the house and the very air was full of snow and again they could not hardly see anything for the distance of ten feet .At ten oclock tge storm was still raging with great fury.

It stormed still harder a little later on the wind blowing a regular gale prostrating the trees by the scors every every minute. Violet and her sisters were greatly alarmed over the incessant trembling ofthe house and their father left the window where he had been watching the stom storm and went to Jennies bed to see if she was awakened by the roar of the hurricane. Jennie was still sleep with a smile on her prec pretty face and a medal of the Sacred Heart claspod to her little heart that was coming day after day to long more and morefor the return to Angelinia. After this despite thefury of the storm he again went out to see the little sick girl and went he got there fter hard traveling on snowshoes he went into the tent with the mother the poor child seeming to be sobbing as if her little heart would break.

As he bent over her she awoke having cried in her sleep and seeing him she suddenly spoke.

"Oh general I dreamed that I was among the Glandelinians where I had been a few weeks ago."

The mother then told the governs gaeral that the d c doctor who had lately come in had declared that all the mucus had disappeared and that the regular salvia had returned. He also told her that she could use her voice again but that no one was to awake her and that the sh child was to awake of her own a accord for the more she slept the more the diseasesand its symptons would surely disappear. So the genwal general producing his knife ripped the rops loose as the doctor had said then he ripped the sewed coverlet from the beg disclosing a night fo gown w th a few holes bitten into it .

"Annie my little Annie."Cris her mother scanning every inch of the chewed up cloth.

It snowed fiercely all that night while the governer general sastayey stayed there being driven in clouds by the furious gale and tward morning snowd snowed more furiously.The mother had folded the child un her arms the curly head of the little girl nestling close to her face. She noticed that the disease was almost entirely gone.The little girls sisters came in at the o moment led by their father and thus once again a whole family was made happy.

CHAPTER FOURTY ~~FIVE~~ three THREE — ATTACKED BY BLENGIGLOMENEAN CREATURES.

Lat e during the evening when the storm was clearing away and the weather was cold one of the army nurses who tended to violet and her sisters went with them out of on a scouting tour all wearing snowshoes and no sooner had they left the camp when a score of savage Glandelinians rushed upon the little part y with drawn sabres with the intention of kil ing them brutally on the spot . As the littlegirls were about to daw their own weapons they were surprised to a see a considerable large winged creature of many beautiful colors come rushing straight for the Glandelinians and that quite a mumbs were also circling in sweeps high above in the sky. T he eyes of the creature glared in a most frightful manner and with froth st reaming from the tarlons of its wings and dripping to the snow it showed its powerful fangs and let loose a horrible roar that stunned the little girls who thought the Blengiglomenean creature was also mad and was attacking them.

The deepness of the snow did not hinder its wild leaps and with a howl it bounded right a in frontof the vivian girls coiled its tail around-in a circle with them and the nurse in the middle and then sprang at the Glandelinians flapping its lugg wings wildly and pre paring to strike a blow. One of the nearest Glandelinians pierced its wing through with his bayonet and the creature in a blinding rage and maddened by pain sprang at the Glandelinian soldier and fastened his strong jaws upon his throat . The other Glandelinians sprang to the resc ue with curses firing a volley and managed to get the mancfrom the foaming creature.Intent upon again reaching his victims the strange Blengiglomenean creature sprang upon them with a frightful roar his weight bearing ten of the Glandelinians int o the snow.After knocking some of the Glandelinians down with its wing and before they could recover themselves the creature was once more upon the Glandelinians t earing at their heads and body with its claws and making a pandemonium of a racket.Heedless of their own safty the other Glandelinians desperately attacked the creature and gathered some of the unconscious and bleeding comrades in their strong arms only to be also knocked down by a blow of the creatures wing.Protecting the wounded comrades against the animal which now attacked them, as best as they could, while fighting off the crea creature she or they crawled to a high snow bank and regain their feet ran for a ravine through the snow drifts while the other Glandelinian soldiers the remainder of the group who had attacked violet and her sisters, and who had been a wit ness to this horrible scene fled for safty. The enraged animal its savage nature aroused to the point of madness by the fury of the Glandelinian resistance flew in persuit of the Glandelinians who ran int o a house and when the last Glandelinian slammed the door of the house behind him he repeatedly flew around the house followed by another creature and then a third, the third flying over the roof knocking down everything in i ts path then made a furious onslaught against the door carrying all before it door and even the casement going down with a crash beside a pot portion of the house from the shock.

Pouncing upon the nearest Glandelinians with the fury of a phanter it bit their hands and tore u opn open the throat of one of the Glandelinians partly crushing his head in its powerful jaws and lacerating his face so that no one could recognize him while the other Glandelinians fought with their bayonets trying franticaly to drive him off.After being knocked down half a dozen times while trying to beat off the second infuriated creature the Glandelinians man hed to pick up their bleeding comrades and rushed back outside.Again with a series of blood curdling snarls followed by a terrifying roar the first monster instatly bounded after them, but the Glande linians managed to reach a second house and shut the door. The two Glandelinians bled to death while the two enraged animals were fly ing against the doors in their determination to follow up the fierce attack.

There was a trail of blood leading from thefirst house to the other house and the floor of the house was covered with blood, when some rein forcements of the Glandelinians appeared with a rush. T he two Glandelinians indeed bled to death and the monsters having found that the doors were strong to be forced open again had flown this time through window sash and all carrying down all the glass with a rattle and this time sprang at the new comers and with its four feet on the chest of one of the Glandelinians the creature t ors at the third victims throat. At the sight of the blood the Glandelinians hurled a chair at the creature, and then rushed him as he flew at the one who threw the chair wih a screeching roar, the others seizing the fallen soldier in his arms. As the creat ures flew madly about the soldiers hammered away at them with musket butt s and with the leg of the broken chair, but suddenly the third creature outside with a deafening roar that shocked the building lunged inside as swift as a lightning flash and threw all the Glandelinians sprawling to the floor, one of the soldiers rolling tward the stairs ahd rolling down like a wheel.The first animal was about to crush of one of the soldiers head between its jaws and scratch and bite int o his face when two soldiers who had gotten to their feet rushed at it t ogether with iron pipes upriaised t o strike it a blow and one of the other soldiers seized the victim and succeeded in saving them.A soldier by the name of Robert clubbed at the creature with all his might but again the animal made a lunge throw ing another called Gannon with a crash to the floor.Simultaneously another soldier called Baldwin tore down a long whip from a mantle and struck at the creature furiously as he tried to bite Gannon in the throat, but he did nothing but put the creature in a maudlin rage. As the creature leaped furiously at Baldwin, James Hanson snatched his wounded comrade Jennings and ran up the s steps to another room pulling one of the other wounded c comrades with him.Quickly treating and fumigating their wounds wounds and bandaging them th he left them writhing on a bed and then drew out his loaded revolvers.In the meantime a desperate battle was going on below.Sixother men were badly bitten by the creat ure who had rushed into their hiding place followed by his assailants and these six were badly mangled and mortally wounded.

Before he went down James Hanson examined a big rip in his p coat and pants leg caused by the creatures teeth. Chairs, tables, books, and vases were hurled at the furious creatures who leaped at the men at each throw fanging one of them every time.But these could not fell them, and yet before James Hanson wa about to shoot one of the creatures bore him to the floor.Gannon made a desperate attack upon him with a chair and managed to drive him from Hanson who had dropped his revolver in the furious attack the creature had made upon him.

-Again he sprang at James Hanson but was beaten off by a number of Glandelinians with clubbed muskets and bayonets, and the pain only blinded the young creatures with rage. Froth again st reaming from the tarlons of itheir wings they all three suddenly made a fur ious spring and one of them landed squarely upon James shoulders only to fall off and sprang on the floor.But with amazing quickness it was on its feet again and after flying madly about made a lunge for Cannon and bore him to the floor with his throat between its jaws.In his desperation Hanson pounded the creat ure mercilessly but could not make him let go of Cannon.Suddenly a lasso flew through the air and went around the creatures wings and was drawn tight ly.Baldwin who was at the other end of the rope pulled with all his might and dragged the growling creature from Cannon the other Glandelinians having already fled from the scene of the terrible carnage.With frantic struggles the creature tried to work itself free but Baldwin only drew the noose the more tighter and with frantic efforts he draw the snarling creature away from the others, and was immediately attacked by the other two and down from the sky came the swoop of many others and the big ones too at that.As Cannon had quickly picked up his revolver and aimed at the eye of one of the oncoming big creat ures he -let los loose a roar like a million thunder rolls and lunged at Cannon like a cyclone bore him to the ground fearfully mangled and Baldwin and Hanson t oo and suddenly flew off disappearing high int o the sky.

The only Glandelinians then rushed to the aid of their fallen comrades some of them nursing their wounds while the others were busy attending to those who had died from their injuries.Ten Glandelinians had been killed by the creatures which had went to the rescue of Violet and her sisters.

A soldier by the name of Germaine Jordense soon a ppeared from the window of one of the houses and announced that his own wounds were severe but not mortal.

"The one who warned those creatures of our attempt to shoot or bayonetthose dastardy Vivian girls is the fault of all this." Said the leader of the Glandelinians in a rage."It was not necessary for them to be warned at all and if I knew who it was"

"They do not need to be warned for those creatures can see everything going on from above no matter how high they are, and any way we did not thih think that our attack on those little gur guttersnipes would bring on this terrible incident."

"You didn'T?"Said the leader with a scowl."Well it has and that shows that those creatures are just as you said telescopic eyed.If we had not done our best to stop them creatures when they made the attack to--t o---to--to---- save---that ---that---that---that bleeding comrades of ours , those----bledding---corspes on the ground--we would have fared better than we did.We were foolish to attack it.Maybe that creature had a special grudge against the man it first attacked.And our foo foolish heroism is the only thing that saved us from annihilation altogether."

The second lieutenant was also in a terrible rage and he said; "They are all too fired pretty those christian dogs known as the Vivian Girls."S He said."They caused or nearly caused the deaths of all of us. Did not you men see that they carry whistles on their breasts which they blow when attacked by us and which when they did blow immediately brought the creatures."

"What in the name of thunder was those creatures?"Asked a sergeant. He had escaped only with a few scratches.

"I know they were too violent for anything.No drgon dragon could be so terrific in their actions or rage.And they caused lots of havoc here." It was true.In the two houses t oget her broken chairs lay here and there, pict ures were torn down, carpets were t orn t o shreds by the wing tar lons of the creatures the glass of the windows by the creatures second lunge against the lower casings were shattered, the t orn bed clot clothes, and window shades and draperies lying on the floor covered with blood, and big scratches on the plastering marked the desperate unsuccessful fight. Tables were overturned and demolished, rich vases smashed, and the floor covered with blood from the- teo two dead Glandelinians who were being taken out by some of the Glandelinians.

"It wa was horrible but our comrades were powerless to save their lives."Said the Glandelinian capt ian whose name was Robert Hansel. "Several times we tried to take out wounded comrades our out of reach of the creatures but many t imes we were knocked down. Ten of our soldiers have their throats so badly torn that you could see the interior to the windpipe and they bled to death.The creatures were so furiously worked up that they twince w twice tried to open the door of the second house by bounding against it and succeeded in the first attempt in the other house.See what conditions the rooms of each house are in from the desperate battle."He exclaimed.

The doctor examined the wounds of woevery Glandelinian bitten by the st re strange creatures after they ret urned to their own lines and after dressing them,said;

"It is lucky you re treated the wounds quickly. There is of course no danger now but the salvia of the creature is posionous nevertheless some kind of a Fenomedan posion and you could have recisved infection like the other soldiers did did who died so quickly if you had neglected the wounds.However you are all safe.But next time be sure that there are no such creatures around before you attack christian children for children are like flowers to these creatures and if they see any men attacking girl children especially with intent to kill t hey will do just as these creatures did.

MANLEY AND HIS ARMY GETS BUISY/

In the meantime general Manley dreaded the outcome of the seige of Jennie turner and as general Hanson had constructed many strong works besides those he made out of the captured works, he had also made extra conglomeration of works out of certain snow drifts and builded works with snow and earth making sal sdlat positions and Manleys army was s seriously handicapped. The best way he thought to made general Hanson with draw from the seige was to strike at general Wans but he dared not for Evans alone was the real danger and thus the reason why so many christian generals were surprised to hear that Evans had not yet had a general battle with the enemy. Manley had two plans in hand and that was to either attack Evans, or threaten Eva Crania and so he decided to follow out the latter and did so.Shoemannias army alone had been seperated from his and so was moving northward and he ordered him at once to seize upon the town of Evanb Evangelinia Crania. Shoemannia at once moved forward and was confronted by a large christian force under general yivianda at a town called Calverine on a portion of the Mc-Hollester Run.The battle raged three days known as the battle of Cal verine or third battle of Mc-Hollester Run and which had caused the great est toll of lives yet as far as he could be ascer tained. The frightful battle had raged a little over three days closing way past nig midnight and only probably the most terrific efforts of the enemy put anoend to the terrific resistance of yivianias army and swept it aside, and only the ability of the commanders saved the christian army from too reckless a persuit of the enemy though of course the Glandelinians were really victorous. General Gannons army simultaneously along another portion of the drama of war in the west fought a battle at Lena suffering a loss of- I395,223 in killed and wounded.Baldwin clashed also with Shoemannia at Elsie and suf fered a loss of 3,000,999 in killed and wounded, while general Jennih Jennings clashing some time later with Shoemannia at Meldon Aronburg reported his losses as I,I65,283.After this Shoemannia was-reinforced and within a week was confronted by general Roswell Rusters Johnstons force near Marcoclcellio a point of Eva Crancia and driven back after a desperate battle and both si des suffered the loss of I,500,000.

Johnston having been wounded in the fray gens general Senguine was placed in his stead and drove at the enemy at Little Evangeline suffering a loss of I885,998, in killed and wounded and was also himself wounded, and his place taken by general Seingunary who struck the enemy a blow at Angeline Beldon and then report ed his losses as I28,000, while Germaines divisions which aided him reported a loss of I,I25,000, and Vivian Jimmieson, I32I,283. Hindermine was at that time advancing southward to aid these Angelinian generals in their great conflicts and got into a clash with general Shoemanni a at Jennie Turner and won but at the cost of 3,990,600 in killed and wounded and 2,I56,777 others when he resumed the conflict the rest of the day. Shoemannia reciev ing -reinforcements rallied and struck a blow against a christian army at Josephine in which both sides lost I,I99,983. In battles at Bondinia, Andencia, Cal Callie, Grandburg, Andrean Road, Angeline Crossing, Vivi an Hi llx Hills, Sunbeam Creek or Fandkerton and at Aurandecallie Run the christian losses ranged from 322,942, and 292,998 with others as 6I 7,940 while Gladerlinias army lost in the battle near yivian Wickey II,599,923 in killed and wounded and prisoners the total christian losses in these series of battles in killd and wounsed could not be correctly ascertained but with the number of the losses of the different commanders was believed to be about the same as known as at Lucille Jorden or 3I,704,035 in killed and wounded and prisoners though it took the Angelinian commanders almost two weeks to fo figure it all out. Over I9,058,689 were down in killed and wounded.The Glandelinian losses in killed and wounded in these series of battles were about 20,000,000 in killed and wounded and their full loss in killed wounded and prisoners and totally disabled were about 46,000,000. These series of battles with Shoemannia and the christian commanders occured beginning from October t and ending in December.Long after these series of batt les the Glandelinian series of armies had pe persued their way onward desp ite their victories or defeats and it seemed as if nothing could be done to stop general Shoemannias advance on Evangelinia Crania and the only barrier in the way was the large town of Osmondonson which if a christian army got there in time could do n something to drive back the foe or check him if possiblet The great christian general Meldonia Shoemannia Bicknell fortunately had not been in the recentlt frightful September battle storm along the Mc-Hollester Run, and he was able to recieve a force of Abyssinkilians, Abbisannians, and Abyssiniannians under general Tantemegrgo to make a great junction with general Francis Hansonia and so Bicknell assuaing psonal command decided to form his forces at Osmondonson a town south of Evangelinia Crania EEvangelinia crania being some of the fortifications of Mc-Whirt her guarding Vivian Wickey and here general Bick e Bicknell decided to check general Shoemannias headlong advance at all costs for he he failed then the seige of Jennie Turmer and Evan Crania both going on simultaneously with that of Vivian Wickey would be worse than a defeat, for there would be a terrible disaster. Shoemannia determined to reinforce Manley and this Bicknell was bound to prevent. Osmondonson and Jennie Turmer are only about thirty miles from each other on an even line and both places are so close to Vivian Wickey that the sei ges made a serious menance for the enemy and this was fully reali zed.General Huebaum Manley was advancing to reinforce general Shoemannia so that he could push his wa way forward despi te all opposition and he had to Bicknells dread recieved heavier reinfor cements from Adele-De-Garbe and by general Webb.Bicknell though Shoemannias reinforcements made the whole of the Glandelinian army almost one quarter to his two was not discouraged as long as Shoemann ia was not superior in strength though he sent an appeal to Angelinia Agathia for reinforcements.Shoemannia was astonished when he saw that general Hansonia Vivians forces were also threatening to make a stand against him at Osmondonson and though he realized he was now over-whelmed by his christian enemies he vewed he would win this battle/ and help break the seige of Jennie Turmer and Evan gelinia Crania and wrote this note to his King;

"His Excellency general John Manley had won a grea great victory at the battle of Mc-Hollester Run, and now I am confronted by a new force at Osmondonson but I swear to win and break the seige of Jennie Turmer and Eva Crani a and if I lose you are at liberty to take away my command.Bicknell has more men than I or Huebaum Manley and even more cannon but just the same I'm confident of vict ory against even superior numbers.I can show John Manley that though he beant beat the Vivians I can also beat Bicknell at Osmondonson.

General Shoemannia.Commander of Ninty Fifth brigades of Glandelinian army.

General Shoemannia seeing greater numbes confronting him however decided to remain on the defensive as Bicknell had stronger works and he knew that to attack the christians first would be complete folly.

The wall of fire was almost blood red in hue and seemed to lean to the

THE BATTLE OF OSMONDONSON .
SHOEMANNIA WINS A SWEEPING VICTORY ON THE FIRST DAY, COMPLETELY CARRYING ALL BEFORE HIM.
BUT UNFORTUNATELY THE CHRISTIANS RET REAT TO AN UNASSAILABLE POSITION, AND SHOEMANNIAS ATTACKS ON THE SECOND DAY OF THE BATTLE MEETS ANNIHILATION.
THE FRIGHTFUL DISASTER.

General Bicknall had appealed twice for reinforcements to the Angelinian governmat itself as Angainia Agathia (Calverinia could not spare any troops as they needed the armies thereto hold the place against attack also and already more great Glandelinian armies were dvan cing into Calverinia from Aronburg and Federal and Evangeline curran and the Angelinian governments also could not spare troops as they had to send big extra forces to hold the enemy armies at bay.

However in a few days general Vivianias scattered remnants of his army had rallied and these had reinforced Bicknell though all the while general Vivianias did wish he had the two Vivians with him and always wondered how they expected to capture the strong hold of Jennie urner. Though news came on December 2Ith that a dreadful struggle was raging along his left wing on the Jennie Banderline railroad crossings, Bicknell was not much confirmed and as it seemed thewind was blowing too fresh for the enemy to attempt any assault just now and as during the progress of the day the wind had attaind the force of a hurricane and a snowstorm of considerably severity was also raging he did not think the reports true untill late in the afternoon a tearing assault of the most greatest violence was thrown against his whole center.Beforethis however

Bi cknell reckoning that the roads were still very good was unconcerned and least apprehensive of danger untill when the assault came and drove his whole center back in the wildest confusion even before the other armies of Abyssinkilians could arive to lend him aid. The situation was dreadful and even his officers could distinctly hear heavy firing of great intensity elsewhere which became very fierce and strong and continued to grow fierce and fiercer untill general Bicknell began to see exsite ment in the faces of the men rushing forward to restore the broken line at the center and he decided to make investigation and see where the new struggle was. He had sent out men to investi gate just at the moment that Gertrude Angeline was brought into the lines by several guardians and she declared that general Vivianias right wing had already been badly reduced by general Calvsines fierce Glandelinian attack and she also stated that general Bi cknell should do something before the same storm of assaults would come upon his center without warning.But she had arived too late and already Bicknell was doing all that he possibly could to drive g ba back the foe along the center but completely in vain.

Most of his officers disagreed of counter charging the enemy because they dreaded the superior forces of the enemy who was atta w attacking, and the violence of their onslaughts but just the same despite their advises and warnings gensal Bicknell decided to make a swee ping counter attack and to send forces to general Vivianias rescue. It took a long time for general Bicknelo to get the strong concentration started at every point but at this moment a furious hurricane of firing along the enemys lines upset all his plans and the wh- wholeconcentration was repulsed with the greatest slaughter, general Vivianis and Hansonia were wounded, and the battle at its worse raged with an uprom uproar as to make the world seem to come to an end and though completely victorious in the first day of the battle and driving all before him as the tornado does in sweeping the corn field Shoemannia suffered the annihilation of his ninth corps.

That evening general Bicknell withdrew a considerable distance back and took up new positions close to the Ava Maria heights and on the next morning the Glandelinians resumed the battle by making a still more determined attack which had carried all before it with the deaths of genem general Maxwell and urmer on the christian side and with frightful o loss to the christian and enemy side and general Bi cknell in supretending a portion of the battle line was severely wounded but had to retain command to prevent a disaster.

I032.

There was now a lull. Seeing that the break in his line was dangerous general Bicknell decided to retakethe lost position and so general Bicknell sent ten division under general Sniedor Johnstons all Calverinians only to counts attack the assailants and as the Calverinian columns advanced the Glandelinians began firing as fast as they knew how and soon the roar of musketry became terrific? Gertrude rode up at this moment and riding up to general Failen said;

''I doubt if the-advancing Calverinians can retake those positions.See how those Glandelinians are firing and our soldiers a are dropping like leaves from trees in a gale.''

''Maybe it can be done but it is risky work.''Said the general who was ordering up his batteries to support the assault.''The men are already dropping in thousands at every volley. Yet they seem very undaun td undaunted.

Bicknell indeed feared that these divisions now being under a murderous fire of cannon and musketry would soon be repulsed or annihilated in the bargian and sent other divisions to aid them. General Camillian with seven moredivisions consisting of two extra brigades were sent. These columns advanced in two long lines ten deep across a wide plain where large columns of Phelans brigades and battalions were posted. Phelan had less men than Camillian but yet the christian commander commanded Abyssinkilians which also came to his aid and Phelan and Camillian went forward at a run to smash the enemy if possible. Then came the Abyssin kilians under the ''Terrible Aronburg'' and the red and purple coated columns swarming out pressed on yelling like demons but soon whole swarms fell before the enemys deadly musketry Aronburg commanded the first division and was in the lead his gallent manner filling his troops with enthusiasm and waving their flags came on o in grand array. Avenues were ploughed in the christian lines ad soon shells and shrapnell and then canister added to the carnage tearing up thechristian line like a thrashing machine prostrates the wheat. Camillian and phelan could already see that gensal Herdrudes lines torn in pieces and badly mangled were already retiring though their very surviving lines seemed ablaze. He rode up to his generals and then said to oneof them whose name was Charles Brown

''The Glandelinians are hard pressing the divisions under Herdrude though he has advanced readily for two hours.Take about I,I55,000 men and go to his rescue.I will attend to the torn up divisions under Phelan.''

General Charles Brown immediately galloped off to his own command and ordered t his brigades forward.

''To Herdrudes rescue.''He ordered.''Check the advance of the enemy if you can.''

Herdrudes lines were retiring in confusion when Browns men reached them, but at the arival of reinforcements they speedily rallied and opened a withering fire upon the advancing enemy.

''Forward''Shouted Brown to his men.''We must check them at all hazards now. Forward charge them.''

Browns men immediately rushed forward under a storming fire and attacked the enemy with great fury but met a most terrific fire of artillery and mahine guns and then added by musketry which tore his first line to fragments. The survivors hesitated and then recoiled but on pressed the second line and came upon the position with a roar of yells and curses and feare fearful was the struggle and as more and more pressed on and closed with the enemy the struggle became fearful. At ten o-clock the battle at every point whatever was in full sway and the uproar of firing w was awful. Herdrude at last repulsed his assailants and cut their massi ve line to shreds and Charles Brown was in possession of a long stone wall to which he had been driven at the same time by the victorious enemy along his own front and which the exultant enemy was striving with all their demon like fury to regain. On both sides of the stone wal wall the ded ad wounded lay in high piles or windrows and blood wa visibleon the stone masonary. The struggle was continuous along this stone wall and every mi nute a thousand had-fallen. Bicknells aids brought divisions aft er divisions against the Glandelinians whose whole line was wreathed in smoke. Many christian divisions was not yet in action and yet the enemy did no not give way but retained the positions they had gaind the day before and the others thy had captured and kept up their murderous firing without pausing. The stone wal was soon cap captured afte a number of desperate charges but again general Brown recarried it and now the uproar of the firing redoubled and increased for an intense hour as more troops came up on both sides.

The wall of fire was almost blood red in hue and seemed to reach to the heights of many hundreds of feet

General Herdrudes army still held its fire along their own line of works the firing here soon being more terrible than along Browns linew lines a and tens of thousands of the Glandelinians fell.... General Brown realised that this brave general was having it all in his own hands and soon sat some fresh divisions to his aid who soon thinned the enemys lines terribly and agai aga n fairly tore the Glandelinian columns to fragments as fast as they appeard appeared through the smoke. Gallopin g over to general Herdrude,,,,,, he asked;;

''Well how goe's the battle?''

''Pretty fair.''Answered Herdrude.''But it is quite dangerous.I have sent two monsterous brigades to counts charge the enemy and they came back only in small fragments after their full numbers had mounted up to hundreds of thousands.''

''It is terrible.''Said general Brown.''I wonder if it would be better to thrown t the whole line forward under cover of a strong artillery fire. If you will agree I'll give the order.''

''Yes''Said Herdrude.'I'm wishing to storm their batteries which are now desciminating my lines so terribly.''

General Brown sent the word along the line to fix bayonets and when Herdrude screamed; ''FORWARD'' The whole line rushed tward the enemy like some monsterous surge. Suddenly there was a blaze of musketry that wiped out the whole front line of Angelinians, and then almost immediatelyafterwards hundreds of shells per second burst among the surviving portion of the mighty surge of men in red and purple tearing it to pieces and though men went down in mt myriads on pres sed the survivors.The number of enemy guns increased, their fire grew hotter and redoubled with a horrible roar f of explosions, the shrapnell exploding in the air raining a storm of fragments and bullets, and bolts, desciminating whole divis ions of the christians. General Herdrude was horrified at this havoc which increased when they came within full range but general Brown feared that now it would be worse to retreat, and so he was bound to have the artillery captured at all costs.....

The christian artilllery soon arived and when placed into positio Herdu Herdrude cried;

''Open fi re when you get near enough for ty e right range.''

The Angelinian infantry now got within range f of the enemys infantry and the purple coats began to drop in such frightful numbers that it seemed as if they were only lying down but the survivors only press d on gallant gallantly and now as whole columns went down and an whole brigades and divisions went to pieces Brown himself became horrified.

''Return the fire with all your firearms and go into them hard.''Shouted all the christian officers leading the charge.''Give them a perfect storm. Give them hell.....''

The surviving Angelinians now gotwithin a easy musket range and made a tumult of bayonets as they reached the enemys lines which seemed to have broken out into an inferno of furnaces and so thick was the smoke, and so fie fierce was the counter charge of the Glandelinians that the poor poor Angelinians had no chance chance to fire and they themselves had to take to their bayonets ad pikes. Whole lines in purple seemed to go down and amid the bloody chaoes of bayonets but finally the gray columns wavered and recoiled, the Angelinians as they pressed on again fairly o paving the ground with dead and wounded in gray as they persued. Shoemannia not in action as yet saw the di saster and sent large forces to check Browns divisions. Herdrude saw the approaching overwhelming numbers and said to general Brown

'I don't believe we can hold out against them.Will you please send for general Ca Camm llian and Failen to come to our rescue?''

Brown at once depatched a messenger with this note;;;;

''''Herdrude is overwhelmed. Will you please send large forces to hi s rescue and mine at Liebermanns plain.Firing fearful, slaughter terrific. Pleas e hurry.

General Brown.''

In the mea meantime as luck would have it Failen wa advancing with four lg large divisions tward this same locat ion, and seeing that general Brown had won an advantage was resolved that he should keep it and threw all his forc es against the advancing enemy reinforcements thus increasing the tremendous carnage torribly.

I034. 786

T he line of rei nforcement s aft er firing for several minutes in a manner loud enough to open the bowles of the earth, gradually wavered, ad anf and began to fall back, t he ngelinianspressing t hem hard. Shoemannd Shoemannia had now led forward I,500,000 out of his seven million of the main line of defense back to a new point of position and also those under huvania, and the retiring divisions which were rallied came on again with greater violence and the sudden rallying of these landelinians filled generà general Brown with amazement and he begged Bicknell for reinforcements, for the other two commanders were too slow in coming up. Shuvania with his five hundred thousand men moved on to take the place of the shattered di visions in gray, ad and Brown seeing the grand advance of these landelinians decided it best to fall back on ogamninias plains as all hopes to retake the lost positions sem seemed in vain. He sounded the word and the whole line slowly withdrew, but nevertheles nevertheless kept up a roaring withering fire thà mowed down monsterous masses of the advancing landelinians at every step.:.....:::)('

Generà Herdrudes lines were also retiring tward radi ot creek and from a high rise of ground he could see the brilliant advance of general Ahoeman Shoemannias divisions who were swarming across oe Elezebet h s plains under a heavy pounding cannon fire of I0,000 guns five million five hundred of them sweeping tward Browns columns under cover of their own murdsous fire of cannon.

''Those landelinians ne are certainly advancing in grand and furious array.''He told himself.''General brown does not want to encounter such heavy numbers without rei nforcements and is retiring across Hoganninias plains much against general Camillias will.''

General Brown had in the meantime sent this following message;

''I'm outnumbered ten to one, and must have heavy reinforcements or the battle is lost.I am retreati ng for I cannot repell such heavy numbers, without reinforcements, ad na and must have them.''

Please hurry.

Gensal harles

brown.''

In the meantime gensa general Cammillian saw this nicident, incident , and decided to advance his forces to general browns rescue and though his staff protested on account of the strength of the enemy, he ordered the onward rush for Hoganninias plains.

''We must check their advance.''Was amillians words.''If we hold back they will overrun our lines and make the landelinians think we are afraid to fight.I intend to ch eck them despi te the odds.'

He then wrote this note to general bi cknoll;

''On account of the counter advance of gensa general Shoeman ia it will be wise for you to advance one tenth of your inactive lines or reserves or all is lost . Brown and Herdrude are falling back before overwhelming numbers and so o are other christian generals. They cannot repdure the position and neither can they now hold their ground and their losses are already intolerable.I'm going to their rescue and probably my death, as the carnage wi ll be herculean.''

General Camillian.''

Tha Then general Cammi llian advanced with I,400,000 men tward Shoemannias advancing lines or advancing left wing, his movement being covered by a m st frightful cannonade which tore brigades of the advanc ing enemy to fragments. Fearful musket volleys added to the carnage and general Browns men began to rally. Cammillians men assailed the enemy with great vehemence and bent their main line backwards by the vehemence of the impact ,, but never theless the landelinians held their ground stubbornly every man fighting with devilish fury.

The wall of fire was almost blood red in hue and seemed to leap to the heights of mountainheads of fame

I035. 787

The struggle now resumed was more fearful than the battle before, and in a few minutes mot more a part of general Browns line again broke into action with redoubled fury, the action soon spreading all along the line th e christians delivering a most destructive withering fire. Division after division of the Angelinians swarmed forward but they came back in only regiments their men having been mowed down like windrows of grass .

G Herdu Her drudes men took defense on that rise of ground and recievig recievi ng reinforcements also did not give way, and soon the rise of ground became like a regular hill of gray and purple coats swarming again st each other. Herdrudes line after another struggle of two hours were soon fight ing behind a regular wall of dead and wouneded graycoats and hundreds of Angelinian wounded were borne away every mi nute, the sides of the rising ground being strewn with dead and wounded soldiers in gray.

Hurdrudes whole line furiously repelled the advance of the enemy under general Shuvannia himself and the firing became more fearful and most persistent.General Herdrude was determined to hold this rise of ground at all cost. He did all he could to keep up the courage of the men, kept the regimen tal flags waving, and always exposed the flags with the Sacred Emblems on them.

''These christ ian dogs are a holy terror.''He heard one Ab landelinian officer say.''They are making out of themselves a yellow jackets n est.''

The landelinians were yelli ng o like demong now but more and more reinforcements for Herdrude arived, and the landelinians soon met a ve veritible tempest of bullets and canister which were mowing down many sections. Still they stormed Herdrudes lines with greater fury, and though whole divisions were driven back crushed and mangled and torn to fragments, only other columns swept forward to revenge it, and soon the battle r raged with st ill greater fury.Browns divisions also held and poured a perfect storm of shot shell and canister upon the enemy, adding perfecttorrents of grape and other missles but the survivors rushed on like an enraged mob of demons and bended general Browns lines back considerably. The batt le was also fierce along general Cammillians lines which kept up a ravaging fire mowing down the enemys columns as fast as they came on, but the survivors increased the fury of the assault and soon threatened to press general Cammillians right grand divisions out of their new position.Here the firing was almost aa annihilating. Shoemannia was bound to carry all before him even if it cost him his own liv life and so hurried forward larger forces and mi nà minute by minute now the battle increased with greater fury. The fire poured into the enemys lines was something terrible.Hundreds of gaps gaps-appeared as fast as the y were closed and scores of thousands of th the landelinians became confused as now their da xedead and wounded lay in monstercus windrows.General Cammillian saw the starting confusion among the waves of gr aycoats and gave the word to his generals by wire signals all along the line;

''Fix bayonet s.''

The men hastily obeyed then as Cammillian shouted''Charge'' the Angelinias Angelinians crashed down upon Shoemanni as shatt ered surviving colùmns columns but were met by cannons of all kinds stretched in a long line whose deadly fire carried all before it, and swept and t orn to pieces the Angelinian columns with their numbers being wiped out by scores of thousands broke into a panic and recoiled in amazing con fusion. In the meantime general Brown saw a large force creepi ng around Herdrudes flank and seeing his army in confusion, and also that general Shoemanni a was rallying large portions of his shattered divisions and that greater columns were appearing to reinforce him he decided upon action mighty quick.

''This must not be.''He sai d to himself.''If in such danger why don't general Herdrude notify me?''

Just at that moment when general Cammillian was moving forward the firs first two messengors reached bi cknell who was also fiercely engaged at all points of his lines.

''I'll send reinforcements but not for Herdrude for it is too late.''He said hastily.''Go and tell general Hossbie to train his cannon on Hurdrudes fla flankers.Hurry before it is too late.''

T he soldier obeyed and in the space of fifteen minutes a mo merciless cannin cannon fire was cutting nearly all the force of flankers down like grass. The divisions before Herdrudes rear recoiled and fresh troops of Angelinians pressed down upon them with the fury of titans carrying all before them for a cert ain t ime though at a frightful loss.

I036.

The other columns also charged the enemy who which was st ill advancing increasing the fearful struggle t o redoubled fury again, the sa sanguinary struggle now being general and raging at all portions of Bicknells main line itself. For some strange cause the firing soon began t o cease the whole gray line advancing as most of the Angelinian forces began to give way in confusion and ha had not this blunder been made th e Angelinians would have been able by more cont inued resistance and by a deliv deliberate counter charge drovethe enemy- from the field that very day. However during thus time the advancing Glandelinians who had now halted reciev ed reinforcements and so did Cammillia who withdrew his shattered lines to better ground and placed a new line with the reinforcements a , advancing his right wing on Paminsans wheafields where he placed a strong chain of cannon. However during the remainder of the struggle the christian armies had been in great confusion and had been driven like stampeding cattle before the enemy. General Bicknell saw nothing else to do but run his armies up the Ava Mari a heights and this he did the infantry going up as fast as men could climb while all the heavi er guns covered their retreat . Four hours of this retreat followed and general Shoemanni a knowing the condition of the hills and seeing that his armi es were disorganized restrained persui t and decided to resume the battle on the morrow.

While the christian forces were retiring up to the summit of the ridges one of the christian generals said to general Brown as he rode up to him;

''T he enemy ha being in possession of all our positions now are well sre sr strengthened now and it would be useless to ra,lly the troops and continue the attack on them any further.''

''If we can rally and reform the troops by mid night why not to morrow continue the advance and attack Shoemannia ri ght wing!''

''But that wing is too strongly supplied with a chain of batteries also.''Said general Brown.''We have a better position than before being intrenched on high ground and their lines are intrenched in wheatfields and plains.Of course we are under orders to cont inue the advance but now we cannot even rally our troops and even look will you. BICKNELLS whole line is streaming to the heights to take up a new stand.If the enemy resumes the battle and if we are to win so as to succeed in stopping Shoemanni as move to reinforce general Manley at Jennie Turner we have got to do something. Even their left striki ng against general Bicknells retreating columns a is more strongly int rench ed than the center or right . The right wing is the only one I depen ded upon for success and we were beaten again as you see and driven up here in a panic.''

''I believe it is best to be on the defensive.''Said one of the other generals.''Maybe by that we can repulse every onset and descriminate the enemy so terribly that later in the day they will not be able to resist their our counter assalt assaults.''

However general Brown saw and feared that nothing could be gained by remaining on the defensive and as there was now strange actions among the enemy while the reformed christian columns were rallying and helping with the placing of the ariving batteries which had not been captured fort un ately, and whose actions made all the officers suspicious he determined to go forward again in the morning and have it over with. General Herdrude watched the movement of the enemy through his glasses and declared that a great part of general Muebaum Manleys army was ariving to Shoemannias support .

''I wonder why they don't attack?''He wondered to himself.

It took nearly till midnight to get the whole christian line st raighten ed out and soon tward day break general Shoemannia seeing the situation realized that he had not won the battle after all. He had driven the christian army into an impregnable stronghold. Nevertheless he decided upon a forlorn hope. An hour passed after da day break and though his officers were opposed to attacking such a impregnable position on those steep heights whose rear were too precipice to attack the christians in flank Shoemanni a decided to make the assault and so at eight thirty the attack came but at a very unexpected quarter at that . For the first part of this drama of horror neither Brown or the other commanders were assaulted. It was Bicknells center which recieved the dreadful shock. The struggle was fearful and the Angelinians met the Glandelinians with titanic fury causing the enemy frightful loss es before they succeed d in getting up half way on the si des of the heights. The sanguinary confli ct within one hour extended along the whole christian line who were intrenched behind natural breastworks boarded by an impenetrable maze of tall cedar trees.

The wall of fire was almost blood red in hue and seemed to rise to the height of many hundreds of feet

I037.

The enemy ca e on in a perfect wave and charged against the breastworks in most frightful numbers and now the struggle raged here with unabated ferocity for fours hours a succession of assaults being made and almost anni hilated by the dreadful christian fire, then general Herdrude noticed from his point of observation during a rally on the part of reinforced Glandelinian troops that a portion of the main christian center under general Bi cknell was being cut up and in danger of being pres sed back wards from their works, but that at other points of the line of battle the enemys assalting wave was now in some great confusion. There was only one th ing to do to save the center under Bi cknell from being worsted and that was to mass his batteries upon t he enemy swarming forward now a across the plains and wheatfields.Then a he was prepaing the batteries and to advance Cammillian to re e repell the second section of the wave of horror moving upon Brown and Hansonia Fa Francia vivian other christian batteries opened fire suddenly ewith frightful violence then Herdrudes and Cammillias and Cammillians, and also Browns artillery broke into a chorus of thunders and the wheatfields and plains were soon curtained in so mo much smoke that the results could not be seen. The din was stunning and seeing that his own troops were going down in thousands per second Shoemannia galloped over to his lines and ordered them t o move forward s, slowly and to take advantage of the trees and other objects of proctection on the sides of the heights.

The Glandelinians advanced in seried columns up the ridges soom making a wi wedge like formation and then broke into a monsterous swarm and again the christian line let looce ascathing fire that even scarred many t rees with bullets and s hell and s everything seemedto go int o wreckage from the terrible rainof canister that was added. T he Glandelinins though their columns were shot to pieces were still advancing with indescri able fury upon the Angelinians who were holding their own while Herdrudes soon rei nforced Bi cknells center and by the most incessant and vigorous firing of all soon held the Glandelinians in check untill the smaller guns could be placed to train upon their massive ranks. Reinforced still more the Glandelinians soon resumed their attack and again the christians reopened their awful firing with such intensity that their line became obscured in smoke and the Glandelinian columns melted away by scores.It was a frightful scene for Herdrude as the carnage along his lines was becoming terrible.

The struggle was becoming fiercer and fiercer all assal the central divisions bega to press forward and general hasmeres brown soon brought up the remainder of the christian cannon which made a deafening uproar as they opened fire. Five million muskes were already in action on the christian sidealone whosedisolved whole mulitudes of the Glandelinia s Glandelinians every fifteen minutes. The enemy then started to recoil the gaps only appearing in their lines as fast as they were closed. They ha made all the desperate attempts known to capture this the ris t ri se of ground but for the first assault had been driven bak back with the loss of 8,420,000 men.Terrlhe loss i ndeed.

I t was over for about half an hour but at nine o-clock just as general Bicknells center was being still more strengthened and the firing along Cammillians lines had also slackened IO,500,000 Mc-Hollestinians and Zimmermannians under general Robert Kep Kemp.. Damask fiercely stormed general Browns christian line on Lucille Hogans Hi ll near Calton pen where they had managed to bese besiege him but could not make a foot of progress as they encountered an annihilating fire. A terrible disaster occured for for division after division wassent to his aid and the Glandelinians being i nfiladed by musketry and caught between two murderous cannon fires were compelled to fall back leaving countless dead and wounded behind them. The losses of these Glandelinians was awful.A scene of more awful slaughter was at Roseannia Hill defended by 9,999,000 Angelinians under general Rodulph Heller.He was an obstinate general ad his lines fairly stormd with fire as the graycoats came rushing up like frenzied mulitudes.General Logan led I,7000,000 up the shell and canister swept sides and thousands were fairly mowed down per mi nute minute and as the survivors cont inued on up the slopes grape and canister added to the destruction and the din of the firing was appalo ling. Every wave of the Glandelinians wa mangled and cut to pieces and suffered such frightful losses that the foremost of the survivors fell back in con fusion but the rest of the main column getting nearer and nearer kept up the fury of the struggle without intermission. For two hours division after division reached hald w half way up to the summit of the hill in the face of the murderous cannon fire and musketry but they were almost annihilated and as the survivors recoiled the Angelinians made a desperate counter charge carrying al before them ad and again mowing columns of the Glandelinians down.

But Logan was not daunted. Fifteen minutes he again swept to the charge though furrows were plowghed in his main line. Logans losses were certainly stuoen stupendous but his survivors pressed on up the hill as fast as they could facing an indescrib indescra indescribable xdeath dealing storm of volleys of muskeytry musketry, of round shot, shells, canister, and shrapnell that mangled divisions again and tore whole brigades literally away from their main line.For four hours the fury of the struggle increased with redoubled fury. The Ah Angelinians under Heller kept up an annihilating fire without intermission and officers among the enemy of all rank went down by the score. The sides of the hills became fairly obscured in the bodies of the dead and wounded Glandelinians and thousands of trees on that side of the hills resembled hickory brooms. The Ange linians were lying down or standing behind boulders and from this defense they kept up a fearful fire thinning the lines of graycoats more terribly. Nevertheless the Glandelinians kept up the desperate attack with unabated fury but in due time more reinforcements of the Angelininns came to the support of Rudp Rudolph Heller and used their own muskets and artillery with the most frightful effect cutting down many masses of the assailants. General Logan was mortally wounded and as more and more christian divisions arived the firing along the christian line became so fierce that even the dead and wounded were dreadfully cut up by the tempest of minnie balls and torrents of canister and shells which repeatedly brought down whole sections of the enemy. A portion of Hellers men were defending themselves behind a long wooden embarkment two or three feet high and these boards were so badly riddled and hacked that thy they also looked like hickory brooms.Some of the boards you could asily see through. A ll of the Angelinian cannon were now roaring incessantly and also again the gray lines were wavering as the frightful aspects of the scores of thousands who were riddled by the christian fire or cut to piecos by shell fragments unerved them. Considerable numbers of da dead closest to the christian lines had their very bodies mangled and the smoke was so frightfully dense from the incessant firing that it was like the smoke and smoke clouds of a forest fire. The Angelinians did not follow the ne enemy this time but remained where they wereeYet the attack was not over. Shoemannia reinforced the retiring columns in person and the Angelinians had only time enough to clear away some of the wounded when the enemy again advanced to the attack.

General Tech ney now arived to Hellers assistance with seventy five thousand cannon and ten million men but it was seen that this time especial especially against Heller the enemy was advancing in overwhelming numbers. There t were also thousands of machine guns mingled with the other artillery and these now opened fire upon the advancing enemy with double charges of shells while the infantry lines again again started up a most terrific fussilade of millions of rifles. All the other cannoneers now served at their guns raking the gray lines through and through. Yet on came the survivors of the assailants rushing up like wild beasts but the artillery fire which kept up again without intermission brought them down in whole swarms and even as fast as the very christian cannoneers were shot down others were there to take their places and again the carnage became horrible and increased in a frightful manner.Hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians rushed or climbed up the hill while the summit of the long hill was now like a volcano in eruption. The frontal divisions of the Glandelinians made attack after attack but each assault was repelled and driven back with the loss of many columns in dead and wounded. These re-peated repulses and losses enraged Shoemannia, but he was not yet disheartened and as his main columns redoubled their energy he felt sure of victory as on the other two days. For as fast as the columns of Glandelinians disolved in the face of this insedious fire and thousands more had been massacred, the Glandelinian survivors continued the assa ass ault untill the Angelinians driven to desperation made another counter charge shattering the Glandelinian wave and driving the survivors back with frightful loss. Yet Shoemannia rallied them and yelling like a million demons the Glandelinians crashed down upon the Angelinians causing a terrible mass acre. The christians were demorilized and the Angelinia Angelinian leaders did all all their best to reform the Angelinian columns who were falling in hundreds, and who were badly mixed up and like pale stricken mobs. Thy however retired in confusio n up the hill the enemy pressing after them but the cannoneers p poured deafening volleys again and again, of shells, adding them with broadside after broadside of grape and canister upon the shrieking human fiends driving them back again with the loss of three quarter of their number.

The wall of fire was almost blood red in hue and seemed to rise to the height of many hundreds of feet

I039.

Thi s gave the other christian forces time to rally while the fresh divisions soon again moved up the sides of the hu hill the enemy again making a storming attack. Again the whole gray wave still stronger was rushing up the hill and now the battle was three times as fierce as before and as more Angelinians were put into the action the fury of the battle increased every fifteen minutes with unceasing fury. All of Shoemannias columns that now advanced to the attack were now engaged in general conflict but the confused Angelinians were now rallied by this time and again they poured in a terrible fire and the slaughter now became really terrific..Yet a portion of the christian line seemingly despite their trust in God were yeilding inch by inch the si des of the hill were again heaped with the d dead and wounded graycoats, and the summit wondrow windrowed in purple coats, and the dead and wounded Angelinians were lying thicker than the enemys fallen now. General Heller was killed and all his staff were dead or wounded, or without horses. His chieff engineer officer sont for he, help stating:

"That unless help comes the he hill will be carried."

General Wailen Bell within an half an hour had twenty six horses shot from under him amid the dreadful carnage and one half of his staff were all killed and the rest injured many seriously. The veritible storm of firing on both sides was awful indeed.Indeed Indeed it seemed as if "hell" could not be as bad in its sulphurious smoke and from the din of yelling and firing. Neither were the shrieks in hell as bad as the shrieks of the Glandelinian Devil Yell.The whole of Picknells christian line, the whole entire christian line on the whole stretch of Ava Maria Heights seemed roaring like a billion cannon, seeming to flash storming sheets of fire and smoke, and no another Calverine seemed to have broken out. It was a massacre of Glandelinian troops pure and simple, and it was not a battle but an assassination of troops, and the Glandelinian generals were indeed the biggest fools to continue to face their sadly shattered forces against such a furious destructive fire. Hundreds of columns disolved, the main line IO,000,000 was torn t o fragments, the whole sky and vally was shrouded in smoke of bursting bombshells and shrapnell, officers of all rank dropped like corn, the hill sides was fairly dominated by the three hundred thousand cannon and the whole Glandelinian wave was facing complete annihilation.

God himself seemed to be venting his rage and revenge on the child butchers.The very heavens seemed on fire amid the billions of cannonading thunders of battle, and even scores of fresh divisions all along the line as they tried to rush on were literally torn to bits and shattered and one big force of Zimmermannians reaching half way to the summit melted away completely. As the survivors still pressed on furiously the canister, bullets, shrapnell was added by high explosives and volleys of grenades which tore down the main columns of Glandelinians like the adv avalanches of hell and damanation. Hundreds of thousands reachec the summi t and went down all at once and thousands of officers of all ranks among them. The battle was now a screaming thundering hell. This was indeed indeed too much for the Glandelinians 9,600,000 having fallen and the whole wave again being fairly torn to pieces as it tried to reform to resume the attack began to waver, and as Shoemannia frantically tried to w rally them he fell severely wounded in the midst of a withering fire twenty miles long and through a sea of smoke the Glandelinians fled like a swiftly moving torrent streaming back across the shell swept plains in the wildest confusion, the christian cannons still volleying and thundering ad and the whole battle field was a veritible reign og terror. Indeed on account of Shoemannias fall his men was not able to stand the bath of destruction any longer. Even Shoemannia from an ambulance saw that he had made a serious attack and blunder in attacking those damanating heights so terribly fortified.He realized once again that he had driven the christians into a position that all the devils in hell could not carry. On the third day of the battlehe had lost over I3,000,000 men three million of whom were slain, having lost over nine million in that one assault and in this attack over I75,000 had falla fallen at one small point in a very few minutes and still as they were retreating they were being desciminated in whole divisions. Already since the beginning of the battle Shoemannia had lost over 20,789,999 men in killed and wounded to that of the Angelinians ',999,000 8,999,000. Manley however did all in his power to restore order tward two oclock and now there being a lull he finally reformed his men and then went out himself with a party of genmals to recoinitor the ridges and believed by repeated assaults they could be carried.

I040.

He sent forward general Lucille Turner C onvention with a very strong force of Zimmermannians. Convention was filled with despra desperation. He decided to hav e the whole body assail at one time, and so he therefore urged on the wholef force who with a yell of fury swept upward but met a frightful avalanch of canister and a curtain of artillery fire which again tore their massive lines to fragments. On went the survivors in mighty mulitudes, when again a wa wavering undulat ing sheet of flame swept the hills like a long fissure eruption, there was again the titanic roar roar and crash as before that fairly shook the hill and two whole gray lines seven miles long and three deep withered before that annihilating fire. The survivors broke into an indescribable panic, but the rest of the survivors were determined to captured the heights even at the risk of annihilation and soon they continued on again, but again came that fearful flash of musketry and cannon which settled down into a steady thunderous roar. That awful fire mowed down divisions, the slaughter being more terrible than before. Even the whole gray wave withered, the o others behind recoiling in panic before this terrific fire.But the main line pressed on again stu still undaunted, again sweeping on up the hill but the christians only resumed their awful firing again mowing down mulitudes of Glandelinians together and eve at every volley.It was indeed morefrightful than ever. The whole attacking force was now again in confusion on account of the murderous fire and despite the threats of general convention and the other leads, and even pleads and commands , broke once more into a panic and retreated with all haste down the hill general convention striving in vain to check their retreat. This again the desperate battle lulled.

After the struggle had lulled again the dead and wounded were again gathered up.Indeed the scene at this point had been terrible. The sudden explosions of so many cannons going off simultaneously at times along the whole line had displaed their wheels untill they were almost about to t opple over and indeed this great carnage had turned the whole region into one vast morgue for the distance of fourt y miles, the whole length of the hills at least, and even the ground was covered with blood that varied in thickness at some places to a few inches. The narrow escapes of the other Glandelinian generals in the worse of the struggle was mysterious, for the fire aof the christians along the summit of the heights and cannon had seemed to rage beyond hells preternatural violence and in the full contest up to now since their loss of twenty million they had lost now five million more.

After the struggle along this point had lulled general Huebaum Manley had declared that the Good and Almighty God himself had made the christians pour pour such a seemingly unearthly cannon and musketry fire down upon Shoemannias army annihilating every charge, and declared that it was all on account of the butchery of children, nd he was at a loss because Shoemannia being wounded would not be able to make any further attacks that day and Manley had evil forebodings of a great disaster that had occured to the Glandelinian army.

This wicked and furious assault of the Glandelinians had alarmed generà general Hellers Angelinians beyond endurance and that is what made them appeal and warn Picknell to be on the look out and so caused the whole main christian line to go into action nd and almost annihilate Shoemannias columns.

THE ANGELINIANS RESUME THE BATTLE BY ATTACKING THEMSELVES.
THEY REGAIN ALL THE LOST GROUND, CAPTURED BY THE ENEMY DURING THE OTHER TWO DAYS.

General Picknell in the meantime since his whi whole line had successfully repelled the assailants with such dreadful results to Shoemannia and Manley decided to counter th attack the Glandelinian army which was wholly shattered now and by thus dragging the enemys other wings into the open dominate their divisions, and by a sweeping assault crush the enemy the same way they had done in repelling the assaul of assault of the foe before, and to recover all the lost ground. But half of the christian army was to remain on the heights to guard it against further attack. It seemed awful to commit such an awful massacre the second time, but general Picknell was bound to win the battle atvall cost for he must hurl back Manley from Osmondonson untill general Vivian a could retreat to a safer point.

I041.

It was already four thirty in the afternoon and the lull had lasted all th at time and all that while preparations were made for the attack. All his men appointed to charge were Abyssinkilians and were formed into lo g parellel lines.All the christian batteries that could be spared from the ridges were to advance with the line of charge. I 7,000,000 Abyssinkilians were thus formed for the advance against the foe, holding the main recently captured positions down below, while the Angelinians and Calverinians were to attack the Glandelinians in the wheatfields and plains where chains of Glandelinian cannon were, and all these in seventeen deployed immense brigades, and many seperate divisions with all their myriads of battle flags flying marched from the right of Wil Wailen Bells lines, and thon surged down the sides of the hill and wentvforward across the plains in formidable array tward Manleys main line. Manleys ca cannon now began to volly and thunder but few a Angelinians dropped as the shells f went far beyonithem while the advancing christian batteries answered with telling effect.

But as the Angelinians came within range the eneuys cannon became one long line of flame and smoke and now general Picknell was dismayed for his men were going down in swarms. Yet he was not daunted and seeing it badly needed sent more troops to reinforce the assaulting columns whose front lines were being shattered, and the remainder decimated by an annihilating fire. Thou through his glasos glasses he could see that Manleys batteries placed on a high elevation was raining shells like torrents of hell fire, and that his very own divisions seemed to be melting away. Manleys own line was in a preternatural uproar, and now became almost obscured in wreathes of smoke. The Glandelinians were repelling the Angelinians with all their desperation and determination, and the energy of despair, and Picknell had doubts if they would carry the positions once captured by the Glandelinian armies. So he sw n sent a number of messongers to ask for the main christian line left in reserve to come on. On pressed the others, the open ground across which they were moving seeming ly to be fairly dominated by Manleys guns. Never did Pi cknell hear infui infuriated cannibals yell so terribly as the Angelinians themselves as they cont inued to advance des pite the fact that greater gaps wer were t orn in their lines.

To cross the wide open ground and drive the Glandelinians from the christian positions was a hazardous problem before general Picknell. He discovered that i t manifestly was impossible to cross in the face of Manleys army under such a murderous fire so he decided to make a fient . So cons picious preparations were made for bridging above the enemy enemys lines like at other battles. It took a long while before general Manleys attention had been attracted to that point but then it was too late for picknells whole attacking force moving to support those assaulting him in the plains was precatically moving on Manleys entire flank before the herculean feat was known to the foe leaders .

General Manley now found himself in a very ticklish position and under two fires. H e He held Osmondonson but the christian advance not only threaten ed his flank but his communicà communica tion of suppli es at the south was captured, therefore he was compelled to evaca evacuate the city and hrul a counter charge upon Picknells left wing under general Roswell Buster Johnson just what Pi cknell wanted.

The sanguniary battle at this point surged back and forth a hogror between heaven and earth. A brigade of four hundred thousand men at Picknells left met two hundred thousand Glandelinians cavarly which during a regula rugular hell of carnage was driven back on its supporting infantry crushed and mangled.

A neighboring point of Picknells lines anid a million cannon like roar of musketry was attacked and thrown into confusion and the christian left seemed about to crumble away when reinforcements sent by Brown beat back the victorous Glandelinians right and left .Dead and wounded again lay everywhere. Assisting forces sent by Manley about an hour after wa too late to be of any service in maintaining the original success and disaster stared the Glandelinians once more in the face. These r reinforcements were driven back in turn crushed to fragments by the overwhelming mubers that came to the aid of general Brown. All this time Pi cknells opportunity was coming for a gap two miles long exsisted between Manley on the Glandelinian left and Convention on his right hand and an attacking forc e under phelp phelan was thrown int o this unoccup ied space. In the meantime simultaneously q an assault of hellish fury was maintained on browns line also and success wavered between the two contending forces. A large division of general Richees corps was driven back by Roswevillies Glandelinians when sanguinim arived in time with heavy forces to the assistance of the defeated and once more heaven and earth seemed to be wanting its vengeace on the graycoats.

I042 Sanguinne with his storm of hell t urned the tide of battle even against against the reinforcing Glandelinians mowing them down in almost all their numbers. Several other Glandelinian waves ten miles long were crushing the christian center, when fresh troops under generals Herdrude, Wailen, Cammillia, Clavin, and Braggtin took a hand in matters and after a maelstrom of hell and contefury tothe center was saved though all these commanders went down mangled and bleeding for their pains. The fi fih fighting wa was more bloody at the right of Browns line near Chickages and Vivianianscreek. Bicknell had forced the movements of the battle to the left with all his violence and Rusbaum Hapley did not see the advisability of lessening his counter attacks on icknell the main comman der and tried with all his energy to demolish the right or the whil whole main line of Browns men. At one point seemingly unoccupied the enemy had rushed in but their left flank was caught in ambush and these Glandelinians soon pressed on the right and left being driven out of the supposed gap, which had only been an ambuscade, and the enemy were cut down in hundreds of thousands and their survorz survivors sent scurrying for shelter.Then anley sent assaulting columns in close succession from the left, we wheeled and swept against the christian line from east to north. This terrible onslaught was so far to the left that only brigades at the right of the assulting force touched the christian breastworks. Here it was like the dashing of twenty monstrous monsterous waves g against the breaks breakwater which hurls back in spray what but now was the solid sea. The Glandelinian commander general Henry Hellem was killed and his shattered brigade of I,000,000 men having been reduced to only one hundred thousand were withdrawn from the horrible inferno. General Cleburn Randolph who sent his second brigade in motion a few minutes later arived too late to be of any assistance and his lines in rushing forward were also crushed to fragments. But general Hellems chief aiding commander had gained a valuable position with h is remain remaining brigades and so he wheeled around ailens flank and sought to take the Angelinians in the rear, while andolph engaged the breastworks.

His advance however was observed by icknell who sent against the enemy first a brigade of general Patter ranstones right grand division(in reserve) which beat the attackers to a fight ing position by only one hundred yards and by divisions from two other large forces. Hellems chief aiding commander was subjected to the fire on the front and both flanks ad was forced to retire as was gene general Rando andolph whose assault on the breastworks had little effect except horrible slaughter. While anley kept up a series o of furious advances on the christian left only one of which was temporally successful, phelan advanced one million nine hundred thousand men against the southern end of the breastworks there defended by rowns men.Brown came forth to meet the enemy who charged a across a lane and after merciless carnage drove the assilants back and forced back the assault to the shelter of the already blazing woods.

Fifteen minutes later poured forth I,700,000 men through the woods in long parellel lines who took phelans and Davids glandelinians on the right and left flank respectively, dashed into the rear brigades of o inotaurs and Woodruffs and crashed int o anley and gatg gt sattanic who vai nly endeavored to stem the ti de.There was no stopping the flow of his torrent of men.General Shoemannias remaini ng army was driven completely from the field as were inotaur and the other divisions, and general icknell who hd had shattered the Glandelinian right turned to the south, an and twenty five brigades which barred the way were torn t o pieces, cut up, and then swept a aside with most terrible desciination.Bicknell had turned also Manleys flank a and reached his rear and all about him the dead lay.

Everywhere the attack was successful in the pah of the Angelinians except at anleys main center whose lines extended across emperial run and from the slopy woods of ocket Ridge westward to a longer line of breastwor breastworks with which it made a slight angle? The rest of icknells force was hurled against the center and it was a desperate hand to hand fighting, and the Angelinians were pressing slowly onward when heavy reinforcements came on the run and threw themselves on the Angelinins below. A fter twenty nj minutes the Angelinians were driven bak back having killed many men and one quarte of the central division was disabled i in less than a few minutes fighting. Twice again the long hill was assa assaulted by icknell but no parts of the slopy heights were taken untill the left grand division as well a the ri ght was subjected to the attack and damnation of ruin and destruction. At seven thirty the third assault was made and the Angelinians surged irrestibly over the works.

THE BATTLE OF MILTON.
VISITING THE GLANDELINIANS.

I042 Sanguinne with his storm of hell turned the tide of battle even against against the reinforcing Glandelinians mowing them down in almost all their numbers. Several other Glandelinian waves ten miles long were crushing the christian center, when from the north under generals Herdrude, Wailen.

I043. The defenders were in slow retreat. Half an hour after fresh divisions carried a point on the northern part of this long slope but thec success of the Angelinians did not progress farther. A desperate rally on Manleys left held Bicknell and Brown in check, then the approach of night brought the battle to an end. However it was an Angelinia victory for the Angelinians had recpatured all their own lost ground and captured the nemys position on the slope as well. The dead ly thick among the trees on this ridge o Osmondonson was one of the bloodiest battles since the war began.

It was while Shoemannia was crushed and mangled that evening with his armies flying in rout southward that Manleys main army also began to give wy way but the Angelinians didnot persue. The estimates of the effective forces of Bion Bicknells army ran from 99,000,000 of his alone with vivianias combined t hough the whole forces engaged ra nged about 94,288,412. The total christian losses on the fi rst day of the battle was 8,967,127, on the second 10,789,000 and on the third an equal number as on the fi rst being again 8,967,127. Total was 28,723,254 in killed and wounded. A similar agreement and disagreement existed in the reports of the Glandelinian strength whose losses on the remainder of the third day was an extra 10,000,000. Total losses were 35,000,000. General Vivianis had wished to flank the enemy and trap the Glandelinians if he could to help thrash general Manley during the battle but his plans had all gone wrong and he had been wounded early in the contest the battle making a scene for those three days like a raging forest fire, and the fiercst foe fiercest part of the conflict with general Bicknell and Manley raged near Barrys Run. These two recent battles in Calverinia at Osmondon and at Lucille Jorden were the first two fiercest conflicts the world had ever seen, the charges having been many herculsan and bloody, and raging with the warfare of titans. The battle of Lucille Jorden and Osmondonson had s started the very world agoing with the news. Even from Rossana Hogan it was reported that despite the snow on the ground the thick forests were set on fire and burning fiercely for columns of smoke were seen rising from a near by forest, while columns and spouts of the smoke seemed to pour everywhere in the distance thick velvety smoke but the Angelinians could detect no smell of burning.

Following the battles of Osmondonson, and Lucille Jorden came news that somewhere further north about maybe two hundred miles away from the scene of these battles, there had been great explosions somewhere near the Mic-whirther River which made a cons concussion which was reported to have been felt at some considerable distance. But ad all connunications had been cut off from town to town by the enemy and also because of the reported disasters no full details could be found.

Who ever of the enemy may be respobsible it cannot be said, but as the explosions seemed so mysterious it was feared that terrible results may have occured knowing that the Glandelinian armies are wicked enough to do any thing wicked, and cruel, and if big fires or floods have resulted the whole country will have to know. Hearing of the reports Emperor Anson Vivian is quite worried, and so are his generals despite the victory which had been won at Osmondonson and they are making many frantic inquiries especially by witr wireless tward Angelinia Agathia, and Port Dorothy Gale cities but have recieved no word, as those places heard no news or felt nothing whatever, even though Anson reported that the houses of Osmondeson city which his army or a portion of it is occupied by swayed by the concussion and many dishes and windows were broken.

The noise sounded a little like thunder, going off at short intervals at a long distance but there are no clouds in the sky, and it being so late in October it would seem unusual for a thunderstorm of that nature to be coming on.

It was the 21th of October 1912 and Hansons army after being victorious was starting to lay seige to Jennie Lutmer city tward which a portion of Manleys army had fortified itself under fortifications and rifle pits. Jennie Lurmer itself felt the shocks, and so did towns further away.

CHAPTER FOURT Y . FIVE

FIERCE ARTILLERY DUELS AT JENNIE TURNER. CHRISTIAN BATTERIES AT JENNIE TURNER GOES INTO IMMEDIATE ACTION WHO IS TO BLAME? GLANDELINIA?

In the meantime while the christian batteri es were preparing to mass for th the intended bombardment violet and her sistss sisters saw great clouds of smoke and wondered what was going on again in the direction of the forests outside of Jennie turner. Even while the work at placing and massing great batteries was at its height the little girls had determined to investi gate despite the warnings of the christian commanders and s et out fully armed as there was danger of meeting packs of wolves as wal well as the enemy. They had been traveling for fully half a hour when the air became full of pungeant biting smoke.It was hanging ovs over like a thick fog while the sky became black as if with thunder clouds.

"It's a forest fire set by the enemy to mak break papas seige"Said Jennie. It wi th a look of horror."And if we don't be making for a place of safty we will be caught. The fire I'm sure has been set by the enemy to force the christian armies besieging Jennie turner out of their positions, or by theblaze caused by neglected camp fires."

They started to run for the christian lines while an uncanny color began to spread over the sky which was completely overcast with clouds of smoke. The clouds were rising in thick columns like vapors from a monsterous crater of some immense volcano in explosive eruption. This was the most awful sight they ever witnessed and they wondered how the forests could even burn with all the snow on the ground.

"It looks four times worse than the burning of Pullaway."Said violet with a shiver."My such a fire, and what a great rain of sparks."

It was indeed awe inspiring.A regular snowstorm of sparks and twigs were dashing dashing everywhere on the wings of an arising wind and e everything was being obscured in white palls of smoke. The little girls were hurrying as best as they could for they feared they would be s uffocate in the smoke. A bright glare was already seen in the far distance, while clouds rising in immensseconvultions made an impression quite like the approa approa ch of hell itself. Violet was hit a stinging blow on the head by a smouldering branch, and the foliage overhead and even ahead of them was starting to ignite. T They saw that they were in awful peril for they knew that a forest fire traveled swifter than a city conflargration. Half suffocated by the smoke and beaten by flying branches and twigs they staggered on while despite it bei ng winter the atmosphere seemed to be getting very dry and warm and also the little girls began to feel the tortures of thi rst. The lurid glow was getting brighter and warn winds swept by in hot squalls almost carrying t he little girls off their feet.

"It must be a fire hurricane which is produced by the hot draughts of forest fires and we are caught sure and may perish."Gasped violet. Trees already seemed to be blazing fa far ahead of them and to their dismay violet and her sistss were almost chocking from the smoke.The red glare had become terribly bri ght and they knew that the fire was approaching fast and furiously. Jennie tripped over a stone and fell headlong skinning her knee and one of her arms. She was almost stunned by the fall.

As her sisters two of them picked u her up gent ly they could already feel the heat of the approaching conflargration among the thick forest of pine trees. Their thi rst was now becoming intolerable and they would have drank any kind of water had they found it and ea cati ng snow did no goodL Not a trace of water was in sight not even a frozen stream. The heat itself waw becoming worse than the hot waves and once in a while small holes were burned in their clothes by flying sparks. Jennie herself was scratched and brus bruised from her recent fall and fairly staggered along suffering worse from her craving thirst and worse for them the deep snow was becoming s wet and slushy from the warmpth of the air. The little girls realized what the horrors of aforest fire really was for now in the far di stance a vertiblewall of fire was approaching along the tree tops roaring and hissing like an advancing whirlwind od of death and destruction..

The wall of fire was almost blood red in hue and seemsed to leap to the height of many hundreds of feet throwing a bright dazzling glare over the atmosphere.At other portions immense walls of smo e smoke clouds arose filled with millions of spectaclur convult ions making a sublime sight . The nearest trees were already blazing in sheets of flame at thei r tops and at quite a distance there was a small opening of ground and the little girls without their knowing it were heading for this through the deep snow. The heat was greater than ever and from a clump of bushes near by the flam flames were already leaping fiercely while trees in front of them were blazing by scores like oil. The yivian girls das hed on through this fiendishly hot atmosphere but suddenly came upon windrows of blazing pi ne bushes and t here was a great danger of them being hemmed in from escape. Yet they passed through itthough the heat was blistering. G Great clouds of white smoke and black belched tward them from above and steam was rising from the melting snow and smouldering ground rubish where snow did not lay and yet with heads low down they breasted the suffocat i ng clouds, b t but soom came upon a wall of rosing crackling flame. The clouds of smoke increased every minue every mi nute and realizing how hopeless it was to go any further in this di rection through the deep snow their progress being painfully slow they turned another wy more di rect tward the open ground.Whole masses of trees to their right seemed to be pretty well engulfed in the flames and the woods above itself seemed to be in t he embrace of fire.

The ruddy glow of the main advancing fire was increasing every minute and realizing how hopeless it was to go any further they felt sure they were doomed as the thick smoke began to t urn to a kind of a red. The scene was like some inferno when more flames broke through the smoke red t ongues of flame presenting a new awful wall of fire whose heat was parchi ng awful.

Thousands of trees and lines of bushes abd and e even brushwood were fairly blazing nearly everywhere arouhd them and in this awful atmosphere of smoke they were almost strangled. Behind the little girls was a n an ocean of flames indeed a thousand feet deep all blazing trees and bushes. However they were getting nearer and nearer to the open ground, though the advac advancing wall of fire burned faster and more furious the smoke becoming a regular pall thick as the closest fog. The very nearest trees and bushes were blazing furiously the heat of the main fire above igniting bushes and brushwood below and trees hundreds of feet away from the conflargration started up. Even thousands of t rees dangerously near the li ttle girls were burning like tinder and the fire was s preading s o furiously that hundreds of t rees seemed to be catchi ng at once.

Many burning t rees fell crashing to t he ground sendi ng up a great hurricane of sparks while the roar of t he fire and of falling timbers was terrible .

The smoke was becoming thicker and more chocking every minute cloud after cloud sweeping by and Jennie was already becoming terribly weak from inhaling smoke. Millions of s parks flew everywhere ad a terrible roar told violet and her sisters that the fire was more dangerously near than before and thousands of tho t ongues of flame shot thousands of feet across the sky over their heads.The smoke was more thicker and thousands of trees having caught per second because weak from burning through and may many fell wi th a crashing roar.

Violet and her sisters frantically wondered which direction the christian lines were. They felt sure they were lost. And they were indeed terribly frightened because they could not progress any swifter than a bird hops through the deep snow and they fat like curs cursi ng the snow i tself. How they prayed to god to save them cannot be told. The conflar gration seemed to be advancing as swift as a horse runs and the little girls seemed to be doing only a snails movement.Some places the snow was hard crusted and enabled them to progress some what faster but at other time they almost ploughed through snow up to their waist level depth and at time times clambered over mountianous drifts.

Violet and her sisters were frantic.Would they never reach a place of safty? Were they to perish after all? And why was it not possible that some Angelinian soldiers would be looking out for them.They now would sooner meet a pack of hungry wolves or even t he Glandelinians then be caught in thep path of an advancing forest fires.And they thought when deep snow was on the ground a forest of trees could not burn.And they were ca caught in the path of the worse forest fires they had ever seen ad and they had seen many. As they went on several of the burned trees fell across a ravine and set more bushes on fire at that.Poor Jennie recied a blow on the head by a heavy bramch almost knocking the poor child silly at that. Violet and two of her other sisters, grabbed Jennie by the shoulder, and dragged her away before her clothes caught on fire. Indeed the whole world seemed to be all on fire as all the distant trees extending for miles ad miles were burning like greattorches, and the little girls were terrified for the fire was only a mile away now. Jennie was lifted to her feet while many other trees fell with a roar, and myriads of trees far ahead of them began to catch afire very rapidly. Their their apprehensions, and desire to escapecould not be described. And never before had they prayed so hard in their young lives lives. To them the extent of the burning forest seemed to have no end, and the christian lines miles from the woods seemed much further away the than it really was. hat really terrified the little girls more was of the trees catching fire far ahead. Violet gave a glance behind her, and saw to her horror that three large groups of giant oak trees, and some pine and evergreen were burning furiously fast as if they were soaked inoil. Indeed the ground itself was getting hot, and in already many parts it was smoking. The little girls were also suffering for want of air, for the atmosphere became stifling hot, and filled with chocking clouds of smoke. Yet they hurried on, through the thick wreat s of smoke, past rows of leaping flame, where from the heat their flesh seemed almost blistered. Other trees near them were beginning to burn, and all but strangled, their hearts beating at low pressure, they continued to battle through the smoke and at l ras l last reached the open which appeared more free from smoke, and just as they reached it many more trees fell with a crash that shook the ground and the roaring flames could be seen plainer and nearer now leaping from all the nearest trees, making spectular clouds of smoke.

"Come, let's hurry" gasped Violet "Or we will be surrounded by those outpouring flames."

They stag estaggered on. The wind appeared quite against the approaching forest fire which drove off some of the smoke which began also to fill the open in the woods, but the flames seemed to be spreading more rapidly forthey leaped hundreds of yards across the tree tops and sky, enveloping other trees, and spreading along the rear edge of the forest at Violet's left, filling a distant ravine with a perfect furnace thirty feet deep, and Violet and her sisters saw the longtongues of flame that leaped high into the air and ignited fresh num ers of trees. And never before had they ever seen such clouds of smoke, and though in the open, their peril was not yet over, for the wall of fire was approaching near nearer and nearer, yard by yard, leaping across the sky and by its l ad causing a smoke among the infine inflammable foliage lying in th e grounds.

Even from the newly catching trees the flames leaped up, crackled and reared, sending up great volumnes of smoke, and this fire was approaching the main ones. The wall of distant trees t to Violet's left was a roaring mountian of fire by this time, the heat being awful. Even thousands of trees were catching at once, and poor Violet exclaimed in terror;

"Oh It's coming straight for us."

The open ground was again filled with the rasping rolling clouds of smoke from the burning trees, while clouds of white mingled with the dense black overspread above their very heads, and now the roaring of the flames and the crashing of falling trees w was awful. Soon seen the sky became so illumined that any one could read by it, and in another minute thousands of distant trees fell to the ground with a series of fierce detonat ions, scattering a hurricane of burning embers. Trees also near the ravine crashed to earth filling the air with heavy clouds of sparks. The scene was indeed fearful and now the li litt le girls felt there was no escape whatever from their great peril. They had passed the two main walls of fire, only to come within sight of a burning villiage, where an awful panic was ensueing, while many people had already been buried beneath blazing debris and other rubbish. Indeed it was peril after peril.

Every moment the flames gif gained swiftly, and reaching a wooded hill they saw three more counter fires moving in one direction, and becoming a regular sea of flames. Violet and her sisters retreated rapidly down the other side, and finally reached the valley just as the trees on the summit caught afire from the storm of sparks. And inh indeed here the little girls saw the summit became fast enveloped in a great mountain of flame which threw a dazzling glare. It was finally quite a time before the little girls reached the christian lines, where they had a full viw of the approaching conflargration. The flames leaped up thousads of feet into the air as fanned by the breeze, hungrily devouring the upper forest on the hills and catching other villiages. Many stretches of forests were burning fast. The main army of the Angelinians had retreated hours before the approach of the fire, but the little girls in following the rest found again to their dismay they were again cut off off from scape entirely. Many other terrified women and children came rushing up a hill or tward a river for safty, but many trees all around them caught on fire from the rain of embers and storm of sparks, the distant forest becoming a regular seaf of fire indeed. It looked as if the small villiages within the borders of the forests, and the many fugitives were shut up in an inferno, with an ocean of fire and with do m doom confronting them.

The fire

The fire roared like one of the fierce Calvorinian or Abbisannian Typhoons, and was burning forward at an appalling rate, and many trees above the frightened women and children threatened to fal fall on top of them. And before any of them could get out of the way, the trees did fall and they were buried in a tremendous heap of blazing wreckage, the screams of their their death agony being indeed appalling to the ears of Violet and her sisters. Yet the Vivian girls did not seem to show much fear at that. They escaped the s hower excepting poor Jennie, who was struck down by a blazing bough, but though she was not hurt, her thin clothing caught on fire fire and her sisters battled desperately, and succeeded in saving her, though their own clothes began to smother. Despite their own burns, Violet and her sisters, went to the aid of those under the blazing trees, but succeeded in only freeing two, as the tremendous heat of the blazing debris drove them away. On little girl succeeded in freeing herself, but tripped and fell face downward, a big five foot splinter going through her, and she was opened wide, her intestines coming ouid, the leaping tongues of flame quickly reaching reaching her as she lay dead. Many of the others were crushed and burned to death as a sea of fire quickly enveloped them. Another storm of fire close to them was burning furiously, more than all the other trees. It was a roaring sea of fire, clouds upon clouds of smoke of all hues forming a convuluted canopy. Violet and her sisters turned away from the or horrible sight, and proceeded in their flight, when Violet suddenly screamed; "Oh look out sisters. Those trees. They are going to fall."

But it was too late. With a shocking crash a whole mass of the trees fell, scattering millions of blazing embers, burning all of the little girls under the blaze of burning wreckage. The embers began to blaze like cotton, but the little girls managed to escape with slight injury, and as they emerged from their own furnace intact, saw ten more fleeing fugitives buried and crushed by falling trees. And clouds of smoke smoke thike thick as a deq dense pall hid the nearest trees, the falling trees scattering embers everywhere.

The pall of smoke also became strangling and smothering, and Violet and her sisters could hardly see each other and gasped for air. Bya tremendous hissing roar, Violet and her sisters knew that the flames were reaching the foliage over had head, and the smoke increased a hundred fo d hundred fold. Gasping for breath, they now laid down flat, being so thirty, that their tongues almost protruded. The thick clouds of smoke and the steam rom the damp ground chocked them, butvas they crawled along they came to a cave, a small one but big enough to practically shelter them from the approaching storm of fire. This cave was free from skoke, and a brese breeze was blowing from its direction. They entered, and when they saww saw a s trickling stream, they did drink from it like those dying of thirst on a large sandy waste.

The whole atmosphere outside was full of rasping white smoke, and the glare of flames pierced it like sheets of lightning. Even from every direction flames and smoke began to pour, enveloping everything, and then sad t o say Nthe little girls were forced from their refuge by the sea of flames that threatened them. Having some water in their canteens they did not worry so much now though the forest fire was a sad and sickening sight to them.

reciedd a blow on the head by a heavy branch almost knockingthe poor child silly at thatoviolet and two of her other sisters, grabbed Jennie by the shoulder, and drag

The flames in a perfect wall darted thousands of feet in the air with an unearthly unearthly brightnes , the dazzling glare making a thrill of horror go through their hearts such as they never felt before. They had again narrowly escaped the fire and saw another villiage al ablaze. With a loud resounding crash the roofs fell in and then the beautiful ste-ples of the bo burining g buildings st anding proudly amin amidst the sea of flames and smoke crashed down in another moment through the roofs raising snowstorms of sparks. The fire d certainly held an awful facination. The roaring sea of flames leaped and danced while catching the houses scores by scores leaped high into the air with a roar. Whole roofs of bigger buildings fell in sending clouds of sparks thicker than a snow storm. Hundreds of famlies were fleeing for safty carrying all the property that they could save from the advancing fire. The walls of the burning buildings began to fall. For the Angelinians who were fight ing the fire as they retreated it was indeed a terribly danger and the brave men who did it were continually line imperiled, for continually they were driven back by the hellish heat and hundreds after hundreds of trees fell with a deafeing roar compelling many of the fire fighters to run for it . Many houses in the burning villiage collasped with a thunderous roar and larges masses of the walls caught many men women and children. In about fifte en minutes all the burning buildings caved in with an appli appalling roar that made the ground tremble the walls falling outward. The whole villiage was becoming a fearful furnace and clouds of black clouds as from a volcanic weruption rolled from the whole conflargration.

It indeed was one of the greatest con flargrations that Violet and her sisters had ever seen. They had nce been in this peril for a good aprt of the night after the batle and a nin they came upon the retreat ing christian lines. For many days this fire burned on and each day it became more fiercer, traveling with great speed and buring with appaird appalling fury.

It even swept across streams and rivers catching other trees beyond. Railroad ties were lie literally malted or consumed and also the wooden ties. The waters of the rivers and creeks became scalding hot from the heat of the fire and allll the fishes were fiarly cooked alive. Thousands fled before it trying to seek reg refuge by train but few got away in that manner.

All this time Violet and her sisters were fleeing before the advancing conflargration but was outdistincing it little by little.

''This is dreadful.' Exclaimed Violet with a shiver.''Forests fires are really worse than a burning city and we certainly had narow escapes.''

''I know.''Said Jennie. ' God alone got us out of the danger.'

''And I thank him with all my heart .''A Said Angeline.''I would rather be fleeing from a horde of the enemy than this. This is terrible.''

''Yes.''Said Joice. ''I believed they were caused by those fires in the plains which the battle of Osmondonson had started. Do you think theses fires will always burn now?''

''I know a good way to check one.''Said Violet. ''To check or put out a forest fire is to start a big counter fire. But many men would have to battle this also so that it does not spread in the wrong direction.''

''But it might be dangerous anyhow.''Said Jennie, with a shy look. ''Suppose that the wind would shift another way.?''

''What would happen?''Asked Angeline.

''Why it would burn an opposite diraction than that which the fire fighters wanted and form another conflargration proab probably worst than the first and the main one would be able to continue onward.''

''But how does a counter fire check it then?''Asked Angelinie. ''And besides if so many men are fighting the counter fire surely they could hold it in the right course des ite the wind.''

''Why by burning up the trees in the path of the conflargration.''Said violet.

A ''As for your argument as to how the men can check it in in vain. For when once the wind shifts an opposite direction it can carry st reams of burning moss all over the tops of trees far in the rear of the fight ers and then how are they going to check the new conflargrat ion without being burned alive themselves?''

A counter forest fire is not always the saftest way to fight a fire either.''Said Hettie for I have seen fires which men fought and ones they made to check the other. You see its this way. Supposing this big fire now was traveling through as now, and supposing that twenty miles away or even thirty scores of men in number would start another. Well this fire gaining headway in its front would become almost as big and sometimes even bigger and swifter. Well it of course does the same havoc as the one its to meet burning all before it until it reaches the main conflargration. Then with because there is no more fuel eit her may both fires will have to subside unless a change of wind startes a new one. Also the fighters will have to watch out that the counter fire does not become larger than the other for if it it if it does then the counter fire is just as bad as to make a new one in another course.''

''I see now so.''Said Angeline. ''But how can that make it go the same way all the time for it could spread in ot her directions despite the wind.''

''Why men fight it on every point except ing on the advancing side of the new fire to keep it advancing another way...''

''But ca can they stand the heat??''''Asked.Jennie.....

''In some ways they can when they have on wet clothes.They fight the fire with wet blankets in case it is a ground fire.But a ground fire could not usually occur when the ground is so deeply covered with snow. But then it is is quite risky.''

The fire now quite a distance away was in a long appalling wall of flame stretching as far as eye could reach. It was really an appalling sight and Violet and her sisters began to realize that general Manley had set this fire to force general Hanson vivian, his brother and general Jack Evans to abandon the seige of Jennie Turner.For hours the fugitives of near by towns kept fleeing before the advancing forest fires.But by the desperate efforts of thechristians the fire was not moving tward their own lines though nevertheless the conflargration was still advancing at a gra great rate, but nevertheless violet and her sisters felt sure that most of the danger was over. But nevertheless danger was still threatening asthe conflargration was still speeding at a terrific rate and despite the snow on the ground violet and her sisters rode their horses this time and always kept close to the men dreading that some of them would get caught .

The advance of the fire was as swift as men could run or marck m march and the soldiers who werefight ing the fire off from the forgi fortifications they had builded in the valley suffered badly from the smoke and heat and though the tempet ure was below zr zero they were ringig wringing wet with sweat. Violet and her sisters glanced frequently tward t ward the approaching forest fires which advanced in leaps and bounds covering the whole hori zon and half way to the zenith with a shet sheet of dazzling flame.

''I wonder how we are going to avoid this!''Said violet ''This fire is coming faster and faster.''

''Maybe general vivian will be able to confine it to the edge of the wide plains.''Said Joice.''He will have to fight the fire from the south though.''

''But that gives the fire more chance to press him hard.''Said Catherine.

''You see it is moving from the northeast.''

''We may have been persued by the fire for three hours.''Said Angeline herself.''It must be a way long distance for us to reach safe ground.''

She was right . and general vivian himself soon realized that she was more than right for he could not compell the conflargration to move tward the snow covered plains but nevertheless he was not going to abandon his position if he or the whole army burned with it . To force the fire to reach the other plains where it could be stopped the wind must be blowing from the east.But nevertheless he decided to detail twenty thousand men to beat it back tward that direction. Three more hours passed and there came a stronger wind this time from the west and this gave the troops some relief from the smoke which was thicker than than ever.Hansons main divisions who had been finishing their work at battery placing placing saw that a portion of the fire was advancing tward their left rear. Hanson saw that some thing must be done or his own command would be enveloped. He was puzzled for the fire was approaching as fast as astorm and to fight it even by counter firing was only sucide. He managed to collect over thirty thousand men who were armed with axes sharp pikes and saws.

''Cut down all the trees about you.''He ordered.''It will check the flam flames a little anyhow.''T

The men did as ordered and soon thousands of trees were cut down in a very short time thousands of more men coming with xsawa saws and axes and even many of the cannoners brought the trees down like flies with their solid shot and shells, and the trees which were down were rapidly dragged away by horses to the christian positions to use as abatis.

In about half an hour a large opening was made in the woods and then the wood cutters da dashed at the trees and other trees cutting down trees at every single line of their work though tormented by many Glandelinian snipers and buswhackers who strove to prevent their work of checking the incendiary fire. On came the fire roaring like a cyclone. It was a perfect wall of flame a thousand feet high roaring like artillery and though three thousand yards away from the op opening the heat was so great that the stumps were rapidly smoking or afla aflame. With a screeching roar it reached the edge but was not in the least checked des pie the terrific battle the flames recieved.

It made slower progress however taking two hours to leap across the open, for it had to burn its way through the dry rubbish along the edge and under the snow, and when general Hanson s army was concentrating to fight the fire at every point he saw that the fire was now coming on at a greater rate than ever.He saw that it was of no use to have his fire fighters cut down many more trees but ordered his fire fighters by telegraph to move directly southeast which they did. Thus at least most of the army of fire fighters escaped the demon of fire and smoke and within three days a week before Christmas or after I mean they were out of range back to the main li ne and settled down to rest, but violet and her sisters had been lost again while being pes persued by the enemy for nearly a whole day and lost again in the ''sume'' forest but at a differe different point not yet reached the fire.....

It had been two days aft er violet and her sisters had been seen or had been seperated from the christian lines again when a certain soldier who had been a fugitive from the enemy and who had been hiding from the enemy in a cave for days and for whom the enemy was fairly scouring the country wa was walking through a certain part of the forest on his ret urn to the cave from the advancing conflargration when he saw seven of the prettiest little children running frantically tward him nearly all of their clothes burned to shreds and that they were half naked.

''Oh mr save us we cannot stand it any longer.''Panted one of them.

''We are lost in this burning woods and cannot find our way to the christian lines.It is not the fire, it is the Glandelinians who are after us.''

One of the little girls had a bloody bandage around her head and another had a bleeding gash in her cheek. The man at first did not know what to do but he readily consented to take them into his cave untill the Glandelinians has passed.

''Folo Follow me.''He said.

Violet and her sisters for it was they, quickly obeyed and he had no sooner grabbed Jennie by th e bare arm and threw her inside the cave when a horde of Glandelinian cavarly slowly came up and the leader halting them said;

''Hello my man, have you seen any pretty little girls around here?' They are christian spies, and we have bea been chacing them for miles.''

''Yes indeed I have seen such chu children and too pretty to live.''Laughed the man.''Why they pas passed me just a moment ago down that road. But I guess it is too dangerous to go after them now for look how the fire is spred spreading.''

The leader having no suspicion whatever wheeled his horse and turned back the whole force dashing off the way they had come.As soon as the wi cked Glandelinians were gone the man went inside the cave where the little girls were standing in a group in the middle of the floor.

''Are the Glandelinians gone?''Asked violet.

''Yes they are gone but I had to tell a lie to save you.''He said.''Were you little girls taking the great chances of spying on them?''

''W No sir. We are no spies.We are real refugees from this fire, and we just hap ened to run into them.''

''And no oh how can I ever thank you.''Said little Jennie lifting her pretty face up to his and looking him squarely in the eyes.''If we had not met you we would have been murdered....''

As he saw her pretty face lifted up to his he was awed and he drew her c to him and hugged her so c, closely that she almost felt pain.

''I'd be obliging to save any poor little children like you from those blood thi rsty men. 'He said as he held her fast.I have always loved good little girls like you, and no wonder I cannot resi st doing this for I have always heard that there are no prettier children than the daughters of the great general Robert vivian, and I surely know without question that you are the very ones.''

Jennie felt happy as she laid her curly head h against his chest and as he drew her closer to him her sisters prattled around him, Violet placing one of her arms around his neck.

''When we ever reach the christian lines again we won't forget you, and will tell the great general how kind you have been to us.''She said.''But how comes it that you are here all alone in this cave.We would be hap happier if you were in the army for our poor nation needs bravekind hearted men like you.''

The man laughed loud and long.

''So my poor country needs me eh.''He said.''Well she don't need me for I am in the army. The reason I'm in the cave because fourty times since I escaped the enemys lines after successfully securing Manleys important plans I've ,o lost my way on account of this forest fire and for six days I have been chased by hundreds of Glandelinians and whole swarms led by Gargolians and Secret societies with blood hounds are scouring the whole region for me. I'm ,o lost as well as you little girls.''

Indeed to him the little girls were like celestial beings and he could not resist hugging and embracing them all and after he had given them a good feed from his rations and as the fires were further off he said as he drew them off to them again, and drawing violet with his army arm a around her own neck;

''We might as well start on our own journey and by my heid you will soon find your way through the woods.We cannon cannot stay here too long for the fire would reach us even here in the v cave.''

Soon after the eight were on their way and indeed it did n look like as if seven little celestial children were following him and the man indeed felt that he was in the pres presence of something more than children and decided to see them saftly through the woods to the christian lines. As soon as they emmerged from the woods they suddenly encountered a large number of Glandelinians who were out looking for the man who at seeing them immediately opened fire just as the man and violet and her sisters threw themselves behind some trees. After them went the Glandelinians and so quick was the dash of the foe that violet and her sisters could not get away and they with the man were immediately seized and placed on horses and away went the Glandelinians violet and her sisters being bound hand and foot so that they could not escape by any tricks. In the meantime a large force of Angelinians had been advancing through the woods and seeing the fleeing Glandelinians three hundred of them immediately opened fire, and shooting down a score of the foe and then dashed forward capturing the remainder and rescueing the soldier and violet and her sisters.

THE BATTLE OF MILTON.....

In the meantime general Hansons forces had been so heavily reinforced by more troops and artillery that he had a stronger army than ever and so he decided first to gi ve battle to a strong force of Manleys army concentrated in an advanced position near the small abandoned villiage of Milton before starting the bombardment, and to try and seper ate this force from the main body and captured it. The battle did not open untill December the third and for a while Shoemanni a Hansons left wing of Glandelinians then engaed wi th Hanson vivians right was fairly bathed in blood. Attacked by overwhelming numbers the left wing wa was utterly routed and compelled to flee through a large wooded plain under a heavy storm of shells as if pe persued by a legion of fiends. General Shoemannia Hanson was about the only one of the leading generals who kept his wits about him said all this confusion and ruins. He had over I 7,000,000 reserves and seven million of these he advanced across the wooded plains keeping the main-force in reserve near his main line of batteri es. The seven million Glandelinians reaching the pale stricken Glandelinins columns rallied them after some diffuclty while general Mahogany Stans took about nine hundred thousand through a slopy region of ground of borad extent where he was reinforced by one million more under general Antonio Gaten.These were thrown upon general Hansons furiously advancing Angelinian columns with the most murderous fury and shouts of derision arez arosed from the checked lines as they noticd noticed the new strength of their powerful enemi es. The foe met resistance that could not be described, and though they had succeeds succeeded i n checking the christians they could not make any advance or drive them back. Sone of the Angelinian officers angered over this sudden cha change called on general Hanson - vivian to sent reinforcements to demolish the presumptuous and devilish Glandelinians. General Hanson frowned and cast an approving glance along the thundering seri ed lines and wondered himself how the change had come so quickly.

II,I48,000 Angelinians were drawn up in battle array against general Shoemannia Hansons attacking lines and twenty batteries each having one hundred and fifty cannon were lett ing loose a drum drum fire of hell from their positions tearing Shoemannia Hansons lines in a frightful manner. General Hanson vivian ordered the reinforcements by wireless and telegraph to the other officers and the giving reinforcements r enraged over the impudence of the Glandelinians began to drive in at them with their bayonets in a way that ket the Glandelinians busy in an exciting manner. Scores of thousands fell. General Doblin now came up with his men and these also met the furious attack of the Glandelinians, one of the gray coats leaping at colonel Evans with hi s fi xed bayonet but he raised his sabre bringing it down with a swish on the mans head that sent him sprawling wi th his head split open the sword pointed musket whirling into the air and being discharged as it fell to the ground. Five more with fixed bayonets leped at the colonel who struck at them right and left with his sabre and as they tried to close in around him may many recieved a gashing blow.Many thousands of the Glandelinians shot bayonetted and clubbed the christians soldiers down and recieved their death wounds i n return. The Glandelinians and the christians in the hand to hand fights handled each other roughly biffed and banged each other like da demons as they closed. Colos colonel Evans himself would have been killed by a score of Glandelinians that set upon him furiously had not fifty Angelinians come to his aid, and after a desperate fight hurl may many of the Glandelinians to the ground.

VI VIVIS VISITING THE GLANDELINIANS.

''How about making the Glandelinians another visit?''Asked Violet.''We fear no danger and are not a fraid of the wicked Glandelinians.''
''Oh yes let's do.''Cried Jennie clapping her hands.''I'm not afraid of old Governer general Raymond Richardson Federal. God saved us every time we were in the powe of the Glandelinians and we showed our love for God by suffering for him and would do so again.''
As they had made preparations to start Jennie suddenly fi xed her eyes on a distant ridge far to her right which to her surprise was seeming to hurl into the air convulted clouds of smoke and a string of explosions far in tha that location seemed to hover ove over the enemys position.
''It's the bombardment beginning and one of the worse bombardments of the seige there is.''Said general Hanson as he not iced it''And has been started since th the day of the battle of Mc-Whirther Run with the Glandelinians and Abbisannians southwest of Jennie Turner.That ridge is known as mount Calverine twenty miles away from here nd and I'm afraid that to visit the enemys lines on a scouting tour ev en would be dangerous just now.The power of the Glandelinians seems more stronger than usual and we would have some laborous and perilious times if we expect to end the seige too soon.''
''Yes you had better pospone the scouting trip for a whileat least.''Said her father.''That bombad bombardment as I've recieved news from the distant christian lines over yonder is nearly as violent in the din as the eruption s of Mt Andrean which the Glandelinians''Call Mt Hell''
''What is the matter with the enemys position over there since there is such a commi commotion and what is a bombardment.''?Asked oneof the children taken from the distant villiages whom general Hanson had brought into his headquarters to intertain only a little while ago.''I don 't know what a bombardment is for I have never seen any.''
''So you don't know what a bombardment is eh?''Grunted general Baldwin.''Wel Well that is a bombardment over there, but the main part that is coming which we will have by and by will be worse yet and our guns can do some destruction when our whole lineof batteries gets into full action. Do you shot what shot and shell is?''He added.....'
''Shot and shell?''Said the child with a wondering look.''Perhaps its rocks and seashells what comes from the ocean.''
''In that case you are wrong.''Laughed governer general Vivian.''There are shells in the sea of course, fu fish shells and the like but what I mean is bombs that explodes and cannon bA balls. Our guns throw all kinds of shells and this ridge yonder produces an ppearance to me as if the mount ian called mount Hell is there instead of a ridge armed with cannons. The artillery men must be giving it to the enemy good and proper over there.''
''Say Papa when we were slaves among the Glandelinians they threatened to tie us to the mouths of cannon and blow us into the sky.''

All is true the Glandelinins can do anything wicked.''Said general Balw Baldwin.''And I'm wondering what the si ze of that ridge called Mt An Calvsine is. So thick is the smoke clouds to me that it seems to be like a mountian covered with steam gases which no one can live through and also it makes a good position as its sides seem impossible to climb in the face of a murderous misketry fire. And in the violence of the cannon fire I see yonder it seems to be a terror.And friends he added.That ridge called Mt Calvsine is the most strongest for us to be in possession of and no foe can carry it.She is the one that ought to have all the bombarding batteries.We could give the enemy such a dreadful artillery dueling from there that afterwards it could also be called ''The Mountian of Hell.There is no batteries of cannon that makes such cannonading thunders and those do over there and see though the enemys batteries are responding we cannot hear them''
As nothing was well prepared for nothing occured along any other portions of the christian lines only more work was in progress in fis finishing the building of fortified works but the next morning a terrible morning Violet and her sistes were leaning out of the window of general vivians headquarters watching the working soldiers and drinking in the deli cious adours of the Calverinian country which was mingled with the strong perfume of the great Mc-Hollester Run River when they were surprised and amazed to notice that the same distant ridge was covered with immense wreaths of smoke and explosive puffs of thicker clouds reminding them of the scene witnessed when a forest fire is starting though the smoke wreaths reminded tha also of the steam which gently rai ses the lid of a tea kokettle. The very air which wa before so very sweet and crisp was gradually becoming smoky and pungeant while a thick fog filled with noxious powder oders hid everything from view over the valley and in the direction of the enemys lins lines in that location and the sun rising through the fog could hadly hardly be seen. The company streets of the army was filled with excited shouting cheering soldiers, while the soil itself seemed to growl and tremble as if some formidable dragon after long slumbers was awakening somewhere in the depths below. Finally with the tumult of an invasion from hell I saw saw an army of women and children covered with shawls and overcoats and hats tstearing through the company streets to a high point where they could look upon the distant scene screaming something with excite ent and delight as they went that the little girls could not make out. So Violet and her sisters desirous to see also went out to join the crowd.
''The bombardment has begun.The bombardment h as begun.''
The words of deadly meaning uttered in ascents of excitemat and awe passed from lip to lip. Stupifying news and confused reports were being repeated by one after another. What Violet and her sisters vaguely gathered was that there had been a sudden increase in the strength of the christian batteri es on that ridge and that terrifying floods of foe troops hadinundated across the fords of one of t he streams to make a desperate a assault and h ad reached a portion of the christian lines but the Abyssinkilians had met them as a prize fighter meets a coward and drove all before them.The wreaths of smoke Violet and her sistes had seen was the entire cloud of a hundred thousand christian cannon in action on the Calverine ridge.Suddenly over the enemys lines there occured terrific explosions of dreadful force and all through the fog of smoke there broke a red glare and among the smoke high in the sky a storm of flash es occured like a Fourth of July Fi reworks going oof in a fireworks factory when burning and even among the crowd from some where it came a rain of cinders and mud and snow bega began to fall while clouds of small shattered stones added decending upon the crowds and general Vivians headquarters or crashing into the river with the hissing of myriads of quenched fire brands, then great sheets of new clouds of smoke shot forth along the enemys lines in that location to a great extent mingled with a series of horrible cannonading reports h that was as incessant as a thousand drums rolling vigoriously.
A fresh glow appeared which at the same time was red in hue as it is during some great conflargration at the dead of night. Then there was a bright flash in the middle of the plains in front of the two positions an awful roar, a made stampede of gray surges forward tward the christian works. A large force of Glandelinian troops wa s again rushing forward to make a second desperate assault. For some reas on the wave divided into two the other half forming in into seried lines like some ensanguined tongues was sweeping across theplains , but gaps suddenly appeared among them and the distant uproar became more v wild and violent.

T This bombardment did not stop untill millions of dollars damage had been done in the city of Jennis purmer and over three hundred thousand soldiers had lost their lives on adocunt of the cannonading i tself.

Just as the little girls had returned back to general vivians headquarters the floor under them shook with a rapid and convus convulsi ve three. Far and wide through and the air and seemingly dong the s i soil went a hoarse and rumbling sound, the curtain of the clmber chamber shook as at the blast of a storm, the alter in the K.of C. buil'd building rocked the tripod rseled and high over the company streets outside of general vivians headquarters thetents wavered and trembled from side to side and s ome fell. But the convus convulsion ceased as quick as it had come only to repeat and again the little girls went outside to see wha was the cause of the queer murmuring sounds from the lines of the distant foe. Violet and her sisters who had went outside with some of the soldiers looked like real fari fairies in their Angelinian con costums and like good little girls they made full preparation for Holy Communion on the Coming sunday. All the strange soldiers had wondered at the winning ways of the little girls and their continued happiness.They had seemed jolly dg after day despite the bitter coldness outside and the frequent snow blizzards alwgs smiling, singing, and laughing softly. And this of course made them dear in the sight of all the good soldiers, Angelinian, Abyssinkilians, Abbisanians and Calverinia ns who felt sorry that they had suffered at the hands of the cruel Glandelinians.It was on the afternoon of the same day of the slight earthquake shocks produced by the distant bombardment when general Hanson and his brother passed a decree declaring that all Calverinians wee to risecup and put an end to the child s lave horrors in Calverinia by joining the Angelinian armies and to burn and destroy all the child slave factories ad plantations they could lay their hands on and- if necessary to o join and help the child rebels to crush the cruel Glandelinians and to free all the children who were slaves. Thecause of this degree was that the day before the bombardment commenced general Hanson had recieved a letter from the king of wicked Glandelinia.It had been a very annoying letter and general hanson himself did not know what prevented hi s army from beginning a general bombard ment on Jennie purmer right away.It ran as follows;

''Governer general Hanson vivian;
''You have unjustly sei zed many child slave places in Calverinia, interfored with the aurthorities of Glandelinia and also made war on Glandelinia unjustly, and we demand you under pain of forceful evection, to draw your armies out of Calverinia abandon the seige of Jennie purmer and to give back the child slave places and to atone for the abuse of the Glandelinians whom you have already drove out. Inhh In the first plac e you two governer generals have no right whatever in setting your foul dirty feet on Calverinian so l soil at the purpose of your false God, and you are bound under any condition to give up the children to their misery which they deserve and leave Calverinia with your armies and if you do not you will be forced out.

Yours very truely - Glandelinian king
Hablin procile.''

General Hanson who had been filled with disgust and anger had showed it to his brother who said;
''We do not intend to give them back or sell them or withdraw our armis out of Calverinia and give them back just to see the-children suffer That damn king of Glandelinia must be crazy. Those Glandelinians however are provoked and are very touchy.They threatened to force o us out long ago and we are forcing them out ins tead. Don't you ever dare Governer general Hanson to yeild to their demands for if you do you will be a big fool in the eyes of the world.''

But general Has Hanson sta stamped in ra go.''In ''Indeed I will not. ''He shouted brandishing his sabre.''I'm governer of Calverinia and if they ever dare to try to force us out they will wish they had not tried it and for this insulting letter I'M going to have every seaport of their blockaded and right now. And I will not allow any Glandelinian ships to enter Calverinian ports either.''
That night general Hanson had pondered over the letter and its contents before retiring. Violet and her sisters saw him early that morning and said to general Baldwin;
''What is the matter with uncle?'I've never seen him so angry before.''
Just then they heard their father and uncle talking in angry tones;
''Ha they heard their father say''The King of Glandelinia is abusing us because we are warring on his nation, besieging his armies, driving out of Calverinia his child slave masters and he wants us to give them back and get out of Calverinia. Well we are a fool if we do, and why in hell don't he fight his own battles instead of leaving his generals do al the fighting.He is a coward but does not want to admit it. ''
I''Drive us out indeed?''Thundsed thund ered Hanson. Those Glandelinians can go and mind their own buisness.I'm going to order a fleet of wa warships and close all the Calverinian ports ad and Glandelinins also ag against all in coming Glandelinian ships, I'll blockade all the Glandelinian ports and give them something that will open their eyes.''

Indeed ever since the child slave trades had been going on there had always been ill feelings between the two nations.The chief inareason wa was of the interference of the Angelinians now during the Glandco-Abbi cannian war when several times the Glandelinian armies wereforced to leave Angelinian soil, and fight their battl es in their own country against Angelinian invaders.

Ot her rasons were because all the christian children who were banished to the island prisons were refugeed by the Angelinians, who raided the Angelinian or island prisons with war and transport ships to get and free the poor unfortunates. The Glandelinians were themselves the cause of the Glando- Glandco-Abbisannian war, and the Abbisannians who had abused them did it justly, because Abbisannia then owned Calverinia and would have no slave trades goin on there.
Late that very afternoon of the earthquaks caused by the bombardment all observed to the westward over Jennie J Turner another ominous cloud black as sack cloth and knew that it was one of those very peculiar fire which always hearlded an approaching battle at some point of the besieging christian lines and w hich was going to rage.Ther fears were not wrong.
That day Violet and her sisters had recited this prayer asking Almighty God to end th e miserable war that was raging;

Hail Queen of peace,look down oh sweetest mother,
From north to south,from east unto the west,
See how the nations warring'gai nst each other,
Take from the world human lives the best.

Priests and Religious, men of every station,
Giving thei r lives for country and for ho me,
Oh dearest Mother, humbly we petition,
Plead with thy Son for love and peace to come.

He'll not refuse to hear thy earnst pleadi ngs,
E'in as he did in Cana of Galilee,
Hearken then, Mother, to our heartfelt yearnings,
Send peace and love, as gifts from him and thee.

Then joyful heart s shâ shall kneel around thy alter
And grateful psalms around the world shall ring,
Never our faith in thy sweet power can falter,
Lady of peace and mother of our King.

CHAPTER FOURTY SIX

THE BATTLE OF DROWSABELLA T UNGER.
RAGES LIKE A TYPHOON SWEEPING THE LAND.
THE CHRISTIAN LINE IS LIKE A SHIP WRECK.KINDERNINE IS WOUNDED AND HANSON THREATENED WITH DEFEAT.

Quicker than words ca can tell that black cloud they had noticed rapidly overspread the sky over the city and a dull leaden darkness as if a storm was approaching fell over everything. Another great fire was raging i n Jennie Turner.

At the very first shock of the attack of the screaming fiends in gray a good port ion of general Kindernines line which recieved it was hurled back with their divisions torn in pieces and all other port ions of generals Hansons lines faced such heavy seas of humanity that it was only a question of hours probably moments if they would hold out or not.General Hanson was therefore forced to hurl forward his own right grand division upon the enemy at Drowsa belle Turner to try to save his other divisions from meeting disaster and the roar of the wild bat tle became terrific.The situation along the whole christian line was des perate. The whole of Kindernines army seemed at the mercy of the fur ious attack which steadily grew worse as the numbers of the assailants increased and Hanson had to concentrate heavily upon Kindernines assailants to restablish order at all points and the thunder of many cannons all along the whole line was earsplitt ing.The whole of the christian line seemed and was the sport of the terrific assault and waves after waves of Glandelinians swept onwad after each repulse and the ominous yells of the foe was dreadful and was heard plainly amid the roaring of the cannons. Every one who witnessed the battle and who were held in reserve feared that the whole christian position would be wrecked by the raging assault and suddenly as the batt le was increasing in fury and gradually extendeding along other points of the christ ian line genral Hanson saw a big column of men rushing to the rear and the hi lls far in the distance called Mt Calverine which had loomed high from the curve of the valley facing the enemys position soon became obscured in smoke and a deafeni ng uproar that was incessant came from that direction and the air was full of bursting shells.

The panic stricken column of men was streaming with all possible speed to the rear and general Hanson sent a cavaly force to stop them and force them to rally just as the waves of Glandelinians now sallied over other portions of the christian position and along general Kauffmanns lines in immense waves of humanity and as the whole christian line broke and streamed rearward Kinderning who strove to rally them fell severely wounded and was borne to the rear with thirteen other generals who also were wounded. It seemed now as if both the retreating christian forces and the enemy were having a race. Then suddenly general Hanson managed to throw forward his first line of reserve and the battle increased with redoubled fury and in the gleam of the bayonets of both sides general Hanson saw that the battle storm was wilder than before the assaulting lines hurling themselves against general Roswell Buster Johnstons lines.There was a terrific crash of musketry and cannon that fairly shook the earth like a severe earthquake, followed by a stupend ous shock-and the Glandelinian wave had dashed itself to pieces against Roswell Buster Johnstons lines but nevertheless the whole christian line was as well off as a wrecked ship already stove i n, and the dead and wounded of both sides soon covered the snow covered plains and the works whi le the storm of explosions from the cannons of both sides raining s shells by the thousands formed a indoscriable chaoes of splin tered trees and twisted bodies and clots of dirt and snow. The battle as the christian forces were rallied was now raging with the most frightful fury and the enemy charging again and again in that mad med lam filled the air with their yells with the shriek like a million demons, while column after column of the enemy were shot to pieces by the ravaging christian cannon fire and general Hanson could hear ha above the roar of the raging storm of battle, the rending of timbers, the yells of the foe and other noi ses the screaming roar of other cannons and then as a more furious wave of Glandelinians a million strong hurled themselves upon the christian lines there came a roar like a million cannon and then all was chaoes a million fold while the foe line ri ven to fragments receded, only to rally and come again and again in quick succession. Again the worse of the Glandelinian waves dashed themselves against the roaring, screaming, thundering christian line. At this moment most of Hansons line was broken and was retiring to the rear once more and as the christian batteries tore the main gray line to pieces again and again it was apparent that the highst fury of the battle was on and news came also that gensal Evans himself was advancing heavy forces to the rescue and so was general Vivian and so general Hanson who felt he was threatened with defeat felt surenow that the enemy would be re pulsed. Heavier waves of Glandelinians however approached and a hu e ocean of Glandelinians over the length of ten miles swept forward like a huge tidal wave against the rallyi g christian line and only losing its fury when the reinforcements coming in the neck of time tore and galled the mighty wave, and with the help of the annihilating cannon fire drove it back to the foot hills of Drowsabella Turner and far beyond. General Vivian at the same time ari ved with heavy reinforcene reinforce ments and smashed the enemy in the vinicity of prowsabella and drove every line clear back to their own works in a total disgraceful rout, and Manley had to train his batteries and gall general Vivians a advancing lines to stop his ravaging persuit of his own troops.

After thi s the battle showed rapid signs of abatement and was over by evening the enemy being driven out of every position they had cap tured and routed back to their own main line. Two hours later the Angelinian artillery ceased its terrifying roaring and all was still and quiet once more. The losses on both sides was dreadful, unaccountable but neither side would report the actual number though general Hansons men collected 10,000,000 Gladelinian wounded and disabled and captured three million prisoners. That evening after the terrific battle general Hanson and his brother with twenty other generals decided to have the bombardment started in general and t o see first if the terrible activ ity of Mt Calverin e was true.If possible then why should he delay the bombardment which general Evans was already making for his positions were on that hill.

In the meantime Violet and her sisters went out scouting also ad and after two hours of climbing over masses of wreckage caused by the battle they reached the base of a certain hill and on a pa part where it was not so steep to climb, but yet would take all the more longer to ascend. This was the f part facing Mt Calverine and also on the summit of which was an immense batter of cannon and strong positions existing. Unknown to them the little girls were under the position of the enemy. The little girls did find a lot of peculiar kind of sulphur by throw ing a lighted match on a peculiar pink rock.Thi s quickly flared up with a detonation causing a quickly spreading conflargration on the mountian side. But by the help of a lot of dust and snow they managed to check the spreading fire wishing to take a lot of sulphur along with them as they returned tward the christian lines. They now rested after a little more climbing finding ravines and crevasses hindering their pa path pa th path. As they were climbing slowly tward the summit Violet gave a cry of surpri se and pointed to a big serpent with the wings of a butterfly climbing up tward them. After a good while they all recognized that it was one of the plengiglomenean serpents and so they were not afraid and they were warned by it that the enemys position lay at the top of the ridge and cautioned the little girls to be careful. It then flew into the air and was gone. One astonishing adventue adventure about the ridge they were climbing happened on the night of decem ber the twelveth.The base or pa part of it at least hd was greatly cavernous and Angelinian a engineers were working in these caverns setting mines with which to wreck the ridge and all the foe on ot it. Violet and her sisters were indeed having a hard climb and the sun blazed dazzlingly on the white snow and blocks of glassy ice and cold as it was, with streaming pores they panted from the exceexertion. T here were places criss-crossed by countless fussi fissures and crevasses where an hour of dangerous toil advanced them no more than a hundred yards. They now stood on the edge of a big crevasse it being ernormous and ancient, fully a hundred feet across with sloping age eaten sides instead of sharp angled rims. At this one place it was bridged by a huge mass of pressure hardend hardened i ce and snow that wa was i tself half melted below. Even the bottom of this mass they could not see much less the bottom of the cev crevasse.Crumbling and melting under the intense warmth below it the bridge threatened imminent collaspe. There were signs that recent portions had broken or melted away and even as they studied it a mass of half a ton

"Looksp pretty bad."Joice admitt ed with an ominous head shake."But we ha have got to tackle it or we'll nev er get back.We are almost at the cump now since we left that ridge with the enemys position on it n and don't want to be de,layed any longer. Anyway i ts one at a time, and it is me first ."

Joice took a coil of rope she had with her.

"You my sks sister Jennie will hav e to cast off.I'll take the rope. Give me your hand so I can slip down easily."

Slowly and carefully she lowered herself the several feet to the bridge where she stood making final adjustments for the perlious traverse. On her back was her pack outfit around her nec k resting on her shoulders' . She coiled the rope one end of w ich which was still fast to her waist.The pick and the long stick she used as a alkenstock. which she balanced horizontally after the manner of a rope walker. She trust one foot forward tentavely, drew it back and steeled herself with a visible physicd effort . Her foot went out to rest this time carefully and li ghtly while the other foot was brought up and fast.Very gently and circumspectiv ely she continued on her way untill two thirds of the distance was covered. Here she stopped to evamine a depression she must cross at the bottom of which there was a fresh crack. The others watching saw her glance to the sd side and down into the gulf itself, and then began a slight swaying.

"Keep your eyes up."Violet commanded sharply."Now go on."

Joice obeyed, nor faltered on the rest of the yourney. The sun eroded slope on the further edge of the gulf was slippery and quite cold but not steep and she worked herself up to a narrow ledge ,faced h about and sat down. Then three more of the little girls and two others doing as joi e joice did and more cautiously came saftly across, untill only Jennie remained behind.

"It's your turn across now."Joi ce called to Jennie who was the last one to come."But just keep on coming and don't look down. That is what nearly made me fall.Jusy Just keep on coming that 's all and get a move on for its almighty rotten by this time."

Balancing her stick horizontally Jennie boldly started across the very passage. T hat the bridge of snow and ince was weaker was no mistake.

Under her feet she felt a jar, a slight movement of the mass, then a hew heavier jar. This was followed by a single sharp cra crackle. Behind her she knew that something was happening. If no other reason she knew it by the strained faces of her sisters.From beneath her and faint came the murmur of runni ng water and jennies eyes i nvoluntarily wavered to a glimpse of the depths. She jerked them back to the way before her. Two thirds of the way she came to the depression.The sharp edge of the crack thoughly though slightly reached by the warmpth below showed how recent it was. Her foot was lifted to make the dangerous stel step across when the crach began to slowly widen at the same time emitting ernormous sharp snaps. She made the step quickly increasing the stride of it but the worn nails of her shoe skated on the furthor slope of the depression. She fell on her face and without pasue slipped down int o the crack her legs hanging clear her chest supported by the stick whic which she had mmanaged to twist crosswise as she fell.Her first sensat ion wa was the nausea caused by the sicking upleap of her pulse, her first idea was surprise that she had fallen no further. Behind her was crackling and jar and movement to which the stick viberated. From beneath in the war mpth of the crevasse came the soft and hollow thunder of the dislodged masses strking the sides. And still the bridge broken from its farthest supports and ruptured in the middle held though the portion she had crossed had tilted downward at a pitch of twenty degrees. She could see Joice perched on her ledge her face b feet braced against the rough surface swifting recoiling the rope from her shoulders to her h hand.

"Wait"She cried as her other sisters were wide eyed at their sisters peril."Don't move or the whole shooting match will come down."

She calculated the distance with a quick glance took the handkerchief from her neck and tir tied it to the rope and increa increased the length by a second handkerchief from Violet. The rope manufactured from Cat-O-Nine-Tails Cat-O-Nine-Tails and short length of plaited sawhide knotted together was both li ght and s strong. The first cast was luck as well as deft and Jennie clutched it. She evidenced a hand over hand crawling or inten tion of crawling out of the crack, but joice who had refastened the rope around her own waist stopped her.

"Make it fast around yourself as well as under your shoulders."She ordered."That's right under the shoulders. Make it fast. Now start. Get a move on but easy as you go. I'll take in the slack.You just keep a coming.T hat is it.Easy.Easy."

I059.

Jennie was st ill a dozen feet away when the final collasp of the bridge began. With a terrible noise, and in a jerky way it crumbled with increas ing tilt.

"Quick "Joice called coili g in hand ove hand on the slack of the rope. whi ch Jennies rush gave her. Jennie came crawling into the hard face of the wall of the crevasse while her body dragged back with the falling bridge. Joi ce sitting up feet wide apart and braced, was heaving with her her all her might onthe rope her sistes helping h er. This effort swung Jennie in to the side wall but it jerked joice out of her niche. Like a cat she faced about crawing wildly for a hold on the snow and ince. Beneath her was fifty feet of rope, between her jennie was xl clawing just as wildly and ore the thunder from below announced the sma smashing of the bridge both children had come to rest. Joice had achieved this first and the several pounds of pull she and her sistes sisters were able to put on the rope had helped bring Jennie t o a stop. Each lay in a shallow niche but Jennies was so shallow that tense was the strain of flattening, sticking nevertheless she would have slid on had it not been for the slight assi stance she took from the rope. She was on the verge of a bulge and could not see beneath her.Several minutes passed in which they took stock of the sit uation and made rapid strides in lea learning the the art of sticking to cold and slippery stone wa was a difficulty. Joice wa s the first to speak.

"Gracious that was acloso call."And a mijute later."If you can dig in for a moment and slack on the rope I can turn over. T ry it."

"Jennie made the effort then rested on the slope again.

"I can do it."She said."Tell me when you are ready."And be quick about it. About three feet down is holding for my heels and it won't take a moment ."

"Are you ready!"Asked joice.

"Go on."

It was hard work to slide down a yard, turn over and sit up, but it was harder, even harder for Jennieto remain flann flattened and maintain a position that fras instant to instant made a greater cal l upon her muc muscles."

As it was she could feel the almost perceptible beginning of the slip when the rope tightened and she looked up into joices face. Jennie noted thewhite paller of her face and wondered what her complexion was li ke. But when she saw Joice fumble for her sheath knife she decided the end had come.She freared joice was crazed by the scare and was going to cut the rope.

"Don't mind me."Joice said without a ring of fear."I ain't a bit scared. I'll be all right in just a minute."

And Jennie watched her double over her shoulders between her knees holding a tight tensio n on the rope with one hand, while with the other which had the knivknife she hacked and gouged holes for her heels in the hard frozen earth. As for herself it was more nerve racking strain lying plastered against the stone without nothing to do but strive to stick on, while the rest of the little girls watched their sister with gaping mouths. A scream and a quick cry of hold on warned jennie. With her face down or pressed against the stone she made a supreme sticking effort, felt the rope slacken and knews knew by the screams of her sisters that joice and her sisters holding on to her were slipping tward her.She did not dare look up untill she felt the rope tighton, and knew that joice with the help of her brave sisters had again come to rest . Holding the few pounds of strain necessary for Jennie with her left hand joi ce again jabbed and chopped the frozen ground with her right for ten minutes making ha heel holds and hand holds for Jennie. Five minutes later the upward struggle began. Jennie after drying her hands on the inside of her arm sleeves clawed into the climb, belli ed, and clung, and stuck and pla plast ered, sus tained and helped by the pull of the rope. Alone she could not have advanced despite her muscles because her her serious handicap she could not cling as did joice who was stronger. A third of the way up where the pitch was now steeper and the rocks less eroded she felt the strain of the rope decreasing. She moved slower and slower. Here was no place to st op and remain but most of her most desperate efforts could not prevent the stop and she could feel the downward slop slip beginnig.

I060. '802

Jennie felt the rope taunten in a futim futile effort then the pace qquicke quickened and as she went pat her previous lodgement and over the bulge the last glimpse she caught of joi ce, she was turning over and madly moving hands and feet, striving frantically to overcome the dowadownward draw. To Jennies surprise as she went over the bulge there wa was no sheer fall.The rope s restrained her and she slide down a steeper pitch which q quickly eased untill she came to a halt in anothet niche on the verge of another bulge. Joice was now out lf of sight enconced in the place previously occupied by Jennie. An interval of quiet followed. Jennie could hear the ring and metallic strike of the knife and hack of the knife and occasional dribbles of rocks and los loose earth slide over the bulge and came down to her. Then she heard a gasp that slide into a shriek of despair and felt a slackening of the rope that made her claw. Immediately the rope tightened again. Straining her eyes in an a upward look alongthe steep slope she stared a moment then saw the knife point first slide over the verge of the bulge and down upon her.She tucked her cheek to it, shrank from the pain of cut flesh tuc ked more t ightly and felt the knife come to rest.

"I 've lost the knife."Came the wail down the crevasse.

"Chee c heer up I've got it."Jennie announced."Say wait.I've a bit of string in my pocket."

Jennie found she had none and then joice cried down;

"I've got some string in my pocket ."I'll drop it down to you and you send theknife up."

Suddenly a small pocket knife weweighted on a knife on a stri ng slid down the rock. Jennie got it oppened the larger blade by a qii quick effort of her teeth and one hand and made sure that the blade was sharp. Then she t ied the sheath knife to the end of the string and called;

"Haul away."

With strained eyes she saw the upward progress of the knife. Then the slow minutes passed. Jennie centered her soul on the dull hury of a hang nail on one of her fingers. She should have clipped it away that morning it wa was hurting then she decided and she resolved once clear of the crevasse that it should be immediadely clipped. A gasp and a grao groan and an abrupt slackening of the rope warned her. She began to slip but the movement was very slow. The rope t ightened loyally but she con timued to slip.Joicecould not hold her and was slipping with her? Then vaca vaca ncy. The digging toe h of her fart hest extended foot encountered vacancy and she knew that it was over the stairway fall.And she knew too that in another moment her falli ng body would jerp joice with it.Suddenly the rope ran over a slight piece of rocks the strands parted and Jennie felt herself slide more rapidly and then fall. What happened then she did not know. She was not unconscious but it happened so quickly and so unexpectedly. Instead of falling to her death he fe feet almost immediately struck water.And she sat violently down in water that splashed coo coldly upon into her face. Her first impression was that the crevasse was shallower than she had imagined. And that she had saftly reached bottom without fal falling int o any deep roaring stream of water. But of this she q was quickly mistaken. The opposite wall wa more than sixty feet away.She lay in a babasin formed like an ourjut of the wall by melting snow that dribbled and buckled over the bug bulge above and fell sheer down a distance of a dozen feet . Where she sat the water was a foot deep and it was flush to the rim. She peered over the rim and looked down into the wide chasm. hundreds of feet to the t orrents of water that roared and hissed along the bottom . From the other side now Joi ce left and went around to where Jennie was the rope having broke on her thus having caused Jennie to fall to the basin.She threw a rope down to her and with the help of her sisters now succeeded in drawi ng her up. Violet and her other sisters looked at Jennie with glowing eyes while joice was bui sy coiling the rope just as a furious downpour of snow came on and lasted for several minutes and then stop stopped only to start in again gradually. Looking in the direction of the ridge called Mt Calverine they saw that the whole summit was still covered with wreaths of smoke and suddenly they were startled by a strange grumbling sound and as they gazed tward the distant ridge they saw columns of thick white smoke rise into the air succeeded by three long streams of longer smoke clouds which spread over the summit of the whole mountian and then the ridge was gradually hide in the ever in creasing snow pall.

I065. Sude Suddenly behind them there was a wild yell and they saw a swarm of fierce hooded Glandelinian and landelinias coming after them as fast as they could gallop on the horse through the deep snow.

"Gracious we must run."Gasped violet ."The T hey are the Gargolian Kurds ."

By making a speedi speedy decent down int o a small ravine, and then across two roads the little girls just in time managed to r un into a large body of Abyss inkilians and were thus saved from assassination and the Gargolians seei ng the Abyssinkilians beat a hasty retreat after deliv ering a volley at rao random. As the little girls proceeded tward t he christian lines under their esc port ing guides of Abyss inkilians they saw in thedirection of the onemys lines apparently in front of general Evans position, what appeared to be signs of volcanic eruptions ans at first thinking it was such they stopped to look on i n awe and saw that it was a series of great explosions sending forth great clouds of smoke and debris that was fairly stumpendous nd so the little girls deci ded that it was best to get back to the christian lines whi le the going was good. The scene before them was apparent that general Evanshad started a general bombardment of Jennie T urner.

Meanwhi le this slight scene was invisible to general vivian who had his own lines concentrating for the final effort, but during evening he saw a slight lurid glow.It took them over an hour to reach the christ ian lines and just in time for a furious storm of explosions broke inthe air above them, there was a horriblehissing roar and many kinds of missles fell all about them but no one was struck. Two hours later after some more trying experiences violet and her sisters were again at general Hanson headquarters.That same day general Hanson recieved another letter from the King of Glandelinia and general Hanson after having read the first few lines said;;;;;

"The rascal now wants me to abandon all the Calverinia refugees to the Glandelinian aurthorities to be massacred within a weeks time. Ha I don't care what they say or think t he king will soon hear that Jennie T urner iskilled.I have enough armies and money t crush all the rascals pitched against me if I want to. We bought the country from the Abbisannians and we are going to keep i t."

"But why do they want us to leave the Calverinians in the pows of the Glandelinian aurthorities when they know you won't do it!"Asked violet as her sistes crowded around him straining straining their little necks to look at the letter over general Hansons shoulders.

"Don't you know violet, and your sistes too, that also the Glandelinians, and Abbisannians are enemi es and had a number of terrible wars with each other!"Answered general Hanson."Well they don't want us to protect the Calverinians for it will enable us to easily win this war and also t hey knew that the Abbisannians are the onlyones powerful enough to -overcome their child slave horrors. Other nations have declared that the Glandelinians were more wicked and brutal than the most fericious Indians or other savg savages, worse than any barbaric nation and the strongest of all nations fully prepared for war is Abbisannia and Abbisannia is only looking for a chance to pitch in with us."

"Abbisannia strongest of all nations."Gasped Jennie."I did not believe that Abbisannia is so strong theugh we do know from reading the history that Abbisannia did defeat the Goandelinians in all the wars also the war of I84I....."

General Hanson did not write any l answer to the two letters of the wicked wicked Glandelinian king but to prove that the Ki ng was tampering with a dangerous nation or i ts two dangers dangerous leaders at leas t, he set the decree that all the Calverinian seaports andriver ports were to be closed against against all Glandelinian ships and that all the Glandelinian ships that tri ed to force thei r way into the Calverinian port s were to be interned or destroyed. All that evening Mt Calverine was capped with thick rolling white clouds though despite the still small glimmer of daylight a flashing storm of glares could be seen flashing back and forth along the ridge though no sound was heard. The next morning came with a thick sulphurious atmosphere.Along general Hansons line everything was in a dead silence. Horses strained at their work of pulling up big guns to the position but looked at their masters with strange eyes. And caresses could not c omfort them and they wereunassured by words though after their work of hauling the big guns they were brought far to the rear. When a dog by a terrific lunge br oke its restraining tethers it dashed away howli ng int o the distant wilderness.Even door yardfowls here and there among the christian lines deserted their coops seeking refuge at the margin of some frozen stream. Wolves even failed to show in their appearance though they were seen in herds the day before.

T he other port ion of the christian armies whose troops were intrenched in the thick woods and scouting parties, and trench diggers, and fortific ation builders and other travelers on the dim trails saw the creatures of the air, and animals of the forest flying in one general direction, as if pursued by some foe that struck greater terror than a man or beast. They indeed seemed to fee fear no man or beast. Scarcely would evd even Calverinian rattlesnakes or other wild animals like wolves or mountian lions or phanters lift their heads in sight of a man or move out of his pāh path t o let him pas. A great t ragedy wasimminent for mature. The air was charged with a warning which men not soldiss soldi ers could read or underts understand.The very atmosphere wa was filled with a suk sulphurious fog mantle, the sun showing as red as iron under the smiths hammer far down near the eastern edge of the world.Nothing on the leafless trees stirred and stranger still general Hanson who was up early that morning was whooly surpsed to discovere discover that the enemy had receded from the Kauffmann positions that their big battei battet batteri es were in position, and far to the east near Mt Calverine the region was swarming with thousands of explosive puffs of smoke.General Hanson told his brother about the receding of the foe infantry at that section and of the concentration of their batteries and also not iced a peculiar change in on the summit of the ridge called Mt Calverine and also on other hills adjoining which seemed like three vivolcanoes very unquiet.

''I don't like the scenery on yonder hills.''Said general Gannon. ''The scene is very queer and the ground under our very feet is tremb ling in a peculiar manner and is that continuous thunder I hear or a coming earthquake, and what are those barrages of puffing clouds of smoke hanging over the enemys positions and plains, where the sounds are coming from?''

''There is a rumbling sound from the hills too.''Said violet.''But is is funny that the enemy does not show any signs of action.''

''What is tha that funny noi se''? Gaspd general ivian as a que queer hissing noi se filled the air outs ide.

''It must be steam''Said Jennie.''Look how quuer the enemys lines seem to be acting.

''Suddenly a queer snarling sound seemed to come followed by a strange explosive sound, and general Hansons headquarters swayed nd and rocked to its foundation.Again the rumbling explosions came from the distance and seemingly underground, and every strong building in the christian lines and the fortifications made out of the towns and villinges seemed to be swaying. The terrible motion that appeared to be an earthquake seemed to travel from the mountian ridge calld Mt Calverine tward general Hansons position, and then came another from the west, but this was lighter than the first and was gradually over. Then another came and amid the tg thunderous roar from the distant hills there arose i n the direction of the shaken fortifications in the valley a lour irregular strange outcry of scores of thousands of voices pitched to high excitement and fury. Then a stream of soldi ers moving forwad across the valley seemingly wearing gray and within sight of the window of general Hansons headquarters responded by a uni versal shout and then those in gray suddenly became submerged in smoke for several minutes and then was observed to ret reat tward the Kauffmann positions in amaxi amazing confusion, while to increase the tumult a storm of explosions toppled over a score of the enemys fortified buildings on the plains, and then there was a surge of red whi ch blocked the retreat of the gray masses trward the Kauffmann trench es and the red column seemed to surge into -them, while out of other portions of the distant glens the terrified Glandelinians poured like living and tempest tossed waves before which the head of the advancing part in some mysterious cause,9 (which could not be observed as there was a sudden issueing of smoke clouds ) recoiled and was overwhelmed and seemed trodden down.

There was suddenly far to general Hansons left a roar like a thousand tons of dynimite exploding at one time espe especially from the direction of the ridge sounding very much like the roar of a volcanic eruption, and which made general Hanson very suspicious that something strangely queer was going on over there. Every face was turned tward it in great expectation directing their gaze by a sort of fascination not intermingled with a strange dread and fear, from the distant position of general Evans army, but to add to their fear, and to the suspicion of general anson and the others nothing was to be seen but the over increasing smoke clouds, while the ground during all the while the horrible roar cont inued quivered like a frightened child.

The cause of the other dt detonations general anson or the other generals could not tell, but the soldiers susps suspected that it was caused by some great explosions.Again at this moment the ground shook in a frightful manner. The mulitudes of the foe who had made the desperate attemt to capture the christian fortifications drew back further and further irrestibly widening the space between them and the persueing christians THey n knew by what not impusle. Suddenly the uproar and wind that accompanied it subsided and even the loud q ueer hissing ahd roaring in the direction of the hills seemed to sto as if a supernat ur al awe had seized even the brutal enemy arkies armies. At the presence of the queerly acting enemys lines which had receded and only the soft whispers of the soldiers, and even of the fright ened wol women and children refuged withinthe christian lines stirred the vast death like silence of the atmosphere, but a moment before a scene of retreating and persueing hordes, strange suspicious roarings, shouts of the panic stricken gray hordes running to and fro mingled with q ueer unearthly sounds and the screams of so many voi ces. It was if a typhoon sweepi ng with deafening uproar of elements over the lashed ocean had been suddenly stopped and followed by a great calm.

''This silence is dreadful.''Said Jennie.''I can hardly stand it.' It seems to stop the very heating of my heart.''

Every eye of the vast mulitude of christian soldiers seemed to fasten itself on the seemingly quieted hills in expectation of some dread even to come.It seemed to even resemble the people to be assembled before the Tribunal of Jehovah awaiting their good or bad sentence. Suddenly the silence which had been oppresei ve was broken by a crowd of children who gave vent to their feelings was a series of piercing shrieks and fell insensible to the ground.

There was a general thrill of horror yet the same awful stillness succeeded this fri ghtful interruption. Those series of intense shrieks had spoken for them all giving express expression and outlet to what they all felt . Suddenly a horrible vibrating detonation sounding like the discharge of a thousand canno n shook the very air it seemed and city and up into the sky from the summit of the ridge shot of column of blackest cloud followed by a torrent of glowing explosions and then a rolling cloud appeared along the enemys lines in front of hansons position there was a fearful hissing sound and shells keeping perfect time exploded high in the air over the christian lines.Before this fled the whole crowd of women and children, escaping in such haste from t he second volley of shells that they seemed to leave all their property to its fate seeking only their own personal safty while now the Angelinian guns were being loaded. Such a scene of confusion and fli ght as was witnessed now followed to the surprise of general Hanson who was suprstending the concentration of the christian batteries. T he whole mass of women and children nearest to the s scene of terror seemed to ruse in sudden retrograde motion resembling some furious backward draw in which thousands of children were borne a, along and crushed in the human torrent. It was not before the apparent advance of the enemy before which they fled it was from the shattering storm of shrap shrapnell explosions high in the air which rained a blizzard of missles down upon them and the position for the advance of the enemy was only a demn demonstration and the foe column was not strong enough to even advance a mile in its course and dare face the frowning christian batteries. They ran likechaff while a great cloud of smoke overspread the city once more in the direction where Evans had his own position. To the eyes of all the cloud seemed to become ablaze with fire under its lower foundation while through the edge of the advanced part of the cloud w vivid yets of flashes appeared like the very swords of the destroying angels and this caused such awe and apprehension that the other crowds of women anc c and children nearest to the danger thought only of flight and escape. In a few minutes all th e furt hest part of the city of intrenchments was cleared of every soul and some were still fleeing across the main stretches tward the christian rear. On looking tward the di rection of general Evans far distant position general anson and his staff who alone stayed at that dangerous location for a while saw that the cloud no longer advanced upward but how hovered over the eastern part of the city spreading out rapidly, but from its bosom seemingly a frightful discnarge of puffing clouds of different colors as it seemed was rising and the cloud above seemed full of flashes darting back and forth while there was going on the qu queerest sounds ever heard by man kind.

The mulitudes of women and children in the northern portions of the refuge camps were nearest to this scene and southing to escapewere pressed back tward the east the scene becoming appalling. The mulitudes of women and children were panic stricken on account of the approa approach ofa destructionan coming in one direction, a frightful torrent of shell fragments in another, and the black strange uprising clouds in t he east of them the mulitudes fearing to go either way trod upon one another, trampling each other underfoot, and filld the air wih shrieks curses and horrible outcries of mingled pd pain, rage and horror of a coming massacre. The earth seemed to shake ca ceaselessly while from the direction of the city cold gaseous winds escaped and rushed upon the christian lines with an awe inspiring roar and shriek. In the cloud there was a muffled roaring and thunderous explosions and as the cloud grew darker and darker terrible tempests of firing roaring like a hurricane of waves seemed to surge fort h from somewhere, and cannons seemingly along general ivians lines began to ra roar and crash incessantly and in a terrfying manner and the air seemed to be filled with yells from millions of voices. At the samw time away in the distance which had really terrified the mulitudes of women and children away in the distance along the whole stretch of plains from the direction of the Kua Kauffmann trenches saw an awful sight. A stupendous monsterous wall or wave of men that before all x seemed almost too impossible to be real wa was pouring over the trenches o in the valley from which purple columns were in a back- ward flow and from a different quarter there was a roar like that of a titanic avalanch.As it advanced forward it became an immense moving swarm that seemed to reach beyond the length of the large pld plains and the great wave of men r oaring in an awful manner with their "Devil Yell" and contorting their faces more hediously than the Indians could ever do came on at a swift pace before which the columns in purple were recoiling tward general Hansons main line, then some great noise as if something gave way res ounded with the roar of a thousand ad avalanches, and then there was an earsplitting roar that shook the very men off their feet as Hansons one long line of cannon let go in a rolling discharge of hell.

C... ...O.

T HE BATTLE OF MERCHAN.

Hanson had been at that time concentration most of his lines near Merchan nun a small creek and the rushing torrent of Glandelinians pu poured over all his trenches and breastworks carrying all before them though being shot down in mulitudes, and the violence of the blow tore the whole christian line asunder thousands dying in a moment and so fierce was the firing that the smoke grew so thick as to almost suffocate the fighters.The whole christian line was swept and torn to pieces in this desperate assault of the enemy the survivors being swept from the breastworks in confusion the progress of the Glandelinians flying all of the christian divisions back from their main position and many of the Angelinians who tried to r rally were massacred. This wave of Glandelinians was so strong that it was like a food and even poured through the company streets in a wild pandemonium of yells and firing the company streets were like deadly ambuscades of slaughter, and in one street thirty thousand Glandelinian lives were wiped out including thou twenty thousand others making a total of fifty thousand w who perished. T he assault was so determined, and desperate that it pushed clear to the rear of the christian line driving all before it at every quarter in hopeless confusion.It was surely apparent that the helpless women and children would have been reached had not Hanson used his quick wit s. He massed his main line of tremendous batteries upon th e wild assailants and bombarded the very christian camp committing incapble destruction and tearing to pieces many of the Glandelinian brigades piling the company streets in dead and wounded in gray and the Glandelinians were now like a ship stra st randed on the br beach. While the artillery held them in check the enemy set up a dreadful firing of fusmu musketry that made a sea of smoke within the christian line but general Hanson managed to throw his fresh divisions upon the enemy and after four hours of horrible slaughter and most desperate fighting the foe at last gave way but as the fragments of the way receded it carried many of the prisoners it had captured back with them.

T he next rally and assault of the enemy was more desperatebut during the second assault which lasted two hours a part of the gray line of attack had entirely disappeared in meeting the christian fire and the assault also soon was repulsed. The cloud of smoke during the time the first assa assault made its sweep had continued to hover ove the city of Jennie Turner but spreading out wi while its under part rolled likemillions of sponges and mushrooms shapes and seemed to lower threaten ingly over the city while along its front there appeared immense rolling white clouds resembling rolling cirus clouds at the approach of a storm, the whole cloud now hovering partly over the christian lins lines.The torrent of Glandelinians which had appeared to the second assault after farily rolling upon the christian lines and causing such a firing as to make the opposing lines look like two rivers of fire had reached the Kauffmann trenches during their recoil w here the survivors reformed and only the in describablt indescribble torrent of sheils that Hansons batteries rained over the plains probably exp exempted his lines from being reached by the left wing of the wave which had been galled and soon reced like the remainder. The stupendous pall from the cloud continued to spread and so thick it had become that the sun could not penetrate it though its light fell on the earth outside the city, but all the frontal part of the city was becoming covered or obscured by a strange orebus pall or shadow and shooting through the cloud could be seen the wild flashes like fire which made the scene the more hedious. It was a fearful sight and the cloud of smoke was the bla blackest kind ever seen blacke than any typhoon cloud. All the crowds of Angelinians who had repulsed the second assault of the foe watched them and the cloud and began to talk of it a d and wondered. Then besides to general Hanson and his other officers it resembled in shape the very cloud they had seen before during a great fire at Jennie Turner for it entirely becaus like the for of two gigantic wings more like some gigantic dragons spreading miles over the country, its outer edges being filled with countless convultions and a thick black discharge seemed to be falling.

There it now hung visible from the windows of general Hansons head quarters but they were somewhat used to its awesome presence and had not feared at the first, though they had been somewhat lost in wonder. The whole surface tward the east where it had lost its thicj thickness somewhat a seemed to be agated in tumultious billows and a red and st range supernatural darkness was now cast upon it from below, and the strange coloring was more fearful than any words could describe even more worse than the eclipse of the sun. What appeared to be earth- quake shocks cont inued at quick intervals and where the dead soldiers were still lying on the fields the earth and rocks had been rent by shell explosions t ombs of some cementery had been broken up and the bodies of other dead were torn up to the surface and exposed to all eyes and the whole region was in terror for all this was unaccountable, fearful and dreadful. All faces were pale and all looked as if some dread calamity hd had befallen the whole eart h as well as the city.

All this while there was a terrifying roar like as if there was the bursting of many brigades of cannon and all this time the cloud had become of indescribble blackness, while the portion rising over the city began t o have glowing interiors while again it seemed to advance and spread out with awful speed, spreading and expanding in the most appalling manner while a new kind of cloud riding from a valley united with the black cloud above but this cloud became of red hue under its roots throwi ng a weird light all over and not only Jennie Turner Mt Calverine and the c other hills or the enemys positions but the adjoining mountians, the surrounding country, the river, the christian line and positions w ere soon involved in the fearful black ness of the strange cloud which again was giving forth rising tore torrents of clouds that seemed to ascend from among the houses like some hedious smoke pillar from the mouth of hell and again came a strange murmuring sound from another portion of the christian lines . The retreat ing torrent of Glandelinians that had recently reached the Kauffmann trenches had become hidden by the w sackcloth blackness the most dreadful unearthly indescribble darkness overshadowing the surrounding coun try.After the appearance of newly formed clouds from one of the east end of the city where seemingly torrents of darting flashes and lights had glared like explosive flame from burning gun powder a sudden dead sepulchral suffocating silence had again seemed to come on, and of the hundreds of thousands of soldis soldiers who had been gazing upon the retreating enemy whose fury in the first assault had assumed such fear ful force, b every one now felt prostrated upon the ground in mortal agony so many had fallen.

Jennie purmer was almost blotted out of view but an angry red light as if it were a forest on fire was visible above the distant housetops or among among the houses shrouded in some parts by strange pink and white clouds. Everything else in the d r direction of the city and foe lines and part of the plains was obscured by the pall of darkness and the fearful shine of the flames of some burning village and probable conflargrations in and about the christian lines also flashed fiercely and fearfully and this made the scene around and above the universal gloom that was gatherining gathering to shine like some red hell shaped monster, sav e where a long glowing riverlet seemed to sear its way through some distant forest . As the darkness cont inued over the region the mulitudes of women ad and children now that all was again silent ceased the beat ing of their breasts and quieted their own moans and soon ar one to their feet but moved not for none dared stir from their place of new refuge and viewed the distant horrible depth of erebus gloom. They talked to each other in hoarse whispers.An undefinable dread was upon each mind for the sudden general eruption of the seige it was and the overspreading of the darkness from the smoke clouds from big fires ragin raging in and outside of Jennie purmer was as unaccountable as it was dreadful. Two long and fearful hours of this seemingly supernatural darkness continued in the direction of the city, and all this while the vast muli tude of women and children had remained fixed and waiting they knew not what.

Gradually but surely the cloud arising above the city seemed again to be lighted by a moving column of sheeted clouds of different form that spread under thesurface of the main cloud in that direction for a hundred feet at once while another vast arising cloud near its under base suddenly appeared t o be reddened to fire by arches of terrible spitt ing flashes like fiery lances seemi ng to blast the very air, the strange lights resembling something like flaring bursting shells under the cloud.At t he same time the darkness which had filled all the d air seemed to concentrate and gather about the city so that it became invisible save for the one solitary fiery cloud rising from the side. The cause was by thick clouds that was arising for that moment during series of great explosions ad and the general exclamanation of horror that followed this was suddenly checked by an increase of the terrible trembling of the ground from every direction so that vast numbers of women and children still viewing the scene were cast down, the r ocks were rent and thrown upward whilethe whole earth shook with the convulsive thr oes of an earthquake.However this earthquake wave did not sweep the city and had it done so every building would have crumbled into dust in one moment . The whole gorge near general Evans position on the Calverine ridge seemed to d isolve in fire, the surrounding hills seemed on fire and above another gorge and a solitary mountian appeared fresh clouds of smoke that formed seas of convultions above the ridges.General Hanson k now knew the meaning of the great cloud hovering over the city.General Evans was already bombarding the enemys position himself though the other parts of the christian lines was still quiet , and to try and stop him or oust him from the ridge the enemy had started fresh forest fires. The very sides of the wooded ridges seemed to become seared seared and while the mulitudes of women and children looked on in terror, and the soldiers in excitement and anger the whole of the suddenly many streams of fire gradually changed into one glaring sea forming a gigantic sheet of dazzling bright flames shooting high into the air, and from it p poured rays so bright that soon al of Jennie purmer and the country for a wi de extent became like a lighted red hell. The mountians seemed to be riven by vast chasms of rire fire and the snow covered cementaries were still strewn with the bones of the dead uprooted from the graves from the mysterious earthquake. The ridges seemed to be all on fi re and now another long fiery river of burning trees advanced upward tward general Evans position more larger than the other conflargrations and glowing fiercer than the distant conflargrations, and another started upon the forests in front of general Hansons positions and seemed to be aimed for the wach watchi ng crowds of people within the christian lines, while the soldiers shouted to every one to kep keep cool but nevertheless many of the women ajd children screamed in terror. Slowly another ridge seemed to burst int o flame and on the mountian sides where these fires raged, a resinous soothy vapor had now arose and mingled with the approaching black cloud and nature seemed to be s stifled under the storming curtainof fire gases.

Pe oplo panted for breath of untainted air, their lungs burned and their eyes became inflamed. But a for all this the christian positions on Mt Calverine had seemed to become oppressib oppresively quiet again and the air seemed to be suffocatingly dead. There was no carrying power in the air and sounds were muffled as if by a vacuum, while birds staggered t hrough the vaporous chaoes on bewildered wings, panting lost, in the cont inued darkness . Through a large woods at theright of Hansons positions there came at length o a timid wind sighing through the tall trees Despite it being winter the wind struck hot upon the foreheads of the crowds of soldiers pouring through it on their way to make an effort to check the flames, it burned dry upon their l , ruffled th e white fog for a moment soon to die away. Again it stirred like a cautious step of a thief, and again hotter and closer. It freshened steadily but did not roll away the thick white fog, and it was realized by the soldiers preparing to meet the conflargration that a tempest produced by forest fires was approaching adding to the terror of the distant violent battle that was really still raging with Evans and Hanleys artillery. The hurricane seized upon smaller fires as it advanced fanning them furiously, scattering them a abroad through miles of forests on the neighboring mountian ranges each falling spark to kindle a raging fire storm of its own.

The flames in flashing through the clouds of smoke like incandesent gases burned the woods like a hells caldron. H ot gases cont inued to increase whistling their sharp notes above the roar of the tempest of fire, and wind,and crashes of thousands of stretches of falling trees.

In the superheated atmosphere, it appeared to general Hanson about three days later as if all the world were afire. The flames sent spouting clouds of white smoke the condition of the fierce con flargration despite the three days hard fighting against it being something terrible for incessantly the roaring flames rose to th e height of nearly a thousand feet the storm of sparks flying over the neighboring hills like a blizzard bi blizzard of hell fire and increas ing the spread of the fire. On the hills where the timber was small but close together , small flaming limbs and masses of burning moss and the materila on the fir and evergr een t rees were carried all over the forest, the flames c atching the risinous foliage, andlong streams ers of pendent every evergreen moss with the hissing ros roar of giant sky rockets and shells. In a breath the tallest and proudest t rees on the mountian sides were stripped off their virdure, their blackened trunks hurled contemptously to the ground by the tempest that drove the wild ocean of fire before it.Never before had the enemy during seeige produce such a forest fire with the intention of break ing Evans plans but however the region before and to the front of Eva Evan s and Hansons position was thickly wooded trees being in many places only about three feet apart and mostly fir and evergreens and the enemy had set the blaze by igniting the tops by hurling flaming torches among them and by setting shacks and wooden houses afire at the same time.Thi s of course spread the fire in the quickest time possible. The very air above the hills was full of fire the tempest carrying the sparks all over the ridges looking indeed in the darkness like lava covered volcanoes. Even Pelee with its mud and lava deluge its gases, its clouds of death, was not one third as terrible as this winter forest fire, in its destructive fury.After the passage of the conflargration bodies of men who had died fighting it were found in the tracks of the great fire, or thawed water streams, on hands and knees, turned back in the direction from which it decended upon them. It had struck them with death suddenly, leaving in many cases scarcely more than theirbones Many of the dead could not be even identified. In many cases the bodies were entirely consumed, the watches knives, coins, and other things carried by the fire fighters being melted.

The fear t hat they might not be identified seemed to loom before these burned creatures at the last moments beforeand above the others. Wife mother, frig friends far away might never know, and might misjudge the dead. So the poor roasting wr etches took many means tp reserve from the flames, c ins, letters, cards, trinklet s by w ich they might be known. Some scraped with the last strength of their burning hands little holes in the eart h, put their papes in them, then flung their shrivle shrivled bodies down on the ground to die.

Some had only time to pla place the articles in the ground or under their chests, before the shrieking red death overwhelmed them.

They were found so, their names preserved to those from those they were devided and theinjury to the living and the scores of thousands of fire-fighters was more serious than the sufferings of the dying oness. Human beings had peished in greater mubers in worse calamiti es than this during the war, but never before had poor human beings, even fugitive men women and children lived through the to tortures which thousands of them endured in this raging firestorm when many of the fugitives fleeing from the dangers of the mountian, from shell fire of foe and christians alike, into gorges and ravines were roofted in seas of roar i h roaring shrieki ng flames, that streamed from hill top to hill top, the men, husbands, balcholers, and sons together with with even fugitive Angelinian and Calverinian soldiers who fiercely fought the flames there with desperation of despair, through hours and hours of terrific singing heat, while other thousands of fugitive fire fighters floundered through blazing woods, to frozen lake margins, to river edges maimed flayed, blinded, contorted. Trees were falling in every direction, the fire was fairly roaring, ad the wind c screaming, while for an hour during the furius furious increase of theforest fires, the continued activity of general Evans artillery batteries redoubled at times in a frightful manner becoming fearfully volent violent.The artillery along general Evans lines was now really making a most fearful nois noise ad a neighboring villiage was quickly reached by the retreating foe who were fleeing after having attempted to capture it and innumerable gaps peared among the Glandelinian columns and then a great swarm of fresh Glandelinians despite the ravages of the forest fires rushed again tward the fortified villiage but was overwhelmed by the christian machine guns which peltd canister as thick as a rainstorm.

This was also driven back but a new Glandelinian wave which extended ten miles in length forced its way through the sea of christian musketry fire but in four hours the foe were again turned back. In the meantime the forest fire was progressing onward over new mountian sides making the whole scene a pit of hedious red. Across an old burn strewn, with logs and forest debris streamed an unbroken roaring hissing fiery g flood of flames and a this point the sudden roar of explosions and the clamor of destruction became so great that nothing could be heard and the very air to the northwest of the second quater to the northwest of Mt. Calverine was so hot that it cut the lungs like the fumes of acid.. Steam from melting snow, gases ad smoke fumes were stifling while t he mulit uds multitude of fire fighters pouring through the half flaming woods to the sh southeast could be seen in the fantastic light of the terrible conflargration their i mpotent arms li fted up tward the sheets of homing fire shrieking prayers to the Almighty.

In these woods by the force of the screaming gale, the heavens seemed to rain fire, a and the logs even wet from the melting snow caught fire.It i mdeed seemed a marvel that the citt of Jennie Turner or the christian lines was escaping the peril as t hey did from the wall of fire, the flames moving in two directions closing on everything in its pa path. The unfort unate crowds of retreating fire fighters docontinued on their way through this broiling heat of the hot winds, swiftly through the stifling smoke, over beds of coals under the swinging menance of burni ng branches and tottering tree trunks. During the progress of the wild conflargration the s oke fog had grown so t hick that the course of the great avalanch of fire hadnot been seen by those in the overwhelmed villiage of Davi dson, but the dazzling glow it had thrown to the northward warned other towns of their perilsso that the villiagers hearing and seeing it fortunately had taken time for flight and escaped though their first peril was added by swarms of Turnerannians who strove to overtake and massacre the fugitives . Suddenly as the forest fires had been progressing there was a dreadful disgorgement of shooting flashes high into the air, and a storm of glowing embers seemed to be thrown upward to the distance of three hundred feet followed by a series of violent e exploding detonations that was worse than the heaviest of cannonding cannon ading t hat succeeded each other so rapidly for an hour as to produce a continuous uproar like the gradual discharge of nearly a million cannon which at that time seemed as if it was about to blow the enemys whole line to pieces, from where the d terrible din seemed to come. This terrible din had made a great tremor of the ground in and bout the city of Jennie Turner and the black cloud of suspended smoke at the same time seemed strongly elect rifi ed by the frightful friction of bursting shells so that the bright flashes of explosions pla played among the cloud like the supernatural skies of hell(if it had one) and the rolling of unearthly sound o f thundering crashes of the exploding shells in that cloud added to the indescriable cannonade along general Vivians line which had broken out and even cont inued long aft er the third frightful outburst. The icy waters of the Mc-Hollester Run river had been heated by the falli ng trunks of burning t rees which had pent it up in a dam of fire while tye fishes in the streams of the Mc-Hol'ester Run and Angoline Run its main branch had been broiled a and the smoke was so dens dense thā the crowds of fleei ng fugi ti ves had to hold each other to pre vent becoming seperated and lost ascit was impossi ble in spite of the giant flames and glow of sparks and embers to see anything a few hundred feet away. Falling trees which cont inually imperiled the crowds crashed about them rending their way to eart h through the limbs. The progress of the crowd of fire fighters and women and children fugitives at times had to be changed to other di rections by the columns of screaming roaring fire that sprang up like the Will-O-the-Wisp feeding upon air. After the third outburst of cannonading along general Vivians lines of heavy cannons a series of most violent detonations came from the enemys lines, the air was torn by a salvos of cont inued ex plosions which added to the scene of horror and the play of shell flashes added by the glare of fmales and flashes of other gr eat explosions made the immense battle field of Jennie Turmer as bright as pantes Inferno... Si multaneously there came an outburst of shell fire from general Kindernines batteries and trees in the woods not yet reached by the great conflargrations were shattered by the blasting force of explosions, and the roofs of thehouses among the christian lines were shattered and ripped by enemy shrapnell.Later after the bombardment people in Pounces-Woolia, Bondinia and elsewhere about two hundred miles away had stated in the news later that the explosions of the c canonading and shell bursts were heard there wi th Norma Catherine and with Jennie Turmer as a center. The fourth outburst of the artillery duel the next day had been a terrible one and thousands upon thousands of explosions rent the air every second and late in the morning about ten o-clock a most fearful ad avam avalanch of Glandelinians rushed across the plains and tore at the christian line under general Kindernine whose position was near Veronia Run while another part of the Glandelinian wave struck heavily against the right wing of general Vivians lines and then the forces of the foe after tearing and being torn collasped and fell back in confusion.The wave an hour after again came back against both simultaneously and the sound of the battle was like a thousand barrels of dynimite powder and T.N.T . blowing up every minute.

THE FURY OF THE BATTLE OF VERONIA.

Tobthe left grand center of general Vivians line already waves of Turmerannias advanced with the most resistless energy sweeping for ward with dreadful ferocity and for a time all was in confusion unti ll rei nforcements were thrown upon the foe and the ridge defended by the christians seemed split into glowing fissures by the streams of christian musketry fire but after two hours of hard fighting the foe finally finally recoiled and fled precipi tately tward their own lines.

The Glandelinian waves that made the next assault rushed against the christian lines with greater speed and fury and the destructive force of the Glandelinin Glandelinian charge was ernormous. Ordinarily the Glandelinians when making an assault take about fifteen minutes to cross a mile of open ground but this great wave of Glandelinians swelled by those who had formaly been repulsed had crossed the wide plain a stretch of two miles across in ten minutes a speed beyond anything known in the charges of an army of men and even across such a wide snow covered plain. Imagine a big avalanch of men traveling t ward you at the speed of two miles in ten minutes and you will be able to conceive in some measure the magnitude of the Glandelinian wave of men that had swept against general Kindernines and general Vivians lines.They had swept forward with unabated but undecreasing speed the christian musketry making almost an supernautral roar while the cannons tore and made avenues and jagged chasms in their lines. When the van guard of the foe reached the frontal point of the christian position it fairly became a mob of yelling screami ng human fiends with faces fearfully cont orted like real demons the christian line let loose a general musketry fire whose horrible roar wa heard for fifty miles, the whole gray mob in front was melted away, the survivors still tried to comebut could not face such a horrible blaze of musketry and cannon and recoiled, and the whole christian line like an overwhelming torrent of humanity swept forward and progressed on down the side but slowly but retaining the fury of their fearful musketry fire and the glow of fire was so dazzling that the Angelinians could see to do their work well and so rushed down the sides of the ridge with ungovernable furyv reaching the rear of the fleeing enemy with speed incredible by which no man can stand up against and fight, from which he could not fly and prisoners were taken by the whole sale the enem being persued clear across the plains and to their own position and then the Angelinian wave being checked and meeting too hot a fire from the enemys batteri es and fresh infantry recoiled back to their own positions positions.

Thus ended the battle with the foe again repulsed. Over a region of nearly thirty three miles the dark cloud was spreading its darkness and the air wa was gloom for the distance of nearly a hundred miles.The flood of fire hd had now been part ly hidden by wreaths of most blackest smoke and a river of burning trees nearly two miles long to the north was advancing slowly pa partly hn hindered by the fearful torrent of shell fragments from e Evans batteries which was a active continually and far to the rear where a portion of the conflargration was slowly burning u itself out, and at another point where a forest lately stood there was now spread a scene of desolation desolation and horror. Blackened trunks piled in the sport of that destructive fire storm like straws lay thick on the mountian sides and the nearest mountians wee glowing with new ly born fires spread by the violence of the wind. They stood stripped of limbs and bark gaunt skeletons in a pict ure of death. Miles upon miles of hills rolled away without a sprig of green from the ever-green trees to ease the melancholy wreckage and glow of smouldering fires. It was a miracle that the fires pas passed off from the direction of the besieged city of Jennie t urner and yet the city looked still more lovely for the desola desolation around despite the hellish glow of the distant flames and the dark clouds above. No one of the fugitives who took refuge inside of general Hansons headquarters though they seemed safe for the present did not dare to go out just then and from where they were they could plainly see the distant storm of fire which was now moving tward a gorge of the mountian with the speed of a wave and still tward the furious seaof main conflargration.

"My gracious I never know that the enemy could make such a scene and show such terrible outbursts with their attacks and cannon duels." Said violet with a shake of her pretty head as she vi ewed the scene from one of the sailents where she was behind a big gun."Now I certai certainly know what destruction the enemy c can do even if our own bombardment does not h arm the city as I feared it would."

"Yes and this is the worse forest fire and other ravages committed by the enemy I've ever seen."Answered general Hanson bitterly as he rode up. "My was not that a big wave of Glandelinians."Said Catherine."It's a wonder we escaped defeat as well as we did.All the other brigades of men were worsted before reinforced."

"I'm suspicious about this."Said little Hettie Vivian who had an inpet ious nature."Those white clouds near the ridges I see now are real powder explosio ns for little girl t hough I am I know powder smoke from smoke of fire."

"I'm suspicious that some Glandelinian spied on-us and learned on of our intentions."Said general Gannon."If the Glandelinin Glandelinian spy--"

"See interrupted Jennie excitedly."A bi g wave of Glandelinians have alred already struck across that little creek and look at the wall of smoke their firing is maki ng."

It was true to gener al Hansons surprise.A big flood of Glandelinians had again plunged across the open plains and the very sky wa seemingly covered with the smoke clouds of firing now along the christian lines o c once more. Violet and her sisters who were standing on top of one of the salients in their best purple blue clothes at the time looked very pretty. Violets richest gown of purple color reachi ng to the knees with a wide girdle of gold and her hair which was always worn loose and in brilliant golden curls and held by a gold band was fr f wreathed i n paper flowers and she and her sisters looked so pretty that all marveled that children could ever have such beauty. At this moment as some of the soldiers were watching the t little girls and also the scene before them violet and her sisters saw saw one of the fugiti ves a little black haired girl steal a frightened glance tward the great oncoming avalanch of Glandelinians which they saw had on account of meeting sesorious resistance divided into two parts one of which torn and shattered was falling back in comuf confusion, the other moving directly straight for general Hansons lines in his immediate region of the headquarters. Even from where they were the awful roaring of the battle could be heard and the shock even felt, and the little bla black haired litt le girl whose name was Annie Saunders rushe up to general Hansons side starring innocently into his face and cried; "Oh please lets go away at once.""I'm afraid that wave of wild men is going to get us and ki ll every one us of us."."

"Yes I believe we had better get down from here."Said violet as she and her sisters suited the action to her words."We may perish if that fearful wall of men strikes because we would be exposed to the g heavy firing."

"Where do we go if we do go away?"Asked Hanson of thelittle girl."For the enemy-----"

General Hanson was interrupted by Angeline vivian who was runni ng up to him followed by general Baldwin as he tripped on a root of a tree and accidentally seized her rou hly as he fell sprawling nearly knocking general Hanson over on top of himself. Little Annie fell on her knees in terror before Hanson and said clasping her hands;

"Oh please don't let the Glandelinians catch us.They will kill us all. Dear kind general do not let us perish. Oh ples e take us away."

"Linten little girl."Sai d Joice."Be quiet and do not be so foolish. Theywon't get near us.You are only acting like a coward."

Suddenly t here was a roar as if the heavens was bursting and general Hanson saw truely that they were a good deal safe were they were as the enemy could not progress any further. So he dropped his hand to his side while violet taking the scared little girl in her own embrace said; "We don't want all our soldiers to run away from here and ley let you and the other children with their mothers and fathers perish little girl/ and you cannot escape if we did such a thing.Our armies can turn them back easily enough for if the enemy continue to advance they will only run themselves bodily into the range of our best artiolery and surely they will for can't you see the speed with which the bad mans are advancing?"

"If we could throw upon them some fresh troops before the foe over whelms the denfer defenders I think we could give the Glandelinian attackers a good spanking."Said general Baldwin staggering to his feet."But of course it may be needless and we are perfectly safe here for something will soon cause the enemy to be checked in their headlonf advance."

"Oh let 's go ."Moaned the poor frightened little girl."Oh please let's go."

"Don't be a fool little girl."Said Hettie. Just trust in God. We cannot be in peril at such a distance from the attackers who are down in the valley as you see and there is a, ll there is to it."

"We will all die if we don't."Said the child sadly.

"No we are safer here."Said Catherine."The enemy can't get far intheir attack through that smoke clogged ai r and breathe in the deadly gases."

However it happened as general Hanson and vi olet and her sisters had expected it would. T he christian batteries were in the way of the foe and finally checked their onslaught though it caused a great com motion along the whole christian lines. Violet and her sisters who were g again on top of the sailent with their hair loose and streaming like golden cataracts thanked God indeed when they saw the second portion of the wave of Glandelinians checked by the christian artillery but the great firing incessantly kept the scene before them in volume of thick white smoke and soon great jets of fire began to burst forth among the enemys receding lines a as the christians let loose motar bombs and also a storm of sparkler like explosions began to tear the air in un unlimited quantisis. The evidence was clear that the barrier of christian artillery which had checked the wave of Glandelinians made the situation really worse than expected. T he slaughter was fearful and for a time the enemy tri ed to rally and then broke and fled in confusion and a sa sea of smoke closed on the scene.

T he great clu clouds of smoke from the distant forest fires were wonderful in shape seeming to mount to an indescriable shape to drag anything living down into the abyss of hell below. They came wreathing up like exhalations from an enchanters den tw twisting themselves int o fantastic shapes tha seemed to stretch forth arms to seize the city, amid all the horrors of the fire flood, battle, turmoil and deafening uproar and all this while to the hears of genral general Hanson and the little girls they were almost deafenend and stunned by a demoniacal orgy of sounds.The glandelinians who were still attacking were fairly shrieking, groaning, howling and bellowing in thousands of different assents & once while over all dominated the deep booming roar of thousands of cannon that had threatened the glandelinian wave with destruction before it was checked. There seemed to be voices in the uprom uproar heard but faintly, voices there that were not articulate to human ears. General Hanson and the restof the generals could not distinguiseh any of the words and yet the voices were full of meaning. They seemed to wail and to invite, to mut murmur and to threaten and they wereclearly distinguish able amid the hed ious sounds of the cannon duel along the enemys and gener general Evans lines. One of the distant hills in front of g general Vivians lines was crowned with great Hemlocks ad and fine bu bi rch whose fine white thrunks were now smouldering and were bent down at a most perilious angle and hunge over the edge of a precipitice nodding to their own expected fall when t hey vurned through. Gener al Hanson and his othergenerals could see i ndeed that the enemy were going to be pretty hard to whip. Whole districts of trees had been swept by flames ignited by t he enemy which had been one of the most spectalular sights ever known. At times from nonew conflargrations bl bulging clouds would arise with glowing fiery billows which spread out in the shape of cirrius clouds but assumed a yellowish color the underpat under partof the cloud having t he weird light or tint, t he color of Salmon which shaped on its edges like long feathery streaks of delicate spray. The flames still raging among the forests sent up blaci and appalling clouds of smoke and all during this day of unspeakable horror some portions of the main christia christian line had met sea after sea of the foe attacks untill all of the Angelinian columns melted away while the hard battling reinforcements heavy with the weight of the pressureof the glandelininn assaults upon them were being crushed back despite the fact that they returned the sledge hammer -blows and only to meet a headlong swoop of the following seas of glandelinians that went sweeping furiously on.

Along general Roswell Buster johnstons lines from t he force of the glandelinian assault t he christian line was jarred wildly and a t idal wave of glandelinians catching a portion of his army on its rear flung them broadside to those in front then the christian line was engulfed in the sweeping glandelinian billow and they faded away completely in the face of the enemys fire. The very branches of trees far ahead of the dvancing storm of flames were swept clean as the trees swung to the gale and any one could have gazed into t he smother at the dishelveled tops of the burning t rees and seen that the worse of the conflargration w was coming almost hidden by the storm of smoke as it was. One big wal wall of flames advancing through the northern section of the woods poured on with an ominous roar the whole stretch becoming a mighty mass of seething flames. The wlods woods i n the nort h and south were in a wether of flames and an avalanch of fire x swept over the tree tops burning them t o a crisp in the incr easing fury of the conflargration the falling trees crashing like thunder and the jagged ranges of flames stretching away for miles roared on wi th a thunderous tumult and even along the battling christian lines every thing seemed to be going before the terrific blows of the seris series of Glandelinian onslaughts.Suddenly a burning t ree fell to the ground in front of general Hansons hed headq uarters with a terrific shock and in a moment it was caught by a giant flame burned top foremost untill every trace of it was gone. Far above the terrible conflargration a pack of fat black clouds all aglow rose up stacking themselves upon one another untill t hey resembled a huge pile of rounded boulders which a sudden puff of wind would have thrown down upon the plains and city if it were blowing from the west. During the afternoon along Hansons lines a seri es of violent blasts were now tr tearing upon his divisions like projectiles and now the battle was raging in redoubled fury and som the soon theenemys yells became like a screaming gale and never before during the seige had there been such an uproar of battle and the distant roar of fresh conflict along general Robert vivians lines was doubly frightful. All of the christian brigades to general Hansons left collasped like wooden houses before t he enemys desperate onslaughts and despite the numerous repulses the foe recieved the attack was only resumed with full force and to make matters worse the enemyset in a fire of shells whose explosions t hrew up into the air boldily whole houses dashing them t o splinters to the ground blocks away blasting to pieces with them the bodies of their occupants. T he very heavens to nt t he north and south were ablaze with the flames making so much light that both sides could see actually what they were doing, and the uproar of the battle was deafening.

I073.

Depite the din of the battle and fire storm, and roar of cannons, and the boom and bang of xploding shells general Hanson Vivian was amazed to hear petious cries of a child near the christian sailent . With his indescriable sympathies even inlisted for children he glanced quickly in the direct ion of the sounds and beheld in the light of the distant blaze a little infantile looking child of four years standing against the rear of one of the sailents where the shot and shell of the enemys guns was flying thickest and where the nemy was al also making a desperate onslaught but the little girl for the present seemed out of reach of the enemys raging musketry fire the little girl apparently gazing bewildered at the distant scenes and screaming away at the top of its lungs. Hanson ordered one of the soldiers to go and get the child and the soldier paying no attention to the dangers of the fire and battle hurricane quickly dashed for the sailent and approached on his hands and knees and a a at a single glance became deeply interested in the little waif. It had a face of singular beauty a dark Olive complexion lag large brilliant blue eyes c coal black hai r that now hung tangled and disordered over her shoulders and making a beauty magnificent to behold. Her little dress had been torn by some rough usseage of some sort and her hands and face were scratched by probably flying stivks and stones.

Evidently t he child was lost.The soldier approached while flying shells shrik shrieked and howled above in the sky andthundered frightfully in their explosions.The child turning t o gaze on him for a moment ceased her cries. Stooping down he pa parted the tangled elf locks of the dark little face and gazed long and earnestly in the bright eyes that fearlessly met his own. It seemed to him that he must have seen a face like this some where before in some child slave factory before the place was captured, and that it was connected with some dark memory, what , he could not tell. T he child looked up into the pale face of the Abyssinkilian soldier and artlessly lisped;;;;;;''''

''Uncle Hanson vivian....''

''Uncle Hanson vivian?''Gasped Gasped the soldier himself in surprise.''How in the world do you know the grea great generals name, Where is your mother little one?''He asked trying to make himself heard in the scream ing of the enemys yells and the shrieks of flying shot and shell and the booming of cannons and the crash of musketry.

''In Calverine with bad Glandelinians got them.''Lisped the little innocent as a crashing roar told that scores of glandelinian waves had reached the christian position, and also that scores of trees,were being torn up by the roots from theforce of mine explosions. The soldie was a a loss ad perhaps would have gone with the little one further away from the trenches had nota greater howl and yell of the near approach of the attacking nem enemy warned him not to. He did not deem it wise to venture into the woods in t he rear for a shell barrage were fairly blowing down all t he trees at a single broadside. Even where he was the concussion of the exp,osions of so many shells and the roar of guns buffetted him t he effect being like actual blows of the fists and being indescribable indescriable and the soldier with a herculean effort tried to burst through the storm of smoke at his immediate front but was immediately thrown down to the ground by the concussion of an explosion with t he child directly under him. Amid the crash and din of the storm of battle general Jacob Baldwin came riding up at that instant to Hanson just as the child was brought before him by the soldier and said;

''What are you doing out so far in front of the battle lines in this dangerous war storm governer general Hanson vivian?''Then catching sight of the litt le girls he burst out in surprise.''Well bless my soul if this child does not look like one of your neices.''

''Does this child look like one of them.''Asked general Hanson as the firing of the battle roared in redoubled fury.

''Yes your excellency and I saw her with some Glandelinians whenvthey tried to enter our lines yesterday.I believe she got left behind when they were seized by the sentries. I don't believe she is any property of theirs though, stole most likely.''

''Do you think so?''Asked general Hanson starting tward his head-quarters.''Why do you think she has been stolen?''

''Why my dear sir if she had been one of the children of the refugees who took shelter in our lines some of the women would have had her, but nobody seems to own this one or to even care about her in the least as they are now too terrified a the scenes they are wit ness ing before them.I saw s aw one of the wicked Glandelinians draw her along-side of the head yesterday andthen another strike her a blow that knocked her down.Goodness how my fingers were itching to do the same and worse to him....?''

General Hanson compassionately folded her in his arms with a sudden impulse.

"Poor little thing. Now I think it was more likely that she had been stolen for she cannot speak even Glandelinian. Carry her into the house where she will be safe. Her poor little hands and feet are all cut, half frozen and bleeding and he cannot allow her to perish during this fearful storm of battle. I wonder she was not frightened by the firing and the explosions and all the noise but she seems to take it in a if it was nothing at all. She is as fearless as a good little girl should be."

General Baldwin lifted the little child into his arms and followed the governer general to the main hall of the manison where he gave orders to have the little child properly dressed and cared for before presenting her to governer general Robert Vivian. He smiled as he listened to general Hansons story and followed him to the room where the little child now was washed and neatly dressed sat on the floor with Violet and her sisters playing with some toys. But as his eyes rested on the dark brilliant face, the smile faded away and a half puzzled a half doubtful look took its place.

"Is she not beautiful brother dear dear!" "Said Robert Vivian. "Does she not remind you of some dark bright Tropical flower!" He added in admiration.

"Or some bright winbow winged gorgeous butterfly!" Said Baldwin.....

"Yes" Said Governer general Hanson Vivian as the house seemed to sway in the force of the concussion of an explosion.

"But Governer general Hanson it does seem to me that I cannot account for it. I know I have seen her somewhere else before in some dingy child slave factory in Pounceo-Cee-Woolia."

"My goond goodness have you observed it too?" Cried general Hanson breathlessly as a storm of shells seemed to scream through the air over the house like a thousand demons.

"It was the first thing that struck me too." Said Baldwin. "How very singular. I suppose she resembles some one we sometimes see in total strangers. For there is no accounting for the strange likeness."

"Well what do youintend to do with this little bird of paradize you have caught!" Asked general Robert Vivian.

"Let her remain with Violet and her sisters. And I cannot account for the strange interest I fell in this little one Robert. I" Said general Hanson.....

"I should like to see the child you do not feel an interest in?" General Robert Vivian said smiling. "But are there no means of finding to wo whom she bā belonf belongs. Her parents may be living and and lamenting her loss even now dear brother."

"There are no means of discovering them." Answered Hanson. "So I have given her to you to do as youp pleasewith. Thechild is certainly very beautiful. I believe you love all children for God's sake?"

"Oh I do for my Sweet Precious Sacred Heart."

"Oh my Lord if this little one had blue eyes and fair golden hairlike Violet I could find it in my heart to adopt her for my wifes sake." Said Hanson.

"You would not let such a trifle as that let you be prevented you general Hanson. If you love children really like I do, I guess you had better let the child remain with you."

The distant screaming of the enemys yells by this time had became so thredening, and the noise of the firing so violent that poor Violet and her sisters had bet ook themselves to the dark corners and their feather beds in order that they may not witness the dread scenes.

It was seen however that good portions of general Vivians army would have to be withdrawn for one part of the attacking Glandelinian surge pressed forwad, and encouraged onward by their officers and generals was threatening to break the whole christian line. It was known as the battle of Veronin but nevertheless was the battle of Jennie Turner in general. Only the army under general Evans was not engaged by the enemys infantry. So general Hanson ordered all to abandon his headquarters and so all of the generals left sorrowfully to obey the command of dragging their divisions out of the inferno and nearing a burning stretch of woods general Hanson halted some of his generals soaked a gunny sack with water slipped it over his head and dashed away into the flames only to be back again and ordering the officers to throw forward the reserves. He halted the retreating divisions every little while however to dash off on his perlious forays coming back a,w always to beckon them ahead.

General Hanson finally reached a second line of works near which was a tunnel tward which he had been working and ordered the retreating divisions behind the trenches while he and some of the officers went in to see if he could have the tunnel mined. Even then the timbers at the mouth of the tunnel were on fire and it seemed an insecure retreat to the following mass of Glandelinians who would follow and ow as the Angelinians and Abyssinkilians noticed the approaching wall of Glandelinians they were not fools. It was a long tunnel and timbered all its length and near its entrace entrance asma,l small stream stream trickled. This tunnlel was parrelel to that of the christian trenches but n beyond at a distance of ten hundred feet and general Hanson knew the enemy in surging up would use the upper portion as breastworks and so inside the tunnel were placed an immense store of explosives and to this was connected wires to which a battery was also connected and the wires unseen by any one stretched to the rear of the christian line where the men waited for the signal to push down the handle. General Hanson was the very last one to cross the new sal sailent and he ordered all the men to lie down on their faces and set a number of squads to dashing water from a pool near by upon the burning timbers in front of the works. Already the region was packed with smoke as the enemy came within range and the firing had starr started anew and even the soldiers found breathing difficult and more difficult than they had at the other part of the battle line, and the soldiers begged general Hanson to let them go at the enemy in a counter charge. By that time the fire hurricane had mounted to its height once more in the distance, and now the whole length of the ground in front of the new position was swarming with the Glandelinians while behind the whole region was surrounded by a roaring seething sea of fire. Just thick, a desperate battle raging in the midst of forest fires.

Hundreds of blazing trees were hewn down by the bursting shells hurled ed by the christian cannon among the enemy and as the enemy surged forward for a charge the christians let loose a dreadful fire with all their weapons and the roar of the battle was again redoubled. Generals Gannog, Cannon, Walter Jennings, Robert Vivian Jimmie, and Baldwin and several other generals had just then arived with the reserves and they helped keep back the enemy untill their divisions were shattered by the ferocity of the enemys attack, and untill they fell one by one severely wounded and even overcome by smoke, untill general Hanson were the only general left w fighting the enemy. The wounded soldiers in purple lying on the ground were praying, crying, gasping for breath. A stalwart rush of Glandelinians half crazed in their fury rushed at Hansons shattered lines and general Hanson who grimly stood directing the battle along his front and watching the movement of the enemy at other quarters, succeeded in ordering the artillery to be brought up and just in the nick of time and he succeeded at last in driving the assailants at that quarter back. In the next hour that followed the region became like a mad hell. The Glandelinians rushed and tore the christian line again and again only to be flung back by the two stud sturdy christian armies under general Vivian and Hanson whose men used every weapon against the enemy they could bring to bear. The Glandelinians were worse now than a sea of raging maniacs of fiends and the Angelinians who were wounded went through tortures as men women and children seldom endure but through it all they kept quiet and lay on the ground behind the works cheerfully encouraging their comrades by words and praises to hold firm while all the christians and others under generals Hanson and his brother kept the enemy back for every inch. The two generals stood in the rear of the trenches and lived when the Glandelinians fell by thousands their wounded smothering sn and chocking in the thick smoke of forest fire and musketry. The upper section of the tunnel on its roof was now packed by the Glandelinians and the Angelinians suddenly hurled flaming torches upon the foliages and soon the tunnel was was surrounded by a roaring sea storm of fire the furnace of fire burning all around it driving the panic stricken Glandelinians off and even over it and at times the smoke of firing became so dense when added by the smoke of burning trees that the two christian generals were compelled to lie down with their faces against the ground, while Violet and her sisters who bravely and recklessly stayed with the men besides the earthworks were now struggling for breath in the smoke clogged air. Blazing moss, bark and evergreen foliage fell upon the breastworks incessantly and again the enemy pressed forward through the inferno to the charge once more despite the uproar.

In the meanwhile while the battle was still raging the whole forests were on fire at new portions the heat being so intense that it melted big boulders lying near the old abandoned positions and made the rocks of another tunnel red hot inside. From road to road the flames leaped with the speed of a hurricane sowing brands upon the unburned forests to kindle slower an d even more deadly fires. With the fire came the height of the terrific gale. Stones of a thousand pounds in weight, gravel, dusts, debris of the forest were hurled before it and soon the clouds of rushing smoke soon obscured the main big black cloud which was fire tinted now scourching and thicker than ever. The smoke was so thick that nothing could be seen and even the fire began to reach part way tward and to the christian linss at the extreme right and would have reached them had it not meet as serious a resistance as the enemy. The heat was so great along the stretch of railway which wa was heavily bordered with timber that pick handles were utterly consumed. Where the old tools lay upon the ground which had been thrown away or left in a place as the workmen and fire fighters dropped t hem apart from any other inflamable material all were burned. Water in barrells was broiled and evaporated away the staves burning down as they sank. Fishes in the recently frozen streams were fairly cooked and floated by thousands. Tiles were burned out of the railway tracks, the rails were buckled and bended, and even melted and kindled like wires. Even steel bridges were hald melt ed and all out of shape.Everything was swept clean to the left and right of the christian trenches ad it was a wonder how the fire fighters even numbering by the hundreds of thousands survived in that suffocating smoke and blinding heat . Simultaneously more than two hundred thousand men women and children had also become refugees from the flames flying for th eir lives to Pounce-cee-woolia on foot, for no trains could run on account of the twisted trw tracks caused by the heat of the fire and these fugitives were persued by both the conflargration and by the enemy. In another and shorter tunnel six hundred had found refuge but stifling somewhat from the smoke. All the bridges on the railroad lines for miles wewere blazing and it seemed impossible for the fleeing mulitudes to save themselves from the fire, and Glandelinians, or be rescued. The fire wa was pouring across the tracks in furnaces and many bridges were going. The smoke was so thick that it was like a shroud. The first of the large towns to be reached by the fire was Derophia only twenty five miles away from Jennie-T urmer. While the flames were pressing down upon the town, the men women and children at the roar of the approaching fire fled for safty. The forests all along the rdl railroad line for miles were on fire, the heat so intense that nothing could survive the bath of flames. T he fire had at last become unmanageble. At last Charles Roberts a fugitive could stand no more.His senses clouded, his limbs failed he fell beside a stream, the fires burned low, the cool winds came stealing int o the smothering hell. Some one revived crawled to the stream ad and filled his lungs with sweet air drank some water and shouted. Others joined him, creeping painfully going back presently to help their compa companions.While general Hanson was pressing the foe back and while his advacing troops was following them in their retreat and retaking their p lost position gens general Hanson saw the blackened smould ering tree trunks piled in the sport of the destructive fire storm like straws and they lay thick upon the ground in front of general Mindernines old abandoned positions and the nearest mountians where the fires had first swept were still glowing with the embers.Trees that were still stading standing stood stripped of limbs and bark.Over an area of ten miles the fire had spread in three days but despite the sf efforts h of the enemy had failed to oust the christian armies from their positions.
There during this time came some reports which Hanson recieved according to the mystery of the explosions heard during the battle after ,rden which ran as follows, Explosions at MicWhirther. Dikes torn asunder. Big floods starting. Large country inundated by water. Terrible destruction in property."

3ITOWNS IN PATH OF RAGING FLOODS CAUSED BY BLAST.

At the time that the battle of Osmondonson was raging, it occured about two hun hundred miles further in north, an unheard of disaster in this war which when full known shocked the nations which heard of it. Between nineteen hundred, and twenty five hundred persons were killed, hundreds were injured by the thousands, and many towns were razed to the ground, by explosions at many scattered places along the banks of the Mic-Whirther Run River, which made these towns just from shock or concussion look as if tornadoes or twisters had struch the,, and the distance that towns were badly affected was about sixty eight miles from the blasts, while places as far as Angeline Junction Angelinia State, and Calverine and vivian Wickoy, and Abbieannn Calverinia, reported the concussion in two great converging lanes.

As it was heard to bring in the real facts as to the disaster so far, the death tol toll was by no means any too complete even to day as to the results of the earthquake shocks brought on by the eruptions, for many of the towns in the strickén regions were completely isolated from the world, with telegraph and telephone wires down for miles and miles, and so far as could be summoned out the property damage was stated to run into the millions.

The Glendeliniens who were the cause of the disaster must have worked at seperate sections as the explosions occured almost simultaneously at different points along the river, though the concu sion was felt with devastating effect through the middle portions of the state, and apparently felt most at Albertinia the scene of battle just early in the war, fifty two miles west of Jennie-Wren-town Calverinia, and fires resulting from the explosions swept the woods north of Albertinia.

The combined northern edge of the concussion was felt considerably inthe city of Calverine, and many windows suffered. Morinio town just west of Albertinia suffered badly because of the shocks. Two hundred were killed..In that region trees were even uprooted by the vibration, windows broken and streets heaped with debris. One man a resident of Angelinia Agathia was killed at Albertinia. One of the nearest explosions hurled a large stone high into the air, and it fell and crushed a house on a farm under its weight. On the north side of Albertinia the concussion ripped the buildings shaking down many eletric light poles, which cut off lights of the town for two days, and uprooted many trees near the country side. Albertinia proper was untouh untouched, save for a terrific downpour of water like a cloudburst of rain in some parts of the city, as a result of the for water hurled up high from the force of the great explosion.

The little town of Prusrin nearest the scene of the blast was literally wipped off the map,the force of the explosion and its concussion fairly flinging the town about the countryside, destroying all of the I0,000 houses in the city save one a big school house which though wrecked remained on its foundation. One story of heroism stood clear at from the list of casualties and damage. It was that of Miss Anna Ophelia, a sixty year old School teacher and nun of the Catholic School of that small town just west of Prusrin. Noticing that near the river there was a large party of Glendeliniens up to something, and fearing they would bombthe house the teacher cal calmly instructed the children to get under their dek desks to be safe in case the enem enemy would fire tward the schoolhouse. As she was herding them under the iron supports screwed to the flooring, there was a terrible noise like thunder but of a million times more greater crash. The school house was crashed down by the concussion into a heap of jumbled timbers and bricks. The teacher and all the children in other classes were killed or hury huet hurt but those under Miss Ophelia were savedm the structure falling upon the iron supported desks which held. A few were slightly injured.

Of the two hundred and eight hurt or killed at Bell town only two were recovered. The dead at Prusrin were to one thousand. A woman who held her little baby girl in her arms and who had her young daugh-er and sonat her sides was buried in the wreckage c of the house. All four were instantly killed, while the husband is in a critical condition.

Handonia Thornia,and a number of men in the small town of Lewis werr were killed being crushed to death by the collaspe of a building. Fifty employes of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad lines there were hurt when their shack was razed to the ground. In Prusin even the schoolhouse the only building left standing as stated before was badly damaged ben being almost razed to the ground, and all the school teachers were killed or hurt, and all the children killed or injured except those saved by Miss Ophelia. In this vinicity after the disaster military and deputy sheriffs were armed with rifles and patrolled the town and environs with instructions to shoot all Glande linian looters on sight. Of the sixty dead at Headrick only one body was yet recovered. It was a women who was so badly mangled she could not be identified. Two hundred were killed near the Brushwood area, including children of an orphan asylum and aschool building which was wrecked. Sixteen schoolboys, and thirty school girls were also hurt and killed as they fled from a rural school at Blue Bell town near Albertinia when the building crashed down almost before they could even move. some of those injured suffered a fractured skull or arm and we are in a critical condition. They were struck by bricks and timbers from the building as it collasped. All those who did not get out of the building were killed.

Close by this School which was also a Catholic the Catholic parsonage was wrecked severely injuring six priests, and a number of employes. The farmers grain elevator, and the Hatchery were totally wrecked, and many hundreds of persons were hurt in the streets by flying debris. Hundreds may thousands of families who survived in this area are homeless. One fruit grower was killed near Alto' Calverinia, and his wife, brother, parents, and children were badly hurt probably fatallyAbout a hundred were hurt. One of the strange freks of the vibration of the explosion occured near Alto. A man whose name is not mentioned here being ill with a broken leg was hurled bed and all out of a big window of his house by the concussion about twenty yards away from the house.

The fe ged however when it fell fell upright and he was hot very badly hurt, though he had a terrible shaking p. The house out of which the concussion hurled him was razed to the ground almost at the same time, and had he not been hurled out on time it is probably he would have been killed under the falling mass of timbers.

A christian general by the name of henry flord was killed at Mt Zion Calverinia. He was on furlough and visiting the home of his wife and children. The house was razed by the concussion and he and they were suddenly buried under the wreckage. Closest to the scene of the blasts crops were destroyed by the sudden rush of water from the blasted dike, and many thousands of hogs, and cattled killed, and barns houses and silos destroyed instantly or buried under water: The enemy to cut off all communication had seen to it that wires were down all through and far from the stricken district, and confirmation of the full reports was as yet impossible. It was reported that one hundred and fifty five were killed at the little town of Herner north of Jennie urner but no communication there could be as yet established with the town which was said to have a popua population of over a thousand.

several of the Mic- ollester and pandora railroad trains picked p 10,000 injured people at three ruined towns in the afternoon, and took them to Albertinia where they were taken to various hospitals. Others were taken to Big "irl Knool and opsy and it was estimated that nearly four hundred were hurt su seriously if not fatally. One in St osepha ospital in lbertinia was a eight y ar old girl, with a large piece of stone jabbed into her k neck. She was unidentified and was in a critical condition. A seventeen year old girl also was brought in with a crushed neck, while a six year old boy had his back fractured. The Mic- ollester and pandora and other roads sent a number of special trains to the devastated areas, while in places not accessable to railroads doctors and nurses and soldiers from near by armies struggled desperately to reach ithe stricken districts by horseback, in wagons and carriagew. Adjutant general Cainsbury of the national home Guard acaccompanied one special train to make a survey of the area devastated by the concussion but was shot at from ambush by landelinians.

The Governer of Calverinia issued a proclammation asking the loyal people of the state to give freely to the aid of the sufferers, while immense bodies of men were sent to the scene of the blasts to prevent the danger of floods which were sure to occur. The concussion of the explosion affected sixteen counties with devastating effects, rai razing many towns to the ground. And these disasters came just at the samt date and time that the battle of Osmondonson had been raging. The concussion was felt even from Big Girl knool, and half ofthe cities street car companies were out of commission when two eletric power commission or transmission lines connecting Big Girl Knool with Little Girl Knool were severed. Sixteen miles of the line of the Abbieannia gletric power company was hurled down by the shock ten miles south of Elnor on the Calverinia side of the river. And therefore about fourty five industries were forced to shut down because of luck of power. ifteen hundred buildings in the town of peabody were demolished but no one was hurt or killed. Also damage of about four hundred thousand dollars was caused by the concussion eighteen miles south of landale. "hilliamsburg near by was comple ely razed, and rocks and debris from the explosion close by lay in the streets. Property damage at Caldwell was estimated at one million five hundred thousand dollars. All windows of remaining buildings were smashed, and many trees uprooted and leaves shaken off. ldontis also suffered. The concussion shook off roofs from many residences, school and other buildings but no loss of life was reported from this portion. o terrific may have been the explosion that farmers near Albertinia reported that the air was full of wreckage of everydestriction every description shooting over the town from the direction of the levee. Apple and cherry trees and pear trees near Albertinia were stripped of their biggest branches, and the fall crop all but ruined by debris hurled upon it by the explosion. o rocks the size of wagons fell and , many thousands of dollars worth of glass in immense green houses, churches and stores was destroyed.

Another place severely visited by the effects of the explosion was the villiahe village villiage of Heide on the southwest edge of Big irl knool. Telephone and elstric cable poles were smashed down, or shaken down, and it was said that many two or three story frame houses were hurled six feet across from their foundation by the vibration, one of these buildings tumbling completely over, andchringing wires down about two railroad cars that were passing through the town on a train at the time all filled with passengers.

But no one was hurt or killed here. But hundreds of school children were menanced wh when the concussion of the explosion shook down poles of the Abbieannia Service ompanies and threw a terrific maze of live wires across the strea streets, near Alberto Ab Avenue, and Thirteen tre t. Police and soldiers and citizens roped off the streets . One of the wires fell across an abandoned orphan home,, and set it afire.

The effc effects of the explosion had peculiar effectsor ap aspects. Apprently it consisted of parallel explosions along the banks of the mighty river, each one said to have been blasted simultaneously, and the shocks of the air waves produced therein, displayed tornado intensity as it sh they shot through Heidi Turn south of Albertinia, Albertinia itself, Caldwell, Rivervie, ule Bell junction, and Lellen and other towns, fur from the river---all in a lne of prolongation drawn directly southwestward.....

The explosions seemed to have occued occured on both sides of the stream where heavy leeves or dikes protected the country when ever the river was in a flood stage, and thus the twin explosions occured up through the state of Calverinia for a distance of fifty miles ecc effecting also the city of Abbieann considerably, where the shocks were felt more severely but where no lives were lost.

Thus the twin explosions effected also the town of Mandy, Calverinia. fifty miles west of Abbieann, killing three hundred, and injuring one thousand ne hundred and fifty three persons causing damage of one million dollars, and totally wrecking numerous buildings, and starting series of ernormous fires. It was accompanied at this town which was also close to one of the explosion by a perfect cloudburst of ear earth, gravel and water. By the shock and concussion all windows in stores and hones were smashed in, houses and barns had their roofs shaken off or splintered, walls shaken down, trees were uprtoote upt uprooted und the streets filled with debris. nd also by the concussion wagons and carriages were shaken buck and forth and up and down the streets as if they were toys.

All windows in every school buildi ng in the city in all sides of the structures in all parts of the town of Manda were smashed out or in, the sudden shocks hurled a glass through the clas class rooms and inn injured a great number of children. The shocks at this point were of sixty seconds duration, starting at two P.M On a stormy rainy day. A brick wall of one of the school houses was also shaken down, and fourteen of the children killed, and thirty injured by the o torrent of flying bricks,. The teel and wire company of the city also was wrecked, and the steam condes den condensing towers of that company and the Mic-Whirther River Company were shaken down. Also the shock took great effect between Hendro and Alto Lakes in the counties by the same names, shaking down wires,, hurli ng roofs of buildings p into the air, and destroying a great number of houses, barns, and silo s. At St nn trees and wires were shaken down but though all buildings were completely leveled flat it was reported no one was killed, thoughthough thousands were hoit. All along the bank of the river on both sides de des truction was committed, and thousands of men and soldiers braved the big fires that ensued to save those who were injured.

At tarringvills in Albertia County just south of Abbieann, stones and gravel of all sizes fell. The Muc-Whirther River traction system reported all its wires down between Calverine and Big Girl Knool a distance of two hundred miles. It was reported that even in Calverine roofs were torn from houses in the southern portions of the city, but otherwise this city escaped serious damage outside of millions of windows broken.

One report was but which as said to be exaggerated was thi s;

12,000 reported dead from effects of terrific explosion somewhere near Calverine. Several thousand persons mangled instantly by the effects of a severe explosion on the Mic-Whirther un between Calls and gan palto according to reports recieved to day by telegraph and telephone officials before wires went down. Operators in Calverine city advised officials of landelinian durthorities as said city is in landelinian hands that eighteen thousand citizens in towns near by had been killed, and that somewhere that must be an ernormous fire, which though said to be nearly fifty miles away is so grea great that the clouds of smoke rolling up into the sky seem to be only a few blocks away, and that the fire wasthought at first to be in Calverine itself.....

The true reports of this portion of the disaster however came out later and the death list was found not to be exaggerated but much below the actual number.

The town of Glenfield Calverinia, reported a loss of eight thousand killed, and an ernormous but indefinite number injured by the effect of t ese same series of explosions, which effected nearly t three hundred miles of country with the shock and air vibration. The report follo followed as this;

Glen i Glenfield, Calverinia. October the 20th K 1912. --------

Eight thousand persons are dead, three thousand mission, and more than a score of thousand believed to be injured as a result of the shocks of explosions that swept the country side with terrific viberations and air waves with the force od a tornado, and affected thirty counties to day. yet the reports from the stricken territory are said to be meager because the enemy have crippled all communication, and also so had the shocks of the explosion. The dead include children in school buildings, orphan asylums and hundreds of citizens and even police officials, and only thirty six children out of hundreds of every school house survived, the rest are even unaccounted for. All survivors picked up or refuged are suffering from injuries, and a thousand are reported dead or injured in Heidi County."

The effects of the explosions were felt also in southern Calvein County where sixty of two hundred scholl children and four hundred of orphan asylums and homes were unaccount ed for and sixty m small villiages were wrecked. In the homes the attendants were also killed. Many were killed by bricks, and buried under the wreckage of their homes which burst into flames as a result untill the wrecked towns were burning almost at once so that nearly sixty towns with as many a a as ascore of thousands of buildings each were afire and sending clouds of smoke far up into the sky so that it was reported some of the very injured even perished in the flames. The shock of the explosion also affected the town of hill and hurled its buildings to the ground like an earthquake.

Another report came as;

Heidi junction, Northern Angelinia State, October the 20th----------

Two hundred school children in ten schools were reported killed at Big Hedda this afternoon when the explosion close by shook the ground like an earthquake and big fires are burning while many districts report the dangers of floods. The children girls and boys were buried under tons of bricks and timbers. Besides wreckaging the schools the shock of the x explosion destroyed the big city hall and other large buildings, the smaller buildings mysteriously escaping somewhat unhurt, but the catholic home for children had one section of it thrown down, and hundreds of people were injured in the streets from the flying wreckage of the home. A frantic telephone call for doctors was recieved here at Heidi junction but no information could be forthcoming as to the extent of damage except that a big fire is burning and floods are starting. The effect of the blast and the force of the air waves struck near the Mouth of the Aronburge Run River and was said to have swept everything in its path for a distance of sixty feet damaging country houses, small factories in the town near by andcaused a loss of one billion dollars but no lives were lost. Parts of roofs were hurled up into the air and other damage was dohel.

100 MILE PATH OF COUNTRY ALMOST SUDDENLY RAVA ED WHEN LEVEES ARE BLOWN AS NDER ASUNDER. REFUGEES POURING INTO CAMPS.

THE first report of floods because of the explosion was the levee near the mouth of the Sunbeam Creek running into Mic -hirther reported to have suddenly gone out. Though in some degrees the flood is starting gradually there is nearly twenty two thousand being made homeless and an immense ammount of land at the junction of the Sunbeam Creek, and Mic-Wt Whirther Riveris flooded. Many refugees from the great flood sweeping down the Mic-Whirther Run Valley were pouring into many concentration camps by the scores of hundreds, on the late evening of the day of the explosions and the number of homeless so far were estimated from fifty five thousand to a hundred thousand..

Levees had been weakened and were crub crumbling everywhere between the cities of Albertinia and St Francis and the region there was being slowly but surely converted into agreat inland lake especially due to the enemy blasting the dike or levee in the St Anna Levee near the town of new Madrid Calverinia and the bigger levee before the same town.. The steamers succeeded in carrying away many refugees from New Madrid late during the evening to higher ground in the vinicity, but later it was said that from unheard of places rescuers and rescued were being steadily fired upon by many Glandelinian soldiers in ambush. It is said that the waters in New Madrid Calverinia. is ten to fifteen feet in depth, and hundreds of thousands of houses are half submerged, by the inundation. The districts being flooded thus far since the blasts is about one hum hundred miles Dng, and fifty miles wide, a very rich farming country with thirty five towns and villiages.

Many of these towns were or are already standing deep in water, And people who did are escape were marooned on house tops or floating timbers. Immense streams of refugees are also being concentrated at Alberto city which itself has a population of a hundred thousand and also threatened by the flood. And the area flooded has a population of three hundred thousand. Among the larger towns thus flooded, are New Mar, New Madrid, Mariaetta,, LaPaloma, Peckinbridge, Fallcall, New Tree, Abbieannia Bayou, Angeline Beldon, Lillian Francis, Miriam Lewis, and Alto all having singly a population over 10,000. In all of these villiages already the tops of houses are only seen above the water, but most of the people had escaped and l no loss of lives so far resulting because of the flood.

Even heavy rains caused grave concern as the river when the levees were blasted are at high water mark, and fresh floods caused by the other explosions elsewhere, are pouring down the Sunbeam Creek,, Aronburge Run, and other streams where dikes were blasted asunder but the main danger is at Mic Whirther River. At Albertinia the levee though blown by explosives also were reported to be still holding nevertheless, but the waters were pouring gradually out of the vents, and the city now is completely cut off from all outside communication, except by boat. If more dikes than is belie ed believed have been blown apart by the explosions the water will spread out for more than two hundred miles on either side in no time inundating hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of acres of p, plantations, and numerous towns and villiages and the destruction of harvest crops will be immense. All soldiers not used in battle fields or even home guards have been called from many spots to not only help refugees, but also to shoot it out with landelinians who attempt to snip the refue refugees and rescuers.

It was also feared that Glandelinian engineers would explode the dikes of the river near Abbieann also Alto too and if such a collaspe occure the river at this point will rush upon the city, driving additional scores of thousands from their homes.

Heidi city was slightly menanced by the same flood which had isolated many towns, washed out railroads, destroyed high way bridges, and forced scores of hundreds of families, to flee their homes without a chance to even same the smallest of their belongings.

Also smaller explosions that eveningin widely seperated sections, added to the toll of floods killing a few, and injuring a hndred others, a few fatally, and sixteen other deaths were added when the flood near Heidi town neared record heights with thousands of families driven from their homes, the waters spreading over the lowal lowlands all around the city. and others who still remain in their flooded homes but in up upper floors are making r a ready to use rafts and the like while national guardsmen and home guards, and others were joining the rans of more hardy civilians of Heidi town in patrolling th the levees in order to prevent landelinians from blowing others up and increasing the extent of the flood.

A levee of the Aronburge Run close to the Mic-Whirther was also blasted at the time when that river is even at flood stage, and government and army engineers made the reports that large areas are inundated, and soldiers and citizens from Heid city were called to Calls County were many families hundreds of them were taken from their house tops in flooded lowlands caused by the inability of sewers to drain the section after the destruction of a levee. Isewhere floods were causing more damage in the southwest following a series of fresh explosions, elstrical storms and cloudbursts, of which the vandal landelinians had taken advantage.

Heavy rains in all portions of Calverinia in the Mic-Whirthian region sent streams in record marks of which fearing the enemy would take adven age of many sol ci soldiers were sent to protect levees, and even this did not prevent scores of thousands of persons to be driven from their homes in southeastern Alberto County when the waters from a bursted levee overflowed to further weaken railroad trancks, and highways, and upwards of one thousand families at Loyla s spent the night in the army barracks and city grade schools, when the waters rose in the town untill it was three feet deep.

Even the town of Heidi had me to five feet of water already in its st tstreets and buildings and if the flood ocontinued the city was expected to have the depth increased to several more feet but just now as the levee there was hastily being mended by hundreds of soldiers and thousands of men and even children a more serious inundation so far is not to be feared. but most of the men citizens of that city has left to aid in the work of repairing the damaged levee and calls for relief boats and for government levee engineers were recieved from Heidi Junction city, after the St Anne levee was blasted by the enemy and alleged attempts to destroy the main levee along the Mic- Wt Whirther Run River were reported at evening and soldiers were rushed to the spot with cavarly and machine guns.

All the Red Cross Headquarters were advised to that evening by the aurthorities of the counties affected by the rising waters of the floods rushing out of the levees to send aid, and ask people to contribute generiously to the relief fund being ri raised by other red Cross concerns....

The flood itself had ac according to later reports gone about six fourths ( if there is any such a thing) above the deph depty of the flood before, and the weather and war of officers said that the crest itself apparently had been reached temporarily , but made no prediction as to later in the week stating only that if the enemy cannot be stopped in their desa distardly work bad complications might result. Yet there came reports from portress Callenwell that a small creek known as Holt creek recieving the flood waters from the bursted levee had nevertheless remained stati stationary at thirty eight feet but was also flooding a good piece of land. By this creek recieving so much water it alone had already flooded to a considerable depth over a million acres o of land, according to weather and milita ry offices, due to the explosions in dikes, backwaters from the main flood, and overflowed tributaries of the Mic-Whirther Run, while though there was no report of loss of life at leaast among human beings scores upon scores of thousands had been driven from their homes. A score or thousands or more of farm and other animals including chickens and other fowls have already died in the flood waters, and so far extended is the f ood even at this time that the damage cannot even be estimated.

Even which caused moresalarms new break breaks in levees caused by the Glandelinian engineers were reported the night before, while in some locations the waters continued to mount to unrecorded heights. A break in the wll also causdes caused by the enemy of the Mic-Whirther Run near Empire Crossroads was already inundating a vast area for more than eighty miles around on the second day of the flood, thoughthe break was reported to have been made by the enemy late on October the " 21th, the sole purpose of the enemy for making the flood being to stop the advance of various various christian armies upon them, which were said to be moving forward in such overwhelming numbers that if the lfloods did not check them the Nationals would cause a dreadful and irreparable disaster.

Lakelena, and three other good i sized towns are in the path of that break, but the section wjere the floods began is said to be suf suffering more extensively from the flood than an b any other prtion of the province and therefore this section p of the country was in the grip of the worse flood in the countrys existance. And as a result of the wrecking of the dikes of the branches of the big river to the southwest, the flood was also said to be retaining in its intensity while also there were reports that Glandelinians were prepa preparing to blast a number of levees protecting the Sunbeam Creek and Angeline Run, thus intending to extend the flood. Throughout the whole Mic-Whirther Run valley the problem of caring for the immense droves of the refugees was being met at many pla es even under fire of concealed enemies by organized relief grou gru groups which were however being protected by the National guards, who always answered without pausing the fire of the worse enemy in history. The Red Cross and other organization were also mustered into full service under guard of well armed soldiers, and making ready for any eventuality despite the attempt of the many hidden Glandelinian snipers trying to hinder their work.

National guardsmen, seed soldiers spared from various armies, and all the Home Guards joined the ranks of well armed citizens in patrolling the levees while elsewhere despite the peril of the work work, men women and even children worked madly to repair levees that had been partially damaged by blasts, and defied the s distant snipping soldier soldiers to prevent them.

The Calso River was also on account of heavy October rains at flood stage between Big Girl Knool and Ophelia but all the dikes here were guarded by thousands of soldiers, and civilians armed to the teeth, while cavarly were on the look out to prevent any secret enemies from slipping through to blast them and probably even kill all the guards.

And yet even around here because of the levees of Mic-Whirther being destroyed large areas were flooded, and all the citizens and soldiers and police and firemen were called to the southeastern section of g Big Girl Knool to that spot where many families were taken from their homes in the flooded low lands of the city caused by the inability of storm and other sewers to drain the section when the waters poured from the nearest of the broken levees.

Damage from terrific explosions or frequent blasting by enemy vandals was also reported from some places in northern Calverinia, Southern Calverinia, Northeastern Angelinia state, and other sections. But in Angelinia the x explosion took a toll among some of the vandals themselves. Six Glandelinians wer were killed and seventeen injured by an explosion near a dike at an Antonio early in the the morning of October the " 21th , while eighteen other Glandelinians were also reported injured and ten killed in an explosion at Big Den Levee near the same town and the explosions did not even barely wreck the levees enough to cause any break in the waters. High explosives however from their concussion wrecked buildings at San Antonio, and three or four other big towns and d hundred citizens were k injured by the wreckage but none killed.

At St Marie there was also levee breaks between that town and Cassy Town but so many men worked desperately at these breaks that theyput a considerable check on the flood in these se sections, but simultaneously a break in the east Knool Run distric district bvee leves and another just above little Girl Knool fourty miles north of St Maria a also sent out or caused the mustering out of enough men to take care of a large vuvolume of water. More than thirty thousand tents had been already sent to the flood areas by the Western branch of the Abyssinkilian Red Cross for use by the refugees in the flood districts, and many more thousands of tents were enroute from Angelinia Agathia to points in Southern Calverihia, and northern Angelinia and an addit additional eleven thousand five hundred have been asked for to meet other troubles that may arise.

The conservative estimate of one hndred and fifteen thousand homeless in this region was expected to be far exceeded in a very short time if the floods would continue, or increase. Persons who were flooded out of their homes in the devastated sections and elsewhere between Big Girl Knoll and also Albertinia were being taken across the flood on boats and staunch rafts to other points for safty, while thousands are being housed in tents near Big Girl Knool, and the Abbieannian Red Cross Headquarters were ad advised that the go governors of the states and provinces affected by the floods from the the bursted levees and its of the Mic-Whirther Run and its branches were issueing frantic appeals asking the public to contribute generiously to the relief fund being raised by the Red Cross, and that the contributions would be recieved by Red Cross branches in the flooded regions. The Red Cross itself had already contributed more than a million dollars from its National fund but a great deal was more was badly needed and that the funds giving by the public will be applied directly to only relief work. And while this emergency differs from those which had come unannounced and with cataclysmic speed it may nevertheless be compared with some armed invasion. Scores of thousands moved with their families and with what property and lve stock they were able to take to higher ground.

THE PANIC OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN. THE EARTHQUAKE CAUSED BY A DISTANT CANNONADING! AN OMINOUS CLOUD. ANOTHER BATTLE. THE AVALANCH OF HELL, AND THE CONFUSION.

The next morning however a new blizzard had raged with great fury partly quenching the forest fires and the following morning the sky was bathed in rosy and tender hues but ave above over the summit of the ridge called Mt Calverine there still hung a yellow and ominous cloud the single frown of the landscape besides the scene of desolated forests. The deep and massy cloud had since the terrible forest fire had disolved and was gone but in some mysterious manner the sun seemed to forwarn general Hanson al and the rest of the generals of some unseen danger assuredly awaiting his armies or that of the enemy. Some danger violent and sudden in its nature. The stars had been for him the same mocking menance which if our chronicles do not err they once wore for Pyrrus for him his doom was t o stri ve, for all things to enjoy none, all attacking, but none gaining, battles without fruit, without triumph, fame without success. At last made craven by his own superstitions and slain like a dog by a tile from the hands of a woman. From the huge Calverine ridge on the side seem ingly col coiled and round as some slumbering monster rose a thin and ghastly mist, which gathered darker and more darker as it spread in wreaths in the sky. Above all rose the smoke capped summit with the shadows now dark, now light, betraying the hedious teeming cannons ad and ashy rocks. Dim in the silent part of the city of christian tents rost the flag staffs along that mark of army luxury and of labor was now stilled of the mighty hum. No lights here a and there or in the port ices of t he voiceless forums of the generals headq uarters broke the wan and fluctauting light of the coming morn, for from the heart of the vast christian army once viberating with a million passions of war, there now came no sound, the streams of human beings in uniforms circulated not . The big river itself ,the beautiful river lay scarcely hushed save that from its deep bosom came softened by the distant a faint and regular murmur like the breathing of its s leep.

Suddenly the vast features of the ridge seemed to grow with liv life. As through a transparent viel flushed luminiously a crimson and burning hue around the summit, played and darted corcus-cations like livid lightin lightnings, and balls of seemingly lurid flame shot up into tha air with dull explosions.At the same time the whole city of camps was g w again in aconvulsive throe, the ground groaned and trembled, the floor of general Hansons headquarters shook in terrible tremers, while far and wide along the streets of the city of camps went a terrible and roaring sn snarling sound, allbthe curtains of the windows and doors shaking as at the blast of a hurricane. The whole house rocked the c tents many of them reeled and fell, the columns of Hansons building trembled and we wavered from side to side, the roof of his barn collasped and gave in.

Again and again the ground shook forcing general Hanson and the little girls with the other generals to leave their manison for fear it would go to pieces. But scarcely had they gotten outside when they were met on all sides by panic stricken women ad children, and then following them disordered groups of soldiers whose festive and glittering uniforms contrasted in mockery the solemn terror of the hour.They did not appear to heed general Hanson a or his generals ad soldiers they were u occupied with their own fears. After the tranquility of a few hours that burned and treacherious soil agin again menanced destruction and the poeple and even soldiers uttered the one cry;

''The earthquake.The earthquake.''

Again the earth sk shook beneath them with greater violence massed with the mysterious terror of the distant ridges even seen plainly from there, and the burning smudge fields seemed rent with unseen commotions. Again and gin again the soil seemed to creep and heave heave beneath them, then ceased as quickly as it came. All this time the cloud had hung motionless but sometimes it changed its form, and now it looked like some vast giant with an may arms outstretched over the foe lines. It was also astonishing distinct. This giant shaped cloud seemed seated on the brow of the mountian, the different shades of the clouds appearing to form a whi te robe that swept over the vast breast and limbs and it seemed to g aze steadily upon the enemys lines to point with one had hand, over their glittering lines, and the other raised to the higher sky tw ward heaven.

I078.

It was like the ghost of some huge titan brooding over the beautiful world he lost, sorrowful for the pa pat past-yet with someting something of menance for the futi fut ure. T he earth shook no more, and the lively army of soldiers forget that even there had gone forth so terr ible a warning of the approa approaching doom, like the first or worse. The skies that day were serene and clear but general Hanson deeply read in signs of their various changes beheld in one mass of clouds along the horizon which the wind began to agate slowly that a storm was approaching. Not a very long time hd passed that the enemy began to creep forward once more to storm the christian lines. The wa warning of the approaching confliot was a low distant rumble of cannons along the enemys lines of batteries, and soon seried columns of Glandelinians were seen moving forward while nearer and more nerer nearer broke the thunder of distant cannon and fast came the dashing attack upon the christian line. A severe battle wa was gain again raging. The Glandelinians had suddenly struck against the christian line with a fury tha broke through all lines of resistance and a flash of sudden severe firing tore one of thenearest Glandelin ian waves out of existance, while simultaneously a shell struck one of the trees in front ot of the christian position and split with a mighty crash its trunk in twain. The attack wa was however repulsed but after a short lull and before any of the troops could do anything there came a sudden rush of fresh Glandelinian troops, ad in aa few minutes time the whole christian line was again forced back, the battle now becoming a screaming horror, and at the same time all the trees within sight of general Head Hansons headquarters were teeming with Glandelinian sharp shooters and these swept awy thechristian officers by scores at every volley and the artillery men hd had to fire frantically and incessantly to sweep down the trees to frustrate the snip snipers.

In ta ten minutes this attack was a,s also repulsed and the enemy re coiled their yell ending to a low angry muttering r oar and only a momentarily flash of firing affrot affronted the foe receding line. This violent battle was short only lasting four hours but it had cos cost the death of over three hundred thousand soldiers on both sides combined but that same day there was soon to be added another and probably a more greater horror. A conflargration of red lights could be seen flickering back and forth along the enemys main line and a moment after the battle had ceased a strange rrumbling hoa hoarse and distant sound came, while ever and anone with a loud grating noise which to use a homely but faithful simiule, seemed to resemble the grinding of steel upon wheels, while at the same time volumes of dark gray smoke issued forth from the sides of the ridge called Mt Calverine and rushed along the edge of the mountian summit.If any one could have looked closer they would have observed long lines of thousands upon thousands of big cannons in action day and night since the beginning of this queer scene commenced.T his edp a explains the mystery. To dg day indeed had broke forth to give warning warning of a coming horror. The air after the tornado of battle had become uncommonly calm and cold with a heavy fall of snow starting at long intervals which gradually abated, while a thin and dull mist gathered over the whole expense expa expanse of hills and yet to the surprise of general Hanson and the other generals despite the exceedingly still ness of the atmosphere the furious waves of the Glandelinians were being stupendously agaited against a portion of Kindernines army and seemed a as if they were to advance to carry all before them, while continuously from the ridge of Mt Calverine there crept a hoarse and sullen murmur. T he cloud that had so long rested over the crest had suddenly increased in thickness a d and as general Hanson turned his eye he was arr ested by a strange and sudden apparition.From the summit of Mt Cal verine, and a ridge along side of it darkly visible at that distance, there shot thousands upon thousands of pals metoric livid lights cont inually each light tem trembling and becoming invisible only to reappear. Simultaneously along the side shot other queer lights that meteor like now crept as the snake creeps along the rud rugged and dark soil, now leaping to and fro, daring across the vast sides of the mountian in wild gambols, and as suddenly bursting into tenfold brilliancy then suddenly v vanish only to appear again. To him this wa was some kind of a sudden warning of some deadly peril, of some terrible evil, and danger, that hung over the beautiful and ill fated region. He felt it was best to have the yivian Girls fly for safty while there was je yet time . At the same time there came the sound like pent up winds hissing, and the grinding as i of wheels and while they all gazed a dog in one of the company streets uttered a s shrill howl and fell down and died and the salvia and froth were on his lips and hanging from his jaws.

I079.

After this strange appear apparition he again saw a dull red smal str eam of something creep slowly on, and heard many and mighty sounds, like hissing and roaring through the gathering gloom of evening. General Hanson had learned also that houses by the thousand in the villiage of gaunders had been torn into tangled masses of wreckage by great explosions just as if a tornado had lp ploughed its way through the big town.At night great and strange lights increased in amazing fury the sheets of flickering light revealing the precipitious and rough grags of the distant mountians frowning before the besieged city of Jennie Turner rendered more terrible by a conflargration of red and all colored lights known thatillumined the dark and dangerous soil.The blazes of lights at times lin gored over the wreckage of fallen half charred tr ees, and sometimes leaving the whole of the scene in darkness, and then broad and shestedly hung redly and ghastly over the furious and roaring storming cannon duels in the distance while the high mountians seeme seen to glow more redlt and so intense was the blaze of lights at time that they brought vividely into view even the sharp outlines of the more distat distant winding s of the rivers shorelines and the river itself, and the giant hills further off. The concussion like the earthquake that a early morning that shook the christian camps to their foundation was but the fore runner of the more greater destruction, and doom from the main lineof christian batteries and like the rivers of the sleep less h ell the surges of christian troops would pour upon the enemys positions and drive all before them. Wandering up and down, and to and fro a a lighted exhalation on the summit w the peculiar lights were again seen and again invisable.

''My how cold it is.''Said general Hanson to himself.''And yet the sun is still shining through the thick mists.''

General Hanson opened a window on the riverside and when he leaned his hed out in the outer air its breathless and sunless wa growing cold but strangely arid mingled with the coldest blasts of wind at the same time which smote withsingly outside in the company strstreets and which had during the whole morning testified a singuliar uneasiness. The draught of cold wind seemed deadly and hi he closed thewindow. One single dog outside alone in the streets of the camp had during the whole morning showned signs of restless uneasiness. Its bearing seemed rather that of fear than of coming rabies to general Hanson, its howl was pa painful and distressed, it hung its head and snuffed the air, then lay down, started again and again, un uttered its wild piercing and far resounding howl.At times it lay utterlyd dumb and mute, with distended nostrils forced hard against the ground and disturbing with a heavy breath ing the sn soft snow. The dog then raised itself half on end, sniffing the upww upward air with impatient sighs, then suddenly it sprang forwas forwed for ward at half speed, it circled around and around in the street before genea gen eral Hansons headquarters turning its glasy looking eyes from side to side with anxious and perturbed gaze as if seeking some avenue of escape.Once or twice it endeavored to leap upon a wooden fence ad on falling it uttered rather a baffled howl than the ordinary howl of a me mad-dog. It evinced no signs of r rabies, or Fenoneadeansi a, its tail drooped along the ground and at la length as if tired at attempting to escape it crept into a tent with a moan where it lay down to rest.

''My gracious look at the big avalance of Glandelinians pouring twad tward general Kindernines position and the other up the sides of the ridge called Mt Calverin e.''''Cried general Hanson.To one of his officers.''Qui quick general Baldwin throw your lines into position. We are going in to get hell.''

With that cry all of the gensals generals in his headquarters rushed to the window and gazed tward the mountian called Mt Calverine and saw a great swarm of Glandelinians pouring up the sides only to suddenly fade away in a sea of smoke which suddenly appeared upon them and a terrible deafening uproar suddenly broke the -stillness . Then came the shock upon Kindernine. A perfect wavoof Glandelinians led by general Francis T urner came swarming clear over his position like yelling maddened demons, and in vain did the reserve forces which were thrown upon them,88in ----in vain did the christian cannons try to check the tidal wave. The Glandelinians had taken the christians by surprise and carried everything before them in the ferocity of the attack the big extensive seemingly immovable christia christian line being as a reed before the whirl wind as they made but a feeble barrier, the waves of the foe tr tearing their way through and over the entire line of positions capturing two thousand cannon and turning them upon the confused and panic stricken purple columns.Fortunately for general Kindernine general Hanson had seen the disaster in time and his own artillery fir wiped out the first wave of Glandelinians tore the second and third to fragments, and then checked the remainder, and then keeping the foe at bay, Hanson h urled forward into the storm a big force of Abyssinkilians that cut the remainder of the Glandelinian columns to pieces and sent them flying ba back to where they had come with frightful loss, and with thirteen generals killed and wounded and Turner among them.

At the same time there was a terrible crashing uproar in the direction of the plains and to the amazement of all the christian generals who were restoring the broke broken Kindernine front under heavy fire they beheld a strangeand more awful apparition as if a an er uption had broken out. With ineffable dismay and awe all beheld the most awful vast clouds shooting a thousand feet from the rear of h the pld plains in the form of a gigantic pine tree the trunks seeming to be black as the blackest i ink and the branches for the second it appeared shone the hues of fire whose brilliant glows shifted and wavered in their awful fiery brilliancy with every secondary movement being frightfully luminious time and again, turning to a dull and dying red which again for a second more blazed forth with the most intolerable glare. A great explosion had occured along the front part of the enemys position. From the rest of the christian line there was a dead heartsunken silence, through which there suddenly broke the awful roar of firing at a new quarter which was echoed back from th e valleys of the mountians surrounding, by the sharper and fiercer detonations of the furious cannon broadsides, and the salvoes of exploding shells.

Dread seers werethey of the burden of the atmosphere and wild prophets of the wrath to come. There now arose on high as general Vivians cannons far to the center let go with an intolerable uproar the universal shrieks of women and children within the christian line, while thep panic stricken men and women in the company streets having rushed out to see what the trouble was in hearing the infernal din stared at each other but were dumb. T hen suddenly they felt the earth shake beneath their feet, the walls of general Hansons headquarters trembled, and general Hanson and th e other generals suptrending the placing of strong batteris for action heard the crash of many cannons in the direction of Roswell Buster Johnstons lines, and in one instant more there was an earsplitting detonation far to the right and a mount ian cloud of a terrible blackness on its bosom and a fiery red at its edges rolled upward and spread over the sky like a canopy and at the same time from the direction which the l cloud arose there fell a frightful shower of rock fragments, fixed with a rain of snow mud, an debr is and vast fragments of trees. This fell over all the distant trees crushing them to splinters even into the desolated streets of Jennie Turner, even far and wide with amighty splash into the river fell that awful shower hurled upward by the second great explosion.The Angelinians since the beginning of the seige had laid unknown to the ene enemy great mins in the plains and were thus blowing huge craters in the plains with the intention to prevent further assaults on the part of the enemy if possible and to lay the path for the prepared bombard bombardment that was started. No longer did the crowds of women and children within the christian lines believe themselves safe, and their only sole thought wa was safty for themselves, and each with ear splitting yells turned to fly but were prevented from doing so by the christian cavarly.The Glandelinian hordes themselves who had assaulted Evans position were panic stric ken and dashed back across the shell swept plains madly, pressing furiously, and and crushing againstbthe other. In the frightful panic they even trampled recklessly over the fallen soldiers amid caths, and groand, and curses and sudden shrieks, and other portions of the enormous crowds of pa nic stricken Glandelinians began to vomit i tself across the dangerously mined plains and lanes as if persued by a cyclone but after them swarmed overwhelming nu b numbers of christian troops and threatened to hem them in. But whether should they fly.Thousands fearing that there would be a third mine explosion refused to go over the plains and wisely surrendered, while hundreds of thousands of others dreading the showers and torrents of c fragments from exploding shrapnell high in the sky that was now falling fast and furious torrent upon torrent upon them rushed under the shelter of dense woods, under the roofs of the nearest houses, or sheds----- shelter of any kind for protection from the terrors of the open air. Christians after all the Glandelinians began to realize were not to be trifled with themselves.

FLOOD CONTINUES TO RISE. COLD WAVE AND SNOWSTORMS ADD TO THE WOES OF THE HOMELESS IN THE FLOODED REGIONS. NEW EXPLOSIONS; AND THE SHOCKS OF THE DISTANT BATTLE AROUND JENNIE TURNER ADD TO THE TERROR OF FLOOD IN SOUTHERN CALVERINIA. FOUR HUNDRED AND FIFTY FIVE THOUSAND FLEE FLOODS IN THE MIC-WHITHER RUN VALLEY.

Ever since the buttle and seige of Jennie Turner city began to rage; the floods already stated in the chapter gone before was still arising from the gunbead Creek and Mic-Whirther Run River valleys, and the floods was spreading over additional area in the states of Angelinia and Calverinia and in pr. preparation for the flood sweeping down from the already swollen gun Beam Creek the war and weather bureaus warned all persons living in the river bottoms and elsewhere in the danger zone between Albertinia and Big Girl Knool to move to higher ground a as authorities declared that despite all the desperate attempts being made it was or seemed impossible to stop the Glandelinians from continuing their work of blowing up levees. The flood was rising from Big Girl Knool city to the mouth of Calverine Run above Some city and two other dikes had gone out because of blasting.

However tyere was a slight fall of a foot in the last thirty to fourty eight hours recorded at eight oclock in the morning of the beginning of the fighting around Jennie Turner October the 23th bringing the flood here to a stage of 45,2 feet from what had been double that ammount before, and from the effect the workers are accomplishing a further fall was expected before the new flood from the upper Calverine Run should come down where four explosions were distinctly h a he heard. The levees at Big Girl Knool are again being mounted to four and a half feet above the level of the flooded river and are being placed in an excellent condition while troops are being sent in mass to prevent the Glandelinians from coming again in that region to blow them up. Workers from all industrial plantshad left their machines to help build up some of the other partially broken leves on the side of tye the Cattle Horn Creek which the n enemy also tried to blust hine also from Big girl Knool and they were encouraged in their work and hopes when they saw the waters receding swiftly. The big crews even worked for many hours in a heavy rain and also under fire but in spite of the downpour and of being snipped by hidden Glandelinian enemies returned to relief headquarters in a cheerful l moon with not one of their number ever hit.

But otherwise a October cold wave, of a temperature of slightly below freezing, with an all day blinding snowstorm laying two inches an hour, and accompanied by a terrific northeasterly wind added to the suffering of the acores of thousands of homeless in Southern Calverinia, and northern Angelinia on October the 23th, where even acute conditions were rampant following a long seige, of rainstorms, floods, and blizzards. and facing dangers from enemies who tried most of all ti to snip their children.

All the Red Cross Branches in that portion of Calverinia recieved the most urgent calls for food, and provisions and and blankets and fuel to make fires, while floods elsewhere started to rise anew after rains and snows.

Close by the Neldon and Yaka rivers climbing to near record marks in southea southeastern Calverinia was taking adv was taken advantage of by a bunch of disguised Glandelinians, and through them a large levee near Holtsville collasped inundating a very large section and the explosions were heard for ten miles.

Private messages of many kinds recieved at Big Girl Knool reported that great explosions were again heard and that the shocks of a seige battle believed to be near Jennie Turner was producing tremors that made the inhabatants of many towns fear the levees ever, her everywhere would burst because of the concussions. One message from Caldwell said the flood was ten rushing at thirty five miles an hour and that the flood water had risen t sixteen inches in ten hours. And the man sending the message said he was sitting on top of a tre tree while talking over a telephone and that refugees were under fire.

A number of names were also added to the list of dead in the explosions near the Dikes on the 3 23th with the death of a number of Glandelinian planting men, and others ai mained by the explosion were englufed in the flood and are missing. Other small streams also flooded almost beyo nd their banks and augmented by the heavy october rains and snows hampered the work of relief parties and representives of state agencies which were making efforts to ascertain the extent of the property damage which up to now was expected to reach a little onver lwer a million dollars., while to make matters were severe thousands of innabatants crom crouched in upper floors or on top of buildings, and ever, then were fired on from unseen spots. Refugees from Jenso believed that loss of life was small if there were any and as the heavy snows continued tho throughout the day throughout the south and north, a forcast of lower temperatures was issued by the weather bureau a very comfortable state of affairs for the many refugees still without shelter?

The greatest pinch of this gradually increasing of the greatest flood in the country of Calverinia began to also be felt in the lower Mic-Whirther Run Valley. With a blizzard storm sw sweeping down the valley in advance of the crest of the big flood hundreds of thousands of men and soldiers including women and children were conscripted in b a brave the blizzard storm and freezing winds and fight the rising menace of flood waters, and shoot it out, i with hidden Glandelinian marksmen as e well.. Also a twenty four hour patrol of all levees still in danger from Glandelinians was started at the very outbreak of the flood and even now up to the 23th of October thick lines of well armed sentries and camps full of soldiers beyond on both sides stretched from far below Big Girl Knool still several hundred miles be below the crest of the ever rising flood up the river to the districts which already have been touched by the peak of the rise.

Though so far the flood had been increasing slowly on account of the desperate fight waged waged against it the Mic-Whirther Run River because of all the ruins was on the greatest rampage of all times, and therefore with the purposely breaking of its dikes and levees had broken all records of its own for heights of flood waters at points south from Big Girl Knool to Albertinia, and it is said more than six million acres of the most fertile soil of the great Mic-Whirther Run Valley is is under water, more will soon be from broken dikes of Aronburgs Run and its branches, including the Red, green and Blue Rivers emptying into the Aronburgs Run.

Scores of good sized towns in southeastern and middle Calverinia, and Northern Angelinia, and a prtion of the state of Angeline yine are inundated, and nearly four hundred and fiffty five thousand people have been forced to flee from their homes in these states and also secure arms to resist any attempt of Glandelinians to sneap upon them and shoot down their children and of whom it is estimated the Abbieannian Red Cross will Have to provide food and housing for three hundred and seventy five thousand, more. Some state the loss will run over $100,000,000. Cities which have suffered the greatest property loss and which are now under ten to fifteen feet of water are too many to be mentioned here but go up to the hundred. The Mic-Hollester and Pandora, and twelve other lines, including the Sendon, and Evangeline St clare and Crowley railroads have been compelled because of flood and armies of foss occupying the region to annull all passenger and freight trains except for short distances between high points which either have escaped the flood effects or where strong christian armies have concentrated.

BIG GIRL KNOOL AT LAST MENANCED BY FLOOD. SOLDIERS MAKE DESPERATE EFFORTS TO PREVENT ENEMY FROM DYNAMITING LEVEE NEAR CITY. FROM CITY ITSELF TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY ARE HOMELESS.

On the 24th of October thirty two thousand persons mostly women and children were marooned on a levee not far from Altoon city by flood and a force of the enemy, and 33,000 to 66,000 more are marooned in the near by country and a big force of troops and aid was being sent to them.

Another attempt also was discovered by scouts of the enemy to cut the levee south of Big Girl Knool and this brought vigorious efforts from residents of extreme soutyern portions of the city and state and from residents of northern districts to prevent it. Residents on the upper districts converging upon Salac appeared on these dikes in great numbers all armed; while soldiers also took a hand and kept a lock out for the approach of these Vandals.

Having already wrought what all officials declared to be ne of the worse disasters of the war so far with the flood waters of the Mic-Whirther Run and its branches flooding so many miles of country, the threatened danger to Big Girl Knool caused the greatest ex excitement. Indeed so grave had the situation become above Big Girl Knool that the Mayor of that city had asked for official permission of the war department to sent an extra force of soldiers to prevent the Glandelinians from being successful in their plot to dynimate the levee to the south of that city, and that all efforts are needed to save it from a flood that would follow such breaks in the dikes to the south should the Glandelinian soldiers be successful in their attempt to blow them up.

Yet many army engineers in the valley made no secret of their apprehensions for the safty of Big Girl Knool should the enemy come up for they believed no force could prevent them from their purpose. Abd that if the enemy i did blow the dike they est imated that the break to south or north would flood that big city even on its highest point to a depth of many feet with a resultant loss of many millions of dollars in property, if not in life.

And before the flood crest reaches the Albertinia district the Aronburgs Run passing the Big Girl Knool district will be compelled also to reabsorb not only the flood waters the Mic-Whirther Run is letting loose tyrough its opened dikes but also much of that from half overflowed streams elsewhere whose dikes also have been burated. Therefore with such a tremendous volume of water tearing at even these strong levees there has been not the slightest doubt of the results should they too be blasted. And i with the crest of the war made flood still between Big Girl Knool and Albertinia the danger to Big girl Knool was not regarded as immediate even if a levee should be blown apart. Also the levees in that section had been strengthened and have been holding well, and are being guarded well but the question is whether they could prevent the enemy from blasting them and causing not only an increase of the flood but a probably probable big loss of life from the explosions.

Also overflow waters from a great break at Levee Landing also on the Mic-whirther twenty six miles north of Greendale had joined on the 3 24th with the back waters of the main flood near Catherine Town fourty miles south of Greendale; and Catherine Town was inundated. The flood from this river had spread more and inundated ten more small towns on the 24th and were spreading across near the Mic-Hollester forest region seeking an outlet in the Mic-Mic-ollester Run River, and other smaller and bigger streams which in that region had not been affected to any great e t extent by the storms. The bodies of a number of women and children had been found in piles of floating de driftwood at Springfield Calverinia near Albertinia and ten miles north of the Levee Landing break. They have not been identified but on examination it is believed the victims were killed by snipers as h bullet wounds were found on them.

The waters in Albertinia city continued to rise on the 24th but scouting parties near by on high rises of ground reported to the army corps that the population apparently had found safty on higher ground to the north.

The beleaguered city of Catherine Town was but off from all wire communication on the 23th itself and only meager reports on conditions in the flooded retions and towns and villages to the east, west and south as well as horty of it could be obtained.

Count De Biff, Major general Vivianna, and the chief of army engineers, and chairman of the Red Cross arived there on a steamer, which was under fire during the whole trip and slighty damaged. The Abbieannian Count who was directed by Emperor Vivian to co-ordinate all the relief work was getting a full close up view of the big flood, and of the suffering and damage it had caused. He therefore decided to try and reach Big Girl Knool by the night of the 25th to confer with army and Calverinian state officials there, though he said in his reports that so far as he could observe the emergency situation was gradually being brought under control, and many soldiers of the enemy in the neighborhood being captured were being held for questioning.

" This disaster being caused by so ruthless an enemy is assuming increasing proport ions almost hourly" he said" and is undoubtedly one of the worse all of all calamities this country has ever suffered in its known existance. But the emergency situation is being brought under control gradually and surely and reports last night from all our works workers and soldiers in almost every one of the flooded regions were to the effect that supplies of food, tents , other essentials and and protecting squadrons of soldiers were moving forward satisfactorily.

The two biggest p problems facing the Red Cross now are the rescuing under fire of glandelinian snipers, the many thousands of stranded refugees from levees, house tops and many other points; and the feeding and sheltering of the more than five hundred thousand homeless under our care of whom a thousand is reported shot and wounded by the enemy snipers. The surtherities of the mobiliza tn mobulization camps of Dorothy gale city announced four additional divisions of soldiers for duty in the flooded area had been ordered out from Camp No. Ten. One will be placed at Greenden, one at Catherine town and the other at Big Girl Knool. Scouts also will be sent out to make on hill tops daily surveys of all flooded regions to locate refugees and carry medical supplies and food and aid to those marooned and unable to obtain succor in any other manner and to find out spots where hidden snipers are and attack and give them no quarter.

With the known death list steadily climbing above the two hundred mark because of snipers and not of flood and varying estimates of from five hundred to eight hundred dead from the same cause in the whole stricken area every precaution was being taken to preven prevent additional loss of life from snipers, disease, hunger, and exposure.

Clothing donations recieved by the Red Cross relief agency at Big girl Knool and elsewhere contained many varied articles. some of the many thousands of bundles opened or unpacked and assorted included among other items; overcoats, hea heavy underwear, , heavy shoes, and heavy socks, and winter hats clothing too heavy for even that season. Another contributed a heavy overcoat of the size of which out of the thousands of flood sufferers not one of them did it fit....

On the follo ing day October the 25th a telegraphic request by the governer of Calverinia for permission to send armies of soldiers to prevent the cutting of the Mic-Whirther Run levee below pig girl Knool by the enemy in order to save that city was again recieved by the members of the war department at Angelinia Agathia and referred to a body of the Concentinian cavarly for the aid. The Governer asked also the co-operation of the Mic-Whirther Run River commission to aid pig Girl Knool and therefore the commission was in session at Big Girl Knool itself, and it ended with the intention to do all possible to stop any such attempt on the foes. In the meantime the judge avocate of the christian army bac began a stdy of the situation study of the situation involved and the army engineers took up the engineering aspects. And a telegram to the district engineer at Albra urged tyat that an immediate report be sent to the war department upon which action could be hastily based to prevent the disaster upon the city. Governer Heid described the point at which he believed the break would be created by enemy engineers and asked co-op a co--operation of the commission the chief of army engineers und the secretary of war to curry out this purpose and if catching Glandelinians at the du dasturdy work to give them no ,uarter under any xo conditions. The message included a pledge on the part of Calverinia and the city of Big Girl Knool to undertake to compensate all persons who might suffer damage as a result of the break should it come in spite of all efforts to prevent it.

Mayor Coller of Big Girl Knool also signed the message with the Governer.

Also on the 24th of October a Mic-Shirther Run Dike twelve miles north of ginham town was blasted asunder by the enemy by an explosion that shook the country for many miles a round, and whose concussion hung clothing from neighboring buildings into the tree tops and on branches and razed some of the houses, and this additional break is expected to flood three hundred andfourty more acres of farm land and inundated the city itself a city of fifty fi e thousand to a depth of six to ten feet. Other towns and villages threatened with as much disaster are Corn Town, Jaket, Janet, Sudcliffe, and Woodale. The explosion tore a co crevase in the dike about one hundred and twenty six feet wide and three hundred feet long and the water is pouring out in an immense stream.

However the residents of the community being warned by thefuct that Glandelinians were plotting to blow up the dike moved out over the week end, and many hundred of the farm families begun hurrying away, also the few days before, when it became imminent that the enemy were laying mines and no soldiers were around to stop their dastard y work. several hundred men had been sent to try and prevent the rebels from accomplish ing their work for the last week but were not able to do it.

At Big Girl Knool the Calverinian Governer held was on conference also with a large group of rich bankers absolutely for the purpose of working out good plans for re-financing repidents in the area of the city that would be affected most should the enemy after all succeed in making a crevasse in the levee below Big Girl Knool.

A break in the levee in the neighborhood of an Fell had inundated some fifty six miles of farming and trapping lands east of the river below Big irl Knool but the Glandelinians wo who made this breakdid not get away in time and all were killed by the explosion h which had the force of a volcanic eruption.

Some trepidation was also felt as to the manner in which the trappers in St Calles Region might greet the proposal of preventing the enemy from breaking down more dikes. For weeks and weeks they have been patrolling the levees with artillery and rifles and their frequent battles with Glandelinian engin engineers in being being surprised at their dasturdy work on ime had indicated that they would not hesitate to us t use them.

About two hundred of these Glandelinians surprised in the act of vandalism of this kind was shot down often when approaching the levees they refused to answer when guards hailed them. And inundation of the lands would kill many of the game animals an and ruin farming and trapping for many years. Unofficially it was learned that the Glandelinians planned to cut a gap in the dark of night in the levee two thousand yards wide and nearly a mile long which would flood Big Girl Knool with the most disasterous results, and also because they wished to stop a christian army in its advance through the neighborhood.

One of the National Abbiounnian guardsmen who was reported shot and killed by a Glandelinian sniper in the Levee Landing crevasse had rejoined his company after perilous adventures, and now he will be decorated for bravery and given a commission. He had been cut off from his company when the break in the Mic-Shirther Run Levee occured with the explosion. He remained for hours and hours in water up to his waist not far from the scene of the explosion warning persons back to attempted to enter the region. Finally he was forced to flee, with Glandelinians after him hot foot for miles and miles, but finally he caught a freightrain loaded down with soldiers and eventually made his way into Big Girl Knool.

The suffering among many flood refugees was illustrated in the case of a poor woman Mrs Minnie Kornmann now at Big Girl Knool who was still searching for her husband an and three children, two boys and a girl each beyond seven years of age, who have been missingsince the beginning of the flood. She says the rescuers brought her and her chil children out of the flooded area at Corndenk and near Cordenneck and seem to disappear from her sight in the darkness. She never saw them again, and an appeal recieved at Big Girl Knool said she was in the direst need, no home, no clothing except the rags she had on, and only food that good people gave her.

And add to the danger of the fears of the enemy breaking the levee near Big Girl Knool was that the flood waters was constantly rising between that city and Albertinia with the gauge at Big Girl Knool showing a rise to twenty one feet above flood stage. Therefore all the army engineers and those guarding the dikes and levees in levees in that location were being more gravely concerned about the impending situation lower down the river. From Lake Alcor above Big Girl Knool south to the mouth of the Aronburgs River below Glorinan forces of men numbering many thousands under command of a number of state engineers were building up the levees more stronger against the forcast record of sixty three feet and ga forming trenches near by to meet any rascally horde that would advance to explode the d dynimite to wreck the leevee..

And with the crest of the coming Mic-Shirther river flood still far up the valley and increasing more and more every hour, Calverinia began to experience great difficulty in curbing the enemy in their attempts to blow up dikes in the lesser tributaries off the main stream, though a large number of fierce and bloody skirmishes had been fought for hours at many places at once. The explosion of dynimite caused the Aronburgs Run River to break through the Mic-Hollester and Pumora railway and Navegation company levees in Aronburgs Run River Districts and difficulty in curbing the enemy in their attempts to blow up dikes in the lesser tributaries off the main stream, though a large number of fierce and bloody skirmishes had been fought for hours at many places at once. The explosion of dynimite caused the Aronburgs Run River to break through the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railway and Nivagation Company levees in Aronburgs Run River Districts and was spreading rapidly over many miles of rich farming lands threatening to inundate two big towns known as Newbury and lee Bellring. Some thirty eight miles of farm and marsh lands in the neighborhood of London were also being covered by waters from the first main Aronburgs Run cruvase in the Mic-Whirther Run levee system. And all desperate efforts to stop the flow of water through the large opening had ceased the army engineers declared but thatso far it was not placing the city of Big Girl Knool into any immediatedanger.

Throughout the night of the 24th extra number of guards patrolled the barriers watching for any sign of approaching men tward them which might be glandelinian engineers and in all cases strong elstric lights had been strung for miles and miles down the river and river and powerful search lights were broughtbinto use.

Revised flood estimates also for the Aronburgs Run brought admonitions from the weather and war departments that proper precautions be taken between Aronburgport and Albrehambra on the Aronburgs Run River, and between Hunden; and Moltoe on the Mic-Whirther and below, in areas subject to the dangers of overflow along these same streams and their branches.

The commanding general Colholter of the fourth corps area of Big Girl Knool had shipped five thousand more tents to the Red Cross in the Northern Angelinia flood district and Major general Hallwell commanding officer at Atlanta in response to requests from Growerton was sending thirty three thousand tents, six thousand cots, and as many blankets. Homelessxand without food sixty six thousand refugee are moving into Angelinia Agathia the Red Cross was advised by the Flood Control Association at Little Girl Knool.

On the 25th of October the entire region of the Mic-Whirther and some sections of Northern Angelinia not yet touched now was in danger and doomed to inundation when the St Anns Levee eighteen miles north of Prue town broke under the force of one of the on the most terrific explosions yet recorded, and the breach in the levee was reported a mile wide and three miles long which permitted the overflow of the river at the other break s further north to move tward miles of rich farming lands and many towns. The onrushing waters was sweeping down into the Aronburgs Run valley and through that basin into the Sunbeam Creek below. However the main Mic-Whirther Run Levee just below prue town was not touched by the enemy engineers but the river and other men were dubious of its standing through the day should the Glandelinians attract their attention to it next. The St Anns levee defense, had prevented the f overflow from entering the Aronburgs Run basin as well as protected Prue city itself and also Ophelia. And the basin had been for weeks swollen by great floods which have swamped over the lowlands over a most wide expense, and threatened local defenses of many towns, and now since the levee was torn away disaster of great magnitude was expected to overtake many towns which had been fighting desperately to hold their dikes not against prevailing high waters which did not menance them but enemies who would des gn to blow up these dikes also. A hundred tons towns are in the path of this down rushing overflower and they include in the most import ant parts, Lucillia Rickson, Glorianna, Big Girl Knool, Angelinia Agathia, porothy Gale, Wombi, Betsy Bobbin, Joinet Tree, Rosa, Topsy Evangeline St Clare, and St Maria.

St Maria susceptible to this new section of the flood is only fifteen miles from Big Girl Knool.

On account of this new disaster about one hundred thousand more refugees were be wore in danger of being homeless and were already reported as refugees before the menance of the new dike became an actuality. One high point in the valley is at Glorianna city where the hills of Glorianna Heights rises nigh and sharply from the plains ne r near Conservatory Run. Twenty two thousand refugees had gathered there since the time the flood started. Even it was reported that scores of well armed Glandelinian dredge and cruiser boats left from some unknown station with high explosives with which to blow up several more levees near Big Girl Knool, and christian war crafts went in persuit.

In the meantime the Abbieannian Legion had also taken charge of the levee work and were building a temporary barrier in expectation of turning the overflow waters into Lake Angeline and send them down into Mic-Hollester Run River and her branches.

The damage so far caused by the flood varied. Some said it was up to thirty millions only but little attempt to estimate the property damage had been made, but railroad lines throughout the stricken area were heavy sufferers. A report from Albertinia Angelinia state said that the Evangeline St claire one of the chief arteries between Angelinia Agathia and sacremento Abbieannia, and Pandoru and Tundelinia city in time of piece, one of the longest railroad lines had suffered heavily for a length of two hundred miles but more severely at Albertinia where its tracks cross the region of the big flood. The river bridges were said to be washed away and the roadbed is flooded and traind cannot run through the flood. The lower Mic-Whirther Run must take care of not only the actual water that fell from the opened dikes of the upper river and its branches but the immense torrent over the middle Mic-Whirther overflow comprising nearly one quarter of southern Calverinia, and northern Angelinia.

Considerable loss of lifechad already resulted as the flood waters had continued to rise rapidly and there was danger that enemy engineers would cause many more levees to go out. Even reports came from over the flooded areas that indicated that many thousands of persons were still living in the second or third stories of their homes or on house tops or in tents on elevated ground, stubbornly refusing to be rescued and therefore mant many such marooned persons may lose their lives it was pointed out should many more levees be blown asunder and give way.

At J Kauffman town large armies of men women and chil ren were said to be o working in relays piling bags of sand and grave and mud on the others of the Aronburgs Run Levees east od of that town in an attempt to prevent the levee from being wrecked by explosives, and to save several thousand homes from being flooded. They have be been workingfor nearly two weeks.

At eldon calverinia the flood tide of the Sunbeam Creek had reached its peak being twelve feet above normal during the first day but was slowly receding by this time but reports from the upper branches which converge there indicated that th the crest had been reached unless there is more rain but that nevertheless the levees were too strongly guarded by soldiers to be injured by the foe.

All State highway routes in the river bottom at Beldon are under four feet of water but are not hardly injured though they cannot be open to any traffic.

At Angelinia Agathia a number of steamers arived for several days and even nights bearing many thousands of refugees from Glordons Landing where they had been marooned by bon y by the flood while working and fighting enemy snipers on the levees. War crafts, steamers, ddreg dredges and many other kind of cra craft brought many women and children who survived the flood but they had been picked up from the trees where they swam when they were ousted from the top floors of their homes. Other steamers were due with additional refugees from other levees where reports declared that more than twenty thousand persons were marooned on the tops of levees and houses.

One boat full of refugees was attacked by a Glandelinian gunboat and sunk so quickly that nearly o all of the refugees women and children lost their lives, and two other ships which attempted to go to the break caused by th enemy the enemy in the main levee despite warnings of christian soldiers on the banks of the stream were also attack attacked and rammed and shot to pieces with shell fire.

Absolutely t o twenty eight thousand refugees were in Angelinia Agathia and more were being expected hourly.

On this day engineers declared the situation of the leveevs was more favorably and strongly guarded nine thousand men and soldiers were laboring and fighting to a seven mile stretch of dikes below Cornman city where Glandelinians were making several attempts to drive them off and place their explosives.

On one occasion a large number of refugees were on a leveewhich had been half dynimited while they were there, and it being a mile wide was crumbling and they were all heard screaming for help, while the men folk fought desperately against Glandelinians who both attacked them and tried to place more explosives. The witnesses to this harrowing scene declared that the stranded persons with their possessions and live stocks were stretched along the levee for eight miles without shelter, and with very little food,ing, and that the Glandelinians were making attacks upon them every hour and making desperate efforts to blast the levee.These reports brought every conclevable method of rescue, from war craft to river barges which armed with soldiers was pressed into service in the race to reach the refugees ahead of the enemy and flood waters that were overspreading the flooded state. Even there was found several hundred children from a wrecked wooden orphan asylum without food since the beginning of the disaster and scantily clad on the housetop of their building or tree tops near Heidi and all atr attempes were being successfully made to rescue them before the water logged structure goes to pieces.

Though small as it was the death list in the flood was steadily mounting with the known dead of drowning placed at one hundred and eighty, and reports of other dathe from snipping Glandelinians n in various sections and especially in the Aronburgs Run basin flooded by the Mic-Whirther Run and the back waters from the latter stream.

And their homes engulfed by the raging wue waters, and in every instance shot at by snipers countless thousands of refugees were in beleagured cities and towns or clung periliously to house tops trees, small knolls an levee tops exposed dangerously to the wicked Glandelinians who fired at them from every point of vantage. From over the eitnire entire flooded area of the region came the cry for boats, while suffering was becoming intense among the thousands still marooned without provisions or sufficient clothing. Greenburg turning into a swirling Venice by waters which broke from the blasted protection levee quartered over fourty thousand refugees from the lowlands in addition to the citizens. The situation there also, with thepur water supply gone, most or all of the food destroyed and thousands upon thousands encamped on the Mic-Whirther Run Levee was reported to be desperate as enemy batteries were trying to hurl shells into the flooded town.

Five thousand refugees had been taken off the main Mic-Whirther Levee at greenburg by a number of steamers at the risk of being wrecked by the fire of glandelinians und transported to gig Girl knool while other boats moved to take off additional refugees and tend tyose wounded s by snipers. One ship towed six steel barges and three of the barges were covered with children only taken from the wrecked orphanasylum and even these were fired on by sniping glandelinians fired on intensely heavy, hundreds of guns being shot off per second but fortunately without the slightest results but recieving return fire from the guardians and soldiers on board. Also about thity thirty five refugees were quartered in the greenburgs courthouse and nearly eleven thousand in other big buildings on the o upper floors, while a fleet of gunboats was asked for to convey them to Angelinia Agathia. Describing the scene of desolation in this city which yet thought not of itself and strove to rescue others, was that so some of its own residents were clinging to the tops of half broken crumbling levees housetops and trees, awaiting rescue, and yet refusing rescue unless the others had been rescued first. Sanitary conditions in this city were reported awful bad following the failure of the water system, and that the flood waters was being used for drinking purposes.

The terrific explosion which wrecked the Levee of St anne near prue town almost but leveled the big town of gloria to the ground and flooded it afterwards, and many were reported killed and a terrible number injured. The amber of dead is not comple completely known because of the flood covering the wreckage of the lower streets but the greatest horror of the disas er were in all the the school and orphan a asylums which crushed down in partial ruins from the shocks and then caught firs, and where it was estimated that twenty three hundred children were burned to death despite all the most frantic efforts of survivors to save them. The dead in the St Alberts orphan asylum are Sister Anfes the mother superior, ten other nuns, six attendants and four hundred out of one thousand small children all girls, including fourty in the School near by and Edward endro the engineer. Though believed not to have perished the remaining chil ren are not accounted for. All who survived andwere rescued in the other schools and asylums recieved injuries and many were burned to death, making it one of the most horrible disasters ever recorded.

As they were bl blocked up on the staircase of the five story Goodhome asylum five hundred children and their attendants trapped by a wall of fire in front of the entrance were killed or smothered to death when the whole section of the building having been weakened by the shocks of the blast but yet remaining aloft suddenly crashed down he when weakened by the fires above. On the upper floors of this structure hundreds of other children were trapped by wreckage or seething furnaces of flame and those who strove to get out by other exits were buried in the wreckage of falling sections and walls. Out of fifteen hundred girls and boys of this asylum not one came out alive.

Yet the reports were said to be meagor because of crippled communication but in the other asylums the c scenes of unspeakable horror was equal, though fire men and ci citizens strove to save the little ones.

Only three of twenty hundred from the other asylums and of schools in out lying sections were rescued from wreckage and flames.

The explosion it was indicated tore a big breach not only in the levee but in the ground below.

The town of Granier was also wrecked and flooded, and two hundred children were reported killed drowned and burned when the shock of the explosion razed a big schoolbuilding and not one of the puipls children came out alive. In outlying districts many farmers were killed, hundreds of persons were missing and no information was forthcoming regarding the extent of the damage there.

Greenburg also suffured from the effects of the explosion but not disasteriously.

On account of this disaster many thousands were injured and the h shock of the blast was heard for over two hundred miles and also felt with great effects.

The large numbers of farmers killed and of the hundreds hurt were because of flying debris hurled from the levee by the force of the explosion, and several farmers were also killed when their frame houses were blw blown down ,while their wifes wives and children were only injured. The concussion of the explosion damaged many factories, homes and outbuildings of Greeburg especially in windows and roofs and caused a loss of one million dollars but no lives were lost though many were injured by being cut by glass. Parts of roofswere blown off chimneys knocked down, big trees partially uprooted, and other damage done and seven counties of Calverinia was so badly shaken that towns reported windows broken everywhere.

Indeed the shocks of these explosions was as great as if nature herself would have run amuck. From the force of the concussion houses nearest the blast were turned upside down without leaving a single pane of glass in the windows, some sheds were hurled a few feet without injuring those within, and a dog house was hurled upward to the top of a big tree where he soon after scould be heard barking for some one to come and take him down from his lofty perch. Strange to st say the shockof the explosion hurled an entire train of eleven pullman coaches and the mighty engine all full of passengers bodily on its side. The weightbof the Engine alone was of that of our merican style and therefore the energy needed by the blast and its concussion to displace it alone can b can be better imagined than be defined. The train however was on too high a rise of ground to be ob overwhelmed by the flood and for days the train lay there it was flung by the viberation a mutely eloquent testimonal of the mighty force of these man made explosions, yet it was not damaged in thevleust and not one passenger injured though it took lots of work to get them out of the coaches especially through the windows which had to be forced open.

WHAT REALLY RESULTED WHEN THE ST ANNS LEVEE WENT. GREAT CHEVASSE MILE WIDE AND THREE MILES LONG LETS TORRENTS OF WATER IN ON BIR BIG AR EA. 225,000 REFUGEES FLEE SCANTILY CLAD. FLOOD GOES ON NEW RAMAGE. ENEMY RIPS MAIN LEVEES AS COLD HITS ALL THE HOMELESS. FIVE HUNDRED SAVED NEAR GREENBURG. NINE THOUSAND TAKEN FROM LITTLE GIRL KNOOL.

The explosion at St Ann Levee which wrecked the city and killed so many children in schools and homes caused the tremendous pressure of the greatest war made floud so far to finally rush through all portions of the country in that location, and the country around from Little girl knool to the districts of prue is thus flooded. The leves made of clay and sand bags gravel and other materials had resisted several attempt s of the enemy to blow it apart, and already had resipted for months the flood waters of the river which was now rushing down the Aronburgs un and through the opened dikes on the east bank of the Mic-whirther which already had inundated hundreds of miles of country. And for the last week since the beginning of the flood twentythousand labors including children and women labored day and night to strengthen the embankment and prevent the enemy from blasting it. Two hundred and twenty five thousand more persons and six million acres in the immediate vinicity of this new break were affected and the flood was wildly spreading. The region too was the wheat and grain country where all the grain and wheat was ready for the harvest and the estimate probable loss was at about twenty million dollars.

Practically all the refugees fled with only the clothing they were wearing. Most of them were men and women and also children who had been working desperately on the levees. Two days before when the weather grew warmer they had stripped themselves to shirt and trousers while working in the warm sun, and when enemy soldiers tried to snip them from ambush they did not stop work to even answer back or put on more clothes and consequently many reached refuge places without any mishap but badly chilled and suffering from exposure.

Along three hundred city blocks of the Aronburgs Run River levee wa water was pouring upon the city of Little Girl Knool on the 25th of October but the levee there was still ins intact, but nearly half of the town was covered from the flood coming from the main inundation itself. All schools were closed and in some placesthe water was five to eight fe t deep, but the city went about its duty as usual.

Near Little Girl Knool however there were at Greenburg on a levee many persons still marooned about five hundred on a levee, and also on two railroad embank membankment and reported in danger of drowning but were brought to safty. Workers on other levees expressed doubt when so many Landelinians so frequently attacked them that they could hol hold the levees against them much longer than the next day without aid. Explosions already in the leveas caused the formations of dangerous sand boils and a high wind drove the waves over the weakening banks of the leves and blew in gale force across the flood waters at Kauffman.

Nine thousand refugees from the flooded town of little Girl Knool were taken aboard armed steamers and other ships and brought to Angelinia Agathia where they were to be cared for. Flood waters was eight feet deep in the main business section.

The flood was driving forward as regularly as the ocean swamping the land in a hurricane and was already adding another tremendous area to its conquered territories. The Government main line levee at Hindsburg eighteen miles north of Greenburg fell before further explosions set by the enemy and the rushing waters left to their mercy two hundred and eighty two thousand more acres of farm lands and a score of towns. The flood was expected to cover Grunter, Hobert, and Grodnow and Darger counties. Greenburg the largest town in the path of this portion of the flood has a pupl population of one hundred thousand, gt Elizabeth, Jancy, Lucy, Grey and Marie were also threatened.

At this section so far the hardest hit by the flood in the Mic-Whirther Run flood district which extends from Big girl Knool to Albertinia the waters now had destroyed a part of the main trestle over the Aronburgs Run River connecting Little Girl Knool with Big Girl Knool Girl Knool. Cold weather and blizzards came to all parts of the flood area to add to the suffering of the hundrads of thoudands of refugees huddled in unsuntary camps or crowded together on high ground, and there were outbreaks of mumb mumps, measles, small pox, whooping cough, Typhoid fever and other diseases at refuge camps everywhere. Estimates that a score more of lives had been taken along the whole river system hit by the disaster, the go governer of Calverinia dispatched National guard medical officers and state health officers to the refugee camps to prevent the spread of the contageous diseases that might sweep the whole country and claim hundreds of thousands of lifes if they happened to spread any further. The crevasse at this section was the second main break caused by the enemy in the main Mic-Whirther levee system the first occuring when the first explosion wrecked towns and now this.

However the city of Big Girl Knool was being granted a respite from further dangers of the breaking of the levee by the enemy in the south, but nevertheless the flood besieged city turned its attention to another danger and nearly all of its male inhabatant is making a desperate fight to maintain its lines of communications with the outside world. conditions at Melton where the waters was reported racing in torrents over the Mic-Hollester and pandora and other railroad tracks imperiled the sole lines of railroad traffic remaining from Big Girl Knool to the north. A number of weak points caused by the enemy along the drainage district leves which formed the base of the triangle of levees in which Big Girl Knool is located had developed in the last thirty six hours and therefore if any of these levees were to give way it will take i with it the only railroad line leading out of Big Girl Knool to the north and tocomplete the sombre story a hard battle was therefore necessary to keep the wiresof all telegraph stations from going down in the maelstrome of the flood.

The news of the respite from danger of bursting levees by dynimite along the Aronburgs Run and Mic-Whirther river sides of the triangle came from the Abbieannian meteorogist at BigbGirl Knool who announced that at this spot both of these riverg are stationary now and that the cres crest of the flood will probably be reached at Big girl Knool some time within another week, always provided there are no further bursting of dikes and no heavy rains. The Aronburgs Run rose two fourths of an inch during the twenty fifth but was stationary in the evening and it was hoped it would remain so untill a week, when the crest of the flood was expected there.

All the inhabatants of Greenburg were by this time believed to have been rescued and that the women and children are aboard war craft and will be taken to safty. and that many rescue boats were busy along the edge or in the raging flood saving not only marooned refugees but their live stock and whatever possible their household effects.

The Red Cross headquarters however recieved a telephone message urging immediate assistance at the towns of Jennisville and Lucy. The message said that if the inhabatants of those towns were not brought out to safty at once they would all be washed away and drowned. They were all huddled on the edge of a broken levee, on house tops, and floating trees and rafts, or on half submerged railroad embankments in both towns awaiting rescue. Big Girl Knool was not over supplied with ships suitable for this rescue work but it did what was possible. In the midst of the days ax activities the Mic-Whirther Run River commission steamed in from Dorothy Gale aboard a large steamer and when returning the head man said;

"The situation is deplorable. I could never believe the enemy would be heartn heartless enough to make such a disaster as-this."

One of the interesting activities in the vast reaches of the mighty flood water from the broken levees to the bo north of Big Girl Knool was the desperate fight waged nig night and day by the telegraph companies to keep their wires working out of Big Girl Knool. All these companies, Postal and Telegraph maintained armed motar boat patrols along their lines with reserves in Big Girl Knool and other towns ready to rush to any breach at any moment. The head man of the companies were sent down from Angelinia Agathia with orders to hold the lines in spite of flood and foe, and they have done it against the most terrific odds. Sixty to a hndred miles of submerged ground north and south of Big Girl Knool must be patrolled every day and night. This is done by only fourty motar boats eachcarrying a crew of five. The north bound boats boats leave Big Girl Knool every morning for Rose and the telephone and telegraph poles in this section range from thirty to sixty feet in height, and each must be inspected every day.

The terrible wall of waters rushing through the two main breaks already described, had reached Little Girl Knool just before midnight, and within a few minutes had climbed to the to top of the surviving levees there. The levees are about twenty feet high and strongly built, but nevertheless sc fire engines and fire tugs and other ships, and all factory whistles screamed the alarm through the city, warning residents and refugees that the flood was coming. The force of the flood gradually increasing did not even then do any harm to the levee but that did not save the city any for the flood waters were sweeping the city never - nevertheless, and all the citizens were fleeing from the stricken city by every possible means or seeking shelter on roofs and in the stories of higher buildings. Even an additional break in the levee in the Aronburgs Run River was reported which danger was feared would flood the lower end of Turner County and parts of Vivian and Caldwell Counties and thus place Big Girl Knool in greater danger than ever.

All river towns even not yet touched by the floods excepting those on hills or protected by higher dikes far out of reach of enemy hands had been abandoned. Surgeons of the Angelinia Agathia health department sent along by tye the health Commissioner to render any needed service to the people of the afflicted counties declared diseas disease and death will long lurk in the Mic-Whirther Run Valley as a result of this unexpected and unprecedented high flood waters.peath, disease property loss and refugees were being increased in all the flooded areas, of the Mic-Whirther Run and its branches, and now since the flood started nearly six hundred thousand or over were homeless, and abo about seven thousand miles are under water or in the path of the dangerous flood, and with the breaking of another dike which is feared a hundred and sixty thousand more may be either suddenly surprised or driven from their homes. Eighteen children were reported drowned at Ark ₙown when an old wooden school house was suddenly engulfed, and six others were drowned trying to swim the flood to a house. ₐn unknown number of men women and child laborers on the lee levee at Turner ₗanding perished when an explosion tore the dike into the air and three hundred and fifty persons were marooned and in danger of death on a small strip of land near Little ₉irl ₖnool and fifty six boats had been rushed to their relief from Big Girl Knool.

Everywhere it was said on account of ₙlandelinians snipping them that death added to the tragedy in the flood wrecked valley of the Mic-Whirther Run even as fresh disaster occured but the known deaths had reached a probably only two hundred hundred and twenty five mostly by snipping, while at least a little over three score have perished in the rushing waters. eighteen soldiers and ten men workers are said to have been killed by ₉landelinian snipers, and a number of others were drowned when another rescue boat was swamped by a crevasse which was blown up which swept away everything before before it just above little ₉irl ₖnool. All have been drowned as the ₉landelinian snipers prevented res u rescue work.

The breach at little ₉irl ₖnool followed an explosion shortly upon the blasting of the main dikes at Prue and an unusual number of men women and child workers who were piling sand bags there in the last frantic efforts to save the crumbling defense which had been blasted before without disasterous effects were whirled away in the flood but they were rescued.

On the evening of the fifth twenty fifth of October an area embracing three hundred miles across from the river, and extending a thousand or more miles along the banks was already recieving afresh the invading waters and a score of cities and towns in the lowlands toiled most desperately to perfect defenses, and to care for the score of thousands who fled from the menancing flood. It was feared that more than 10,000 miles will be flooded and from one million to i one million one hundred thousand persons will be made homeless by the flood, which is threatening to cover the entire territory between Angelinia Agathia and ₗorinia eighty miles northwest of ₙig ₗirl Big Girl ₖnool between the Mic-Hollester, Mic-Whirther and Aronburg Run Rivers.

Scores of thousands already had been rescued in boats, from roofs of houses and trees as the water crept upward.

Count De ₚiff made a water way expedition and nearreached the Little Girl Knool section where there was a refuge for many thousands of flood victims. for three to four days one of these boats had been floating on the very flood itself three to four days of passage through a devastated area; and those on board saw plenty of signs of suffering but none of the hards...p hardships of those who had fled leaving all their worldly goods behind in the flood. few human beings coul be seen between the big cities but there was wreckage and ruin, a flood of waters gone wild and venting its wrath on the people who have lived by and on the river. The boat then came into Big Girl Knool with a knowledge of conditions u up river but were told they were worse down stream. The count then presented a check for one hundred thousand dollars to the Mayor of Big Gil Girl Knool to be used where it should do the most good.

By six oclock the ship was moored to two stout trees and had not caught up to the other rescuing boats and at night the moon had not appeared but the blackness of night had lifted somewhat and the steamer was under way again. Then when the ships were tied up again many refugees were taken aboard and given a hearty meal and medical treatement to the o those who were ill. Many were women and children and some mothers all who had no shelter or food. So the rescuers fed them, dried their clothing and put them to bed. Indeed this was the first rest they had had for weeks.. ll of All of the rescuers gave clothing, underwear and sweaters. some gave up virtually all their clothing.

WORSE AND FIRST CONCLUSION OF ERUPTION OF EXPLOSIONS.
HOW THE CANNONADING THUNDERS OF ARTILLERY SOUNDED.

There was now a crash as if the planets were dashing to pieces and a might y spread of black cloud shot in the sky above the panic stricken Glandelinians and now a sudden and ghastly night was rushing upon the realms of noon as it seemed.

''The explosions.The explosions.'' Resounded from all sides.General Hanson and the other general now had everything in readiness and now all of his v cannons let go with the shocking roar of hell, and the plains and the sky was riven by thousands of mighty explosions. General Hanson recieved a speedy return and the region of jennie turner was now torn by an inferno of explosions.

''We must go to a safer section of the christian line.''Said violet pt pityingly as she observed the horrible scene of war now en u ensueing.''God is forth coming on the horrible wings of the war death, and now the city of Jennie Turner is threatened with destruction. We must fly to the rear ere the new fires that will be originated will consume us.Hark yon crashing storm of explosions-----hark yon agnozing cries.Hark terrible yells of defiance and derist derision. Not a momet moment is to be lost sisters.Come.''

In a few minutes they themselves were pa pacing swiftly through the peril ous and fearful streets, even t hen the gatheri ng darkness tha covered g the heavens increased rapidly, so rapidly that it was with great difficulty they could guide their steps. The flower wreathed columns of general Kindernines headq uarters seemed to reel and tremble, and with every instant they heard the snow falling crunchingly beneath their feet as another snow storm was raging.Already so de nse was the snow shroud and reeking atmosphere that violet and her sistes could hardly see each other! Yet they hastened onwad onward those brave little Heroines of Jesus Christ..... Alas whether/----- They now could not see a single step before them, the blackn ess became worse than erebus darkness, and they were encompassed with doubt and horror at this sudden catastrophe which had came with but few wa warnings and which had been only noticed by general Hanson alone. The darkness of night was now complete.

''Gracious how the darkness gathers.''Gasped joice. ''An awful hour indeed. Ho,ho by yonder terrific ridge.What sudden blazes of cannons.''

The other little girls did not answer, but neve nevertheless they saw how the lightning flashes from long rows of cannons did dart and quiver. All the tents seemed to be tottering t o and fro with an increase of the terrors of the earthquake concussions caused by explosions and roar of so many batteries of artillery and amid the other horrors the christian batteries began to cast down upon the plains and enemys positions a storm of red hot shot and shrapnell and full where the Glandelinian generals were dashing back and forth striving to get their own batteries in action one of the fiercest of those deadly torrents of shrapnell mingled with immense fragments of shells poured, the cries many of the generals gave were of death, that silence had been of storni ty. The pitchy snow itself was pouring in swirling torrents over the tents covering the ground with a fresh depth and half concealing the quivering corpses of of dying Angelinian soldiers brought down by shell fragments when the shells from the enemy burst over the christian lines. Violet and her sisters were facing tha this same peril for a times there would be a storm of crashing thunder ous rpo reports overheadand a torrent of fragments ould fall about them and shatter a tree which happen to be in the way.

''This is terrible.''Said joice frightened badly.''I did not think the danger was no near and fatd.Hark yon roaring sound from general vivians cannons.''

A sudden flash of lightning from abursting shell showed to them who now stood motionless at the threshold of some old house near the rea of rear of the christian lines the approaching crowds of Angelinians who were moving forward, to support general Hansons x artillery which was in action with the rest .

Soon again they took heart nd and stepped forth to join them when a I082. tremendous shower of shell fragments fell right among the soldiers and one of the soldiers an h officer fell right before the feet of violet and her sisters.They shrank back once more and darkness closed them in. But the awful shower of shell fragments continue fast------ fast -- ----fast---- the heaps of falling soldie soldiers rose high,----- deathly vapors seemed to stream from the exploding shells------the imperiled little girls ga gasped for breath-------they sought in despai r again to fly-------but the explosions of shells, and their flying fragments, blocked up their passage with fallen soldiers-------they shrie eshrieked as their feet shrank from the hodious lacerated corpses.How could they escape? T hey could not an climb to the open space, nay were they able they could not brave the horrors of the open.It was best to remain in the chamber of the old house ; protected at least from the fatal rain of death.

One of the retreating soldiers who had went in with the little girls sat down and clenched his teeth. By degrees the awful atmosphere without stifling and v venemous from powder smoke crept into the chamber and they could endure it no longer. The soldier glaring around saw an ax and seized it. With the despe desporate strength of his gigantic arm he attempted to hew an exit through the walls. Meanwhile the company streets were already thinned of women and children fugitives whose panic the soldiers could not control the panic stricken crowds hastening t o despirse itself under shelter de despite the fact that the falling snow began to cover the lower soc l sections of the country, while here and there the steps of the fugitives cranched them, warily, or saw their pale faces by the blue glare of the lightnings of shell bursts or the more unsteady glare of burning tents, or torches by which they endeavored to steer their steps. Ever and anon the swirling snow or mysterious winds rising and dying in a brea breath extinguished them or these wandering lights and with them the last living hope of those who bore them. The air was still now for a few moments the lamp of one of the company streets streaming out far and clear, the fugitives hurried on gained the rear of the christian lines and passed through to the distant woods through the glare of fires flashing over their pale faces.

The awful darkness which had scattered so deep a murkiness over the country had now settled into a most solid and impenetrable gloom. It even resembled my dear readers, le lest even the thickest gloom and blind darkness of some narrow room. Violet and her sisters had last manage managed to escape from the chamber through the hole the soldie hewed in the wall but the darkness being more than seemingly supernatura, or of erebus darkness they knew not where to go. But in proportion as the terrible darkness gathered into indews riindescriable blackness did the hodious and magnificent glare of lightnings from cannon flashes or bursting shells i ncrease their vivid and scourching glare.

Nor was the awful hues of fire, or of the beauty of the rainbow confined to the beauty of these shell flashes. Not even the greatest colors ever made no matter how bright ever rivaled their varying and prodigal dies. Sometimes therewas a broadside of bright blue flashes miles long more beautiful than the most aztire of the bluest skies, other times flashes appeared of a livid snake like gree n darting restlessly to and fro like the folds of ernormous serpents. Then many times the flashes were of a lur id and intolerable crimson gushing forth over the sky like sea seething rockets far and wide and ci continuously lighting up the whole scene then suddenly to die into a sickly paleness like the ghosts of their lives. In the many pauses of the awful showers of shell fragments and missles of shrp shrapnell the rumbling of fresh cannons could be heard, and the far roaring of musketry and machine guns sounding like the tortured sea, and worser still and audible but to the watch of the intensis intensiest few fer fear the grinding and hissing roar of distant explosions on the plains.

Many times the christian forces moving back and forth would appear to break and assume quaint and vast mimicries of strange monsterous shapes, always striding fearfully through the frightful gloom, always seeming to be hurltling fiercely upon one another, then to vanish swift swiftly into the turbulent abyss es of awful shade so that to the eyes and fancies of the afrighted wanderers the awful unsubstantilal forces were as the bodily forms of giant forms and foes, the awful agents of death and terror.In many place the snow was knees deep and still the awful showers that had been decending but which had now slac slack ened up had forced its wy into many of tents bearing with them death and destruction/ .:

At times it seemed that immense balls of fi re had been hurled upon the tops of the tents always constantly bearing down along the wide company streets masses of confused ruin which yet more and more with every second obstructed the way, and as the minutes advanced, though the storm of explosions overhead seemed to cease, and the fr agments seemed to stop falling dtogether, the motion of the earth was morecsensibly felt the footing constantly seeming to slide and creep, nor could wagons and provision trains way out of the path of destruction be kept st edy on the most level ground.Always the huge shells striking against each other as they flew through the air bursted int o countless fragments emitting bright flashes of fire which caught whatever was combus combustible within their reach, and along the plains and wooded regions in front of the enemys position the darkness was now terri bly relieved, for large stretches of woods had again been set on fire and at constant intervals the awful inferno of fire rose sullenly and fiercely against the solid gloom.

To add to this partical relief of the frightful da darkness the pa nic stricken men women and children had here and there at the rear of the christian lines, in the more public places, such as the porticoes of some stray Catholic Temples and the entrances to some small caverns endeavored to plac rows of t orches, but these had rarely continued long, for the showers of snow, and the wind had always put them out and the sudden darkness into which their fitful light was con verted had something it in it doubly terrible and doubly impressive, on the impotence of the hopes of the crowds the lesson of despair.

Frequently by the momentary light of these torcheslarge parties of the fugiti ves encountered ea each other, many hurrying tward the open plains in the rear of the christian lines, thousands flying from the plains back to the christian lines, for darkness lay upon it, and in the distance the roaring t ossing waves of flame from the burning woods and the incessant st orm of snow fell without the protection which the streets and tents of the christian lines afforded to t he land.

Wild, haggard, ghostly, with supernatural fears and terrors, these groups encountered each other, but without the leisure to speak, to consult , to advise, for the showers of snow though not so cont in ous had recommenced again frequently extinguishing the lights which showed to ea each hand the death like faces of the others, and all hurrying to seek refuge beneath the nearest shelter of some kind. The whole elements of civilization was broken up .

By the flicker flickering lights ever and anon the falling snowflakes could be seen. If in the darkness, wife had been seperated from hus- band, or child from pa paren t, vain was the hope of reunion. Through this awful scene did poor vi olet and her sisters w wi wade and push their way, and rushes of hundreds always swept by them.

T hey did not seethe crowds so thick was the gloom, but wearied, disopondent, bewildered, they pushed on, along the snow and over piling snow drifts, and through the blinding medium of snow which fell upo n their heads or dashed into their faces, the snow pellets dashing up in sparkles before their feet in the gleam of torch lights. Yet they did not give up, and trusted in the power of God, always muttering a prayer for safty.

''Oh goodness---yon explosion-see--it hath riven the ground before us.'' Gasped Violet.''It is certain death to move across that plain.We can go no further.My steps sink mong the snow drifts.''

''Hush little sister.Death is sweeter with thee than without thee.''Said Joice.

''Yet whether-----whether-----oh whether can we direct ourselves through this terrible gloom.Already it seems as if we had made a circle and are in the very same spot which we quitted an hour ago.''

The flaring lightni ng of shell explosions had now recommenced and were now in creasing and spreading seemingly over the whole sky the luri d flahes flashes l ingering over the tents making them look weweird nd and unearthly. In the distance over the opposite mountians something that looked like a t orrent of falling fire from the clouds was pouring and it was becoming awful, while the darkness of the atmosphere which had again fell over the scene was slightly relieved once more and this encouraged the rest to continue on their uncertain way, advancing like men groupedto escape a dungeon. At this moment the glare of the strange rain of fire which looked very much like spa sparklers darting from the sides of the summit now seemed to steer and guide their progress, ye yet little did the awful view in that awful light present to them cheers, or encourage their path.

I084.

In parts where the snow lay dry and not mixed with dirt and other rubbish the surface of the fresh snoo covered ground presented a ghastly and leprous white.In other plees glowing cinders and embers lay matted in immense fiery heaps from beneath which emerged the half hidden roasting limbs of some crushed and mangled fugitive. The groms of groans of the dying were broken by the wild shrieks of womens terrror-----now near now distant ------- which when heard in the utter darkness were rendered doubly appal ing by the crushing sense of complete helplessness and the uncertainity of the perils. Around and clear and distinct through all were the mighty and deafening noi ses from the fiey explosions of mines in the plains facing the enemys position, the rushing winds of the snowstorm, the whirling torrents of snow, ad from time to time the burst and awful roar of some great series of cannon broadsides. And even as the winds swept howlingly through the company steat reets they bore sharp streams of hail and such sickening and cold wind as took away for the instant breath and consciousness, followed by a rapid revulsion of the arrested blood and a tingling sensa sensation of agony trembling through every nerve and fibre of the body. The snow now again fell as heavy as a blinding blizzard, and millions of glaring flashes seemed to flash from the enemys positions and also the christian position aided by the continual partial convulsions of the earth.....

The lightni ng flashes of the shells was evidently among the engines of ruin, for every inflamable material that the shells struck were burned and some substances in metal were partially melted, and abronze statue was completely shivered by the blasting force of an explosion. The air had since the beginning of the lull becae poud and still the first section of christian batteries seeming to be at rest, perhaps gathering for greater fury for their next ourburst. Readily and as steadily as the torches flashed full on the eyes of vi olet and her sisters they saw all the horrors of the scene.

"Oh Joice take me to thy arms."Criod Violet."One embrace.Let me feel thy arms around me and in that embrace let us die.I can go no further."

"For my sake, for my sake-----for my life----courage little sister---- ------ my life is lingering with thine, and see the t orches----this way, low how they brave the receding winds. Ha they live through the destruction doubtless fugitives of the distant raging sea of fire, even through the pat pas t horrors and dreasful aspects of woe and death dea th----- we will join them."

Suddenly as she finished speaking the region and even the whole city of Jennie T urmer became lighted up with an intense and lurid glow never before seen so bright , and the very heavens in that direction was in a perfect sheen of dazzling red r light . Bright and gigantic through all the awful darkn ess which closed around it like the most awful walls of hell the whole mountian of forests to the rear of the foes lines shown a most indescribable terrorizing pile of fire.The summit to base was c ompletely riven in two and above its surface to the abject terror of all, oven violet and her sisters there suddenly seemed to rise two monsterous shapes of awful formation one confronting the other, as titan demons contending for the mountians. These wee were of the terrible hue of fire reddening the blackness of the sky almost as blood, which lighted up the whole atmosphere far and wide, but only below the neither pa part of the mountian was still dark and shrouded, save in six places adown which seemed to flow s serpentine and irregular in an upward and downward course roaring avalanches of fire.Along the enemys lines at this moment there was an awful deafening roar of cannons, the sky above the christian line seemed dominated with explosions and darkly yellow through the profound gloom of their banks the blood red ri vers of destruction burned their way upward rushing swiftly upward gradually forming into one big glowing mass and making a horrible hissing roar heard for fifty mices. Over the broadest of the two monster shapes there seemed to spring a cragged and stupendous arch from which as from the very jaws of hell gushed forth for hundreds of feet piles of blazing flames. This great conflargration of forests on that mountian wax was caused by the Angelinians hurling from their batteries fire bombs this hill being nem one of the enemys positions. The ground shook beneath the fut fugitives with a titan convus convul sion that cast all around upon its surface. A simultaneous crashing roar resounded throughout the whole region and even throughout the city and dw as down toppled many a roof and pillar.

I085.

Down fell the ruin echoeing along the streets and riving the solid pavements where it crashed.The shells razed the houses like the tornado. The sounds of the dreadful cannonading stunned general Hanson and the other christian generals for several mi u minutes. When they recovered all was still along general Givians lines and quist again almost like a graveyard, but the light still illuminated the scene and soon increased to ten fold bright ness, the earth still slid and trembled beneath un under the concussion of cannons and explosions going on elsewhere, and again down caved many a roof and pillar in the city as more shells tore and rended the houses. High behind general Hanson who was instructing one of the artillery generals stood a tall column that supported a bronze statue of the Virgin and C hild and the image seemed to change to the shape of fire. the glow as if caught by the metal lingering there with profound bright ness. Then there was suddenly a deafening detonation and crashing roar, and something that flashed bright and dazzlingly shivered br onze and colwan into huge fragments and injured three christian generals and killed one. Amid the confusion of the great battle and bombardment was heard the l u loud rattling roar of scores of millions of muskets somewhere along Roswell Buster Johnstons lines, and the sound of bayonets clashing against one another as the forces of as ailants were borne down before the avalanches of christians----darkening for one instant the spot whse where scores of thousands fell dead or wounded, and s uffused the next in the burnished hues of the fire lights.The company streets were intensely luminous as a more unearthly bright ness fell over the air making such a dazzling sc sheen of light sp spread over the whole battle field that all the generals and the christian artillery men in awe and wonder instinctively turned to the mountians---and behold with an increa increase of this awful brightness two of the gigantic crests covered with trees dividing the summit and the lower ridges into which the trees had been rooted seemed to rock and waver to and fro and flames shot high up into the air while along the enemys lines there wa was a continous and awful million cannon like roar the mightiness of which no lag language or my learned man can descri be, and then surged forward monsterous columns of Glandelinians in the most frightful swam swarms over across the plains and tward general Hansons lines. At the a same awful instant gushed forth volumes of blackest smoke rolling over the air, river and land. Another,----another----another---and another shower of shells more profused than any of the other shells before scattered in a storm of earsplitting salvoes among these moving gray columns and back they surged torn to fragments and terror stricken. The Angelinian soldiers now pushed forward to counter charge, general Hanson leading them on under cover of the fire of their cannons. The great governer generals and the rest guided their steps and avoiding the mass of ruin that encwabered their path sped on followed by the surging troops with fixed bayonets. The flying shell fragments t ore gaps in their lines, but the fragments touched not the generals, save by the general rain of snow and earth a that accompaied some mighty explosion that shivered the plains before, beside, and behind them, but spared them, and when the lesser heavy showers of shell fragments fell u among the troops hurling many to their deaths the generals still sped on unhurt shaking the snow off their shoulders with a slight tremor and so dauntlessly resumed their course. The advance however was constantly impeded by the retreating crowds of Glandelinians that threw themselves flat occasionally opening fire with all their firearms, and other columns that grouped amid the terrible glare and reddish gloom of shade caused by the trees and now in the glare of the battle and fire storm the once attacking Glandelinians now fled and at length a group of wild panic stricken glandelinians rushed upon a swarm of Abyssinkili ans and though by the shock they were thrown into some confus ion the violence of the other christian attackers hurled them back, and once more the roar of the battle was now red receding, and darkness was now again slowly wrapping over the scene like a vie veil. As his forces cont inued to surge onward across the plains under heavy shell fire they were arrested by immense crowds of fresh Glandelinian troops more in number than half the population of a large city. They spread along the fields and plains hundreds of thousand thousands upon hundreds of thousads and being worsted and driven into confusion by the advani ng christians were uncertain whether to fly, and those who had fled tward the wooded regions were so terrified by the frightful fury of the attacking Angelinians and Abyssinkilians and so handicapped by the distant furious waves of fire spreading in the northern forests and tward their own positions and the I086 pernatural shrieking of the elements from the horrob horrible scene, the gasping forms of hundreds of thousands of dying lacerated soldiers , the disembowled men and torn bodies, and animals and horses, and also the things in the boiling river nand by the sound of the huge explosions cating a rain of stones and earth into the river and fa1l falling in all the regions all around had again recoiled tward their own rear in wildest confusion presenting the less frightful aspects of the two other streams of human beings meeting t ogether feeling a sad comfort in numbers arrested in despair and doubt but still contesting w every inch of ground against the christ ian attackers. The increase of the sudden illumination ov over themighty multitudes of retreating Glandelinians, and advancing ristians, and the pink color of the musk etry smoke it -cast had awed them, but when it grew darker again, the panic stricken Glandelinians crouched in breat,less groups, and never on earth had the faces of men seemed so haggared. Even had the meeting of two big hords of human beings been so hostile and been so stamped with the horror and sublimity of dreadful things done to each other as at this frightful sei ge. Even the distant battle line surging back and forth desplayed the havoc caused by the furious conflict, and the very woodee plains were littered as thick as straws with the fallen sh shattered human bodies of both sides. The awful flashes of shell explosions now and then pierced the clouds of smoke over the sum it of the mountians swept by the forest fire the huge glowing masses of flames lighting the city and country around for miles like an infer no.

Su ddenly a blinding flash of flame seemed to lea along the summit of Evans main position to a stupendous length, where there seemed to be a series of awful terrific explosions somewhere whose deafening roa roar seemed to split the whole range of mountians in twain from the storm of deafening echoes, and which made every tent inside the christian line shiver with the concussion.

At the same time explosions occured among the burning wooded hills raining up and then down a cloud of spaks sparks upon the northeat northeast side of the unburned wooded region where thousands of flee ing Glandelinians had taken refuge and terrible and appalling cries came from the scores of thousands of mangled bodies that rolled and writhed mortally wounded in the path of the advancing fire storm, while at the same time clouds of smoke was again wafted far and wide, and thousands of the prostrate bodies of the glande inian soldiers who did not escape the torrent of shells lay dead or dying.

The sheet of flames though not so so fierce as before continued to shoot up high into the air followed by wreaths of the blackest clouds the frightful torrents of shells still bombarding the enemys positions setting the other woods on fire, while clouds of thick crimson smoke hung over the whole scenelike a bloody ca canopy making the battlefield more hedious. At the same time the sheets of flame had shot into the air while thousands of soldiers were being ki lled by explosions the wind that was rising spread forth a rain of flaming sparks and embers, which had been added by a fearful cloud which also spread over the sky fresh explosions throwing a fiery rain from the o conflargration over the other hills, the whole range of mountians besides ad behind the enemys position seeming to disolve themselves into a roaring mass of fire that swept everything before its flaming billows as they burned on with a dreadful roar.

In a few minutes the bif big fiery flood of flames had reached another of the thickly wooded hills and the crowdos of glande indians terrified and panic stricken were forced to retreat before its shrieking death storm, and the volumes of blinding suffocating smoke, but from the distance came the wailing cries of may many who escaped not as the billows of glowing fire swept over them, burning and destroying and melting everything it in its fiery path.

All this time the blinding sheet of flames had remained flaring into the sky lits glowing tongues seeming to tear the clouds asunder, while now and then t when new stretches of woods caught it made an appearance as if the sides of the mountians were seeming to open and produce fiery jets the whole eastern sides of the hill hill hills looking as if they were engulfed in a terrible vortex of seething flames that continually burned up the sides of fresh hills with forests while now the very city became hidden in the wreaths of smoke while it seemed al s also as if a snowstorm of spaks was literally falling from the skies envelopting all the distant forests in sight in one mass of flame, while at the same time another great ex plosion caused the entire mas s of burning trees nearest to the enemys lines to come down with a mightier roar than ever, the whole sky now being reddened with the glare of the fire.

I087•845

This was the greatest scene that the whole christian army, the fugitive women and children, or violet and her sisters had ever seen. Genral General Hanson and his other generals who were recalling the christian troops back to their own posi positions found the way back to the lines very difficult and large forces of the enemy were persuoing, and masses of dead bodies of men and horses lay barrier like to impede their wild progress. Violet and her sisters later on had been persued by the enemy who had come upon them in the rear of the christian lines and for the little fugitives the pathway grew steep, nothing greet ing the eyes of the fugitives but huge fantastic boulders thrown by some mighty explosions into the center of the desolate waste. They struggled hard to obtain a footing upon the rugged surface of the steep snow covered rocks, hard pressed by their persuers, one side of which in spite the dazzling glow of the co conflar gration was in complete darkness and appeared to be a yawning circular gulf or some sort of sopp steep crater.One false step would precipitate them into the black abyss. But they never knew of their danger untill at their feet the black deep precipice only lighted half way down by the glow of the distant conflargration yawned.When they saw saw the awful precipice it was too late and they uttered cries of anguish as they shot over the treacherous brink down into the unknown depths of the abyss.

As they felt themselves whirling through space a more wailing cry arose from violet and her sisters and then their frightened faces peered down accidentally in an unsuccessful attempt to note the depth of the chasm in their terrific decent face downward. The awful glow of the conflargration failed to illumine the black gulf even half way to its rocky depth. Down, down, down, through the murky darkness, not knowing at what moment the horrible death that must ensue would put an end to the suspense, worse than death death itself. Then followed a shock. A million lights seemed to flash before their eyes and rapidly fade away again. But despite the shock however they were not rendered senseless. They had landed upon a wide ledge which was covered with a thick green moss, and the leavs and twigs that had fallen from above the entire mass of vegetation forming a thick but yeilding carpent carpet . Below as far as eye could pene trate now fully illumined by an increas increasedbrightness of the glow was the jagged opening of the awful chasm, stretching away into an erebus gloom, a bottomless pit that might well characterize the mouth of the Infernal regions. Above the ledge where the little girls found themselves, the towering rocks, and stunted trees, seemed to stretch upward untill they touched the lurid sky. Innumerable dried tufts of vegetation had grown between the crevasses of the rocks and gnarled trees vainly striving to fasten their roots to the thin layer of soil covered the almost perpendin perpendicular sides of the precipice, these being the only signs of vegetable life.

elow nothing but the deep gloom and the death like stillness. Violet turned her eyes tward her sisters and saw saw that they like herself were were upon their knees knees and their lips moving in prayer a prayer to the all seeing, who had stretched forth his hand and plucked them out of the very jaws of death. It was a most mirc miraculous escape and one well calculated to bring them to the foot of God's throne with their heart felt thanks. Violet crept to the edge of the ledge and glanced down. Her heart sank within her and her cheeks grew still paler as she noticed the fearful depths, and realized the hairbra hairbreadth escape she and her sisters had experienced. Violet and her sisters shrank away from the edge of the shelving rock with a shudder not caring to peer over the v verge. There was no way of reaching the ledge above or the height above and to attempt an ascent, or decent was sure death, yet it seem ed as if they were spared from a violent death only to meet a linger ing one of torture, the tortures of starvation. They were unable to quit this ledge and it seemed as if they must remain untill the dark angel of death would put an end to their sufferings.They cried and screamed for help with the hope that some Angelinians might hear them but no one came. Violet herself carefully observed the situation above and below and saw no hope of leaving the ledge. Even the frail tufts of vegetation were beyond their reach reach—— aye may yards beyond their reach, and as the breezes from the mysterious depths swayed them to and fro they seemed to mock mock Violet and her sisters, and defied them to grasp them.

I088.

Behind them was the massive butt ress-------layer upon layer reachi ng upward like an endless wall but as violet was gazing steadily at the wall she saw to her speechless surprise an aperture in its face. She called the attention of her sisters and soon she was leading the way through the openi ng. All found themselves in a chamber hollowed out by nature in the very heart of the wall. Far above was the roof of h this chamber composed of gigant ic layers of strata so interlo ked that each layer helds its superincumbent s strata in position.It seemed as if one should be displaced by a sudden shock that the entire mass would fall crashing to the rocky floor. A flight of square blocks served as a stairway to an opening in the uneven wall of the cave which led to a second vault like chamber which led to bigger caverns and subterranean passages. Huge columns supported the huge dome and numerous stalactities hung down like vast icecicles glittering in the rays of the lights of their matches. Yet as they paused at the base of a huge column supporting the jagged roof and as violet stopped she noticed an opening large enough to emit a hundred men at once.Believing that it was an exit and pausing to examine a dark cavity at the base of the column violet told the rest of her sistr sisters to followefollow her.She led the way and they began the ascent of a rugged and rough winding stairway. This stairway was formed by jutting masses of rock that protruded from the sides of the pillar in such a manner as to form a succession of steps winding upward in almost in an almost unbroken flight .Here and there the huge rocks would render the as ascent somewhat difficult diffi cult but with these few exceptions the mount presented no great obstacles to their journey tward the terminating point. They toiled upward slowly and carefully from step to step untill they paused breathlessly upon a huge slab of stone and gazed through a crevasse through wh which the glow of the co nflargration wa was forcing itself.

A few more steps brought them to a passage in the side of the column nd they placd their expiring torches in a small crevase. Joice pushed a round boulder aside and the brilliant glow of the conflargration streamed into the mout of the o t outlet . From here they could observe the conflargration and battle with complete safty. At this time a dull rumbling sound came from the direction of gageneral hansons far distant lines a bright flash of explosions seemed to tear through the air continually the earth seemed to still heave and tremble ad and then a noise resembling the r ttering of distant thunder followed. They also saw saw that a big wave of glandelinians had reached the position held by kindernines army but was pouring back in a retreat while at the same time a duller shade wa was now falling falling on the air and instinctively they turned in the direction of the conflargration and saw that darkness once more seemed to wrap the burning hills in a veil only the channels of roaring roaring fire glowed dinly dinly.

The next moment it seemed as if the end of the world had come. T here was a violent series of earthquake shocks as it seemed, and the little girls almost lost their footing, while the Angelinian forces in the distance was seen sweeping forward across the plains carrying all before them.At the same time two brigades were dashi ng forwa forward across the meadows striking the foe armies with fearful force while to the sensation of violet and her sisters the ground under them seemed to sink down with a rush and then rise again. Then to their horror came the tidal wave of humanity.Back rolled the glandelinian surge upon the christian line in overwhelming force envelopting the recently advancing christian columns and the torn lines in purple quickly drew backwards, broke, and then fled tward their own positions, while the uproa uproar of yelling was dreadful.Once more the enemy was victorious. Again fiery st reaks of flashes lit up the sky over the enemys distant positions having a bright red color, which in turn was placed by flashes of green, blue, yellow, and purple in color changing rapidly from one stream of flashes to another, now flashing forward over the enemys positions, others seeming to sink low and at times seemed to creep ai and roll along the enemys very lines itself while puffy clouds of whit w white smoke rose and wreathed before the enemys advancing lines and other rolling clouds of smoke probably from explosions sone sometimes became luminous. Simultaneously the white clouds of steam like smoke spread far and wide alon the christian lines and the clouds along general Evans position were torn with the most vivid red lights which would quickly quickly brighten and then disappear.At the same time dark clouds looking like sponges seemed to bulge over the plains pierced with secondary red glowing flashes which illuminated thewhole plain and there was a great clamor of rattling, clashing and banging.The colored flashes no matter matter where they appeared were explosions of all kinds of shells. During the time they had had been seeking for safty violet and her sisters had seen the results of the bombardment and the conflangration ad and had wit nessed some of the most horrible deaths of the glandelinia glanddinia soldie s soldi ers who had failed to escape from the torrent of christian shell fire which had poured a storm of fragments seemingly from the skies as the bodies of seven officers all guarian gurdes except two were ly ng just as they were overwhelmed and destroyed in the act of trying t o restore order aong among their ret reating troops. They were all huddled toget her in a last pitiful embrace. At other portions violet and her sisters had seen four generals t hree of them T urneranmians and one a Mc-Hollestinian presumably the son of one of the most noted glande,l glandelinian generals layi ng also near them the generals also clinging toget her in a death embrace. These dead generals had evident ly tried to rally their pais stricken troops a brigade ofwhich had taken shelter on some outhouses untill the fall of shell fragments and iron had been very heavy, and t hen they had been overcome by a rain of explosion s in attempting to flee. They had been left as they were found for they had been just now i mpossible to be removed from the hardened lav snow crust that had partly engulfed them. During their return tward the christian y lines violet and her sisters finding that the ground was becoming deeply covered with snow and unable to run through so much depth of snow had sought the only means of re fuge t hey could see which of course t caused them to take a trip into the gulf as stated before. Many of the dead soldiers of both sides as they saw were already covered with the snow which had been driven into a hardened crust around their bodies encasing them. From their new refuge violet and her sisters as stated before were able to see the bombardment and conflargration with personal safty and cr from here they saw some thi ng grand.

It seemed as if there were e ormonous conflargrations breaking also from the summit of Mt Calverine where general Evans had his strong positions while on the northern side of other mountians a dark moving mass or objects seeming to push forward with it heavy clouds of smoke which seemed ejected with loud explosive roaring crashes, decended one of the ri dges in front of the enemys position, the si des of the other hill's seemed heavy wi th smoke wreaths the air seemed again suffocatingly dead while every glow of the forest fires seemed to be disappearing in a thick smoke haze the atmosphere being cold and oppresive far from the conflargration but it surely must have been hot in the location of the enemys position. The moving surge of objects was still moving but now across the plains for a great distance in extent and now the little girls who were watching thi s sight were su surprised from the terrific din that now came from general Evans positions with redoubled fury. Knowing as the firing had ceased along general hansons lines and that now it was safe for the time being to leave their queer refuge violet and her sisters went nearer to watch the moving stream of strange objects and the scene they experienced and witnessed was brilliant and awesome. They were above a ledge over looki overlooking the plains and they saw that a portion of general vivians whole line was again i n a state of furious and magnificent activity. T he portion of the stream of moving objects which were pouring over the plains at the start seemed about two miles i n length but it seemed as if it was in no ways remarkable for it only movi moved forward slowly.Then slowly from the foremost of the mass of moving objects there appeared a st orm of flashes like fireflies but of greater intensity and then along hansons lines the roar of hell seemed to break loose followed by cannons that thundered again with an unceasing uproa uproar. The glandelinians were again making an onslaught in an endeavor to either st st op the bombardment or break the christian line and sweep it back so as to end the seige. The view of the little girls was attended with dreadful peril and inconceivable fatigue but they did not regret having made it.

''I'm alwy always wondering why general Evans lines of artio lery artillery is in such a state of activity while the others re only in desultory act ion.''Said violet.''Of course I've been told lately that some glandelinians had planed to blow a large chasm at the base of the hill on which Evans position is occupied and that it was their purpose to set a deadly mine with which to gap his line. It was talked that general Raymond ichardson federal had intenti ons of destroying that christian position by means of six hundred great mines placed nea near the summit and with theintention of blowing holes large enough to frustrateany attempts of the christians pushing forward any attacks in that direction.He know no doubt that if he is successful it would cause the destruction of half of general Evans army bes ide a good portion of the ridge. I've tried to send a message to Evans to warn him in time to stop gensal Federals plas but there is danger of him doing it anyway to rout the christim army from the strong position, and also cause a most titanic and destructive explosion along general ansons positions."

"I would advise general vans to leave the ridge then before it is too late."Said Joi ce."It seems evident that general Hanson is not going to win this seige."

"Yes and though it is quiet and dark now I'm sure that the bombardment is still going on along his lines and it is lucky that the hardened crush of deep snow and the snow tha that is falling protects al the wooded regions around us or otherwise wo we would have been surround ed by another forest fire. The christian cannons along general ivians lines re still in violent action and also I think we had better leave this region before the enemys artillery fronting Hansons position begins activity again and----------"

Suddenly to their amazement and fear both the distant hills and lso also the country around shook in a terrible manne manner from some grea great concussion and they were also startled by a stunning uproar far in front of them, while from the concussion Jennie had a narrow escape from being thrown on her face, and violet and two of her other sisters were sent sprawling gaagainst a ledge of rocks with some violence. The convulsion was simultaneously proceeded by what they saw which rose like columns of dense fiery clouds but which was in reality great columns of dense smoke light ed up by the flashes of the great explosions of which they were and high into the air shot the clouds of smoke mingled with snow and millions of small stones thrown up into the air by the force of the gigantic explosions caused by more mines being set off right under the enemys positions and which was followed by an ernormous storm of other rattling drumming roar of explosions seemingly uni versally on the battle field.Jennie afterwards declared that they were like tall pine trees throwing out great branches at the top. In a moment more there issued from the left plain in front of the enemys position a great storm of flashes, and snow and rock and earth began to fall in tremendous showers over all the positions and even into the nearest portions of the rive for a great extent. The christian batteries under Evans were hurling broadsides of high explosives and blasting the plains before him. Minute by minute the clouds of smoke thickened and a peculiar hissing seemed to fill the very cloud overhead and a peculiar wind at the same time seemed to rise and it was heavy laden with pungent biting sulphor sulphurious powder fumes. The horrible storm of roaring explosions seemed to be covering the whole sky over the enemys positions now the flying shells shrieked with the roar of a hurricane and the landelinian armies now seemed to be in fearful peril of being overwhelmed and blown to defeat.Violet and her sisters not being able to stand the scene of horror staggered away from the ledge as fast as they could half blinded and suffocated by the s o smoke clouds that increased from distant smudge fires while throughout the whole bombardment the night ly sky over the conflargration had become covered with the blackest clouds of "hell" and aother great explosion nea near by hurled a rain of rocks all about violet and her sisters, while the peculiar wind had increased to the force of a gale. The roar of new clattering explosions now na near now distant sounded like the unbroken warning cry from far distant cannon numbered by the thousand going off in a simultaneous continual discharge while violet and her sisters rushed for general ansons headquarters headquarters with the frenzy of a single idea--------they must escape the threatening torrent of stones earth and mud and snow which the explosions were hurling all about and which now came pouring down among the christian tents at intervals as the enemy were returning volleys of the same kind of shells. The whole world seemed to grow chaostic and terrible, and everything was obscured by the smoke wreaths. The big swarm of Glandelinians that had been moving forward to make the demonstrat demonstration swept back across the plins plains tward their own position in confusion.

Cannons everywhere far to their front now seemed to be roaring and thundering incessantly while the fearful orgy of devastation continued on the smoke clouds of more explosions flashing at times into ghastly luridness pierced by zipping tongues of flame from the bursting shells roaring on the plins and over the enemys positions..:....::

The whole line of Glandelinian batteri es across the plains seemed to have gone mad with din and angry songs of defiance, and while violet and her sisters were still fleeing an explosion of shrapnal shrapnell occured near them overhead and something struck the little girls on their backs and limbs with a sting that felt like the cut of a hundred lashes, and they fell, only to get up and limp forward tward a line of trees. As they were now reaching the vinicity of general Hansons headquarters a burning tree fell at their heels, in fact on three sides of them great explosions occured each about a thousand yards away fortunately, and outside in such a location it seemed impossible that the little girls could have lived with such explosions occuring everywhere. The wind p sped the sparks produced by burning trees, and over the heads of the little fugitives the cold blizzard winds blew, and again there was an ex l explosion and something like a million hot needles seemed to press upon them just as their destination reached in sight. The sky was again lurid with flames of forest fires, and now ten shells exploded di rectly overhead with an earsplitting clamor but they had at last reached their destination where all was safe for the time being.

The blazing conflargrations among the distant forests were again becoming visible though everything about one of the recently fire swept mountians was still in total darkness, save in one of the clu clouds of smokewhere shone glows and all kinds of colored flashes. In the midst of that charred region and hot cindery grounds fresh trees began to catch on fire, while violet and her sisters were amazed by the continual sliding of the ground as they stood outside their headquarters watching the scene in the distance, and now in a another dark spot of the enemys positions they saw immense streaks of lurid lights rising here and there but from that direction therewas no roaring and thundering of cannons as yet, though over the plains in that location the fall of exploding shells shot from christian batteries waxed fast and most furious making a great drum drum roar the scene looking very much as if God was raining fire and brimstone from heaven upon the wicked glandelinians.....

The whole sky over the plins and above the christian lines to the right and left was thickly covered with flashes and violet and her sistes now fully alive to the imminence of danger roused general Hanson to get his main batteries in action if he wished to win the bloody seige, and he and his generals consulted together for a few minutes as to the best course to be taken and percieving the probh probability of their lines being entombed in the fragments of stones hurled about by explosions along their positions they res olved in endeavoring to effect a general artillery storm whic h they hoped would silence the landelinian batttbatteries, and give general vans all the aid he needed in troops and ammunition.

T ying pillows on their heads and banding them with strings to sheild them from the falling and flying stones they sallied forth to the lines and they soon succeded in getting up into position all the artillery by vigorous orders to the officers and then all of genera general Hansons batteries roared forth in perfect salvoes of cannonading thunders and so suddenly did the fatal shower of shells come upon them that many mulitudes of the glandelinians in the rear of their batteri es perished or suffered serious injury and as it con tinued steadily over a wide extent the survivors became panic stricken and withdrew to the rear. The snow covered ground in front of general Hansons position wa was fairly strewn with rocks and stones and der debris and immense masses of burning embers of trees borne on the wings of the gale were swept about the hard battling christian gunners who had covered their ammunition to prevent it from catching fire and causing fresh explosions among them. For an hour the artillery roared on in dreadful detonations shells flew among the christian lines continually in ret urn and then a gigantic uproar broke out universally all along the line, and in another hour the whole region again became lighted by an immense glow and all of a sudden violet and her sisters who were still watching the scene noticed that the upper positions of the enemy was sending forth an again an immense torrent of humanity to make an assault with the purpose of stopping general Hansons destructive artillery storm.

Its progress was arrested for a time by large forces of christians thrown forward to meet the charge, but the mass of the Glandelinian assailants at last became so great that they swept the christia christian forces out of the way and came tearing upon general Hansons lines like a screaming mob of fiends just let out of hell upon the helpless children themselves of heaven as it seemed. The enemy recieved no resistance for a limited time to the surprise of violet and her sisters and then before them appeared a hedious gray wave that swept cla clear upon the sailents.

I092.

Then the whole christian line of infantry let loose a horrible roar of musketry that was deafening and heard for fifty miles, tore the wave out of existance, and met the second wave with pistols, machine guns and bayonets, tearing them up. For a time the Glandelinians yelling fiercely and madly hewed their wy way through the christian lines but general Hanson by word and example and by inspiring his officers soon repulsed the second wave before the third wave came up, and his cannons tore the third wave with another uproar heard again for fifty miles and then with a storm of horrible yells the Angelinians poured over their trenches like a counter tidal wave and sweeping forward upon the t orn and descriminated Glandelinian columns poured a withering fire and closed with them in a terrific shock.

The Glandelinians recoiled in panic being completely a alarmed by the counter charge and by the appra appearance of Abyssinkilians upon their right, and so betook themselves to precipitate flight, but before they al could save themselves from capture of death and injury, a large part of the right section of the Abyssinkilian surge screaming in a deafening uproar of yells and curses, began to rush down after discharg ing their musketry full into the faces of the enemy, and then the whole surge gave way and fled in confusion before the christian attackers, while just then in the plain tyere was an awful roa roar , a tremendous secondary noise resembling the simultaneous discharge of a thrillion cannon, and a blinding sheaf of light shot up into the air for seemingly hundreds of feet, and immense quantities of stones snow ad and earth wa thrown up into the air and all about the fleding fleeing Glandelinians at the same time by the great explosion, pro prepagating the effects of the blasted mine, through the space of two miles of Glandelinian troops, and hundreds of the fugitives were showered by a sheen of falling stones, which killed them by scores and wounded many.

A great extent of the fleeing Glandelinian forces was by this tremend ous war commition again again hurled upon the christians with the intention of stopping the counter advance. Four small villiages abandoned long ago were filled with the fleeing fugitives who took t defense there, but the christians captured them ad and here 5,957 of the foe were killed and most of the foe forces again receded. The foe batteries however produced a commotion which for several minutes wa was abl able to stop the progress of the advancing christian troops the shells exploding among the purple columns with great noise similar to the discharge of thousands of the heaviest cannons, tearing asunder great masses of the Angelinians, and throwing both the Angelinians and the Abyssinkilians into the greatest confusion. The enemys line of artillery was now constantly hidden by uncommonly luminous clouds of smoke where the flashes were red of blue blood hue.

A part of the flow of christian troops hd had already reached the left of the pld plains where it came in contact with a rallied pa part of the recent Glandelinian wave of attackers and the whole plain presented a an awful spectacle, as a struggle between two inimical elements.

The noi se of battle was row roaring with the most heaviest cannonding cannonading ever heard before during the war.The foe lines were however pushed farther and farther back by the succeeding masses of the christian troops and the whole Glandelinian wave wa was compelled to recede but at some times the foe rallied and counter charged with such violence that the christians were prevented from progressing forward too swift.

At another point of the counter attack the veloi velocity with which the christian forces advanced was frightful . The other portion of the christian flow had indeed moved with extraordinary speed but this other section took only half a an hour to move from their position to the edge of the snow covered plain a distance of more than a mile but much greate greater had been the velocity of the stream of troops which broke and ran from the southern part of the plain upon the enemys rear.These soldiers seemed to run with the speed of frightened deer. In a few minutes they had reached the enemys retreating lines and in four teen minuteds it had passed half way across the plain and drove all before it. Never was such a roar heard as produced by this horrible storm of musketry fire on both sides and at the fresh outburst of the artillery duels the ground had increa increased its shaking and columns after columns of smoke shot forth in ominous clouds accompanied by the same frequent flashes of dazzling lights and a deafening noise like intol erable thunder which wa was compared to a continual firing of cannons of any numbers known, and more than a billion muskets. The din indeed was more tremendous than can be comprehended.

The greatest horrors of the seige was known as the Confirmation disater and it wa was a great battle whicheraged on that day of the time when the yivian girls hd hd recieved their confirmation. It was called the Battle of Confirmation because of the day it raged and was one of the most desperate battles of t he seige. Many millions of soldiers on both sides who were survivors were all wounded either se s eriously or slightly and at some points of the battle line the enemy had won sweeping successes, and at other points they had met terrible disaster .

The battle raged for three days night and day without t he slightest pause, cannons roared incessantly and charges were made by scores. The foe won the battle and in some cases it i s considered a brilliant v' ctory on their side, but as brilliant as the victory could have been it did not cause the christian army to abandon t he sei ge but did break the besiging lines bad enough to enable over half of the foe army to effect their escape though the Angelinians did capturec over 2I,899,000 prisoners, and ten generals. But general Manley and the remainder did succeeded in escaping to the dig disgust of general Hanson and fled tward Evangelinia Crania, a portion of Manleys army sweeping Bi cknell away an d capturei ng Osmondonson.

General Hanson however despite his bloody repulse did not intend to allow the enemy to get away entirely if he could help it and so as soon as possible his armies were moving headlong to besiege general Manley at Evan Crania. General Manley had captured Evangelinia Crania in the meantime and t hrew int o position over half of his army at Lieghburg Landing and prepared to meet the advance of the christia christian armies who arived within ten days and started to throw up new positions of their own. During thetime that the christian armies were concentrating at Evangelinia Crani a one dark night Violet and her siste sisters had went out to scout on the enemy and became lost in a dark woods.

These woods were infested by the G/a Glandelinians and knowing the danger Violet said;

"Where in thunder have we got t o."?

"I don't know a answered Joi ce. "But we must be careful not to be seperated in thi s terrible darkness and with these woods swarming with those murderers."

"But I don't underts understand why we don't see any signs of the enemy."Said Angeline.

"That is what I say. but hanged if I can hear a sound or see anything at all.All I can see is theglowing camp fires of the foes lines far in the distance and the rembling sound of cannon being placed into o position. It would be fierce if we got lost in these woods especially at such a critical time when Manleys army is seriously handicapped and in a desperation su situation.Then the foe are worse than the hell creatures."

"Don't mention it Jennie ."Said Catherine. "It would mean our finish if we can get u out."

All of the little girls whocwere disguised as Glandelinian boyscouts gazed anxiously around them but they could see nothing excepting the far off shine of Glande inian camp fires with here and there the flashing back and forth of all kinds of lights.These Calverinain woods were as thick as an Angelinian jungle and was of very wide extent and i nfested also with wild wolves ad and dangerous pumas and reptiles especially sometimes the pleng iglomenean creatures had their abodes here and the little girls with their uniforms on may be mistaken fir the Glandelinia boyscouts and attacked. Violet and her sisters did not fear for themselves but they hd had their small small little girl friend with them and some of the christian soldiers also who had determined to protect the children at all costs or dis with them.

"Which way had we better go?"Sai d Hettie."We are surely lost in these woods and----"

"There are two flery eeyes like searchlights glaring upon us."Cried violet excitedly.

"Where?"Gasped Jennie in horror.

Violet pointed at a ledge of rocks a dozen feet away. They all looked and saw a large serpentine animal with huge brilliantly designed wings crouching in the opening of the maze watching them with blazing eyes. Violet a and two of her sisters instantly took aim with their pistols but he their other sisters warned them not to fire for it was a plengiglomena Blengiglomenean creature. T e the creature did indeed mis take the little girls for a plengiglomenean creature of its own type at first but then noticing they were human forms in small grey uniforms it made tward them with inconceivable rapidity and its tail circled around Jennie and a tree and squeezed her up against i t.

Jennie in spi te of herself uttered a cry of terror while her sisters and even the soldiers with them started back with a gasp of alarm. Then to make matters worse a few glandelinians appeared and started to attack the children but the firearms of the soldiers- we were discharged with a crashing report and with a snarl the glandelinians leaped into the air and came down with a crash in the underbrush. For a moment or two their legs worked rapidly and then alll movements ceased and they lay as still as mere logs.

''I guess we all hit them at one time as we all fired together.''Said the soldiers.

''Let's go and investigate.''Said his comrade.

It was no small honor to bring down a numbe of glandelinians with one volley in such darkness and it wa the si x shots that did it so completely and effectually for right between the eyes of the three glandelinians close together we were two holes showing where the six bullets had penetrated the brain of the foe soldiers. Their now intention was to relieve Jennie of the Blengin which mistook her for a foe and attacked her. It would have been all up with the little girl in a fefew minutes for the posionous rep reptile having securely evel p ev enveloped her prey proceeded to tighten its folds. The power in its tail coils would have crushed Jennie to a pulp in the bri ef interval of fi ve mi minutes for its tail had a grip on the root of the tree but the soldiers, seven violet and her sisters did not lose their presence of mind in spite of the horror of the moment and violet picked up a rifle leveled it at the swaying head and fired point blank. Although close to its, the oscillating head p pointed at her half fainting sister with a gloating look in its eyes was a difficult mark to get a shot at in such darkness and violet had fi red quickly knowing that there was no time to be lost, and the bullet chipped a good gash in its head. Though badly wounded what appeared to be the Blengiglomenean creature but which really was an immense rattle snake, it was fa far from down and emitted a fearful hiss of rage at the same time making a clamor with its rattle and then it swung its head around to face its new enemy. Violet having drawn her pistol fired again and thebullet passed through its mouth and the si de of its head. At this the serpent darted its head a violet at Violet with more fierce hissing and rattling that fairly droze the brave childs blood and made her spring backwals ba ckwards in which she tripped.A At that moment another snake darted at her left leg and circled around it, but ngeline and Catherine saw it and raising a hea y heavy stone which they both picked up dealth it a heavy blow. With a fierce hiss the snake struck out blindly, missed violets head by a narrow margin and rapidly uncoiled itself and made off through the deep snow followed by a bullet from violets pistol. Then iolet sprang to her feet in some consterna consternation while one of the soldiers alone was making a fierce and continu cont inuous assault on the rattlesnake and he nea nearly got bit for his pains. At one time it nearly had him in its coils and had he been bitten by it it would have been all up with him unless the posion was drawn out of the wound at once and a remendy applied at once. However they had the remendy with them for no one would everythink at any time of penetrating the Calverinian woods without such a thing. Joi ce and Angeline now attacked the rattlesnake with heavy pisces of limb they picked up, the reptile now beginning to loose its folds somewhat, while i ts whole attention was di rected at its new enemies which had effected such damage upon it.

The rattlesnake seemed to realize that poor violet alone was pacparticularly dangerous to its very existance, and it was necessary to reach the brave little girl and do her up. Violet struck at u it again and again with a club, and the snake would have coiled around her also if joice, her other sisters, and the soldiers had not pitched in all at once to the rescue. Quick as a flash all took aim at the hissig hissing head and fi red simultaneously. In their e excitement they missed but they had the satisfaction of drawing its att attention from iolet who managed to draw her other pistol from its hostler. and though she barely took aim as she fired the bullet went through and passed passed right through the snakes brain tearing out the eyes in its course.

That settled it though.It's vitality was so great that its neck thrashed about with great force while its folds unwound itself from its victim and then churned churned the snow like some wind funnel for a

That settled it though. It's vitality was so great that its neck thrashed about with great force while its folds unwound itself from its victim and the tree and churned churned the snow like some wind funnel for a minute. The moment the strain came off, Jennie now senseless sank limp and motionless on the gro nd ground thu though she suffered no vitial inbury injury from the embrace of the huge rattler which had not bitten her from the attacks of the others. Satisfied that the snake was done for Violet and her sisters and the men withdrew out of reach of i ts swishing body and watched its motions subsi de. When it was safe a enough to approach they rushed to the tree and two of the soldiers g5 grabbed the little girl and carried her away. Each had carried a canteen of water slung avout their body and Violet uncorked hers and poured some of the water down her sister's throat and in a few minutes she revived and sat up.

''Oh gracious.''She gasped with a terrified look.''Where am I?''

''You s are safe Jennie dear.''Replied Violet .''Brace up.''

''I thought --------''

''The snake had you. It did but we podded him good and proper.''

Poor Jennie closed her eyes with a sm shudder. S he trembled all over as if with the argue.

''Is the thing really dead?''She asked at last.

''As a cofen nail.''

''And you killed it.''?

''I and my sisters, and the others helped kill it.''

''You and my sisters have saved me from being killed by the snake?''

''You would have done the same for us had we been in the same danger.'' Said Violet.

''So say no more about it. Look at the reptile it is as quiet as a log now, for there is not a move out of it. It is a monster.''

''We would rather tackle a pack of wolves than that slimy looki g looking thing over there.''Said one of the soldiers.''It is harder than blazes to get a crack at it in such darkness, but God must have helped us out of it, or it would have gone hard with all of for sure of us for sure.''

Jennie looked at the dead ratt le snake and a faint feeling came over her again as she saw what a fearful experienceshe had with the big reptile. It was certainly a monster and seemed of all but twenty feeth in length. The tail st l still appeared to have life in it but this was merely a kind of muc muscular life. She looked so white that poor Violet asked her if s he wa really i nju4 injured.....

''No dear sister I think I am allright, but I can feel that horrible grip around me yet. I do not believe that I will ever forget it.''

''Shake violet and your sisters. I'll be like a brother to youse as long as I live for this brave deed you have done.''Said one of the sodl soldiers.''And so will my companions. You six little girls are indeed great heroines though you are children so young and delicate, and deserve a reward that you may some day get if you keep up your bravery in time of need.

CHAPTER FIFTY TWO

FURTHER ADVENTURES IN THE WOODS, AND THE ENCOUNTERS WITH THE WICKED GLANDELINIANS.....

Each little girl clasped hands with him and the other soldiers, and then they were about to start on their way again when they noticed a great clattering noise in the distance and looking in the direction from whi whence the sound came saw something like objects moving here and there tward or from them.Not believing it anything serious they paied no further attention and one of the soldiers measuring the dead snake predicted it to be about eighteen feet and five inches long and about two inches thick.

"My think of that thing being around me like a vise."Said poor Jebn Jennie as she shuddr su-shuddered as her thoughts went back to her late peril. "I believe if I had been alone and no n one near I would have been mashed as flat as a pnacake a and bitten by its horrible fangs----'

At that moment they heard a childish scream and that of a woma woman and a man also a short distance away.

"Ha c"Cried one of the soldiers."We are not so much alone as we thought ."

Violet and her sisters boldly started in the direction of the scream followed by the soldiers knowing that it was a man, a woman, and a child who was in distress and that they could not be altogether alone in that immense forest so close to Evangelinia Crania, and Lieghburg Landing. More screams from the same q uarter and all was still. However it did not take them long to reach another opening in the woods and here they saw something that was enough to put terror in the bravest heart.....:A

A fierce looking Rebonniaof monsterous size with outspread wings seemingly as high as a mountian was standing over the dusky form of a wicked Glandeli nian upon whom it was clear it had sprung from its ambush in the brushwood and was tearing at one of his arms when the men and Violet and her sisters apppea appeared.

It was ovident that the women and two children had been attacked first by the Glandelinians for other Glandelinians lay about completely torn to pieces while the creatures face was beutiful in appearance but now hedious somewhat with i ts anger and rage.The screams had ceased by the time they had arived and they saw that a n another Blongiglomonean creature was disappearing high into the sky with the women and two children having rescued them from the Glandelinians.For a moment Violet and her sistes sisters gazed at the fierce animal with the greatest awe not daring to show themselves for the rebbonnia was of unusual si ze.The creature heard the approach of the soldiers and the little girls and pausing in her operations glared savagly at them at first thinking they were more of the Glandglinians and prepared for a spring,. Suddenly a nother another horde of Glandelinians appeared and fired upon the Vivian irls who had had just scattered and as some of the Glandelinians rushed them iolet alone quickly aimed her pistol and fired so fiercely as to bring them all down. The ball entered the brain of one of the Glandelinian officers but he was not dead yet and one of the Angelinian soldiers advancing stil still closer put another ball int o his head. That closed the career of the Glandelinians and a great record Violet had made kil ing thirty Glandelinians single handed, and a snake within thirty minutes.

They now quickly left the region as the creature flew away, dreading to look upon the horrible scene and as they continued on a solid three story building with another story on it, or what seemed to be such rising out of the back of it / loomed before them in the darkness.It had been a new building and the Angelinian sild soldiers were surprised & its decorations. The front was shaded by a great porch running along its entire length, the roof was supported by hu fehuge yellow columns craved all over whice the walls of the buil buildings was brilliantly decorated in all colors.

Each column terminated into a carb carved devil's head on which the outer edge of the porch roos rested on an open doorway, closed by a heavy heavy curtian admitting the party into the interior.

"I know this place well."Said one of the soldi ers."We are surely within the heart of the enemys losts, lost within the enmys lines, in 5 his darkn ess, and we did not know it. This is an old idol house that the Glandelinians had built to decoy their enmies enemiew. There is a big golden idol in this place. As it seems to be abandoned just now and as there are no Glandelinians around this location I will show you the odil.It fills half of the room behind the priests quarters, and t i rises within an inclosure built to recieve it. When these curtians you see and drawn, the Glandelinia worshippers who w are admitted to this court can see a part of it. It's face is never seen except by the priest who used to belong here....."

The flashlights they now used cast a weird light about the court that made the waving curtians moved by the light breeze coming through the doors and windows assume strange sh apes, as if they concealed living and moving objects of uncanny creation. The raised portion of the temple was flooded by the strange glow of some conflargration raging somewhere while the cries of the wolves roving about at will came to them from the distance in a hushed sort of cadience. The flash of their lights threw odd shadows on the walls and as it passed along, violet's sharp eye caught the glance of two handless doors which connected the passage with the room where the idol stood, but on the level of the o idols neck. At this moment there was a noise without.Jennie who ha been standing opposite admiring the porch outside came rushing into the court.

"Look out everybody.We had better hide ourselves. There is a bunch of Turmerannians and Mc-Hollestinians coming."

"Away to the upper story, Violet and your sisters."Said one of the soldiers."Come boys we must all hide."-

"ST OP."Roared a stentorian voice."So I have caught some of the prowling Angelinian foll fools at last have I."And the speaker uttered a hoarse laugh of triumph while the end of the court filled with nearly a hundred gray and deep blue uniformed men armed with bayonets .

"The Glandelinians are he here already."Cried Violet drawing her pisy pistols.

"Aye the Glandelinians whom you thought to spy upon."Replied the leader with a scowl folding his arms and regarding the children with gloating triumph."Who are you little girls who have dared to invade general Manleys headquarters , to invade the part called a Temple, and spy on us, and its contents.By this act your lives are in danger no matter how pretty t you are.You have also caused all the Calverinians in the east to arise in rebellion against us and form armies to aid the Angelinians and are to pa dearly for it."

"I'm the lieutenant of these men here and if you harm any of the little girls I will bring the full power of the Angelinians down upon you."Said the christian soldier .I have as many men in this temple that outnumbers your five to one."

"I care nothing for the Angelinian nation bor Abbissania the usurpe wither.I'm general Gaxmon Procile of the Glandelinian army, commanding Manleys right wing at Lieghburg Landing and as such seperiors to the orders of my men. You may be a puppy dog of a christian but I defy you despite your numbers and---

"Enraged the soldier felled the rascal to the floor with one blow while at the same time he faced the men who had advanced to sei ze the children.

"Stand back every one of you or touch them at your pri peril."He growled drawing his four fourty fives."I'm quick at shooting and so are my men and you will tempe p temper the wrong one in a minute. "

Procile was on his feet in a moment and he roared;

"Do you men allow that puppy dog to stand between you and those damn Vivian devils who are wanted by all the Glandelinian authorities as christian spies?"

"Aye though you had your whole army at your back."Cried another of the Angelinian offi cers with flashing eyes."You are not to interfere with even the doings of Angelinian scouts, and spi es,.Run little girls and I and my men will cover your retreat."Added the captian anxious for their safty.

"Never dear captian.I'll help you, and my sisters will also.We fear no Glandelinian no matter what w sect they be."

"So will we "Cried her sisters , and the other christian officers drew their hundred and fourty five,s and the men got ready with their riflew,and bayonets.

"Fools."Crid cried the Glandelinian general."Do you see my men around me!One word from me and they would bury their bayonets into your hearts."

"Don't dare threaten us that way."Laughed the Angelinian captian."Lead flies fl faster than se steel. Before one of those bayonets reaches our bodies you yourself, and probably over fifty of your men would be dead at once.If you value your own life get out of here and take your soldiers with yo you for we will never argue with you Glandelinians. Those children will never be in your grasp agin again if I and my men can help it. The children are under our protection, and the protection of God, and we will defend them with our lives."

The general uttered some word that sounded very much like an impresation, and probably wa was from the expression on his face. He looked with a dea deadly secwl at the bore of the wepon of the Angelinian capt ian, and that of the others which covered his heart , and the breasts of over fifty of hi s nearest soldiers, and saw that the Angelinian captian meant what he said. He was not at all a coward, and he even defied any of the Angelinians to shoot him, but nevertheless though for many reasons he did really desire to die, yet just now he did not desire to be killed by utter recklessness when he knew he could take other means more prudent and more equally effective that would serve his purpose.

"Very well Capt ian of the Angelinian dogs."He said with a malevalent look and a courteous bow."I kindly have to admit that you and your helpers, and and your troops hold the advantage at present. Think not that your puny effort will avail to save the Vivian girls from my power. Eve Every one of their lives is forfeted i f ever captured by us Glandelinians. Untill you yeild yourselves as plain prisoners little girls, the blood wi ll be upon your heads."He added with a fierce looked tward Violet and her sisters."Then when I have you little girls in my power , ye you can ask the tiger standing over i ts victim for mercy. Ask the cobra about to crush i ts prey to forbear; ask the wild beasts of the jungles of Calverinia to lie downinamity with the awed lamb. If they wi will obey your wish then will I have mercy, and yeild my claims upon you little girls."

He glowered at the little girls with a chuckle as Lucifer might at a plea of a lost soul standing before his fi ery throne.

"So you call yourslef a man."Said the Angelinian captian with a ring of scorn in his voi ce."Get out of here, and get blamed quick, or I will shoot you as I would a dog."

He made a menacing move with the pistol and the Glandelinians thinking he would carry out his threat made a sign to his followers and hastily left the building.

"Oh captian, captian."Cried Jennie throwing herself int o his arms a as soon as the suspense was over."If we ever get captured again, he will cause us to get butchered sure."

"Don't worry.If that scoundrel harms a hair of your heads he shall answer t o me with death-for it."

Violet dreaded lest the Glandelinian general had started for his army to have them follow him back in a body to attac k the pla place, so a number of the soldiers we were to act as guards. By this time thr ough the darkness the guards discovered that the Glandelinian general and his followers had gone off in the direction they had followed in coming there, but had left a number of men behind to watch the temple so that in case the Angelinians with the children would leave, he would follow and then return to the army to report where they had gone to. The best thing for them t o do was to try and catchethe Glandelinian guards, but that would be a difficult matter, for the Glandelinians were as crafty as fiends. But yet they saw no reason why they should not make the attempt though it would be easi er to find a snake in such terrible darkness that was still on as it was now only pas t three in the morning, and far in the distance they could see that trees were beginning to bur n. Forgetting their experiences with the Glandelinians they all decided to have a look at the i dol before returning to the christian lines.

They strode out of the room and went down the stairs on that side n into the cord corr idor which circled around to the back of the idol room and seperated that part of the temple from the rear rooms where the servants used to be and the food prepared. They saw no one, and heard no sound, save the roar of some firing outside in the far distance which sounded quite suspicious to all.

Three doors openseff the corridor into the i dol room to the accomodtion of the Glandelinian priests when they were on the ground, but were lik like those of the narrow corridor above were handleless and resist ed thei r touch. As they had no locks, they figured they were secured from the inner side. The fact that they would not work was no bar to a per son entering the idol room, as that could be easily done through one of the curtaind openings of the court . They decided to put in the present time in viewing the idol.They were not sure that it ammounted to a whole lot as a graven image anyway. However they were curious to inspect inspect it, if only for the satisfaction of viewing the materila, and if it was of any worth to report the plan plac to the Angelinian commander and have it captured. They made their wa way into the couty, but not a soul was there. They skipped over to one of the curtain ed exposures, and entered the forbidden part of the temple. The light being shut off by the curtains they were di sappointed to find that they could make out nothing but a great shadowy and shapeless object perched on an oblong base rising i nt o the darkness above.

They wa walked up to it and the captian pla placed his hand on the base.It had the feeling of gold.Stepping back he turned on hi s flashlight. As the light of the others flared out they saw the lower extremities of the idol. It was perched crossed legged in tailor fashion upon a pedestial eighteen feet high aabove, or twelve feet in front and seventy -feet in width. T The base was covered with a glittering devise of Glandelinian design, a part of which might be mistaken for gold at a distance, but wa was nothing but ha heavy plating of bronze.

They now began a survey of the room. Between each curtained opening affixed a huge oiled lamp with a pl polished reflector behind it to thr ow the light full upon the idol, a or at least the lower part of a of it and its base. They all dareling went around and lighted the wicks of all of them and soon had a full view of the i dol up to its waist, but beyond that indeed was shadow. The image indeed was of gols ? gold in gr otest grotesque style and inlaid with large gems. Behind the base stood a ladder made of gold and they took advanag advantage of it to moun t up to the crossed legs. They found a they supposed that the image was made of gold. Up they clambored untill they got above the circle of the light stepp ing with little ceremony upon the legs and then the arms of the idol. Roosting in one of the arms the capt ian relighted his flashlight and flashed the light upward. They saw fifty feet above them an immense chest and a tac low tall wide neck but the head was still invisible. After a brief rest they climbed up to one of itd its broad shoulders and here the capt ian flashed his light and saw the neck several scores of yards in circumference, with a ci rcular gallery around it. They stepped on the gallery and saw the three doors that opened into the narrow corridor. They found themselves about a hundred feet above the court floor below. The doors were fastened by pieces of wood that worked on a screw screw.

Turning one of the pieces the captian pushed the door open. As the neck of the image wewas was long and smooth it wo was out of the question to climb further though they could now see the head which shaped like that of some huge dragon read in the Greek Fairy Tales.

Suddenly they saw a sleeping child in the corridor, and creeping upon her in a stealthy way was a Glandelinian, it being one of the very guards left behind by the Glandelinian general. The villainous looking rascal had devirted himself of his clothing light enough at the best, and now was completely naked, except f or a strip of calico a around his loins. Furt her more he was smeared from head to foot with stinking oil, which made his skin glisten like the sn scales of a fish just out of wa water.

Although clearly on the alert he failed to see the christian soldiers left below in the court, or the others, and had failed to see the others with the Vivian girls who had entered the corridor. Violet and her sisters stopped when they saw the action of the fellow. No t iger account ed the most cunning of all beast, when in q uest of prey could approa approach its victim more insediously and stealthily than this scoundrel was creeping upon the sleeping child which was a little girl probably having been seperated from the fleeing mulitudes who had abandoned Eva Evangelinia Crania and having taken refuge in here.

He was close enough to stab the unconscious little girl if such was his intentions, but it was not for he contemplated a more effectual method of killing his intended victims. His preparations were of the simplest kind.

Unwinding the strip of calico a round his lion loins it proceeded to slip it around the sleepers neck. Violet and her sisters who were watching him watching him suddenly realized that the man was a regular devoty of the Glandelinian Goddess Golis, the particular deity of the Glandelinian thugs. The most villainous of Glandelinian scoundrels that ever cursed the soil of that wicked nation. Another moment and the fatal wrench would have been given, but that moment was denied him. Quick as a flash Violet whipped out her pi stol, took aim at the fellows back and fired. Entertaining a holy horror of thugs from the stories she had read i n her ea rlier days, and of what she had heard about the murderous villains she had not the slightest hesitation in shooting this fellow down like a dog. In fact that was the way the Angelinians were rooting the pests out of Calverinia whenever the opportunity presented itself. The thug uttered a gurgling cry, swung partly a round, and dropped dead on the floor with a bullet through his heart. The report awoke the child and she started up in alarm to find the calico strip around her neck.

In a moment she realized her narrow escape for she knew from the dead man the man having a dreadful character as she well knew. Then she saw violet standing close by with her smoking pistol in her hand the other little girls advancing. Violet started t o explain the situation but it wa was not necessary. The child threw her arms around around her neck, and was hugging her, when the ladder was suddenly knocked to one side off its balance and precipitated headlong to the floor below with a dreadful earsplitting roar, being smashed to pieces by the fall, and landed in a heap. They looked downward from the gallery but could not see what caused it though they did see the outline of the Angelinian soldiers above, all having come up on the gallery. Theothers however did not notice the incident and did not believe that the idol had a head, and wondered what use it would be up there anyway. T hey were leaning against the back of the idols neck when there was a click behind one of the soldiers and a large secret door opened inward and a number of them with the little girls plunged backwards into the hollow idol, the door closing after them with a nuother click. There was a door at the neck of the idol which opened at the touch of a secret button and the moment the soldiers and the little girls had leaned against the keck neck of the idol one of the soldiers had in some way touched thesecret spring which released the door and precipi tated the soldiers three of them, and the children headlong down a seemingly bottomless hole. Though not bottomless the hole ran clean beneath the idol some two hundred feet below, and fun fully a hundred feet more bensath the building, and assuredly the little girls and the soldiers would have been k i ki lled had they not landed on something extextremely soft below. One of the soldiers alone would have broken his neck had not his right foot a as it swung the arch of a circle caught in the rung of a narrow wooden ladder that descended perpendicularly down tward the depths and stayed his downward progr ess head first.

His presence of mind in gripping a rung below that his hands came in contact with, completed his ‹ selft porservation. Violet and her sisters as I have said before had fallen all the way down as swift as heavy rocks and all landed on something soft below, while the soldier hung headdownward, like an invested picture on a wall.

He could not recover his natural position without performing a very dangerous gymnastic feat. He saw that this had to be done, so gripping his arms around the highest rung he could reach, he released his foot, and his body, swung over his heels, striking a projecting part of the idol, and holding him suspended in an acute angle. Drawing in his legs his body went down again striking the ladder with a resounding crash, nearly shaking him off and upsetting it. As soon a as he recovered he turned around and was all r ight . This was a great experience and he sh shuddered his as he realized his narrow escape. As soon as his nerves were steady again he climbed up the ladder and to find the secret door which had admitted him th the other two soldiers, and the little girls and which closed after them, and thus escaped their predicament . There was a sort of platform between the ladder and the door which he located by lighting his flashlight which fortunately was not injured by the shock of his fall, or which fort unately had not fallen out of his pocket , but though he sepnt a goof good half hour for the spring, he could not find it and fizally had to gi ve it u up. He felt kind of nervious at the i dea of the childrens safty, and fearing that they were crushed to a shapeless heap by their fall so far below, he decided to ffollow the ladder down, feeling sure it led to where the children might be lying crushed and mangled, and to some other exit, which he might be more fortunate in finding.

Entering the idol again he put on his hat, and substituted one of his rifle cartridges to hold the door from shutt ing tight. Then he began his descend to rejoin his friends. When he reached the platform he stopped and considered whether he dared open the door with a view to further investigation. As he stepped on the platform, he was suddenly painted

Entering the idol again he put on his hat, and substituted one of his rifle cartridges to hold the door from shutt ing tight. Then he began his decend to rejoin his friends. When he reached the platform he stopped and considered whether he dared open the door with a view to further investigation.-As he stepped on the platform, he was suddenly pounced upon by two Glandelinians. They were the fi erce Kurds. He had unwitting ly fallen into the trap set for hi m by the Glandelinian general. Two stalwart Kurds had hold of him and they uttered exclamanations of triumph as soon a they got their hands on him. There was not the slightest doubts in their minds that they had him deadto rights, for they believed they only had a boy or one of the vivian girls in truth, and by intersertainity a most horrible indescribable hatred and contempt for children of any si ze and looks in general. Thy paid the usual penalty of over confidence for to begin with. It was Captian James Turner Hanson they had pounced upon instead, and no man even numberd by the score could over overcome him in a hand to hand tusle thustle, for he wa was an unusually muscular man, but for the moment he was taken off his bl g ban balance through sudden surprise. Yet any one can ing imagine how it feels to be unexpectedly laid hold off in the dark by two men whose intentions were not friendly. The fact that he failed to put up an immediate struggle led his gloating captors to believe that he had been cowed by his capt capture, and they started to lead him to the door.

Then Capt ian Hanson woke up, and there was something doing that rathe rather surprised the two Glandelinians. The chap who had hold of Hansons right arm was sent whirling like a dervise to one side, like a tostotum as well. With an exclamanation the other fellow took a tighter hold of him, but it only lasted long enough for Captian Hanson to draw his revolver, jab it against the mans chest and pull the trigger, and he dropped with a wild scream. Then captian Hanson wound up for buisness, light up his flashlight, and locating the other follow put a bullet into him just q s he was going to spring. The two Glandelinians now lay mortally wounded on the floor writhing and moaning, but without hesitation the captian, carried them both back into a corner and left them t o their fate. He had just put his foot on the ladder, when he heard a soft sound on the platform above and a silent hiss downward. Captian Hanson stepped back expecting that somebody was about to decend. On account of the darkness the captians figure could not be seen from above. A voi ce said somet hing in a whipser whips whisper, and then he saw the fellow was decending, and began to call to the two Glandelinians but they did not respond for the excellant reason that they couldn't.

The man repeated his call with no better result and came down all the faster. Captian Hanson heard his foot on the rungs and reversed his revolver. T he visitor reached the ground floor and starte to turn around, but his memory failed him about that time, for the butt of the captians pistol came into violent contact with his head. That ended the usefulness of th e the fith Glandelinian.Dari ngly captian Hanson waisted some minutes tying the rascals eyes. Then he left him in another corner and started toward the door. He knew where the spring was and laid his hand on it. The door flew open and he stepped outside plugging the door with his hat. All was darkness as he had viewed it from b above Glancing around the corner of the pedestial he saw that the court was lighted up, and he hard heard the voice of the Glandelinian general speaking. Daringly captian Hanson ventured as far as one of the curtians and looked out, and gege a gasp of consternatio n at what he saw. The little girl whom Violet had saved from the thug was there trembling with fear of what might happen. In the grasp of five Glandelinians, stark naked, she stood a pr prisoner,-while the room al all around was lined with the fiercest of a all the Glandelinians. Behind the wicked Glandelinian general, were the impa impassive figures of scores of Glandelinian officers. Cp Captian Hanson reali zed that during the fight the rascal had captured her, when they carri ed the rear. He laid his hand on his revolverfor a mean purpose, then he thought that his rifle which he had left in the cellar would be more effective, for it would be dangerous for him if he missed his mark, and he did not like to rely on his revolver for a sure shot at that distance. He hurried bak to the door, put on his hat and quickly stepped down the ladder and into the cellar telling the men and Vi olet and her sisters what he had seen as he grabbed his rifle.

Then they all started to mou mount the ladder with the desperate resolve of killing the Glandelinian king and rescueing the little girl from his clutches.

A STRANGE PERFORMANCE. THE GLANDELINIANS TRY TO MURDER A LITTLE GIRL BY MEANS OF A REPTILE. THE DEATH OF GENERAL PROCILE. THE GREAT EXPLOSION AT EVANGELINE GRANIA. GLANDELINIA MAKES ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO INVADE ANGELINIA.

They quickly mounted to the idol room Violet saying;
"That rascal shall not triumph, and we ourselves will kill the rascal where he stands and put an end to his persecution of helpless children." Cocking their pistols they glided over to the platform, opened the door slowly and looked out. Things had changed considerably since captian Hanson started after the soldiers and the little girls. The big bunch of Glandelinians were having wicked ceremonies over their capture though it was only one child prisoner. All thelamps high above and below were lit and captian Hanson in seeing them and what c cruelty they were going to do with the child was wound up to desperation and he took good aim at the Glandelinian general, but he was filled with dismay to find that his ri fle was not loaded. He intended to shoot their leader at all hazards and then sell his life as dearly as possible in the defense of the child, for the rascal was already slipping a piece of calico around the childs neck, and she wa was helplessly tied to a small column so she could not struggle. The whole room was brilliantly li ghted by the glaring lamps despending from the ceiling, and captian Hanson, the soldiss soldiers, and Violet and her sisters from where they were, caught a good glimpse of the whole interior. This was the sanctuary of Saten, where no one but the Glandelinian priests, and the sacred virgins were p permitted to set foot, but the Glandelinians were now w orshipping it themselves, not because they believed in it, but to terrify the child, as they really believed in no idols, and only in the Freee Masonic Religion .....
Wicked as they are the Glandelinians do not believe in any graven thing, but they do theseactions with the purpose of insulting God. In the center stood the golden image of Saten standing soldier fashion on a throne, also thickly studded wih with gold.So there were two idols in the room.In a an alcolve on each side were theeffigies of Satens Princes, Beelzebub and Apyollyon in a sitting posturewith their arms extended in an attitude of asking them to come into their arms, elevated on twin pedestials pe destia ls and over them at some height were two magnificent windows with cross bar lettuce w ork to admit the air. The general effet effect of the room was one of grea great magnificence and beauty in detail and its effects on a beholder for a time was striking and swe i nspiring. A small procession was winding its serious way through, pass the idol back and forth and around the room, and the general was the leader. Behind him came the band, tha then the priests of Saten, then a crowd of hedious e men singers dressed in hedious regalia connected with a hood and designed with snakes, and skulls. Captian Hanson and the little girls watched the procession with scorn, till it finally stopped in-stopped in front of the idol and the ceremonies reached its height.. The Glandelinian general now released the child, and draggig dragging her forward came to a st op within a few yards of Captian Hansons concealment. The plucky captian with his hand on his revolver went out of sight, and as he stood and a was about to aim to shoot the rascal down he heard a ques queer rumbling sound which died away as quick quickly as it came mingled with a terrible sing song cadience, which resounded far and wide, then again the rumbling came with redoubled violence, and came in a full chorus and cadience of sing song clamor. The sound was wei rd and strange and it seemed to fill the entire woods and temple at the same time, but the accousted pre principales of the idols were so arranged tha that the remu rumblings and the sing song sound as it filled the place rebounded from scores of points and was soon maginified into a dull distant cannonade and singing sound at the same time. This sound soon became volumed into a legion of numbers of cadiences, and Captian Hanson and the rest despite their perilous situation were quite attentive to the sound.For the first time captian Hanson took a glance at Violet and her sisters and their beauty and graceful forms filled him with awe On their heads were some wreaths of flowers and sprays of green leaves and the whiteness of their clothes made them look more like celestial beings.The frightened child in the powe of the wicked Glandelinians looked pale and sad, but there was a certain defiance in her attidude which meant stubborness against general Procile. But to be murdered beforean idol was an indescria ble horror to her. The queer rumbling and sing-song sound which continued without intermission was soon broken by the villianous rascal which Joice thought had something like the looks of general procile all right.

"Welcome to the sanctuary of your Idol Saten." He said in tones of Ill concealed triumph. "You are to fall down and kiss this idol.In me is fixed your destiny. Obey me and you live. Oppose me and I swear you shall perish."
"General Procile when you first captured me I defied you to do your worse. That defiance I now repeat again. And where you appear all powerful. I really do fear intensely, horribly to die in the way you propose to kill me, fear it worse than anything I know of, but I'd rather take the chance than commit such a sin against God." Replied the child throwing back her head proudly.
"Bully for you/ you've got grit, and it will grow hard if I and the others do not save you." Thought Captia ceaptian Hanson his blood thrilled at the childs nervy stand.
"Perhaps you fancy those Angelinians of or those drated Vivian G r Girls who have eli eluded me ad may be still at large will come t o your aid. Oh would they but venture. How I would laught to have them in my clutches now. Joice threatened me with revengeand death atthe point of the pistol at Andrean, and her uncle forced me from his own place. I myself thirst for revenge. At this moment I have a thousand crafty Glandelinians scouring the woods, and if they are brought here every torture that my fertile brain would be meted out t to them, and you----you should behold their dying agonies, listen to their frenzied screams for mercy f ,for a momentary respite."
"Man, man what are you?" Cri ed the child passing her hands to her face to shut out the fearful mental picture the rascals words called up. "You are not a man.Your wickedness may have already transformed you into a spirit of perdition....."
"Then by saten you shall taste of that power." He cried wrenching off the stripe of calico and then pushing a knob in the base ofthe the pedestial. A door opened revealing a barred enclosure within which lay half coiled a large Cobra or Copella, or hooded serpent,.Grabbing the naka naked child by the wrist he dragged her forward and quickly bound her to that door. Then before captian Hanson or the rest could open fire the snake was stirred up and instantly it sped through the bars set wide apart, like a flash of lightning and coiled around the screeching child. The reptile was a hed ious one and redoubly coiled around its own self the narrowest twining around the childs throat and squeezing that member with crushing force. It also began to t ighten its folds around her body while the rascal stepped back. Captian Hanson s aw his corrente fall off and recognized him to be the rascally Glandelinian general Procile. This was more than he could stand, and as the snake was chocking the child hequickly raised his cocked pistol and fired with deliberation at the rascal, but he missed. Joice at the sam same time fi red wi with true effect, and captian Hanson and the others went out to attack the snake before it dealt a fatal bite.
With a cry the rascal clapped oney one hand to his chest, sprung around and dropped dead on the floor . The restof the soldiers opened a continuous fire with their rifles and pistols, driving the Glandelinians to seek shelter behind the large columns, and driving the others outside alt oget her. Captian Hanson had in the meantime attacked the poisonous snake and drew its attation tward him. The way the snake was chocking the child was horrible, and yet she could not move a foot, and had to take it all in without suffering. struggling.
Her tongue was protruding while the blood gushed from her nostrils and ears. Capt ian Hanson saw that he must be quick for it would soon crush the child &toget her for its folds was gett ing tighter around her every minute. Taking careful aim at its eye he fired, and the ball shattered its head completely.T his settled i t for the snake. It quickly unwound and fell to the floor swishing like a s whip in all directions, while the child fell limp to the floor, gasping for air and rubbing her paining throat, while Violet and her sisters, and the soldiers were keeping up a wi thering fire upon the Glandelinians who were cobtinually charging upon the temple, sw that reinforcements was hurrying on, and got Capt ian Hanson to secure all the windows and doors .... prevent them from coming in.

But the doors were quickly burst open and ascore of officers with many many men entered the room and prepared to dash upon the fugitives when the noise of rumbling and sing song increased in terrifif terrific fury then from the distance there came a cannonading roar and the whole temple swayed from side to side, and then the distant rumbling increased to a deafening din.

The Angelinian forces are attacking Lieghburg Landing.''Was the shout from all sides and the Glandelinians ran panic stricken from the temple, while the columns, and the idols toppled and fell with an awful roar.Captian Hanson, with the rest of the Angelinian soldiers, and Violet and her sisters had also ran out by another exit in the back, captin captian Hanson t taking the child and following, and it was well they did for now from the shock of the concussion of the distant explosion which occured at Evangelinia Crania the whole temple caved in. The Glandelinians however soon recovering from the scare persued capt ian Henson and the rest, keeping up a fearful fi fussilade in the pitchy darkness.The child had recovere by this time and ran as fast as the rest , and at times Capt ian Hanson even carried her.

A few minutes after the fugitives noti ced a pungent smell that was filling the air, and a faint feeling stole over them. They all kn ew that it was the most posiou posionous gases escaping from somewhere, they knew not where.Yet they opened fire upon their persuers, knowi ng that the gases were taking the same effect upon them.Many of the Glandelinians fell with cries as the bullets singled them out.The air was getting more and more fuil of the venemous vapor, but hapily they saw a ca cave in front of them....

Yet their chance seemed mighty sli ght for a craving hunger and thirst seized them, and a cold storm of snow was flying in the fury of a rising wind and this beat down upon them, and even at times snow in clu clouds was whirled into their very faces. They suffered intensely from the cold and thirst but they dared not stop, a as the enemy were coming closer and closer every minute. But aid wa s coming to the fugit ives. It looked as if all the fugitives would soon be all in, when it began to grow lighter now, and then a cloud of snow thicke: than ever appeared in front of them to the right and the sound af hors es feet reached their ears.Then they saw a small squadron of Angelinian officers and men riding up with a large force behind. With a shout of joy that gurgled in his throat Captian Hanson discharged his rifle.T he others did the same almost simultaneously, and that attracted the attention of the troops to them. The soldiers i on horseback drew up in front of the fugitives, and captian Hanson and the rest rest includ ing the children scramp scrambled on extra horses. Then the Glandelinians coming up were hotly contested in terrific fury, the Glandelinians having a battle with the christians and fugitives for the first time in such dark woods.However they proved to be too much, and seeing a chance to get away before the enemy would overwhlm them, the Angelinians dah dashed way into the darker recesses of the woods, and went off as fast as it was possible in the darkness amid the mas maze of trees and bushes...

In a short time the woods were left behind and they struck a road where traveling was easier and soon reached the region of Li eghburg Landing where the positions of the christian lines loomed before them in the distance and here they saw saw that a battle was raging with fright ful fury, and cannons were thundering with a fury mean enough to prostrate citit cities to the ground with their concussion. Violet was alone by lieutenant Baldwins side. Jennie was with captian Hanson. Just at that moment deep into her wrist into an artery leding leading from the pulse strait straight to the heart sank something like a sharp fang, and looking forward tward where she felt it she saw a head of a Blengiglomenea creature glaring at her plesa pleasantly from the darkness and it was receding. With a scream of delight she started to dart tward it while now in her veins suddenly there came a feeling as if they wewere filled with with some kind of sweet soothinf soothing acid.The peculiar salvia of the creature injected by the fang had gotten int o her blood and was circulating through veins and artieries and was going through these just as water poured in an iron pipe would go through to the main system. Suddenly she felt a queer h appiness stealing over her, a happiness different than any she had ever experienced, a happiness which made her feel a love for every one she saw, and then with a pathetic but happy w o scream she threw herself into captian Hansons arms and to him the happy child looked strangely transfi gured in the dark and he was surprised & at her peculiar happiness and cried;

''Why Jennie dear have you been among the angels and come back?''

II07.

''No.''She gasped the answer.''But maybe some day I will.Violet and her sisters then realised what had befallen jennie, and told the captian that they all had the same experience some time ago at Phelantonburg when lost in the cavern of a Blengiglomenean creatures.Any child no matter whom who is fanged this way fel feels this happiness for a long time. If the stinging was directed right at the heart instead anywhere else the happiness would b never leave. Violet and her sisters wh who were in white dresses like celestial garments appeared in captian Hn Hansons presence as lovely apparitions, and as they smiled and stretched out their lovely hands to him and spoke in a voice sweeter than the singing of any bird his heart seemed to leap wildly.

''I wonder where are all those good christian soldiers going in this darkness.''Asked the rescued child.

''I do not know''Answered happy happy jennie.''Maybe they are taking us to their own camp until daylight comes when we can find out way to our uncles lines.''

''What religion do you believe in?''Asked the captian of the little girls.

''In one good religion.''Answered Violet.

''I hope you are not fools, and believe in those foolish false religions?''He again said.

''Our religion is all right and you cannot flatter us.''Said Joice with a laugh.

''But what religion?''He asked.

''A religion that we would stay in even if we died for it.We are Catholics, and so are our two brothers and parents.We would never get to heaven if we knew the Catholic Church to be the true religion, and refused to enter and live up to it also.''

''See here''He continued''If you little girls will tell no body I'll let you all on a secret.''And he drew out five hundred dollars.

They all slowly shook their heads.

''We will not tell a soul.''Said Angeline.

''All Glandelinians are very cruel when they try to make us helpless children turn away from the true faith, but then we would not give up Jesus Christ, and his Church no matter what they would do to us!''

''Well''Said Captian Hanson with a scowl''I'm a Catholic also, and a great great and deadly enemy of the Glandelinian cause.I've been trying for the pat pat past years to drag Glandelinia into trouble for her cruelties in behalf of Governer general federal, and that scoundrel had caused the destruction of my wife and daughters, and even ruined my only home and caused me to be without home, and wife and children, may even murdered all of my relatib relatives and hunted me down for three months like a dog. I'M a true Abyssinkilian by birth, and now that the great war is on and threatening to grow worse I have recieved a commission from Abbiannia s to serve as a general in the Angelinian armies.I thought I would tell you this so that you will not be taken by surprise when you see me commanding the armies with a general uniform on. But tell no one untill the event comes to pa pass.''

''Why this does surprise me.''Said jennie.

All the way during the mard h back tward the christian lines he looked into the pretty faces of the little girls.He loved children very much and far more better than a lover would a fair maiden. The little girls were gathered all about him, and jennie who was on his horse behind him put her litt le arm around his neck.

''You will protect us won't you captian?''Asked jennie with a slight pout, as she realized the horror of the coming danger.

''I certainly will.''Said the captian.

What a wonderful face these children had, yet so grave, so sweet, so child like, and so innocent. Their hair wa was indeed like real gold and at times he could almost fancy that they were enshrouded with a blinding white light, and that bright wings were attatched to their shoulders. Indeed a great reverence came over him as he gazed upon the bea beautiful children in the glow of distant fires, and he hugged Angeline who wa was in front of him. At this moment as they came within sentry distance of the christian lines the leader of the Angelinian soldiers rode up and handed captian Hanson a roll of paper, and he spread it out and read the lett ers which were in gold, and it was a warning to general Hanson vivian to look out for the Glandelinians who were again trying to invade the southern pat part of Angelinia with the intention of trying again to lay seige to jennie wren own and commit another massacre in revenge because he closed their sea ports against their ships.

II08.

It was written and sent to Hanson by the king of Abbicannia and after the captian red it the leader asked him to take it to general Hanson as quickly as possible. At this time the troop had halted, and as Capt ian Hanson set the little girls down they looked more sweeter than fairies to him, their hair flowing in beaut iful golden curls, and the golden curls on violets violets head touched capt ian Hansons face and tickled him.Every one of the soldiers thought the little girls were celestial beings they seemed to be so transfigured. One of the officers approached and asked;

''Who are you celestial beings, and what brought you here?''

''We are not celestial beings.''Answered Jennie.

''I have seen many pretty children, so pretty that I thought there could be no prettier ones, in all kingdoms of all nations, here and in other countries, but you children q are as pretty as the queen of angels to my way of thinking.''Said the soldier.''But also you children seem to be so happy, and transfigured and seem to have halos around your heads as if you were celestial children.''

''But we are not.''Declared violet.''We cannot help it that we are so pretty and we recisveso much praise for our beauty that sometimes we feared for ourselves.''

The general was indeed surprised for he had indeed thought they were celes tia, : celestial beings even if they were not little angels, and they were certainly dear children before his sight, and he was filled with awe and pity. He had dismounted by this time and he placed an arm around violet and Jennie and after kissing and embracing the two little girls he pulled out of his vest pocket and placed int o her hand a beautiful Rosary, and then out of his pocket he pulled out a bag of oranges and handed them to Jennie.

''I do not like sweet stuff very much.''She said her blue eyes beaming with happiness.''I always was trained to eat wholesome food. Fruit is too sweet sometimes.But I certainly do admire the beautiful Rosad R osas Roas Rosary.''

''But you like oranges don't you?''He asked fondling he her pretty hair and placing ar ound her neck the beautiful beeds beads, and looking a long time at her beautiful expensive Scapulars.

''I do like them sometimes when I'm as hung ry as now.''

She opened the bag, took a orage out, handed the bag to her sister, pealed the orange and began to eat it.

''It is good, and it is the best kind of oranges I have eve ever eaten yet and I am very thankful to you for giving them to me.''Said happy Jennie.''Won't you please have the last one.There are seven of us and there were eight oranges.''

He took the offered orange and asked;

''What is your name?''

''My name is violet vivian.''She answered. And she told the name of her sisters.Then she continued;''My mama's name is Mary Vivian, and the names of my father and uncle are Robert and Hanson Vivian.I ans and my sisters also have an aunt and her name is also Angeline C Vivian.''

''You told me more than I asked.''Said the general embracing the happy child.''But what makes you so happy.Anyway my name is Richard Ki ndernine and I have seen you little girls savethe train from being wrecked by the log across the tracks.''

He was aroused by the little girl clapping her hands.

''I know who you are ''She cried.''You are the great general Kindernine.''You are one of the best generals my papa or Hanson my uncle has next to general Jack Ambrose Evans.I have heard so much about you that I wondered.And so did my sisters.''

She paused rather out of brea breath.The sweet clearness of her child ish voi ce was very pleasant to hi m and he wondered why he had never noticed it in childrens voices before.

''I hope you will come and see us a at general Hansons headquarters, or papas escmetime.''She sa said gravely.

''I really will.''Said general Kindernine never taking his eyes from her and her sisters. ''How long have you already been with the army.''

''Oh---oh.''She debated with herself.''A long long time.I cannot remember when we started with papas army last.''

At this moment there came a shrill blasting roar, b and before any one knew what it meant there was a sudden shock a fearful crash, the ground shook terribly from the sudden settling of some huge body and two big searchlights suddenly appeared blinding at them all, and inzr insan instantly there was a panic among a suddenly appearing horde of graycoked soldiers who had been steeling upon the christians in abush.A big Blengiglomenean creature from high up had seen them trying to surround the unsps unsuspecting christians and the little girls, and had suddenly swooped down among the Malandelinian soldiers and many had be been killed.

''Tr-r-r-r-r-r-r-r.H-i -s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-s-ssss.''

Terrible was the noise of the creat ures huge rat ler, and with an unearthly scream of terror the remainder of the Malandelinians ran blinding t ward the dense woods the creature persuing them and emitting a tremendous roar which made the ground shake, and using feet, teeth, and wings at the same time was mauling many of the foe before they succeed succeeded in escaping to the dark recess of the distant woods. However after this there was no more incidents and after the creature had been gone they were able to resume their march, their right of way being a,ong along a line of snow covered railroad tracks.

''Can we ever get out of this scene?''Asked violet s as captian Hanson put her on the horse with her sistes sisters.

''We will have to reach the shelter of the christian lines as soon as possible.''Said the captian e embracing her.''I cannot help it.'' He confessed.''I love you dear little girls.''

''Just because we are beautiful?''She asked.

''ITSs both the beauty and the innocence.''He answered.

They were soon coming within sight of the main city of tents of the christ a ian lines and here they soon reached and the soldiers soon settled down among their comrades and all started to recieve their breakfast though of course the little girls were served immediately. While they were eating another general a stranger t violet and her sisters came up with two roo rolls of paper in his hand. Then appeared the great general Hanson himself.

''Where did you get those rolls?''General Hanson asked him as he shook hands with him.

''I got them from main from Angelinia Agathia.As I rode here I saw swa swarms of Blengiglomenean creat ures.''

''You did?''Cried general Hanson.''And how did your uniform get burned to shreds.Did you encounter any conflargrations?''

''Yes your excellency.I did and a dreadful one on the northern lope near Evangelinia Crania.The foe are starting more forest fires to break your second seige of the war.''

Hanson t ook the rolls and while general Kindernine was having a conversatiob with him Hanson Vivian glanced over the first roll.

''Your excellency;

''T e The fair daughters of your brother the heroines of Angelinia, and Calverinia, and who have risked their lives many times for the poor little child slaves of Calverinia and passed over the earthly gulf of fiery t orture for many weeks before the outbreak of the war, have now been threatened by the enemy enough, and it is your duty if you are any kind of a wise general to see that the Malandelinians are justly punished.The Malandelinians in Calverinia and their a aurthorities in Calverinia also are searching high and low to recove recover them with the purpose to make more tortures for them. Us Angelinias are pi proud of the little heroinss, for their kindness to the poor child slaves, and risking their lives in such dangerous plac pla pla places and now it is in your powe to decide in their cont inued happiness or further misery.I have seen the days when the daughters of your brother were too happy to speak, when you had also come to love them more than yourself, because of their inbocence and gentle nature, and their reward must be that they shall be protected at all hazards. We have enclosed a pair of beautiful beads which you are to p place around their necks.Way before these troubles we had seen the time when the happiness of your daut daughters or the daughters of your brother I mean had increased, and of the time they could not keep from giving a cry of overflowing happiness, and of the many times they had thrown their bare arms around your neck, and laid their golden heds heads against your chest in happy content. An angel probably the celestial being of the murdered Aronburg girl had appeared to me, and the Aronburg child claimed to be the guardian of jennie and had told me that those who do all the good possible toward the little girls will always have good luck, and those who persecute them will never have good luck, and will even perish. The Aronburg girl had even told me that these beads will tell any one who studies them carefully how much they suffered during their captivities.

This is the kind of happiness that good children like, them always ought to hav o and now you are surely not going to let the landelinians get them g again are o you? Wehave met the very Blengiglomenean creatures that live in the Caverns of Mt vivian, (Angelinia) who are also great guardians of littls children, and they also have foreforeseen the dangers of violet and her sisters, declaring that it is even dangerous for even them to show themselves before the very glandelinians, and as they do not wish to injury any human beings, they have to take in all the insults the wicked glandelinians gi ve them. So it is your duty to protect them, for just now these unfortunate serpents can do nothing. If you wish to see them in misery then it is your own doing of c ourse. We are only warning you to be prepared for them that is all. Of al th e generals serving in your armies general jacksonia Ambrose Evans is the most dangerous of all to the enemy. The enemy did not attack his lines during your seige of Jemmie Turner for the very special reason that their leaders did not wish to committ sucide. So this is the scooving of the mystery which you could not make out. You are therefore wise to appoint him to be the guardian of the vivian girls."

A FRIEND("

General Hanson vivian showed the letter to general Robert vivian his brother, and the father of violet and her sisters, and after he had rõad it he said;
"Let's keep this to ourselves just now. We will want to work on thi s as soon as possib,s possible."

Meeky, soft ly, beautifully, dawned at last the light over the still trembling land. The winds were sinking into rest, the foam died from the glowing azure of that delicious river, it was fourteen below Zero, and the recent scenes of desolaion desolation was covered three feet in snow. Around the east thin gray snow clouds gradually caught theresy hues that hearlded the morning .Light was about to resume her e reign. Yet still dark and massi ve in the distance spread the broken fragments of a destroying cloud, from which red str streaks burning bright, and then dim betrayed the yet rolling fi res of the very far distant conflargrations of many t owns and villiages burning. Nearly two weeks had rolled away before the horrors of the seige of Jemmie T urner hd had subsided, and everything in the snow whi tened town of Evangelinia Crania were now a storm of ruin, while any one could see that the two opposing forces concentrating at Li eghburnbg Li eghburg Landing was preparing for the coming fray. T he town of Evangelinia Crania is close to the fortifications of Mc-Whirther which guarded the city of vivian Wickey, and since the enemy were now in possession of Evangelinia Crani a there was a sure positiveness that they would also obtain a foothold on v vian Wi ckey and her fortif ied fortifications. General Hanson and his other generals had extended the left portion of his army east of the big ci ty of Annie Arenburg which branched the stronghold of vivian Wickey, and where three hundred child slave factories and plantations had been burned down to the ground by the christian troops and thousands of child slaves set free.
General Hanson before beginning any abrupt movements against Liegh burg Landing decided to attack Arenburg, capture the city, and fortif ications there known as Marcuian and thus infilade the enemys posit ions at Evangelinia Crania from the rear. This was attempted, and general Hanson hurled forward a force of ten milli on men to drive the foe before him. The scenes of such child slavery he had witnessed in the factories he had succeeded in capturing and the fortifi cations had made him fairly rave with rage. Hundreds of thousands of children had been at work cuffed with chain s, and all the children who had been rescued bore the fearful marks of the cat-o-nine-tails all over their bodies, and also the foe to silence their screams had tightened the instruments of torture. Many of the children had flung up their mangled hands to sheild themselves, and the s ight of so many with scarred hands, with fingers gone and in all ways disfigured , had made him fly in such a rage that disregarding the danger he had stormed the places anni hilated the defenders and capturecapturee ev captured everything besides the children and committed went on destruction.

He went down, down, down, down, and down, untill he thought there was no end to the trip. Down, down, down, down, he continued, and down, down, down, down, down, untill he began to wonder where the ladder went to. Still he cont inued on his downward decent and down, down, down, down, untill he began to wonder if the ladder led to the bowls of the eart h or not. Finally at last he landed in what proved to be a deep cellar under the temple, or what was also a great cave cavern. He pas passed the wi de platform in the pedestal without knowing it because sol was dark and he did not light his flashlight until untill he found the solid groun d under hi m. He found at first, all manner of stuff left there by the glandelinian priests and most of it looked as if it was employed in the ceremonies with the temple. Among other things he found violet and her sister, and the other little girl safe and s sound with the other two soldiers examining the queer stuff. After they had cared to see it all by flashlight in the cellar and had st satisfied that it had no outlet that they could discover except by the up way they came they made their away up the ladder to the platform in the base.

T he soldier felt certain that there must be an outlet from that so he hunted for the spring, and after spending sometime at the job, he found it at last and slowly pushed the dlo door open.

They now being one anxious to get out of the place and fearing that the glandelinians would return to do some harm, and would come with an army too large for them to defend themselves against, decided to leave at once despite the danger of encountering the wolves outside. It was much more dangerous to travel in such darkness and besides all the wild a animals were out there either looking for prey, or regu refuge from the shooting going on so incessantly, and hunger would be the only enducement enducement for the wild beasts to attack them.

But them they would rather meet the wild beasts or face the hidden dangers of the forests than the glandelinians, and even the most poisonous reptiles. They first all looked carefully over their firearms and replenished the magazines with cartridges. It was not likely that they might met another savage reptile or a wolfe or t iger or mountian lion, or even a Blengiglomenean creature, not to mention snakes, on their rout through the darkne darkened woods, and they resolved to fully prepare for such an energency, though of course they had nothing to fear from the kind loving Blengiglomenean creatures who defends them against again st the wicked enemi es of God like the glandelinians.....!!!!!!

In order to guard against the glandelinians in case they should return right away, thinking to surprise the Angelinians, the guards watched more closely, while the pretty little girls and the others made full preparations for departure. The guards soon saw many lights approaching through the woods, and called the atr attention to the men. No doubt they were the glandelinian general and his party, and violet and her sisers sisters, indeed seemed in hard luck. If only they had held back a few hours longer they could have given the rascals the quiet slip, and now they were afraid they could not make a show of much fight against the glandelinians, particularly if they had been reinforced. If they tried to force matters they would know that they had been in a fight.

As soon a as they discovered they were the glandelinian party of glandelinians and they were coming upon the rear to surprise them in case they had guards posted in front, they decided to make general Procils the key of the sit uation, so the object of the brave little girls a at their request was to put him down and out in full possish of Joices vow during he her own captivity, and that was to kill any glande linian general that threatened them hereafg hereafter. They went toward the front door in readiness to fire upon the rascal, the soldiers going to the rear al and along side. Many more lights were seen approaching the temple and now they were sure it was the glandelinian genral returning with reinforcements. They decided to hold the front entrance at all hazards, and put up the best fight they could, to shoot the wicked Glandelinian general down as sh soon as he showed himself without holding any further arguement withhim.

Violet and her sisters rushed down to the front entrance and soon they were ready for a c action. As soon as the christian soldiers appeared again they took the Angelinian optian to a corner and showed him the many , lights. At last they reahed reached the clearing around the temple and stopped. Through a lane formed by the lights came a flag bearer with a large brilliantly hued flag of Glandelinia of red blue and yellow lines in bar formation and many designs, and another flag of the same color but crossed like the stripes of a Confederate flag.

At the head of the gray column was was a tall loki looking general. It was indeed Procile the Glandelinian general. They had the chance th to shoot him but it seemed almost like murder to do it before he had shown any hostilities, but they knew he would have no mercy if he got his hands of ch on the litt le girls and they were about to aim, when all the lights were suddenly put out leaving the rascally intruders in the gloom, and the children lost their present chance to do up the wicked Glandelinian. Violet and her sisters saw that they could not do much again st the rascally Glandelinians under cover of darkness, for they would be outhem before they could shoot with any effect . So they decided to hide in the building or stand back in the corri dor and fire at the first who dared to make an attempt to enter. That would show the Glandelinians that they were on their guard. Their pla was soon adpoted and and soon nearly fifteen dark figures appeared at the doorways. Pistols and muskets cracked in a continuous clatt er, and every one of the Glandelinians fell with loud cri es.

T hey now stood st ill in the corridor watching the next movement of the enemy, who were keeping up a useless fussilade at the temple. The fifteen dead Glandelinians, and others who were wounded in also trying to come in fol, but the survivors ran off making a great outcry and their fate evidently deterred the others from venturing before the doors. Some minutes elasped, and then they heard cries and confusion a the back of the temple.

The enemy had forced the back entrances and violet and he sisters and the rest seeing that they could not hold their position retreated to the idol room a and drove the enemy back to the court below with great loss in killed and wounded. The Angelinian captian opened the door in the base which he left ajar placing the end of the ladders fragments against it so it would not close of itself. Violet brought ou one of the bright lamps after putting the others out hurriedly and seeing that the platform was large enough to accomd accomatate all of them they went in, violet holding the lam lamp, so that they would not fall into the pit a second time.

After all were in they c,o closed the door and cli b climbed down the lade ladder and soon reached the bottom and the cavern and stood still while the Angelinians swe swarmed about the cavern floor hiding behind every projecting rock and waiting for more trouble which they sure would come.Not a sound reached the watchers in the cellar, from above. Here the capt ian and the little girls conversed in low tones and waited for somet i something to happen, but the minutes fled by and the hiding place was not discovered.Doubt/e doubtless the Glandelinian general was in full possession of the templeby this time, and wa was searching for them.Violet and her sisters knew that the Glandelinians could not rout them out a/o alone, or even if they tried to do so, they intended to shoot the general or any of them down, and take no chances with the stalwa stalwart soldiers.

An hour pa passed away and as still nothing happened the captian grew impatient and decided to mount the ladder as far as the neck where he orin originally entered the idol and see if he could find the spring t o the door which had eluded him before . Leaving his rifle in a corner and announcing his purpse he started on his upward trip and reached the platform without trouble, touched on his searchlight, and reached out his hand. As he did so, the door opened and the dusky form of one of the black regalia and hooded Ga Glandelinian Gargolians confronted hi m . Both were taken by surprise. The light showed that the Glandelinian was not the regular chief as the captian had supposed it was, it being one of the Turmerman Turmerannians or Gargolians. W Quickly he struck the man in his the jaw with his left and putting away the light stepped half forward, half out the door and hit the fellow with his other fist. The Glandelinian offiser staggered to one side of the circular gallery, lost his balance, and fell that fearful height clean to the floor of the court below, and to the floorof the idol room, breaking his neck.

T he captian then looked down, s aw the flashi ng of light s , and heard many wild exclamanations. He could even see a bunch of Me-gollestinians gathered about the man. They had supposed that the officer made a misstep up there in the dark, and fell. The captian held the door in the idols neck ajar with his hat,cand then opened the door in the circular corridor, and looked out. All was dark there for he heard no sound, and he judged tha the room had been sea searched, after which the Glandelinians had returned to the ground floor. T he captian ventureo along the corridor as far as the stairs on one side, and feeling st satisfied that therewas no one a above the ground floor, he returned once more to the gallery around the idols neck, and looked down again.All was dark below.

MANY OTHER ACCOUNTS OF FLOOD.....

The big Culkin Dike or levee was also expected to be captured by Glandelinians who had attacked those defending it for four days, and should they succeed and blow it up it would add to the back waters of the flood which were spreading over the lower regions between the Aronburg Run and Mic-Whirther Bottoms all the time during the scenes mentioned in the few past chapters of battle, and of the adventures of Violet, and her sisters in the caverns and elsewhere.

Either fortunately or unfortunately either the Vivian girls and the armies were very far from the flooded regions and therefore I cannot put them through any experiences in the flood. Nevertheless the scenes depicted here are quite enough and the distress of whole armies of persons in the flooded districts was continually voiced in an appeal to the Glandelinian Abbiecanian Government for federal aid, and therefore why the Emperor or Violet and her sisters did not even now know of the flood is not yet told here. National guardsmen were increased in numbers and were on duty at stragtic and other points to prevent the Glandelinians were shooting down refugees or blowing up the dikes of the rivers still untouched. Among the refugees concentrated in hundreds of camps in even northern Angelinia diseases were spreading still more as the medicial officers sought not only to check measles, mumps, whooping cough, and Typhoid fever but also small pox and the more dreaded disease Locked Jaw and some cases of Hydrophobia.

One hundred and eighty mad dogs were loose among flood victims which increased the peril to a great extend not leaving out frequent snipping attacks of glandelinians upon these defensive camps or undefensive camps which ever the case might be. Worse than ever northeast winds was bring freel freezing temperatures which w; whipped the half clad fugitives day and night as they crowded together in their scanty shelter, and worse yet for them sneaking Glandelinian vandals would enter these camps preveting th pretending they were refugees, and at night start a fire in one of the camps that not only threatened to wip wipe out all the shelter but burn many to death in the bargain.

At other points along the Mic-Whirther hundreds of regiments of men fought to hold the Glandelinians off from levees and save other threatened lands from ruinous devastation, and Glandelinians captured during many such frays were given no mercy but lined up on top of a levee and shot.

Despite the city of Big Girl Knool being still more threatened by the fury of floods, which were menancing the city even though its own protecting levees were still safe, it was responding to frantic appeals from the Red Cross at many districts, which stuted that many thousands of persons would be drowned Unless means were found to con vey them to safty safty and also to send soldiers to fight it out with glandelinians who were trying their mos most determined best to prevent rescue of women and children marooned by flood. Therefore special trains of a number of roads that could still run through the flood, loaded with soldiers and otyers others left the city, accompanied on the wae water by many boats armed with artillery and explosives. These trains were given the complete right of way. The appeal requested also that no expense be spared and that boats and trains and soldiers be sent with all posible haste. The plan itself however was for the trains to go to the scene as close as safty would allow, and then for boats also taken by the trains to be launched under their own power while the boats coming down on the river w would fight off all attempts of Glandelinians to prevent the rescue, and meanwhile giving the foe no quarter. The trains however being dispatched to different directions it was and would be difficult to know when they would reach their destinations. The request was for two hundred and fifty boats but unfortunately that number could not be secured, though an operater and an armed crew would be sent with each boat, and river gun boats would accompany them and some merrimacs also. Advices to the headquarters of the Red Cross were that six thousand persons were marooned on eighty acres of land a short distance south of little Girl Knool and where they were not cut off from escape by water or the rebels, they were cut off by big forest fires, and had no shelter whatever and ver very little food.

It was saidthat eighteen hundred Glandelinian soldiers working on a long levee i with a purpose to blast it were killed and drowned, when the blasting powder and dynimite with which they were to explode to destroy the levee went off ahead of the time. Those of the Glandelinians who were not killed by the blast, were instantly caught in the swirl pf of water inside and outside the break, and a large craft which had more Glandelinian soldiers on board and a number of tons of high explosives was also caught in the torrent outside the main break itself as it was attempting to rescue those caught in the tram trap and was washed ashore with every one aboard near a big christian camp who forwith took them all prisoners and sentenced them to be shot for murder and vandalsim. It also happened that a levee at Glantor had been broken by the enemy but as no communication could be established with that district which is isolated with telephone or telegraph no one could be assured whether it was g the levee which the Glandelinian soldiers perished on or not. Yet a number of local red cross officials dis patched boats for that region hoping to save many refugees reported by wireless to be marooned on the levee top not yet given way, but who were in immediate peril, but the boats could make no headway against the fury of the flood and three of them were capsized and the crew forced to swim for their lives and knoked about by floating wreckage and dead boi bodies of animals as they did so. Nevertheless it was said that the remaining portion of the levee weakened because of the destruction of the other portions were now caving before the force of the outri rushing torrent, and many people were crying and screaming desperately forcaid, when three big boats passed by with thousands crowded onto i their large barges and on their decks, and yet had to pass by without offering aid because the crews were unable to take on additional refugees, because no room on the boats or barges. The Government Engineer turner allens nevertheless said he was satis fied that the destruction of many Glandelinians on a exploded levee were true and that it served them right for the sauce o of their wicked purpose. One steamer loaded down with refugees arrived at Greenburg junction shortly before six o clock on the 6th of October and the crew and refugees reported that many bodies of Glandelinians were seen passing by in the flood. These st eamers unloaded their refugees as quick as possible and then returned tward the broken levee to rescue the refugees, while the Red Cross obtained the service of many gas boats.

Also as frantic reports came in it was known that more than twenty two thousand persons many women and children were marooned in Turner County. About five thousand were stranded at Tucklin, where the water is said to be ften feet deep, one thousand at Randall, two thousand on a long railway and foot bridge out of the city of Little Girl Knool, and from eight to nine thousand in the woods beyond the bridge, while the remainder about five thousand or more were marooned on a levee , which was not blasted or even threatened by Glandelinians but nevertheless surrounded by a flood which though may not destroy the levee would go far above it in depth and drown those on it.

High winds and a blinding snow and a treacherious current was hampering the rescue work, but nevertheless about two hundred and sixty five were brought in from the bridge, on October the 7th, and about two thousand were being looked for beyond the bridge. But no o boats of any kind have been able to cross the river or go into the main flood.

Near Big Girl knool the majority of the inhabatants were resigned to a continued peril from the flood which was threatening this city for three days, and therefore all of them were w said to be preparing for high water, by removing all their belongings to the top stories of higher buildings and living there themselves or leaving the city from lower buildings and seeking refugee on hills and higher plains hoped far beyond the reach of flood. The business districts were still conducting its affairs though one eye is kept on the threatening flood lapping at the curbstone at lower streets or in a dept of two feet, and one ear is near the telephone while more expensive goods are being sent up to higher floors. A high wind was spa splashing the water against the lower sections of the city, and enemy soldiers were still trying to damage the levee at the south, while a blinding blizzard laying snow at four inches per hour was raging or had been raging for a day and so showed no signs of letting up, thus hampering traffic needed most in case the flood would suddenly engulf the lower portions of the big town.

Many Glandelinians said to have been captured in their attempts to break the levee were taken ifto the town and exposed in public to the people as they were being sentenced to either a long term in prison for the flood or shot.

Where most of the rescues came to scatter good will and bring off the unfortun ate refugees they were only able to express sympathy instead. For many of those having relatives and friends in the flooded areas th the rescuers were only able toreport to report that to their own knowledge despite their inability to rescue any one the loss of life among the flood victims was very small. and that the greatest number drowned were Glandelinians who had been caught in their own traps. Even bigger cities which were also flooded with great damage were pla ing the good Samaratians in that way that made famious the term" Abbiesannian Hospitality." Rescuers saw large samples of it everywhere, and even were aided desperately in their rescue work. Angelinia Agathia tyough far from danger so far was doing a very immense ammount of its own share, taking in refugees, housing them, and sending all aid possible and letting loose big forces of troops occas ionally from its mobli b mobolization camps when needed. All aboard the many big rescue ing ships all was well, but all around them the scene was terrible. Many ship s had been fired on but being armed as needed answered the fire of the snipers with spirit, and with help from soldiers on levees and on shore.

Count De Biffs party on board his large rescueing ship nosed out into the Aronburg Run River tward flooded Greenburg, signs of the flood being visible all the while but this boat so far recieve d no fire from foes. Nearing Goldie it could be seen that the entire town was under water and only the roofs and chimneys of houses were above the raging waters. Truely this was a deserted town for not a human being was in sight only floating wreckage and roofs, and on the other side but far away just the top of some schoolhouse represented what had been the best section of the town. A few miles further north the rescuers observed that another levee on the Calverinian side of the river was out. Because the wicked Glandelinians had broken the many levees nature itself was now overcoming human opposition to the flood, and was having its own swing. here a month or two ago the waters of the rivers had proceeded in an orderly way tward the sea, now because of the enemy all was disorder and disaster, and the murky waters had forced its way inland to fourty miles and even hundreds of miles.

For many miles the rescueing boats and ships steamed p and down rescueing people the passengers and rescued persons viewing the scene of desolation. One of the ships neared Ophelia city fortunately on a large rise of ground but with its lower and river front homes and stores which was paying the penaltybfor their being so close to the flood. past this town in places there would be found a still safe levee, and in some only the invisible space of a former levee blown up by the wicked Glandeliniens. Ten mile further a leveewhich theyhad observed to be still holding suddenly erupted into the air and it was gone too.

Men women and children at times were seen riding on house tops or rafts, and the ships passed scores of thousands of homes abandoned. The town of Allenton was reached but hat had become of its inhabatants no one know and only the highest of the structures could be seen two stories above the water. perhaps the rescuers passed between little Girl Knool and Dolton about 100,000 abandonee houses and shckas, shacks and farm houses. The leading rescue boat had during the evening of the 27th swung around to a boat landing near Big Girl Knool and here a message was delivered to the captian of the rescue ship which run as follows;

" Captian of the Steamer rescue boat Caldwell;
It has been reported to be sir that the levee which you passed at phelia is gravely endangered by Glandelinian vandals just below there. By surthe cityof the War Department you are here by requested to go back a ways and with t your rifle men, and soldiers on board to keep as many Glandlinians away from that levee as possible.
City Council of Big Girl Knool.
Mic-Whirther river Commission. "

Accordingly the Caldwell turned back and proceeded at full speed and her passengers and refugees were cheered by the knowledged that there was going to be some excitement. As there were plenty of rifles on board and ammunition all the male refugees were also armed, and ten miles later there was a rush to the west deck of the ship, prepartory to drive off the Glandelinians from the levee, but the home guards of the town had seen the danger also and had drove away the enemy before the ship even got the report.

One of the most serious incidents of the flood disaster was the attack of a large troop of Glandelinian cavarly soldiers upon a Mic- ollester and Pandora train carrying no soldiers and women and children refugees to H shelter. It was a tragedy and of the four hundred passengers in the long eleven car train about three hundred mostly soldiers had been killed, of whom fourty six were children, and from fifty to sixty were other passengers. The train was the Pa Pandoria Limited a crack train that during peace time would run the same rate and distance as the famious Aronburge Limited which also during the war had been attacked four teen times. From fifty to sixty foriegners were also on the train sight seers come to see the flood but only one of them was injured. The survivors who reached Angelinia Agathis on the Aronburg Limited relief train said the Glandelinians who derailed the locomotive engine of the Pandora crack Limited had then attacked the train, and shouted" All Glandelinia Free from Abbiannia." They robbed the two express coaches of over two million dollars in Abbieunnian money and locked a number of the women and children passengers in some of the burning coaches, after also robbing all the passengers even taking what they could use from the little children themselves. Some of the other coaches however before being set afire were emptied of the passengers as the Glandelinian soldiers curtly ordered them out, and those who were slow in going were thrown out and then the coaches were set on fire. . A great number of the soldiers and passengers were so severely injured in the fray as to be unable to move and as the glandelinians refused to rescue them, even children they were left within the coaches and burned to death. Three wounded officers survivors of the military escorts for the wrecked refugee trains managed to save their lives by discarding their insigna and posing as foriegners of other nations in uniform. Two squadrons of Abbie annina Concentinian Cavarly were ordered to persue these Glandelinian vandals and bandits.

After wrecking the engine the attackers had poured a heavy rifle fire through tye coaches after the derailment of the train which was bound from the flood districts of Little Girl Knool to Big Girl Knool. The o soldier guard and the passengers who too were armed that is the males returned the fire from the many windows untill either running short of ammunition or overcome and the bullets of the attackers caused the majority of the deaths among the refugee passengers.

The engineer ad fire man of the engine were taken prisoner and the rebels used the fire in the furnace box to set the cars ablaze. The charge that a colonel well known by even people in Angelinia Agathia as a son born there of a War Department member directed the t attack against the train was made by a number of refugees and soldiers in the first und second class cl coaches who were among the wounded brought to Angelinia Agathia on the Aronburg Limited. This man a former resident of Angelinia Agathia, they said rode around the scene of combat on his horse. Another officer boarded the train after the military escort had been silenced, ordering the men to kill all passengers whether women men or children suspected of helping the soldiers resist the attack, but many of the glandelinian soldiers happened to be more humane and only massacred the national c soldier soldiers and ordered the passengers out and away from the scene. An officer of the guard known as colonel lint had one leg shattered and his arm injured. He escaped death in the blazing coach through the assistance of several women one of the survivors of the coach.

Captian hando with fifty five soldiers fought from the military caruntill all his comrades were killed, and then unable to prevent the insurgents from entering the car he dropped to the floor and pretended to be dead.The glandelinians entered and bayoneted the bodies but did not touch the captian whom they overlooked.Then three glandelinians remained in the car untill it was in flames and after they left the captian crawled out, met two women who assisted him to safty.

Others also said that a man who had been a former resident of Angelinia Agathia, and who had been born there directed the attack from horseback. A number of women and children wounded as they were fled to the mountains but were captured and confucted to the rebel camps. Shortly afterwards they were shot.

The Aurthorities of Angelinia had been fully aroused by the slaughter of so many refugees on the train besides soldiers, and Count De liff came peremptory orders to gthe national guard for the persuit of the rebel bands that have been everywhere been infesting the flood districts, andino matter what they were doing or not doing to give no q quarter. Hereafter the war department would personally directthe policy aiming at the supression of the revolutionary eleeslements at all points while because of the disasters being caused by the enemy everywhere, a censorship as far as possible had been established on all telegraphic dispatches going to the outside world, and all war correspondents and photographers were forbidden to enter the territories affected by war horrors. It was also believed that Emperor vivian who alone had seen heard of the flood intended to impose a severe course on the rebellious glandelinian generals who have been the special cause of all these war horrors upon the helpless.

He was specially angered at the way the glandelinians fight to hinder rescue worl, work, the attack on the train and other scenes.

General vivianna himself was ordered to sent out his whole cavarly, and the general was to command the persuers in person, and another detatchment was to be sent in persuit of the rebels which attacked the train, and that an engagement with them was expected hourly. If general vivianna finds them he will give no quarter because of the horrors the glandelinians have continually brought on. The nortorious glandelinian officer known as general Stoneman commanded the glandelinians who attacked the train and there were about two thousand of the rebels, and all mounted on swift horses. Stoneman proclaimed himself about a few nights ago to move forward with a column to stop the escape of all refugees from flood districts and he was a man who had a long record of unspeakable military crimes, and guilty of many terrible massacres of little children, priests nunes and so on.

The motive mainly for the attack on the train not apparently not for money, but because the train was full of soldiers, even though the rebels did take more than two mic ion dollars consigned to the banks of Pandora and Angelinia Agathia. They even robbed all the passengers of not money only but of every valuable they had taking even their baggage and their very outside clothing on their backs and stripped all the children stark naked.

Bedraggled suv survivors of this train disaster who tottered off the Aronburg Limited at the Angelinia Agathia Union station shortly after eight o clock the next morning confirmed the announcement of others that the bands of glandelinians included a number of men who had been born in Anb Angelinia Agathia and whose parents loyal to the cause was supp orting it to their their utmost and who had thrown their sons out of house and home for taking sides with wicked glandelinia. even a reporter from Dorothy Gale who was a passenger on the attacked train saw three of the men and recognized them as his three boy hood companions of years ago. One of them had even robbed him. Ten soldiers of the military escort who had been made prisoners and who was taken to the camp of the rebels but escaped in the night also testified to the fact that residents of Angelinia Agathia had wayward sons fighting in the glandelinian army and were with the train attackers. The slaughter of nearly a hundred of the children was appalling. and the Glandelinians directed their fury more upon little girls than boys. Twenty of the boys fell mangled by dum dum bullets while the bodies of little girls were torn apart and gutted. Of one family of fourteen, a refugee colum all were killed and left inside a burning car. The husband of a beautiful woman and five little children was helped off the Aronburg Limited train, and he was laughing loudly and singing a joke song about floods massacres and " Christian dogs,, in general. He had gone insane. His beautiful wife, and children had been slaughtered brutally before his very eyes.

A foriegn woman was borne from a pullman on a litter having been kept alive with oxygen. Th four small figures , her children were also taken from the train mangled beyond recognition by the soft nosed dum dum bullets,and one little girl was carefully removed whose whole body had been cut entirely apart from neck to bottom.

Upwards of a hundred wounded passengers were taken to hospitals at Angelinia Agathia. The dea dead left in the ill fated train were totally cremated when the rebels applied the fire from the furnace of the engine to the coaches or gasoline and othe and other inflamable materials. Of the escort of three hundred soldiers two hundred nd fourty six died actually at their post, but many of the glandelinians too were killed or wounded in the dreadful fight. A foriguer saved some of the other national soldiers who had fought from the shelter of a chair car untill their ammunition ran out. When the rebels swarmed upon the train the Foriegners thought to put some of

around the scene of combat on his horse. Another officer boarded the train after the military escort had been silenced, ordering the men to kill all passengers whether women man or children suspected of helping the soldiers resist the attack, but many of the Glandelinian soldiers happened to be more humane and only massacred the national c soldier and other inflamable materials. Of the escort of three hundred soldiers two hundred nd fourty six died actually at their post, but many of the Glandelinians too were killed or wounded in the dreadful fight. A foriigner saved some of the other national soldiers who had fought from the shelter of a chair car until their ammunition ran out. When the rebels swarmed upon the train the Foriegners thought to put some of their own civilian clothing from their trunks on the heroic soldiers, and therefore the Glandelinians took them for passengers and they were only ordered to get off the train.

Indeed the battle between the Glandelinians and the train escort lasted fully four hours. The Glandelinians then had all the time they desired for looting the long train and destroying what they could of it. While they were transporting the captured luggage from the train to their camp about half a mile away from the main flood Federal soldiers appeared but were forced off by the main troops that came from the camp to fight them.

One of the foriegners among the survivors who had lived in Dorothy gale city for two years said to reporters at Angelinia Agathia it was one of the most most frightful experiedes experiences he had ever passed through in his life. He also said to one of the reportors-

" The attack of the Glandelinians on the refugee train was the most dastardly crime in the annals of Glandelinian revolutionary warfare. The Glandelinians shot into the crowded cars from two sides, even hurling hand grenades even after it was apparent that the fighting was stopped. The awful attack came without warning. The train however h had been going about twenty miles an hour, when there was a sudden and tremendous jolt, the train slowed down so suddenly that all passengers were thrown back and forth violently in their seats, or thrown out altogether, and then the engine and the three forward cars left the rails and toppled over. Then almost instantly came a wild fusillade of shots and terrific e yelling. All the passengers who were only women and children were almost panic stricken but they nevertheless threw themselves on the floor or hid under the seats. Then came the crash of glass, and the bullets ricocheted up and lo down the car. The christian soldiers ran through the isle aisle nd took position below the open spaces where there had been windows, andcbegan firing furiously. There was every few minutes however a prolonged lull in the firing, which at times made u us all think the escort was getting the better of the Glandelinian soldiers, or that their ammunition was running out. Then the inferno would begin all over again. There were seventeen germans in my car and all of us thought our last hour had come but by and by it was noticed that the return fire of the once strong military escort was rapidly slackening. Thirty of these had died in our car and therefore we could guess what had happened to the others fighting from the poorly concealed shelters in the wooden cars. The shrik shrieks and screams of women and little children which we heard from time to time told the story in a bo blood curdling manner.

. Finally the firing had almost ce ceased from the train and the Angelinian rebels drew closer and closer never stopping their own wild fire. A few more volleys volleys, and one heavy fusillade and they were on the platforms yelling their famious Glandelinian battle cries. With rifles and sabres they swarmed into the pullman. A blood thirsty brute brute of a Glandelinian soldier took a fancy to a charming little Abbieannian girl one of the refugees of little Little Girl Knool City across the aisle from a german. The scoundrol first robbed her took off or forced her to remove half of her clothing and then told her to get off the car indicating the spot where she would have to wait for him. The little girl turned white in the face but faced him bravely. The german who had been sitting across the way rose up to protest but the insurgent brandished his sabre over the foriegners head and told him in Glandelinian to shut up adding with unrepeatable obscenity aspersions on all foriegners. Then a few minutes late another rebel officer showed up at the pull man door and bawled out to us to leave the car or be burned up alive. We were forced to get out and the soldiers took us to a little hill lock some distance away and left us under guard in a tent while from there we saw the cars soon burst into flames and soldiers run back and forth withtorches in their hands. As we were foriegners the Glandelinians later released us with the warning; " Don't show up in this region again. Better go home to where you belong. You'll be better off and safer."

200KILLED, 1,000 HURT IN BLAST AT BIG GIRL KNOOL.
VICTIMS TRAPPED AS BIG FIRE FOLLOWS EXPLOSION IN BLOCK LONG FOUR STORY STRUCTURE. EXPLOSION INCENDAIRY. MANY OTHERS ENDANGERED.
DISASTER TURNS OUT TO BE 18,000,000 DOLLAR FIRE IN FLOOD MENANCED BIG GIRL KNOOL.

ON the 27th of October a terrific dock and factory fire near the Aronburgs um River front following a series of dreadful explosions in one of the main river dock plants warehouses of the Aberdeener and Mic-Hollester chemical company early that day killed two hundred workers, and injured nearly a thousand, and six fire men were killed and twenty hurt fighting one of the worse blazes ever recorded in Big Girl Knool city. Two of the firemen were on the roof of me of the burning structures and had fallen to deat death in the blazing interior when a part of the upper section of the building was blown outward by one of the explosions.. The building and a full mile of the wharve with long lines of loaded freight cars and a number of other buildings were afire. and the blaze was threatening to spread with n unusual fury. Many of the dead are in the blazing ruins and that the many fire men were unable to reach them. The many injured were fatally hurt and therefore it was feared they might die. The cause of the terrific explosions could not absolutely be determined but a surviving work man said that before the explosion he had seen a number of men suddenly run from one of the buildings, and men he had never before seen there.He said the foreman had seen these men acting suspiciously ar und the building and had ordered them away.

At the time of the disaster there were fully three thousand in the building.A very strong northeasterly wind and the fact that the plants contained large quantiels of quaintities of chemicals hampered efforts of the fire men in extinguishing the fire and of of rescuing the many injured inside the burning structures. More than three thousand were working inside the structure at the time of the explosions. The fire was proceeded by six big explosions which blew out a large section of the wall along the Calso Avenus side of the five story plant, and witnesses declared that the explosions following a fire in a four story branch of the building came in quick succession and that the entire wall of the building on the Calso Avenue side was blown outward and a terrific sheet of flame leaping two hundred feet accompanied the explosions. Many of the injured were treated in the first aid station of the plant but this too had to be abandoned when the flames rapidly spreadto that part of the building, and when large portions of the river docks caught fire despite the effort of many fire departments to check the conflagration. Most of the injured victims were overcome by the heavy smoke and deadly fumes that spread throughout the building soon after the explosions. The scenes at the recieving hospital a city instutution at Big Girl Knool resembled a dressing station at some of the battle fields of the war itself. All available surgeons were rushed to the institution and even medical students from six colleges of medicine and surgery were pressed into service to care for the lesser serious cases.All the emergency operating rooms in the building were full and others recieved treatments in waiting rooms, and offices.

While the fire was spreading along the wharves the walls of another portion of the burning building collasped before another blast and the fire spread to the opposite side of the street, and residents of houses and shops and men from two other factorie factories there were forced to vacate the buildings as they too began to catch fire.

The blaze was indeed becoming a most spectacular fire, destroying thousands of cars, on the wharves and the confla conflagration fully added to the troubles of the thousands of men who are fighting for lives and property in the flood beleagured city. Mainly the warehouse at which the explosions occured is located on the Aronburg River front adjoining a levee close to the city. Therefore with such a spread of the fire fears were continually expressed that the intense heat created by the burning wharves nand buildings would cause the levees to burst. Therefore many streams of water were also poured on the concrete walls of the levees and thousands of sandbags were held in readniess to hurl into any breach that might be made by the heat or flood.

During this fire there was far away somewhere but outside of the city a burst of sullen thunder with which was believed to be another explosion at some levee that greeted the workers at other levees and the clouds rising in the distance puffed up into a thick curly column of pinkish color high to the sky.

Somewhere else also there had come every few minutes an awe inspiring rumble sounding alternately like th the puffing of some gigantic railroad n engine of or the breaking of heavy surf. From the time of the e these noises a series of strong earth tremors of local origin were felt as far away as Ophelia and Chamberlane in the environs of Angelinia Agathia.

So great is the volumn of water pouring from the Cullens Levee that work on the other protecting levees between San pedro and San Francisco was abandoned as useless, at night especially because Islandelinians kept up such a peppering that the workers had to go. A camp had been planned here by red Cross officials to care for sixty thousand more refugees who it was believed were being already driven from this ne ne- new section.

All the refugees who were marooned on the North Allen Levee had been rescued before the Islandelinians came up in boats and started a massacre. Six thousand persons were taken from the levee between Altos and Glotia and three thousand were rescued but with great difficulty from the embankments near South Bend and the rescue crafts were con tinually concentrating on rescueing all persons in the inundated sections of Lower Turmer and St Ann's Districts. All surf and gun and other boats were searching for the marooned victims.

Also it was found that fourteen thousand five hundred persons were marooned along a thirteen mile stretch of levees west of Little Girl Knool but the levees were not injured or put into a crumbling situation by enemies but nevertheless with the constant rise of the flood the position of these marooned persons was regarded as very dangerous untill theyhwere rescued later in the day. Rescue boats were directed to their aid as quickly as possible but these were hampered not only by the sweeping current through the many crevasses s o honeycombing the levees partly injured by enemy vandals but were constantly attacked by Islandelinians from the opposite shore of the flood and were forced to fight their way to the marooned and then fight their way back to shelter and repeat this very often and at times were forced to move cautiously.With this exception the evacuation of the fifteen districts south of Little Girl Knool and between Greenburg and Ophelia gt lavers Calverinia State was proceeding systamitically and rapidly. While the flood waters were pouring through the newly broken levees an estimate population of two hundred and fifty thousand more lay in the path of the on-rushing waters.The blasted breaches in the Aronburg Run Embankments were about one hundred and ten miles southwest of Little Girl Knool on the opposite or north side of the boundary line between the states of Calverinia and Angeline Vine.The river of floods still remained stationary at Big Girl Knool where the big fire was raging but the flood had risen four feet, at Little Girl Knool, three feet more at Turmer, six feet at Costellio which was flooded since the start. ten feet at Aurand, and one foot at Cramie Chamberlane.

The THE LARGE TOWN OF NELBY CORINTH FLOODED SUDDENLY AT NIGHT.
ALL SLEEPERS FLEE. TEN DROWN, AND FIFTY OTHERS MISSING, IN FOURTY MILE AN HOUR CURRENT.
FLOOD STILL DEFIED AND RESISTED NEAR BIG GIRL KNOOL, ARMY CONTINUES TO RUSH RELIEF FOR FLOOD VICTIMS.

At the city of Nelby Corinth a raging torrent of muddy flood waters during the night of October the 26th in less than six hours completely inundated the city a town of one hundr hundred thousand inhabatants on the west bank of the Aronburgs Run River under ten to twenty feet of wate r. To increase the peril fire broke out in many of the houses on the upper floors and a wind and rain storm added to the horror. The city was rapidly flooded during the early portion of the night but did not increase then at such prope proportions as to cause any alarm so that when the flood broke loose in a bad fashion later at night nearly all of the residents were awake still asleep. Those who could fled to the levees. Others took refuge in the upper floors of buildings untill boats could rescue them. The flood was pouring through a levee crevasse twenty two thousand feet wide with a rushing current of nearly fifty miles an hour, and waters four tfourty to fifty feet deep tossed about and deml demolished many houses directly in its path. While the loss of life in this city was not really confirmed by the flood relief parties and aurthorities, the residents of Nel y Nelby Corinth said about ten orphan a children from a flooded children home trying to swim through the surging flood waters up to their necks were swept away and drowned. But others declared that the fate of fifty or sixty others at the near by Goodknoe plantation including a number of children was unkown unknown but it was nevertheless believed they were trapped by the swift flow of the waters before they could reach any high ground. Several of the farmers reported an immense loss of cattle engulfed by the waters from the bursted levee while three hundred mules, four hundred expensive horses, including ten valuable racers, hogs, chickens, and other domestic animals were believed to have been drowned.

On the twenty seventh of the month of October the inhabatants viewed the romm remnants of their f looded homes from the high levee tops as they impatiently awaited rescue boats and the waters rushed northward and eastward to join those flowing through the other levee breaks which already have spread some four thousand miles down the river valley and threatening Dorothy Vale more than before.

From the crevasse near Nelby Corintn over fiff ty miles more of land had already been inundated but a high railway embankment at the town was believed to have been responsible largely to the safty of the inhabatants by breaking the first main rush of the waters. The Big girl Knool flood investigators notified the Government that the waterwas runni ng oer over two feet deep over the Main line of the Mic-Collector and Pandora railroad tracks far beyond Little Girl Knool north, and at Marrow on the western extremity of a river bayu Bayou it was rising three inches an hour. The conditions also in sight was that the flood in the Little Girl Knool district would be twenty feet deep before long.

Despite the fact that Big girl Knool was more menenced by the flood and had a great big fire raging even beyondcontrol of a hundred fire department and which kept on spreading business as usual was the slogan of merchants as flood waters swirled into stores basements and lapped against windows. Many of the firms however had moved to upper floors, Camera films had record breaking sales, while Grocery boys and girls propelled row boat delivery wagons. Late that day during the beginning ofthe fire the flood out side of Big Girl Knool city reached a 24.4 stage and a new prediction of 26,5 feet by another day was expected for a seventy foot section of the levee below the city had given way before another blast, threatening complete inundation of six hundred thousand more acres of land mostly farm land . The water was said to be pouring over the leves steadily.

H Nevertheless a large carloads of army rangee, with facilities for preparing food for a hundred thousand people was rushed to Big Girl Knool and other places for dis-tribution in the devastated Mic-Chirther Run Valley by the Fourteenth Corps area of the National guard. Supplies and workers also had to be sent there, and the Red Cross was still concentratee on raising well needed funds.

THE TERRIBLE MENANCE OF THE FLOOD CONTINUES TO GROW.
TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTY THOUSAND MORE FLEE LOWLANDS. FLOOD RUSHES ON NEW TOWNS. TOTAL NUMBER OF DEAD KNOWN AS ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MORE. MORE LEVEES GO OUT. NEW LEVEE BREAKS FEARED IN NORTHERN ANGELINIA STATE.

On the 27th of October two persons more were drowned at a small village called Storm Town near Little Girl Knool when they jumped into the flood waters to escape a burning home. The actual number of flood sufferers; the clothing, feeding and sh sheltering of whom so far the Red Cross had taken over by this time exceeded four hundred and eighty five thousand persons. A report to the Abbieannian northwrotics listened them by states as follows, NORTHERN ANGELII ANGELINIA------ 160,000. Will probably be one hundred thousand within another few days.

Angeline Pine.-----145,000. Expected to increase to another 100,000 in next ten hours.. The remainder from Calverinia. And as the crest of the flood is not even yet expectee to reach Big Girl Knool it was probable that the numbers above were being increased to more than two hundred thousand elsewhere for swift and irrestibly the flood waters of the Mic-Smirther was rolling across new ground extending into two other counties of Calverinia, and three in Northern Angelinia, the states of Callenwell and Flanders in Calverinia, and the Counties of Berner, Helen, and Marget in Angelinia inundating many additional towns and scores of thousands of acres of new farm lands.

The flood was driving the homeless before it in imasnse droves, and the flood was claiming new victims here and there, swallowing up a National guard rescuer worker near Greenfold,, two planters near Goodbluff, and the lieutenant of a regiment assisting in leves strengthening on the Aronburgo Run river near Ophelia.

Since the flood began with the known dead past the sixhundred mark, because of drowning, enemy snipping and the attack on the train, estimates of the total fatalitie ofthe flood ranged ffom six hundred to eight hundred, with about one hundred and fifty more reported drowned elsewhere. However in the absense of official estimates varying calculations of the damage over the 10,000 square miles of water covered areas were made by engineers and government officials, and these were to range all the way from two hundred million dollars to half a billion dollars. While all levees not injured were being held successfully against Clandelinian vandals by heroic work and fighting at a hundred other do different points and over a long stretch north and east of Schloedertown, a new break from blasting in the Aronburgo Run hiver levee at South Bend Denden County was reported with the released waters threatening fourteen towns.

Two hundred and sixtythousand others were already fleeing in the lowlands and break breaks caused by disguised enemies in dikes in smaller streams both in southern Calverinia and Northern Angelinia states were reported with a considerable area likely to be flooded and several hundred thousand more made homeless. A new crevasse below Big Girl Knool was opened up by the rascally Clandelinians on the 27th, and was expected to flood thirty more square miles. A score of towns had been hastily abandoned, and all were cut off from communications with the outside world, and Delton city a town of one hundred and thirty two people had been evacuated with the refugees seeking haven from both Clandelinian foes and flood in Maroon and other near by towns, which also were gradually being flooded by the flooded waters from the opened levees. Evacuation was also going forward at Lynolia, Acaroon, and many other towns in the floods path.

Refugees going past in rescue boats saw bodies floating in the water near Greenville Junction and the water was sweeping through the town in a swift current. All the dead were children and from the appearance of their clothing they were little slaves. Government engineers reported even then that there was more flood water in all flooded towns and cities than in all their history, and that the current was stronger than any known for fifty years.

And with the flood menance to Big Girl Knool declared to be the greatest ever, bordering territory in that section of Calverinia so close to Angelinia state, the city on the night of the 27th faced new dangers with breaks on two new major levees occuring not because of explosions but from the rush of flood waters against them. Thousands of men battled at Red Gold sixteen miles north of Big Girl Knool and as the Erminie Creek was flooded from the main st ate stream and as foes threatened to burst the levees in Allter County, armed guards patrolled the embankments thus announced . Excitement even reigned in Rosa city when explosions in the concrete levee almost made serious breaks. But these breaches were found to be repaired within a few hours and therefore hundreds of men were concentrated to repair them with sand bags and prevent a blow out which occured on an arch in the southern part of the city, itself.

Beppo Lansin twelve miles south of Big Girl Knool also was surrounded by water and all the business district is almost entirely water covered. Wagons and the like have no place at all to operate and the river at a stage of twenty four feet had caused the flood to rise twelve inches more in the last ten hours.

At Northern Angelinia there was a danger of additional levee breaks but so far these were closely guarded and every one who could was bent to the task of caring for swarms of refugees from the flooded areas in those districts. At this point the death list was reported as five with the drowing of several men at Callito, several more towns and thousands more of acres of land were under water i with unestimated property li loss. Many motar and other boats during the day and night rescued hundreds of persons from the roofs of their homes in twelve towns, and less than two hundred two hundred

was reported as five with the drowing of several men at Callito, several more towns and thousands more of acres of land were under water i with unestimated property li loss. Many motar and other boats during the day and night rescued hundreds of persons from the roofs of their homes in twelve towns, and less than two hundred two hundred remained in the stricken town of Little Girl Knool.

The rescuers and the Red Cross had handled about six hundred refugees since the flood began and all other boats were standing by for any emergency while several thousand men were strengthening the levees at Chamberlane, and Rosa and other places.

During the date of October 27th. or beginning a few days sooner, a nation wide movement to aid the immense droves of flood sufferers of the Mic-ghirther Rum Valley and other spots was launched by many cities and towns in the far south and north, and especially commenced bythe Abbiesannian Government at Angelinia Agathia itself.And this was officially followed by a quick and hearty response in the main Abbiesannian capitol and many other cities in the east and west, and especially towns and cities not hit by the flood or in possession of the wicked Glandelinian armies.....

The goal set by the Abbiesannian Aurtho rities and other cities and towns was the raisi raising of a $200,000,000 d fund to be administered by the Abbiesannian Red Cross in the flooded sections.

Members of the Abbiesannian Royal Cabinet also were aurthorized to aid in the raising of the fund. The aurthorities also placed the facilities of the Abbiesannian war, navy and treasury departments at the disposal of the Red Cross for the immediate relief of the flood victims and of keeping off enemies from all other levees, while one of the main National armies under general Francis Hansonia Vivienia was sent to drive off all Glandelinian troops found in the region. In Angelinia Agathia, City Controller Frank Hendro Portiro appointe appointed a commites of three hundred persons to raise the city's own fund and all the school children and even children of orphanages and other homes as well as those in boarding schools added their own pennies to the fund.

The Angelinia Agathia chapter of the Red Cross gave at least $1,234,567 immediately. The organization put in the reports that the suffering among the flood victims was growing more worse ev every day and that over two hundred and ten thousand more p p persons were in need of aid, and that enemy snipers and raiders and vandals were also increasing the horror among the flooded regions even risking their own lives to prevent rufus refugees to escape their fury.

CHAPTER FIFTY SIX

685,482 ON THE TWENTY EIGHT OF OCTOBER ARE NOW HOMELESS.
ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY EIGHT MORE PERISH IN THE FLOODS, MOST OF THEM SAID TO BE GLANDELINIANS. DAN DANGER INCREASES AROUND ALBERTINIA AND BETWEEN BIG GIRL KNOOL AND CHAMBERLANE AS DISEASES IMPERILS REFUGEE CAMPS, AND ENEMY SNIPERS
F GROW BOLDER.

BECAUSE of concussions from some terrific explosion far away more than thirty two thousand refugees were marooned on a crumbling levee only two feet and a half wide, and six miles long at Albertinia Landing on the Mic-Ghirther Rum River, all screaming for help most frantically. Sixty eight of these persons are known to have died, and elsewhere at points not before reached by the b flood, so many more had been made homeless that the total now range as far as six hundred and eighty five thousand , as the floods continued furiously to spread on. Another score of cities and towns and millions of acres of rich farm lands were already under water, and many of the towns half flooded are said to be afire on their top floors. Sixteen thousand of the new numbers of homeless are in the Sunbeam Creek delta and near Jennie Alden town were a most precarious position is held on a leeve levee the refugees took safty on, while hundreds of others clung to house tops and trees and floating debris and rafts, wwaing and screaming for aid; which for a while was not forthcoming.....

Scores of thousands more of the homeless were still said to be marooned on two trains of box cars on the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad line cut off from escape near Greenburg and on levees and big sand bars.

The town of greenburg was flooded to a greater depth by this time with all its water supply cut off half of its houses completely under water, and boats and rafts the only means of transportion to safty for those still marooned on upper floors and who had still defiene defied the flood and remained in the city.Horse to come yet there were new breaks and crevasses in the Mic-Ghirther Rum River dikes were threatened north of Albertinia because of Glandelinian vandals and on the Angelinia state side across from Big Girl Knool, and close to Little Girl Knopl.

One hundred and thirty eight were known to have died, adding to the list but it was believed the majority might have been Glandelinians who had been caught ina tra, trap when accomplishing the dangerous work of blowing up oje of the levees, and upward of over eighty five new numbers were made homeless, and another thou and square miles of land was inundated, and with disasters continuing it was believed the crest of the flood was still expected to come. This was even thedanger threatening between Albertinia and Big Girl Knool and along with this menance came others of additiona breaks in the levees endangering many thousands more of persons, and threatening to add more millions to the already enormous property loss. The number of dead included fourty persons who perished we when a big flat dredge boat loaded down with refugees was swamped by a break in the Mic-Whirther River levee at Albertinia Point while taking off many refugees from the same leeve levee. Many thousands of persons were even caught in the Aronburgs Run delta and were in sanger danger of drowning unless aid reached them as soon as possibl possible, and that hundreds of families were in trees, and many more hundreds on tops of floating wooden houses and house tops and rafts. The flood even now was spreading fast, and no one could say how great the number of people might be who were caught in it at this section. And also none of them having made preparations for the disaster knew of its sudden spread and therefore had not moved off thwith their families to the hills and other points of safty , and that it was surely turning out to be the most disasterous and extensive floods the Calverinian country ever had for hundreds of years.

Along the upper reaches of the Mic-Whirther Run River and down the Sunbeam and Aronburgs River deltas could be seen one of the most vast panoramais of suffering and dire desolation in the world, which was spread before the many branches of the Abbie-anninan Red Crossand other relief agencies. Cities, towns, and countless plantations are by this time completely inundated,, countless numbers of refugees mostly only women and children were closely huddled together in more than a score of camps for a distance of a hundred and fifty miles; and the fate of scores of thousands of others was not even then known.

More than 7,654 persons were found marooned in what remained of the town of Turner Allen by from twelve to thri thirty feet of muddy and slimy water. The town was without fresh water, and entirely without food and other provisions, the refugees stuted while they were being rescued. Greenbaum,Northern Angelinia State. was flooded earl early on the morning of the 28th of October when the waters of the flooded Mic-Whirther Run River let through by another bursted dike at Grove Landing flowed over the main municipal levee cutting off the water supply of the eighty thousand inhabatantd and sixteen thousand refugees housed and taken care of there. The eletric light and power plant was so badly flooded that the whole city was in total darkness during the follow ing night.. The Mic-Whirther Run also was breaking through newly blasted levees at additional places during that day. A new crevasse following a tremendous explosion occured eight miles north of Grove Landing, and break breaks caused by enemy vandals were reported below Carnation Field Town, Blue Bell city, and at Allentorie, a short distance from Greenbaum.

Besides the main levee at Friday Village, northern Angelinia State, opposite Chamberlane, was reported blasted and to be crumbling, with another break started at Mic-Whirther Landing, also in Northern Angelinia. Army engineers and soldiers and worker civilians have been forced to abandon the main dike at the head of the Alter Marie Bend north of Albertinia, where the flood waters was flowing over at the top and into the Aronburgs Run River itself. In the Aronburgs Run delta country, Cringore, Caldwell, Randall, Sidelights Run town, Moonlight city, Sunbeam Town, Aronburg village, Winnie Town and Golf Village was also recieved the recieving the flood waters with all the inhabatants fleeing before the deluge.. The town of Popular bluff, near Glend-Glendale was already under ten feet of water.

Refugee plants were started hastily near Big Girl Knool,, Beautiful wood, and Chamberlane and Caldwell cities, with the National guard, Red Cross and army officers and even men citizens co-perating in the work of rescue and care of flood sufferers, but the sudden rise of the waters, and heavy firing from hidden Glandelinian snipers drove them off, with some loss in life and meny injured, including six surgen surgeons, surgeons and three priests and one nun. By night fall of the 28th more than a dozen other counties in the Aronburg Run delta had been flooded, and in the state of Angeline Vine the flood waters were already pouring over the Clantonia and Gandandon and also Jennie Vivian Counties as a result of new enemy made breaks between San Salvador Bluff and the mouth of the Aronburgs Run River!

Slightly rising temperatures over most of the stricken areas in northern Angelinia alone promished to ally much of the suffering occasioned by the cold weather of the last few days, but the melting snows were feared to cause anincrease of the flood waters. And also as the refugee conters b came more crowded, the sickness of measles, and whopping cough and mumps and typhoid spread threateningly causing intense alar , intense alarm but with the Red Cross and other aurthorities including the municipal those in charge were hoping to prevent serious outbreaks, especially in Scarlet Fever in whih which were found a hundred cases in one camp. And the diresome tales of women and little children suffering on houses tree tops on rafts, and on levees surrounded by flood waters, or menanced by enemies were brought to many towns not touched by flood by rescued refugees and members of the rescuers, and also from soldiers of the National guard who spent the few days surveying the situation, for the government from buloons and airships. And also airplanes.....

On one house top of a floating frame shack and about to go to pieces at any minute there were thirty people all women and children, some lying still lying still as if dead, others were making feeble attempts to rise, and the remainder were waving and shouting for help. At another place, about fifty children alone were marooned on a drainage ditch

, while the flyers could see the levee r crumbling on both ends, and see hidden Glandelinians trying to shoot them down, and hear the distress cries of the refugees. One of the airplans loaded with bombs easily seeing the location of the hidden rebels flew over the spot and routed them from their concealment with good effect killing thirty and wounding sixty.

t Greenbaum hundreds of exhausted men themselves were rescued from death in the flood waters which stretched away for many scores of miles. his was added also with hundreds of women and children who slept at night on dikes. Below them was their below beloved city; flooded by waters flowing from a blasted levee only ten miles north, and the city's water supply was being entirely cut off altogether, and rescue boats were patrolling the flooded streets looking for refugees that might be found in the upper floors of the higher buildings. The highest city streets were covered from three to six feet of water, the lower from ten to thirty. All the rescue boats operated by citizens and National Guards men spent day and night taking people out of trees house tops and from upper stories. But these soldiers were unable to always bring in all the refugees down in the flood area as the numbers of refugees were so greatly extended and therefore great apprehension was felt for their safty. Three more deaths were reported by rescuers, a foriegn woman and her two children being drowned at Little Pandora northern Angelinia state two miles north of Chamberlane. Also several several unidentified soldiers were found drowned in the break at Albertinia Levee landing the day before, and there were also reports that several little orphans were swept to their deaths when the dike went out, so suddenly flooding the orphan asylum that the inmates only escaped death by retreating to the upper stories. However it is reported the building seems too strongly built for the flood to do any damage except by ruining supplies within the building and as most orphan asylums are fire proof no fire danger was feared, and rescuers were sent out to get these fifteen hundred marooned little ones.

It was believed the first or the full crisis had been reached so far in northern Angelinia between Albertinia and Big Girl Knool and for this location was also believed to be the most serious flood in Angelinia's his History. Many of the chief engineers of the state and counties made this report and gave the first official admission that that portion of the state was facing a crisis, while more startling yet, further south a great forest fire was raging burning scores of thousands of acres in a week and endangering many towns in its path, a fire started by Glandelinian fire bugs.

Yet every inch of the levee in this section of the Angelinia state along the levee sections of the Mic-Whirther Run, whose waters ran surely moving at a rate now fit to give it its name seemed to be in very good condition and far from the reach of rebel vandals, but many stated nevertheless that no one can forsee extraordinary occurances because where Glandelinian Valdis had been said to be far away they had before, any one expected it blasted at dozen levees at once.Therefore it was well to impress upon all to the people llying in towns and villages at this section of the state of the gravity of the situation with with which they are confronted, and to have every one of their men citizens guarding every levee and to be well armed, as army soldiers needed to fight the Glandelinian armies cannot be expected to guard all levees in every spot.

At the city of Little Girl Knool many big boats and smaller boats whose search-lights gleamed across debris laden flood waters, as beacons for salvation for thousands of women and children said to be still marooned on house tops, in upper stories, and on knolls and hills an levees in Northern Angelinia continued to ply the flood waters every night hourly adding to the list of refugees saved from hunger , exposure, or from the fire of the bold Glandelinian snipers who even risked their own lives to try and shoot down as many of the regue refugees as possible.

Hundreds of refugee camps, hastily constructed recieved belated and meager supplies of food and clothing, while health aurthorities concentrated on efforts to prevent the spread of diseases, but these were suddenly attacked by glandelinian hordes and captured, and the tents burned to the ground. Others refugees less lucky than those rescued by ships and boats were marooned in fri g freight cars and incessantly exposed to the pepper ing fire of Glandelinian snipers. And such badly exposed trains lay at Holden near the state line, where even a shortage of clothing and food caused suffering but the people dared not exposed expose themselves to the rebel fire.. Along the lower reaches of the Sun Beam creek and in sections of the Aronburgs Run River Basin where the flood waters were still rising a serious situation prelived because of lack of sufficient boats, and soldiers who had been sent there to aid the refugees had to keep up a hot fire upon Glandelinian snipers day and night which was as hotly and yet more effectually returned. Baloons tried to replace trains and boats wherever available but were brought down into the flood by glandelinian snipers. One airplane on the way from Big Girl Knool with one hundred loaves of bread, and munitions was said to have dropped high explosives and routed ten thousand Glandelinian snipers out of a wood which were continu continually firing on a flooded town to prevent the people seeking refugge on the roofs with the flood continually rising and threatening to drown the whole town,

Further warnings of dangers of a plague had been sounded as the waters at some points were beginning to slightly recede.

Also waters from the far reaching flood of the Mic-Whirther Run late on the 27th of October was covering the streets of Glorianna in all except eight blocks of the citys business district. The city fire department had been removed from their now flooded stations, and had to be installed in motar boats. Not as of the churches could hold services as they were flooded up to the very floors for the congr egations.

Led by the Government and Royal Authorities and Emperor Vivian himself the Abbieanni Abbieannian National Red Cross since the very news of the flood became widly known started a nation wide campaign to raise two hundred and fifty million for the relief of the legions of refugees from the war made floods of the dangerous Mic-Whirther Run. This action was taken at an emergency conference, called by Emperor Robert Vivian to coordinate all the federal flood relief activies under the administration of the Red Cross, and all Catholic religious societies. This Conference was attended by Red Cross Officials, priests and Superior nuns of Catholic homes, and a special committe committee oof many loyal members appointed by the Emperor to work with the Red Cross in making out remedies for the flood disasters in southern and northern in southern Calverinia, and northern Angelinia, and a dozen other smaller states and provinces. prior to calling the committee together together the Emperor placed all the flood relief facilities of the navy war, treasery and commercial departments at the disposal of the Abbieannian Red Cross, and sent off half the number of soldiers from a number of mobolization camps to go and combat enemy snipers throughout the shores and other points within the flood districts and issued a proclamantion calling upon all the loyal people of Abbieannia and other states to be generous in contributing to the relief fund. All flood relief measures dwarfted all other subjects of the war brought up at the Emperors conference that day with his advisers, and means to install of forestalling future floods made by the enemy as well as steps to remendy the present situation and prevent the enemy from breaking down more levees were also discussed.

At the meeting a special committee of the Red Cross for the Aronburgs Run river valley disaster was also established. The Committee comprised hundreds of important men with Count Callens as chairman. The cabinet members composed the committe committee appointed by the Emperor. Following the tremendous meeting, it was announced that the Secertary of war Weldon Donner had told the committee that the army engineers were in touch with the situation, and that they stated that despite hundreds of thousands fighting to prevent breaks declared nothing could be done because of so many enemy snipers was tremendously unusual and uncommon and that despite their efforts the flood conditions was growling growing worse hourly was extraordinary.

The committee was also told that frequent reports reaching both Angelinia Agathia, and Dorothy gale cities indicated that it was absolutely feared that within a few more days the number of refugees is liableto number more than one million five hundred thousand. Conservative estimates it was said, set the number of persons now looking to the Red Cross and other relief workers for aid at 6,89,000.

Eight states of the Calverinia Province were suffering one of the most extensive ad and distructive floods in the history of the country, but the worse hit just now was ten states of northern Angelinia country, and that the Abbieannian Red Cross and Catholic Red Cross and religious Societies reporting that by a most conservitave estimate that there were fifty thousand more refugees from the flood who must be cured for and yet cannot be reached made the news frightful indeed, and threw the whole northern country into great agation, while this emergency continues which was feared for many more weeks many of the refugees needed to be fed and clothed and succored not only from flood but enemy attackers and snipers who were unusually mean enough to enemy even shoot at refugees who should have even deserved their aid. The health of hundreds of thousands were even menanced, and the burden of caring for the homeless rested upon the agency designated by the Government charter to provide relief in all war and elemental disasters----especially the Abbieannian Red Cross and for so great a task additional funds were needed immediately. The Emperor himself said;

" It therefore becomes my duty, as Emperor of this Holy Nation of the States of Abbieannia, and Head of the Abbieannian Red Cross, and in behalf of my fair dauthers who are just now with my brothers army, to direct the sympathy of our people to the sad unjust plight of hundreds of thousands of their fellow citizens, mostly women and innocent little children, and to urge their generous contributions to ease up or end their suffering entirely. People also who wish may go down and aid in the rescue work as many rescuers and supplies and boats are badly needed."

The Emperor pointed out that the Federal Emperial Government has no funds for flood relief work on account of draining of its banks by the war, and therefore this work must be handled by the Red Cross and those who wish to contribute and better still go down to help in the rescue work. but any who desired to only go down for sight seeri seeing would be bared, and therefore those who wished to go to aid would recieve passes so they could get through. And in explaining the purpose of the se special committee the Secretary himself issued this statement;

" The purpose of the special commitee is to fully coordinate theactivies of the war, navy treasury, and all commerce departments into support of the Red Cross, which it was determined must continue the responsibility for the organization and also administration of the relief measures to be taken, and of preventing the enemy from snipping refugees and breaking up more dikes orvlevees. The extent of the measures taken and the volume of the disaster, and the numbers of rebel snipers believed to be at their distardly work, were fully investigated, and the majority of the rebels who had attacked the train overtaken by Vivianannas cavarly and destroyed. The special commitee concluded that it was already reaching such proportions as to place a burden of at least two hundred million dollars upon the Red Cross, and that with the enemy not being stopped in their work there was every appearance of even wider extension of the floods and frightful loss of life if something desperate is not done soon."

Angelinia Agathia city even at the start of the disasterous flood had swung into an extensive effort to raise funds for the relief of the sufferers in the great Mic-Whirther Run horror, and the mobolization camps was sending out soldiers and gunboats to fight off attempts to ruin further dikes. The city controller was in charge of the collection of the city fund, and had more than three to four hundred prominent citizens aiding in the work, and was supported by all school and childrens homes and parents also. The Angelinia Agathia chapter of the Abbieannian Red Cross at 1987, Albertinia Avenue had outlined the needs of the many residents of the flooded country and had urged immediate donations of at least three hundred thousand dollars, and the money that had recieved so far since then had mounted up to $ 1,234,000. Dorothy Gale city, Rosa, and Mombi, and also Betsy Bobbin and Pot cities raised an ernormous sum and forwarded it to state headquarters at Angelinia Agathia, and having sent the sum of nearly $3,000,000 and suggesting that the State organization also start in its own fund and adminster it through other departments, are now needing aid from the Red Cross themselves, Mombi, Pot, Betsy Bobbin and even Polychrome. Towns prediction a depth of seven feet of water in their lowest streets and hundreds of homes entirely ruined with the people marooned on the upper stories.

So far the collections from Angelinia Agathia had totaled over six million dollars.

As the flood was still increasing it was believed that nearly seven hundred thousand were needing aid, for eight million acres were now under water, and ruins, and the cold, and countless hundreds of Glandelinian snipers were a continued menance to the countless numbers who have guthered in refugee camps which were at times also exposed and sometimes whole hundreds of tents set afire and the camps boldly attacked. At Weldon Grove, Angelina vine state there are said to be 10,000 crowded in a small camp site that is also continued to be menanced by the rid rise of flood waters, and which had been fired on, and attacked ten times by the wicked Glandelinians. And not even dry ground to sleep on, and they can only be reached in small boats whose approach is so continually hampered by the rebels.

The town of Heidi junction was also said to be caring for sixty thousand refugees and more are coming in daily. Heavy funds also are needed there. Thimble Town, Robin ville, and little Albertinia were also seeking assistance not from flood but to care for refugees that come there. Many of the very relief workers, and members of the Red Cross are marooned and other have difficulties in obtaining transports. The worse has not even arived for those who have been driven from their homes. We need money now and above all we need it quickly. And enough soldiers to successfully fight it out with those murdering Glandelinian snipers.

The Secert Secretary of War."

BIG GIRL KNOOL AFFECTEDBY SHOCK OF A BIG EXPLOSION. TWO HUNDRED DEAD. SCHOOL HOUSES IN CITY DEMOLISHED BY CONCUSSION. TEACHERS, AND CHILDIEN LOSE THEIR LIVES. TRAIN IS MISSING. MANY HOUSES UNROOFED. ROOFS FLYING THROUGH THE AIR. TREES ON OUTSKIRTS OF CITY ARE UNROOFED OR UPROOTED.

During the height of the big warehouse and dock fire at Big Girlknool, there occured about fifteen miles away a terrific blast, whose shock and air vibration struch the northwestern edge of the city in the evening, and had the same effect as if the place had been struck by a tornado or hurricane. For the full extent of the streets and city front in that location the concussion shook down innumerable telephone and light poles and ernormous damage was done to homes while the walls of six of the burning structures already weakened by the heatvof flames crashed down at once before the shock.

Nine people were killed, and sixty injured by the vibration, and at the extreme northe northern section school children suffered most. Reports were that three were killed at Center street, near Cordonia Avenue when the house collasped, and that in the St francis School two children were killed, along with three teachers and the shock burled w two hundred of the children but the loss of life was small though, about eighty were badly injured. All lines of communications with that part of the city were shaken down, and the half flooded streets were so badly blocked with debris that passage of street cars and other cars were impossible. Doctors and nurses were immediately rushed to the scene n in boats. Two others were killed in St. nns School on Jenten sterrt street and w twelve of the children injured. Beside this schoolhouse, a line of two and three story residents were h shaken badly and all the windows were shocked out. A wagon driver was killed at Gurdin street by fragments of a wall that crashed from a building when the shock cams. pumage at this street however was not estimated.. yet reports came from various sections of the city of scantling and entire roofs jumping high in the air with the concussion like popcorn in a shakepr and that wreckage of some kind flew across the sky like a bursting cloud from no one knows where. A man and three children were killed and an unknown number injured at Cornland treet near Vivian Avalue. Telephone wires there too are down and doctors and nurses also have been sent there. One was rdp reported dead at Klato street near Center. irst reports came through Albertia street, and doctors ariving there were directed to the scene of disaster. Investigators had reports that the explosion which shocked Big girl knobl occured east of the city far from the river itself, and that it dug a crater in the ground half a mile wide. hat caused it, or who was responsible no one could ascertain, but that it has noti nothing to do with the blasting caused for floods. Other reports showed that fourty three were injured at Broadway, five at Clor street, twenty at Big Girl knool Avenue, ten at western Avenue, and six at orth venue.

Attention later after the shocks from the blast was directed tward Heldon icknel icknell town at which place it was reported two Mic-ollester and Pandora railroad trains h had been derailed by the shock of the explosion. It was two relief and refugee trains due at Big girl nool at three oclock, but it was now eight oclock in the evening and the trains have not been heard of by train dispatchers and it was feared when wrecked they too might have been attacked by Glandelinians.

closest to the noise of the explosion fifteen thousand houses were totally unroofed the roofs at the shocks fairly playing leap frog and then crashing into the streets, and hundreds of persons passing back and forth in the streets which at this point were free of waters were caught in the crashing wrec wreckage and killed or injured. By these roofs also two persons were injured at Riverview Avenue, andmany others further away were hurt by flying gluss either broken from the windows by the concussion of the blast, or from the shocks of the roof s as they crashed to the pavements.

A policeman was killed and about twenty hurt when the shock of the blast wrecked t o two frame houses close to where they were passing. The policeman was killed when a one story frame house crashed down and the wreckage of the front was hurled upon him without warning. Two other school children were killed at Chester Avenue when the blast partially wrecked the St Vincents atholic school. oth of them, a boy and girl were killed when the ceiling of the schoolroom crashed down upon them and the whole class i injuring and blinding the rest, while scores of other children in the other class rons were cut by flying glass. besides wrecking the school the concussion almost razed the upper section of the city iver grain elevator, and two big warehouses along the river front, and in this street half a hundred were injured in the streets but not seriously.

at Albertu street reports came that huge planks, were hurled far over the streets high in the air, that tin roofs went sailing through the air, and clouds of mysterious dust descended into the streets like a blizzard for a few minutes, white dust at that.

Reports of simulair kind came from Alexander, Orleans, Jenson, oodbury, and Aronburg treets. Attempts to locate the source of the debris and the fine dust that fell so thick you could not see across the street for five minutes were halted by the crippled wire service brought on by the flood.

Outside the city limits thousands of trees were uprooted by the concussio., besides miles of sidewalk sidewalks, and all windows of houses not injured otherwise were demolished. Also an operator of the Mic-ollester and Pandora railroad outside the the city was injured by glass and a beam of wood, when his tower was totally wrecked by the concussion.

FLOOD PERIL CONTINUES TO BECOME GREATER. MANY MORE TOWNS PERILED.
FLOOD RISES NEAR ARONBURGS RUN.

THE St Vincent Levee five miles south of Glorianna city was broken early on October the 26th and new flood waters began spreading over a very large area of farm land and the tracks of another railroad line was completely washed out blocking other throu. through war train service. Therefore it s resulted in the entire St Vincent region of northern Angelinia to be doomed to inundation, even when another levee known as St peters before before the force of explsions, and the breach in this levee was made a mile long. This permitted the overflow from the Mic-hhirther Run river at orina to sweep tward the big lake like main flood and the onrush of waters was therefore expected to sweep down into the Little Sunbeam creek valley, and through that basin to meet the main flood further below and add to its torrent.

The main ic-hhirther Run Levee was not touched yet by any Glandelinians and still held but the workers were doubtful it if t it could be protected for another full week. This had however prevented the main flood from going beyond its bonds so as to cause any serious loss of lives but the flood nevertheless was starting in inundate lowlands over a wide expanse which had not yet been touched by waters, and threatened local defenses and many towns.

The full extent of the disaster was even expected to overtake many scores of towns which had been fighting desperately to hold their dikes from being blasted by glandelinia vandals and the prevailing l el high waters.. Thirty of the towns were imperiled and about fifty thousand more persons were reported homeless and becoming refugees even bufore the new menance became a fact. One high point in the valley was at Outlook town where a hill rises sharply from the plains, but two thousand of the refugees who

The flood of the Aronburgs ' an near Little Girl knool on the 26th of October stood at thirty one feet, and it was believed the crest of the flood here had been reached apparently, but it could not be said what would occur the following week. Even at this section millions of acreas of land had been inuna inundated in a sea of waters, while hundreds of thousands have been driven from their homes. A score or more already had perished in the flood waters, and the damage at this section to property had not and could not be estimated.

CHAPTER FIFTY SEVEN

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS ORDERED TO FLOOD ZONE. BIG GIRL KNOOL BARRED AS FLOOD WATERS RISE. NAVY SENDS MORE BOA BOATS TO ASSIST IN THE RESCUE WORK. FURTHER RISE PREDICTED.. BOATS TAKES MANY THOUSANDS FROM LEVEES. ANOTHER ARONBURGS RUN RIVER LEVEE IS BLOWN UP. NEED MORE ARMED MOTAR BOATS. GODFREY TOWN IS SAVED! TWENTY THOUSAND PERCHED IN TREES AND ON HOUSE TOPS. TEN WOMEN AND SIX CHILDREN DROWN IN HOUSE. STRONGER MILITARY RULE ESTABLISHED. WARNED TO FIRE IMMEDIATELY. ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY THOUSAND WITHOUT FOOD.

MORE THAN TWELVE MORE HAD BEEN KOWN BY THE "(TH OF OOctober to have perished in the commencing of the most extensive flood on r re record and unconfirmed reports was that two hundred more were in danger of being drowned. 10,000 more were being made homeless homeless in northern Angelinia, and southern Calverinia, and six other states, and the full number still was increasing.At Greenbaum more than one hundred orphans were reported drowned when the waters rose above the roof of the very asylum and rescue work had been impossible because of a sixty mile an hour current which was washing the very town to pieces.

On this day Emperor Vivian and the Red Cross acted to desperately enlarge and expedite efforts to relieve suffering, caused by enemy and flood, and Government officials were directed by the Emperor to go to Big Girl Knool to expand the Red Cross and other relief organizations and also to make a full detailed survey. To increase movement as much as possible the interstate commerce commission declared a transportaion emergency in the flooded region permitting railroads to abandon requirements for routing of freight and other trains. The Secretary of war also was expected to arive at Big Girl Knool as soon as he could get there, and was to go down the flood tide by a strong river steamer to make a first hand study of the flood, and will be accompanied, by two generals, a strong escort of soldiers and six chiefs of army engineers, and chairman of the Red Cross and five nuns and six priests. Army engineers elsewhere advised committee committee to day that there was danger of the flood waters reaching a stage of two feet higher than before but they believed as long as no Glandelinians don't start further troubles the remaining levees would hold. In addition to gun boats the navy dispatched two big merrimacs to Big Girl Knool. The Red cross reported the number of refugees entering Big Girl knool as eighty five thousand thousand and more were coming.

Scores of thousands of fresh numbers made homeless on the 30th of October by the Mid-Shirther Run flood waters, were carried to safty, while still other thousands awaited succor and continually fired on as others from ambush by the Glandelinian snipers. Even many were in the most precarious positions on exposed levees and o promontories and many were hit by enemy bul lets and wounded, especially those who were clinging to trees and to the roofs of floating houses and barns.

On account of the snipping mostly and not the flood the death list continued to mount passing sixty more, and there were unconfirmed reports that two hundred and fifty more had perished back use of because of the snipers. As the flood passed through the freshly opened crevasse at Boldons Landing above Greenbaum it poured on over fresh ground and new towns were being inundated, among them Meldon turn and the scores of millions in property damage already wrought from Calverinia to northern Angelinia was steadily and increasing at an alarming rate.

Glandelinians smashed another levee on the Aronburgs Run on the evening of October the 30th and caused the flood waters of the Aronburgs Run to roar through in a terrible torrent, and a whole town was devastated with the people barely escaping with their lives and twenty six thousand acres were flooded instantly. With large armies strengthening other dikes on the upper Aronburgs run and, guarding them augmented forces were set to work rescueing the fresh numbers of marooned and of moving them to more safer places those whose had been taken from the flooded towns.

All river steamers were ordered to assist in the relief principally to remove refugees. The evacuation of Greenbaum the largest of the cities flooded so far was almost completed by this time, and attention was then turned to gt Helena and other towns and as there were plenty of craft available rescue work was going on pretty good though a few of the rescuers were wounded by shots from hidden enemy marksmen.

The most pressing need was for small motar boats even big ones for rescue work in the back waters and urgent appeals for these ha had been sent from Greenbaum and many other flooded towns. Appalling conditions of the most kind most terrible kind existed at Greenbaum where in the highest streets the water was more than six feet deep. Sanitary conditions were deplorable due to the failure of the city water and sewerage systems and the presence of nearly twenty thousand remaining refugees in addition to the normal population of more than a hundred and twelve thousand before they were rescued.

The flood waters from the Aronburgs un breaking through t e the blasted levees had spread eastward for fifty miles joining and overflowing the Sunbeam Creek at that section. This caused a sudden increase in the depth of water at Little Girl Knool and dangerous levee conditions brought on by water pressure of the flood tearing over them and location of people who were in dire peril came in from many places.

On the Mic-Shirther above Big Girl Knool the danger point appeared to have passed Godfrey city but the crevasse in the bigger leev levee at Dora had widened by another blast to three thousand six hundred yards, and it was still crumbling before the force of water let through the break with army engineers reporting a depth of sixty to seventy feet. The steamer Vivian arived at Big Girl Knool bearing fifteen hundred refugees, from Albertinia Landing, where they had been marooned while working on the levees. The steamer Buster Brown was also due that day with additiona refugees from the same Landing where more than twelve thousand were still marooned on crumbling levee tops and under heavy fire from Glandelinian snipers. Approximately 22,000 more refugees were in Big Girl Knool on the 30th of October and that city already burdened with its own troubles and threatened more by the flood, with the big dock fire still spreading with unusual fierceness fierceness thugh all the city departments were fighting the blaze and trying to check it even by blasting.

Six river coast guard patrol boats ordered to the flood area from the Mic-Hollester Run River were wrecked by Glandelinian cannon fire from shore, and its occupants barely escaped with their lives.

They had to brave three miles of breast deep water while being shot at, and they stumbled out of the water in Big Girl Knool, and they stated that sixteen rescuers and ten of a crew were reported to have been drowned, when a rescueing schooner was also wrecked by Glandelinian gun fire and sank near El Verso in the heart of the flood..

At the town of Bayside Greenburg five thousand persons were also taken off from a leeve leves where they had been marooned for five days, but six of these refugees died before succor could arive. Six more were critically ill from fever, and all were facing starvation. One man who was pulling on one of his high boots was struck in the head by a bullet fired by a Glandelinian sniper and instantly killed.

Near Little Girl Knool a family of sixteen, father mother, uncle and fourteen children were drowned ten miles near the town, when their wagon was hit by a shot fired by some Glandelinian gunner, and the fragments and they were swept into a swollen bayou. Thousands of pe s persons about two miles off to the east from Greenbaum were marooned on house tops, trees and rafts, and long range Glandelinian gunners on the shore of the flood were firing shot and shell at them untill a squadron of Abbieannian cavarly cavarly dashed upon to them and routed the Glandelinians killing six hundred and capturing the artillery.

Also near Greenbaum elfn eight hundred persons mostly only little children taken from a flood wrecked orphan asylum in the country who clung for nearly an hour to bushes and floating trees after their rescue ship burned when set afire by Glandelinian shells were rescued under rifle fire by two government gunboa s, which returned the fire of the enemy with good effect, and then taking off the refugees brought them hastily to Big girl Knool. The steamer was struck by a fire bomb and was enbeloped in flames while conveying the children and some adult refugees to a small town on the Aronburgs Run side of the flood and which town was found to be all afire. Elsewhere twenty thousanus of others perched on trr and house tops were being rescued. Near this scene ten women and six children who sought refuge in a house from the enemy rifle fire at Blue Bell were drowned in the flood when a high explosive shell fired by some long range rebel gunner demolished the house house and threw them all into the water. This increased the known deaths in this area to 101 out of three hundred in the Calverinia section, and that the estimate total of drownings and killed by snipers was at least about over four hundred, and possibly many many more, and that the great majority were little children. A stronger military rule was being established on account of these horrid disasters and even artillery was placed into position at many points, while the military and other organizations cooperating in relief work prepared to maintain camps for sixty thousand more persons for the duration of the high waters, while two hundred thousand soldiers scoured the regions all about and elsewhere in the flood districts hunting out bands of Glandelinian snipers and fights were frequent and severe.

Six thousand other orphan children were also encamped on a levee and had been rescued while people are marooned in small hotels and other buildings in the flooded city of Greenbaum refusing to be taken elsewhere. Food for tye w o whole population enroute to the city and tents sent to house ten thousand people have been seized and taken away by the raiding Glandelinians. which had been expected to house the refugees. Urgent and repeated warnings by wirless, whistles and explosions and the like, to the ernormous numbers of people in the territories south of Greenbaum to flee were issued by ma many military heads. For the head waters of the spreading flood was not between twenty and twenty mil one miles south or west of flooded Greenbaum and cyst was said to only have to travel about twenty miles before joining the backwater of the main flood from the Aronburgs Run River north and south of Big and Little Girl Knools.

And with the flood waters four feet deep in Betsy Robbin, Ozmania and trot all southwest of Greenbaum and fifty miles west of Angelinia Agathia and constantly rising, nearly all of the population and the many refugees there sought refuge either on the leves of the Aronburg and Mic-Shirther railroad, or on house tops and in upper stories, while the very residents of the town of Moda Rosa were forced to the third floors of their homes or upon roofs.

The most desperate attempts at rescue ever on record for heroism to secured to secure these thousands upon thousands of marooned persons were made for three days and nights by steamers, Red Cross workers in motor and row boats and other craft, and nearly a score for every rescue trip made were shot and wounded or even killed by the distant Glandelinian sharpshooters who did not miss a single aim not even at night. And add to this peril they had to not only fight a strong current, amid a heavy task but had to beat off attacks from Glandelinians who came at them in big boats, but three thousand were even in spite of these difficulties rescued b from Trot Town, and 10,000 in Betsy Robbin where because of stoves being overset by the rush of water against the buildings a hundred severe fires started burning rows of houses on their upper stories, imperiling many hundreds in the flames. Another 10,000 refugees and seven inhabitants were taken under severe fire from Greenbaum and Polychrome on the 28th and to the 30th of October and even on November the 1th and 2th the rescue work continued with the aid of soldiers who came in gun boats and opened fire on the enemy snipers and their hiding places every trip with shot and shell and canister added with grape but with little effect.

Included in this number were five hundred children w from a water torn orphan asylum and this number was added by another thousand who were being brought to Angelinia Agathia from Lake Trot thirty miles southwest of Angelinia Agathia and these refugee ships stranre to say were under severe fire every minute of the three days trip to the city.

Rand town also had the same experien experience but also were rescued. Yet a scene of death and destruction and desolation was presented on new spots between November 1th and 4th over more than nine thousand square miles more of land including more than a million acres of the richest lands considered in the whole of Northern Angelinia as the waters of the still overflooded Mic-Shirther ruins increased by storms and melting snows continued their relentless flow over the land and tward the mouth into Mic-Hollester Run threatening to rise that river also to an unusual record breaking height, and hundreds of thousands of citizens from many towns along its banks started work and inspections on its dikes and levees, and armies of soldiers went to protect these dikes from being also bus blasted by Glandelinians which was feared would also occur. Hour by hour more thousands were made homeless, additional fall crops such as grain sheut cl n outs ng overything on the line of harvest was destroyed, and countless live stock, homes burns, and property, and sixty miles of a splendid popular and oak fo forest including twenty thousand two hundred magnificent Christmas trees, and every thing of possible description were swept away, and near the edge of the flood but too high to be reached by the sea of flood a terrific forest fire ofstanding for four hundred thousand acres was burning forward at ten to twehty miles an hour.

Far across country in Albertinia county, other scores of thousands were quickly quickly moving out to high lands before the waters of the Sunbeam Creek which continued to rush through one of the blasted levees with the prospect that an additional millions of acres of land would soon be inundated. Many even had to tak the risk of the forest fires or die in the flood and therefore were placed between two dangers, but in this location no Glandelinians were in the neighborhood to go and snip the refugees.

Another blasted levee of the Aronburgs Run river above Albertinia Bluff was reported by army engineers but they stated the explosive was fouled and therefore expectations were the dike could be hastily repaired before it would burst asunder entirely and cause an overflow that that would damage Turpo, and Lovechild Counties in Northern Angeline vine state, and several farming districts of Southern Calverinia near the neart the state line.

Southward of the city of Little Girl Knool and between Albertinia and Greenbaum many other persons were still being driven from their homes in Concordia county and every dike still surviving were crowded with them while every ferry boat, ship and motor and the likecentering Big Girl Knool, Angelinia Agathia, and Dorothy Gale on the Mic-Hollester River carried t hundreds of refugees and mostly children. With eight hundred thousand now entirely homeless the task of caring for the refugees, and rescueing so many under the enemy fire was becoming a stupendous one. The immediate work was thay of removing the refugees even from many temporary camps to safer ones on high lands because of direct attacks from Glandelinians or because of the rising flood, and for this work many big steamers and other river craft also loaded with soldiers and armed with artillery had been engaged and often t had to fight it out with rebels to bring the refugees to safty. Disease continues to spread wildly in the old concentration refugee camps and also was beginning to make its appearance in many of the new ones in some parts of the Aronburg and Mic-Whirther Run Regions. Below Big Girl Knool where the day before All Saints Day November the foist a Glandelinian mining engineer caused a small levee crevasse by a stick of explosive efforts by soldiers and hundreds of workers were being made frantically to prevent a serious break, even under fire but the water continued to seepthrough where the hole could not be stopped up in an effort to block it, was beginning to flood the marshlands near Dleo Deldon Town. As id indicative of the tremendous pressure on the dikes army engineers estimated that the water was rushing past Little Girl Knool itself and also Betsy Bobbin and Trot town at a rate of three million cubic feet a second while at a point just below where the Aronburg Run empties into the Mi Mic-Whirther Run the estimate rate was three million five hundred thousand cubic feet a second. a terrific speed, and houses by thousands from a score of towns were being swept entirely away and even the strongest steel bridges were going before the fearful pressure and strong railway trestles also. Flood waters from the Aronburgs Run river also were moving into Northern Condencia state on Angelinia country at what army engineers estimated to be a rate of sixteen miles a day. This flow was expected not only to continue untill the flood was absorbed by the Mic-Hollester Run and carried off but to increase to about twenty miles an hour.

ONE hundred and eighty thousand nay even more people still marooned were without water or food were in the Aronburgs Run delta district by the Mic-Whirther Run River floof flood, and therefore appeals by many others were issued to the country for more boats to take them off before the flood would engulf them entirely. The Red Cross Chairman said;

" Hundreds of small boats, motor and others from the good o people of the country must be furnished almost immediately in this terrible area if human lives are to be saved. More than one hundred and fifty thousand people mostly women and children from Greenbaum, Little Girl Knool, Betsy Bobbin and other places are now concentrated near the mouth of Aronburs Run and are facing starvation and drowning. "Despite the efforts of the wicked Glandelinians to prevent the relief activies for alleiviating the suffering of the flood victims, Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and many other big cities continue continued day after day in their efforts to assist the stricken, and sent soldiers out to prevent further blasting of levees.

The outstanding contribution consisted of millions of dollars even from firms and in a letter the Emperor himself said to his brother still near Jennie Turner city hammering at Yanboy;

" Dear brother, with the flooded Mic-Whirther Run River pouring through its blusted levees and driving hundreds of thousands of people from their homes, and became of forest fires raging to add to the horror, we already known without being told that the Abbieannian Red Cross, and all Catholic relief Societies are more than tu busy with relief mea u measures, and protecting soldier escorts are having daily conflicts with Glandelinian snipers at points for many districts around. Many of the refugees are our own personal friends, and some of the best friends of my daughters and yours and mine and business and royal associates have perished, and all of the refugees are deser ving the aid which is not yet reachig reaching them. We are handling the Red Cross the attatched check for $11,000,000 with confidence that in no other way can we be of greater service and I am sending General Francis Honderto with sixty million soldiers to spread out all around and between the flood districts with the purpose to cut off all escape of those dastardy vandal snipers of the enemy with orders to give no quarter under any conditions, and I am forwarding a messenger by courier to the main Glandelinian generals to withdraw other armies from the flood regions and those confounded blasting engineers or they too and their armies will recieve no quarter and their property towns and inhabatants either. The way the Glandelinians strike at us, we will strike doubly hard."

Emperor Robert Vivian."

A check for a million dollars was forward to Big Girl Knool and Angelinia Agathia by the Pandora Chapter of the Red Cross and Catholic Societies every aday since the flood began to add to the fund for the relief of the unfortunate sufferers. The money was turned over by the Pandora Community Chest with the promish that much w more will be sent if needed. Angelinia Agathians demonstrated their spirit of helpl helpfullness in answering the appeal of all Catholic Homes and societes and Religious places for garments and provisions to be shipped to the large flood areas for the de destitute hundreds of thousands arriving both on foot, and in wagons at the warehouses of the army throughout the city, and especially at St Peters and Caldwell Avenues. Every ytype of Every kind of vehicle could be seen in unbroken unbroken streams that always stopped at the doors, bundles of clothing both large and small being delivered. At one street one of these warhouses mysteriously took fire, but was quickly overcome before damage to any great extent occured. The fire fortunately however was not incendiary but caused by so some defective wiring in the building.

Despite his disasters at the seige of Jennie Turner and "ew "rcs f drewsabella Turner general Hanson Vivian was not dosen discouraged at all and within another Month the armies under general Robert Vivian his brother had come up to join him to the point where he had retreated and thus having two big armies and also recieving more troops continually untill he had an immense army, a more immense army than ever before during the war, general Hanson decided to make a rush for Vivian Vickey and follow out his plans which he had met failure in his crushing repulse at Calverine. Of scures to go by the rout of Calverine as he had intended was an impossibility as the enemy armies there barred his way and he felt sure that no army no matter what size could capture Calverine yet. General Hanson did not intend to capture the city of Jennie Vivian Vickey but to force his way past Evangelinia Crania, and Liesburg Landing and break a portion of the foe line at Lucillie Nickson and having done so he would leave his victorious army with Hanson as reinforcements and select a new army and march for Cedernine Run and crash with the enemy there, and from that point strive to capture Forum Catherine.

It was also hard to say that during his whole service in the whole war up to now that poor general Hanson Vivian or even his brother had any good luck whatever. They had met many defeats, even the bloody one at Calverine, while other christian armies under insignificant commanders were gaining ahead of him with their christian hordes and whipping the enemy at every hand. The Glandelinians facing these christian armies had met scores upon scores of most disasterous defeats ever imagined and Hanson could not understand why he did not succeed in pushing his way through Calverine and have an opening to march his mighty armies upon Mc-Whirther Junct as he had planned.

Thus these serious defeats, caused by more serious blunders of other commanders had aroused general Hanson and he decided to rush on and seize Evangelinia Crania. It was alrea already the fourth day of October fourteenth day of October I mean and general Hanson started in his campaign toard Vivian Vickey. His intentions was to march his armies to first lay seige to the city of Aronburg close to Vivian Vickey and which was her support as well as Calverine, while the other big christian army under his brother already advancing south northwestward from Luchern was to strike a hard blow against the besieged Glandelinians near the St Jamieson fortifications and making an opening for general Hansion, to fill in with large troops and try and forge ahead toard Catherin on the northeast of Julie Gallic two miles from Evangelinia crania.

While general Vivian was marching his troops apparently unopposed, general Hanson Vivian himself began to be worried for he found serious opposition as soon as he began to reach the region of the Battery Line River and the Gunbeam Creek locations and was forced to halt his advance twenty miles northeast of Jennie Vivian to find out whose army had suddenly sprung in his way and was opposing him. The third and fourth christian army after a weeks steady forced marching was approaching toward Madge Grunn near Julio Gallic and was reported to be forced to halt on account of the appearance of large Glandelinian armies of Hobbobinites under some unknown general, and an army that never came from Julio Gallio, or any other section of Vivian Vickey but which had been moving northward also with the purpose of striking general Hansion a blow if it could. General Hanson was suspicious over all this and feeling suspicious that something peculiar was indeed coming b prepared for battle. But the Glandelinian armies did not battle him or the other christian armies, but moved northward and the christian armies had to then change its rout in order to reach Vivian Vickey first. General Hanson recieved many conflicting reports during the advance on complications of disasters going on at Julio Gallic but notwithstanding all the serious condition of hard hit armies general Hanson finally ma smashed ihhis way stil forward, threatening to crush any Glandelinian army that would dare to oppose him. This was only the first. While other christian armies were also moving up around everywhere in the location of Vivian Vickey general Hanson Vivian was forced to halt his advance on account of another great Glandelinian army that got in his way but not wishing to suffer unnecessary losses in an engagement too soon he wisely kept inactive for a certain period untill his brothers army came up and then at the double-arrey of two mighty christian hosts the enemy forces disappeared without fighting. Simultaneously general Hanson recieved word through telegraph from general Hansion that the big Glandelinian armies under general Manley had gotten up through the Verum River, and that Manley had placed all the armies he could spare to fortify the Evangelinia Crania ridges and other points, and was ta, taking personal command untill general Hanson was beaten off in his purpose. This news saddened general Hanson but nevertheless he was not daunted and kept right on but he felt sure the purpose would not succeed and he would have gone back had not his advisers requested him to push on.

However later on while the advance toard Vivian Vickey was continueing with greater speed it was general Hanson who was surprised by the approach of another foe army, or at last by the appearance of one but he nevertheless with the help of his brother managed to hold these mighty Clandelinian armies in their places without actual do conflicts, while another christian army under general Vivianmann was proceeding on in his advance to join Robert Vivian at all points. If it had not been for general Vivianmann general Robert Vivian and his brother would not have been able to press on in his advance and come upon Vivian Vickey as proposed for it was one of the Manleys whose army opposed and confronted him at this point. Vivianmann army did not stand like Hanson and the others. He struck the enemy a terrific blow in the flank drove the Clandelinian center back upon Hansons lines which were then forced to fight at the onrush of the enemy, and within a whole day the whole Clandelinian Clandelinian army was gapped and torn, and general Welborn Manleys left wing was the only one which was still holding its ground the rest being in hopeless confusion.

While seeing to it that the main forces were being prepared for an advance general Hanson and his brother threw their main forces forward to a tremendous attack, and after making sixteen terrific charges drove the remainder of the foe line from the region winning the battle of Virginia and opening the way for the advance to be can d o continued The closses of both sides was too ha heavy to be related and Hanson had to leave a large army behind to attem attend to the great seas of wounded.

During the frightful scenes of this battle in the northeastern region of Vivian Vickey and only fourty miles away at that, in which a number of fortified towns in the foe possession were captured by the christian armies under general Francis Evans, Walter Starring, Vivian, Winchester, Bicknell, and two great wars marshalls and hero Vivianmann little was mentioned of the operations of the other parts of the christian armies not engaged in battle and along the shores of the Gunbeam Creek to which they had now arrived

As unchecked advance of general Hansons mighty armies of christians was causing among the enemy at Vivian Vickey the greatest ex excitement, and they were preparing for the first of the greatest upheaval that world ever experienced. Hanson and his Angelinian generals were fin figuring on the complete overthrow of the main Clandelinian armies along the main battery line and reserve which would open a way to push in the armies mansion needed and force the tightening of the seige untill plans to move on Goldenrain Run could be thought of and followed out. His advance how ever was soon to start the horrible war storm of the Angelinian soldiery who were to attempt to sweep away all opposition in the extreme east and southwestern sections of Mc Whirther Je junct. go fierce had opposition come to Hansons army during the remainder of October in battles that raged every day that later on Hansons advance was called thee "Crushing Steam R oller Drive"
This section of the bloody christian advance tward Vivian Vickey was a vertible region of terror for all persons as well as the Clandelinians themselves. These christian armies a with the clever handling of their generals were like perfect avalanches of human beings the christians seeming to bathe the country in the blood of Clandelinian soldiery sparing not even the highest of Clandelinian generals.
During the advance general Hanson himself had taken possession of a line of fortified towns recently abandoned by retreating Clandelinian armies which moved toward Vivian Vickey, and these stood along the Gunbeam Creek River banks. When Hansons the first actual battle raging on the gunbeam Creek banks when Gunbeam Manley resumed his hostilities with the purpose of holding back general Hansons advance as much as possible but the wounding of general Gunbeam Manley and the terrible loss of his troops sent a thrill of horror and excitement throughout his severely handled armies and when ten divisions were hurled upon the Clandelinian armies Hanson firfound himself met meeting too strong oppos ition to benefit any hopes thatever of crushing the Clandelinian armies under Manley just now. But nevertheless like he did elsewhere after Pantania, Hanson and general Robert Vivian on the next day proved themselves to be two great terrors once again, by forcing a crossing of the gunbeam creek at many fords with their armies, striking vigariously here and there as repeatedly as to disconcert the enemy and soon brought that part of the gunbeam Creek under his control and was able to send new armies not engaged yet westward to crush their way on tward Jennie Vivian and Clarinia.
Then this western region of battle with its horrors, great destruction of po prosperity property a was such a blind and indiscriminate slaughter of foe soldiers that the Clandelinians became like maddened dogs in their defense and frantic with fear and knew that the armies of Angelinians would totally pour across all points of gunbeam creek and ward h direct to Mansions help raved like thrilliens of hell in their fierce resistance and the fury of the gigantic two weeks battle was exceedingly terrific.
The Angelinian armies sent forward by Hanson made such attempts to crush the foe, that when the Angelinian forces fell upon the Clandelinian front they encountered scores of Clandelinian divisions which gave them such a reception and swept them back so far and with such dreadful losses that at first Hanson was dismayed. He had no idea that Clandelinians would dare fight like this before, indeed fighting all through the day against great d odds with extreme bravery, counter charging against the overwhelming christian tide.

But just now general Hansons plan plans were working perfectly at all points, their armies were already moving elsewhere upon the enemys extensive battle-front as remorselessly as mowing machines. General Spencer, Evansville, Lucillia Jordenna, Lotte, gravewhite, Sedannia, and general Francis Hanna Turnerania hurled their armies upon general Gunbeam Manleys left grand center and carried a long line of batteries and redoubts, and swept back the Clandelinian armies with terrible disaste r. The main Clandelinian general at this location was taken with two di divisions, the victorious christian armies pressed on to Turners lines, and though his mighty Clandelinian armies resisted as tenaciously as angels themselves all resistance was in vain, and this section of the Clandelinian armies finally fled panic stricken.
The struggle in the western section of the line was an imitation war of the worlds.
At this point the resistance and offensive of the foe armies was redoubled, and for the length of ten miles in this location the banks of gunbeam Creek and other points was dominated by a volcano of flame and div from explosions, firing of guns and machetry and the terrific yelling of the contatants. But the resistance of the Clandelinians here was in vain. The Clandelinians were cut down like the leaves of a forest in a terdn tornado, the survivors were routed pell mell and were stripped of ermarous enormous amounts of provisions, territory, and their possessions was cut off from the east, shut out of the Confederation of the other sections of the line, and with the still bitter defeat at the South Bend of the gunbeam creek struggled in vain to regain the lost territory. This struggle on the ba k banks of the Gunbeam Creek, was later called the battle of the worlds.
Four million four hundred thousand Clandelinians were captured here.

During the third day millions upon millions of Clandelinians had made a fierce onslaught upon the christian lines and barely on hundreds of thousands escaped in the gigantic overthrow which followed. At another point the enemy had graciously succeeded in smashing down the christian attack near Jennie Vivian, but the offensive of the enemy which followed had resulted very s disasteriously for the enemy which made them unable to prevent the Angelinian armies from crossing a all points of Gunbeam Creek. It is true that during the onslaughts of the christians the Clandelinians after their crushing disasters at South Bend and other well defended points did finally crush back the christian assailants on a twenty mile front of inferno but to keep the glowering christian forces in their proper places was out of the question. The enemy did attempt to drive their very way through the christi n christian line but got only as far as Jennietonia Run a small branch of Gunbeam Creek in which the Clandelinian assault was disasteriously wrecked. This resulted in a flow of dejected Clandelinian armie s tward their own positions. A desperate stand of the foe to check the christians was then made first near the northern bend of Gunbeam Creek, in the wooded section. This part of the conflict r raging all day and night favored an slight enemy successes but only saved their n sadly del deplated armies from utter ruin and did not check the christian tide any better than a low beach checks a i tidal wave from the sea and the losses of the foe already in this severe engagement w s was intolerable and very little success was obt i obtained near the christian right where many foe columns went down into bloody wreck. In this severe engagement called the battle of Raccolta there were a large number of Americans among the Angelinians who proved to the enemy a dreadful christian foe and led by generals who fought like angels against demons, and though many of these americans were wounded twice or three times to the surprise of the Angelinians they only went back into the fight and helping the Angelinians keep the enemy at bay and made it impossible for the enemy to set a fol foothold on the christian redoubts where scores of the divisions of the mighty Clandelinian army met destruction. If the foe had won completely here at this section the christian advance on Vivian Vickey would have been dissilusioned. the foe had won some slight advantages of the battle but had met disa disaster upon disaster in the other parts, and suffered losses so heavy that they could not be corr correctly estimated.
The region for a score of miles had been scathed by the most terrific shell fire of both sides, extensive woods had been shattered of all their branches, or ripped and torn apart, and the woods had been like a vast morgue. Here at Lacollia the great war reached its hig second high tide, it being a regular verdon of Hell to the Clandelinians. This centre of the struggle so close to Vivian Vickey the outside world was watching with eager expectation and apprehension. Should the enemy win, then Hansons plans would fail utterly, and he would have no chance to move on Vivian Vickey. But the enemy did not. win and even the slight successes themselves had been so costly that the enemy under generals thought it sucide to make any further serious attempts on this gigantic christian redoubt fortress, a quickly formed Gibraltar of Heaven on the gunbeam Creek banks. The losses of the enemy had become so indescriminate that general Manley at other sections of the army finally ordered general Corbinnia to abandon his attempts against the christian armies, and get away before general Hansons attacking armies would overlapp, trap him and cut off his retreat entirely.

Jennie Vivian was about sixteen miles west of Glorinia goe Run, a stream running into the Gunboom Creek, and also later on the scene of one of wars another worse battle that raged on All Saints Day.-Indeed if this mighty battle had ever turned out as a victory for the enemy, the Glandelinian armies could have crushed general Hansons army and struck him such a staggering blow, that he could have never advanced on Vivian Vickey at all but indeed the crushing blow came to the enemy instead, which not only broke the full opposition of Buchanan Manley but caused the foe armies to flee northward, not as an agressor, but as a fugitive beast on all sides by persueing christian armies untill compelled to fight fiercely to break their way through and check the christian slightly at Labcure long enough to manage to draw away and save the army from total destruction. The enemy did not win this tremendous battle of Labcure-but nevertheless had managed to hold the christians in check untill the escape of the Glandelinian army was fully insured.
After these series of great victorious Hanson Vivian had to halt for a while as he had to reform his armies and found out how much they had be en reduced. During the halt he placed him self in main command assuming the office of supreteMant general and soon on November 7th worked himself or his armies so valently that he seemed to make himself sic great Napoleons in one again, making a chererr of himself so terrific now that he became a person much dreaded by the foe armies at Vivian Vickey who heard of his advance and that all Hell could not stop him.
Even his brother General Robert Vivian who we all know is the gallant father of the Darlings of the nation called the Vivian Girls, of Violet and her sisters was also again very equal to general Hanson Vivian himself in his own career, and as the foe had two most dangerous enmies to Knox which could not be daunted whatv whatever Vivian Vickey seemed to be in greater peril than ever.
It was these two great christian generals who checked another great Glandelinian army far west of Gunboom Creek ten miles nearer to Vivian Vickey o and Jennie Vivian and threw them against general Vivianana who crushed the first Nightist Glandelinian armies which were sr striving to stop Hansons advance on Vivian Vickey.
At Lucillia Gordon on Gunboom Creek location Hansons army capturSd a Glandelinian division, forced one from Badge Evans crushed another foe division beyond recovering, and took some positions from overwhelming numbers, saved general Bickmells army from disaster when closer in his advance , held the attacking foe back and made a deadly barrier for the vast-foe armies, almost annihilated another foe army and put out of commission a great Glandelinian army not far from Badge Evans, and also captured many foe battleflags and standards.
Finally all opposition being sup swept asq y general Hanson found his armies close enough and he started operations early in December to strike the blow at Liegburg Landing.

Prepar

PREPARATIONS TO STRIKE THE BLOWS AT LIEGEBURG LANDLING.

Liegburg landing was a place or stretch of bridges across the Germa Run not far south of the Great Germa Bridge were other great conflicts had went on previously in the past month of July and August. During the preparation of Hansons army to force hi their way across the river at this point the first greatest disaster of the whole seige was not striking the besieging christian armies, but the unfortunate inhibatants of Vivian Vickey and her other sections whom the enemy dared not continue the massacre on account of the ferocity of the christian investers. The inhibatants were suffered from la lack of food and provisions and clothing. General Hanson knew the enemy recieving provisions from the tunnel of Calverinia to Vivian Vickey had plenty of provisions and he had tried some how to secretly convey provisions to the inhibatants by having Hansion secretly make galleries under to Vivian Vickey by under the river but Hansions army was not able to provide most of the provisions to these unfortunates compelled to suffer the consequences of the seige, and while up to now the christian losses in provisions money, and so on was over scores of millions of dollars none of this had been gotten to the unfortunate i inhibatants and what was the cause of it all? Six submarines and gun boats in the river and bay. These hellish ships upon the waters of the Bay and two Calverinian rivers and even shore batteries, and some batteries from the fortresses had sunk thousands of provision ships laden with all kinds of provisions, which not knowning the manes of the river at this section ran bodily into these river nets of submarines and other dangerous craft which were in possession of the whole stretch of the rivers as far as ships go could go.
Scarcity of food and provisions was indeed indeed the lott of the inhibatants to suffer. Of course the Glandelinians did not literally sta starve them but gave them very little to eat.

1,456, CHILDREN DIE BY BIG EXPLOSION IN COUNTRY TOWN

ORPHAN ASYLUM SET BY GLANDELINIAN DYNAMITERS WITH PURPOSE TO START NEW FLOODS NEAR MIC MIC-WHIRTHER RUN. GLANDELINIANS PUT EXPLOSIVES IN LEVEE ABOUT TWO MILES FROM SCHOOL BUT SHOCK OF EXPLOSION RAZES BUILDING AND WHOLE TOWN. FUSES CRUDELY MADE. CHILDREN IN SCHOOL HOUSES DIE. ONE IMMENSE MORGUE IN SCHOOLHOUSE.

AT the town of Wickey Lansin one of the probable most tragic and terrific disasters of the war occured during the while while far off north Emperor Vivian and Hanson were preparing the seige of Lieghburg Landing near Vivian Wickey, n and just at the time when that place was also menanced by the dangerous flood. A body of Glandelinians believed by their banner and uniform to belong to some regiment of general federals Scoodler and Mic- ollestinian urmerannian Army had touched off the charge of two thousand tons of explosives either dynamite or T.N.T at a ten mile levee, and that twenty of these glandelinians themselves not getting away in time were killed and the others injured more l or less fatally, while the remainder were captured and shot like dogs. The levee about ten miles from the town or at least a good section of it, fairly went up in the air like some big volcanic blast, and the crash heard for fourty miles like rolling thunder shook the air fearfully with a million earsplitting rever brating echoes that continued for ten seconds and shook half of the town of Wickey Lansin and twenty others near and around entirely to the ground and badly wrecked others. A number of orphan asylumns and sixteen school houses were entirely raized but the Angel Guardian Orphan asylum considered fire and tornado proof went down like a house of cards burying the sixteen hundred children in it under the tons of wreckage killing out right more than a thousand little girls and boys and injuring all the rest, hundreds fatally, including a terrible death rate among priests sisters and other attend ants and employees. The terrible blast occured early in the afternoon November the 10th and immediately an investigation was started by Home guards, and survivors of the wrecked to n o towns now being flooded and burning simultaneously into the cause of the two big explosions which wrecked so many towns and Wickey Lansin included with a full estimate loss entirely of nearly fiffty fifty thousand inhabatants in killed and injured , and it was first thought the blast had happened at the orphan asylum and that enemies had wired the cellar of the building, and placed in more than five hundred tons of explosives. But the investigation soon revealed the real spot because of the sudden flood.

It was that the Glandelinians had touched off a thousand tons of dynamite at levee No. Eight and apparently the glandelinians about a thousand of them disguised as Nationals had worked for a long time se cecretly stacking or placing the explosives under the levee and wiring the charges. Shortly after the town was astir and the school hours throughout the city for dhildren in schools began some persons had declared that some bunch of men were seen acting suspiciously at the dam. They also stated they saw a large numbers of wires strung to some thing like an elstric battery about fifteen to twenty thousand feet from the levee. The fuses of the wires seemed to have been crudely made from old bombshells several of which were found near a shattered dynamite shack which also blew up from the concussion.

These witnesses declared that a party of Abbiemnian cavar lt cavarly raced up tward the dike to attack the suspicious characters, when some one near a battery was seen to suddenly stoop down, and then all was noise and volcano of flame and din and a mighty roaring eruption seemed to rise high in the air, and floods of water debris, and smoke shotvin rolling formations high into the sky. The concussion of the explosions was like a tremendous earthquake, and the witnesses said they simultaneously saw the city disolve into apparent clouds and become obscured, and then all was tumoil as if an earthquake and volcano were devasting the region at the same time.

At the Angel Guardian orphan asylum the lower flowers suffered the greatest loss in lives of little ones when the lower walls displaced from their foundations by the shock crumbled with a crash letting the ceiling and roof of the upper floors crash down on the lower floors and then the wreckage caught fire, and simulaneously the flood came rolling into the city drowning a score who were in it its path.

On novemper the eleventh as the bodies were being removed from the wreckage of not only the home and schools but other ruined building as well they were placed in morguesset up at points at of reach of flood, while boats and other craft carried the many thousands of injured the number of which had not been yet estimated as flood conditions hampered work to hospitals in Belview twenty miles away.

people even in the streets were killed by hundreds and fourty were killed while passing the big orphanage orphanage, and others died in hospitals from injures injuries recieved when caught in the avalanch of wreckage.

The chief matron of the Orphan asylum an employe described how she escaped from the wreckage. The children in the building were playing in the big playrooms when the explosion and earthquake occured.

"Without the slightest warning this terrific explosion came and the earthquake follow ing it" she said. " I thought when I saw the bodies of hundreds of children hurled against the walls and through the windows that the blast was in the home. Then I don't remember much whatvhappened except that the whole world to b me seemed to disappeur in a terrible ruin. go far as it was the noise of the very explosion stunned me, and I could not do much untill help came."

One of the lone surviving children described the sound of the far distant explosion as" The worse crash of thunder" following by the sudden falling in of the walls and ceiling." A few of us children managed to cf crawl out, and see the whole town in ruins" she said" but I guess most of my comrades are still in there and the wreckage is afire."

A eighteen year old orphan boy also described between sobs how by the concussio concussion he was hurled through a rear window in the schoolroom of the Home where he was sitting. The luds two younger sisters and one brother were buried beneath the ruins that was by this time one big blaze of fire. The extensive ammount of the dynamite and other explosives, the state police and other aurthorities said made such an awful explosion that ten miles of the trees of the Mic-"ollester woods were shaken from their roots and two farm houses according descriptions from witnesses fairly danced the "House tago or " Jigg".

The dupty sheriff of the small town of lassbottom was quoted as saying, the landelinians recently appeared at the blasted dike a e week before and he supposed they were ational enginners inspecting it.. People from surviving towns around came to aid in the rescue work. Mrs Andrew Antonio wife of Mayor George Antonio of wickey Lansin and her three children and sister, were also victims of the fury of the shock it was found. Her body and that of her children were found in the ruins of her residence, her skull being crushed, leading to the belief that a big timber struck her down. The ruins was surrounded by three feet of water and floating wreckage. Nearly all of the children of orphan asylums were killed and one half of the children of the city itself were da dead, as many more are maimed for life and the hand of this tragedy had absolutely reached every one of the many homes in every other town and villiage affected so severely by the flood and shock of the blast as a result of the carefully devised plot of a band of vandul landelinians who knowing a portion a of mperor Vivians army was coming that way to reinforce him at ie Lieghburg Landing had blown the bvee to make a flood here that would either maroon the army or check its advance.

The surviving landelinians of the explosion captured were shot without trial. In Wickey Lansin itself about three thousand children were killed; including the 2,600 out of schools and orphan asylums and the leader of the landelinians who was the perpetrator of the tremendous tragedy was Colonel Hendro geator a fourty six year Omarian soldier who once from the papers found on him had been a resident of wickey Lansin and a man of brilliance in the city, but whose purpose had been to side with the Glandelinian cause with the purpose of revenge against the Christian nation because God would not answer a prayer which he had offered for some worldy good. He had once been a member of St Aldons Church, and a member of the best of atholic Socialities bit for that foolish reason because God seemed not to hear the prayer he had forsaken his religion, turned traitor against his own country and joined hanleys army.

He alone escaped though he was persued for miles and shot twenty of his persuers to death, captured one and forced him at the point of the pistol to lead him to a safe place for hiding and then disarming him, stripping him of his uniform and outside clothing, contempetiously released him.

ofOf the one thousand four hundred fifty six killed of the children in the Angel Guardian orphanage alone, about fourty two of them were rescued child slaves of six different ationalities,, and fourty three of the others were also rescued slaves of whom according to this storie this story their ationalities which I'll dare to state, were Italians, panish, Americans, germans, Domdobians, and rench besides a few Canadians and of the ussians and also Dutch and wedes,. Of the thousand and some hundred other odd families in the city of wickey Lansin alone, there was not ne one hardly who did not lose nearly every child or a father or mother or other relative, by the fiendish handiwork of thie glandelinian horde, who set the death dealing blast while making it the purpose to stop general kindernines and harles browns includ ing Roswell Buster Johnston and jack Evans commands from marching that way to rejoin the National armies at Lieghburg Landing.

The usual morning hurry and scurry of getting the children throughout the city for school was conspicious by itsabsence. Hundreds of parents, nay thousands, whose daily ritual it was to hustle the innocent youngsters from bed, and have them clean themselves and get ready for breakfast and then for school were now engaged in the sad duty of making funeral preparations for their loved ones, that is parents who had survived the horror for many parents also met death, whole familes families being wiped out. It was hard however to make up any funeral plans when more than a quarter of the population of the city had been wiped out and now with floods raging amid the ruins and sweeping fires also. Fresh numbers of red cross workers arived from pandora, and another places to form out a campaign of relief for injured and homeless and familes hardest hit by the world record breaking disaster of the flood while other state agen agencies continued an investigation into the possibility that that trator had traitor had more assistance in the consumption of his fiendish plot, and thatbother other ig levees must be watched and guarded.. olonel endro geator who concieved the work of such destruction before joining the enemy against his own country was a graduate of the Angelinia Agathia city University for military boys, and had been a leader in community affairs since coming to wickey Lansin to live two years before the war clouds hovered over the nation. He was also looked upon as a sort of sage in the city because of his his superior methods of having schools and childrens homes constructed and other extraordinary intelligence.Recently when he did not recieve an answer to some prayer his character and demeanor suddenly changed according to residents and priests who knew him, and he showed signs of persecuting the very religion he threw to the winds,. The failure to have the petition granted to him by God made him morose and he became wicked. Officials of the school and children homes boards of which he had been a member himself were called upon to try and bring the man back to his reason. But he engaged in fience controversy with the members on every occasion, members that once had been his best and most true friends, and then suddenly he deserted them entirely. In the interlude it was believed by the officials he went to the glandelinian army and then some time must have arived upon the scene scheme of dr destroying the long dike, to stop the christian advance.

On October the 30th it was known from investigators who had secured it he had mailed a long package to general John Manley, and the package contained some mysterious documents which no one could read or make out. It was some sort of a long cipher dispatch, and though it was sent to Hanson vivian with the purpose to have the Vivian girls try and make it out, the package was later reported not recieved at Hansons command because it might have been retaken by some landelinian scouting party.

According to information believed from the investigators colonel Scrator was believed to have ordered his command of dynamiting engineers to disguise themselves as nationals and go to the big dike on pretense of examanation, but secretly had them mine the underpart with not only dynamite but also gun cotton and high explosives and T.N.T several days or so before the big eruption. Elctrical contrivances were painstakingly arranged to set off the blast almost simultaneously. The landelinians about a thousand or more of them were seen running from the scene shortly after 10. A.M and twenty minures or so later the blast followed. The landelinians then were twenty thousand feet from the explosions but it was said they were killed and injured even at that distanc distance not by only the blast but also by the rain of debris that even fell that distance, and even a mile further off.

The eruption was tremendous and the din most terrific, and the shock of the explosion lifted the floors of many immense buildings, schools and homes and residents simultaneously and burst the walls of many of the buildings, hurling the occupants through windows and crushing walls, telephone poles inside and outside the cities jured jumped wildly up and down, street cars were hurled in jumping fits from the tracks, and the concussion even forced up the side walks and shattered the aspault and brick sections of the streets. The Angel Guardian, and ten other big orphan homes; and all school houses were completely demolished, burying the children, and their superior officials and teuce teachers under tons of debris; andworse of all fire broke out in the wreckage, and the city was shrouded in clouds of dust so so thick that it hung like a shroud for nearly an hour so you could not see a hundred feet away. hen the blast occured according to the cavarly who escaped the disaster, the glandelinian colu colonel was sitting on his horse cho cuh chuckling with wicked glee, but who even expected the force of the explosion would destroy even lives twenty thousand feet away merely by the blast as many of the soldiers were found with heads, arms and legs blown off.

Not content with the destruction he had so suddenly wrought the wicked glandelinian officer caused the deaths of many of his persuers among the cavarly and also the chief leader by firing at them with a gun constructed so it hurled explosive balls like grape. The explosion of one of these balls tore the leading officers body to pieces, and instantly killed his captian and two soldiers beside vhim, and tore the legs and an arm from lieutenant ore and Killed colonel acpareen who had also joined in the persuit, and then securing a soldier he forced him to direct him to safty by pointing the same gun into his back.

Sometime before the explosion the colonel and his band had set fire to a woods and a large field filled with harvested wheat and a long row of outhouses and the farmers building which were burned to the ground, and even even destroyed all the fields on the place and blew up a cow shed killing the cattle within. On the fence of the place was found a sign which read; " We do what we desire to crush the Christian Dog armies." On the second day after the disaster other investigations were begun by state police, so soldiers and the state fire marshall and others to determine if Colonel Scrator had other commands under him and if so other levees must be strictly guarded. Admitting such a posnibility to be slight, the officials however held it would be difficult for only a tyousand or so men to do th the wiring and plant such a powerful explosive in t o two or three days. Also investigation revealed that in six other towns wiped out by the concussion of the blast the entire population had been annihilated. ore than five thousand tons of explosives they said had been blasted, and the explosion explosion of this huge charge was with the force of a volcanic eruption.

One of the levee engineers stated that if the Glandelinian colonel was only assisted by that few numbers of men they and he must have secretly worked for weeks to install the powerful explosive and the secret elaborate wiring system. Because of the expert way the wires were soldered and buried under ground it was thought that possibly more than fifteen thousand landelinians took part in the work? The christian armies underv

Jack Evans, harles Brown, indernine and others were advancing by the Lawrence and Pandora railroad tre tracks, to take them a shorter route by way of the Sunbeam River, and some witnesses who were watching the landeliniane in disguise and who had not suspected them as disguised enemies at the time said that the colonel declared;

"If it had not been for God refusing to grantmy prayer that day I would not be at work doing this now."

Another witness to the concentration of these rebels about the levee said that when he not knowing the real situation mentioned something about the christian forces coming that way to reinforce Emperor Hanson and other at Liefhborg Lighborg Landing the colonel declared;

"Well I'll bet they won't ever have the chance to take this route."

All the little victims of the schools, pr orphan asylumns and residents were pupils and orphans and rescued child slaves and adopted ones ranging in age from six to ten, and of the schools, from the first to the eight grade.

The Superior Sister of the St Gertrudes orphan asylum which was partially razed but with the ds destruction of nearly four hundred little lives described the explosion as like like a sudden and most terrible earthquake, At s her own section of the building which did not go down most of her little charges escaped unhurt. Theythad ju.t just started marching around the lower and upper rooms to go outside to reach the homes bchool only half a block away when the distant explosion rocked the building, and the Sister said that suddenly the whole city was shrouded in dust while a report like many cannons sounded all over up and down every street and far away.

"At the same time" she said" it seemed as though the floor went up several feet, and thought was blind. When the shock came the air seemed so full of little innocent children and flying fragments of the building, books and playthings and materials of everydescription and the scene then was hidden in a dense white cloud. Scores of children seemed tossed high into the air by the concussion, many being literally catapulted out of the building, while the nearest telephone poles danced up and down something like the Irish jigg.

Though horror occured throughout the whole city as the biggest buildings went down by thousands yet the most terrible of the scene occured at schools and homes. Here the scen scene was one of unspeakable horror panic and confusion with the flood waters also suddenly rushing into the stress streets and fires breaking at among the ruins. hildren in every building whether school house, orphan asylum or homes of families had been had been hurled through windows or roofs by the confussion and over crumbling walls to light in the yards, dead. The bodies badly mangled were laid out in very long rows, on spots not reached by water, and yet flood and fire hampered rescue work to a alarming degree. Surviving mothers flushed from bending over kitchen stoves, and escaped from death in the wreckage of their own homes by a miracle braved flood and swimming debris in their desperate attempts to get to the scene, when they heard the crush of falling buildings as loud as series of great dynamite blasts themselves. Those who had children in the various wrecked schools ran frantically up and down the lines of childish feet. A scream and ne would seize a limp form and hug it to her breast. Some of them half crazed by the tragedy clasped their dead children in their arms and struggled toard their ruined homes only to step into some deep spot in the eater among wreckage and drown.

Scattered around the yards now being t threatened also by the waters were thousands of injured children, and mothers whose love overcame their judgement tried to carry many to their homes and perished in the rising waters with them.

Every available position from bigger towns were now at the scene of horror and medical attention was given, while surviving residents went desperately to work to rescue others before flames reached reached them. Ambulance boats were appearing and loaded in the rescued injured to take them to hospitals in safer places of the same city, and women and fathers who had not found their children, braved flood and wreckage in their desperate attempts to rescue them. It was a horri horror combining now of fire and flood that makes Johnstown a mere nothing.

At many spots however debris ten to twenty feet deep prevented the overflooded overflooding of the city too promptly but rescue work was hampered in the ruins of many buildings by big fires breaking out, and the whole town seemed doomed by fire and waterAs the first hours of hysteria on the day gave way to grim realty of the most terrific horror ever known the city and country side for twenty eight miles had suffered because of the blast, rescue workers hurrying to the scene by boat and ship over over the flood waters recounted collections or recollections of the horrid con fusion in which work in probing the fire swept ruins progressed.

One huskily built man a father of three children silently turning from view the body of two small daughters and a son, half scorched, and taken from the flaming debris, threw his assit assistance on pulling and tugging at a rope which was being used to haul down some of the tottering walls of his own big residence where twenty six families had been entirely wiped out. A lusty heave and part of the wall crashed down disclosing to the father the crumpled form of a third son and bodies of men women and children also.

A short time later after strenous and hot work amid burning wre wage a rescue worker aided by others lifted a part of the burning roof and to their surprise three of the youngesters in uninjured but with y terror stricken expressions ran out and would have been caught by the flood but they were persued and taken. Still later the body of a small boy and another his sister nearly entirely covered and nearly reached by the leaping fire was seen beneath a mass of timbers and bricks which were just about starting to burn . The rescuers redoubled their efforts but no sound seemed to come from the boy and girl, and hope gave way to the fear they were already dead. After several minutes of frenzied tearing at the heavy and blazing timbers with crowburs and by hand the reached, the two children sat up, rubbed their eyes, and Another father said he was working near the An e Angel Guardian orphanage when the blast rocked the country side.

"I knew there were hundreds of little children in the collapsed building and to think of their fate almost drove me crazy" he said" That I survived amid the ruin of wreckage from other buildings near by I cannot understand. But I began grabbing every one could. I pulled twenty children out of a hole not big enough for five, and one boy broke off his leg as we were getting him out but he too was dead. The Mayor of the city who survived expressed his opinion it would be impossible for years to rebuild the city because of the amount for which the w war was taking from every spot. and for which that section of southern Cal calverinia is already war bonded.

IZ Three Three days now had passed since this levee explosion disaster, and the death of three hundred more children in hop hospitals brought the total known slain of the children up to five thousand throughout the city alone. Indeed this once beautiful city twelve miles northwest of Angelinia Agatnia but close to the Calverinia boundary line which three days before was a place of happiness and hope, and a leading town of good and holy Abbieannians was now the scene of agonized grief, and flood and fire horror. It was now discovered that one thousand Glandelinian soldiers under the command of one treacherious and traitorous Angelinian because god would not grant him a prayer had in an instant brought death and suffering to every home in twenty towns outside of Wickey Lansin for about fourty five miles all around. And his purpose did not work, it did not stop any advance of christians, and the only victims whom he mostly struck by explosion fire and flood were in the main school and orphan children of the city, and neighborhood towns about.

Since th t e the desperate rescue workers succeeded in removing most of the bodies while frantically being aided by others in fighting the fires the known dead including adults in Wickey Lansin alone out of one hundred thousand people was about thirty thousand five thousand children being among them, and possibily about three thousand other children missing , most of these little rescued child slaves. The fact that the majority of the dynamiters themselves were killed by the explo explosion at so great a distance was a marvel to the investigator and workers.

Search was still continued however among the ruins of homes for those still missing, while elsewhere desperate attempts were being made by thousands to check the ever spreading conflargration. lso des also desperate attempts throughout not only this city but other places affected by the disaster was being made to prevent further loss of life. The orphan asylum which suffered the most from the shock however was the st Vincents a five story brick structure a block long and half a block wide and considered one of the best in the city, and which was also destroyed by thr the the o concussion of the blast. The north wing of this building building was raized y by the shock and nearly three quarters of its two thousand little inmates perished by are cnage and being trapped by flood and fire. The workers spent three days to take out all the bodies and fight the flames as well.

It was discovered that the Glandelinians secured the explosives probably from the city's dynamite blasting plant which the glandelinians no doubt had secured possession of and the plot had been worked out so carefully that no one really suspected anything not untill the cavarly got suspicious and dashed upon the workers, only to be repulsed. The colonel of this detatchment of vandals was a disgruntled man worn by hard military life, but who had been in the service lsince the since the terrible war commenced.

One of the things that the aurthorities blamed for the explosion was the fact that that levee as well as others had not been properly guarded as had been ordered, particularly the main levee which was redone three years ago to make it safe . Th The aurthorities were terribly ange angry over the tragic disaster, and it was the Manley generals they told themselves that was causing all these horrible explosions floods and fires to such an extent and that they recieved quarter for prisoners taken by christians in battle was a surprise indeed, The colonel and his wicked men went about the vandal work in a completeand thrpughout manner indeed, even though no doubt most of the Glandelinians knew it might mean their own destruction too should the blasts go off too soon or reach far before they escaped. Nevertheless the colonel from papers discovered which he dropped in his flight had recieved orders from Manley and signed in his own hand writing that four christian commands were coming down toward Wickey Lansin to move to Emperor Vivians support at Riegnburg landing and that he must contrive to use any means to stop them. Here was the colonels chance and he thought he had reached the point where revenge on the christians for his failure to recieve the answer to the prayer was his ruling motive.

But he carried it still further. He had been ordered to wreck several trains to set big fires which would stop the advance, but he thought of a better plan. He did make some fires but that was not what he wanted. Instead of that he worked with his men really secretly for two weeks, straight storing nigh explosives of dynamite gun cotton and T.N.T under one spot of the once beautiful powerful levee ar across which ran the tracks of the main extreme line of the Abbieannia, Bondinia and Galverine railroad, and laying the fuses and eletric wires cunningly and covering them up with dirt so scouting parties and the like would not discover his purpose.

Then he waited till that fatal morning of All Saints day November the 1th to touch them off. He began the day by starting a forest fire to prevent persuers from reaching him from that direction. Then he set farm fields and other places and property on fire, and then all his men were ordered away from the levee and given twenty minutes time to get as clear from the scene of the blasting as was expected. He then ordered the man at the battery to give the si eletric spark just as the momen moment when all school children had been called in session. The children had come from all points of the compass in the city and towns, many brought by their parents, others in wagon loads from the farthest schooless towns in the districts also destroyed by the the explosion earthquake and others walking happily across the fields and streets carrying their luc lunch baskets.

They were then all inside busy at their desks tnether in schools or orphan homes, homes, looking at the teachers for the start of the days lessons.. The normal atten dance of the smallest school was more than three hundred, and out of a school of this six sixty children are dead.. The Supt. of one of the biggest schools looked out of the an window and watched for a moment the scenes in the str. streets below. His face suddenly grew pale and just what he saw never will be known. At least he saw something that frightened and surprised him but then, the shock of the explosion sent him flying out of a window three stories to the ground below. This tragedy simultaneously registered when the conu concussion of the noise lifted the walls of the east wing as if a tornado pulled them upward, and the wreckage crashing down buried teachers and pupils under many tons of debris of of wood brick and stone killing them all.

A In another orphan asylum there was an immediate panic among many of those caught but not killed. Matrons attendants and children rushed tward windows and exits. many were caught here beneath falling walls. Scores leaped to the ground from the lower windows only to be killed or injured as an avalnch avalanch of debris rolled down upon them. Others stumbled over the many bodies of their little comrades, to reach the other air in safty only to be maimed and injured by wreckage from other nigh building.. buildings close by.

The news of the terrible disaster spread on swift wings for the noise of the explosion had been heard in Angelinia Agathia and Big Girl knool itself, and in as short a time as possible men and women came rushing from all directions from towns not injured by the shock, and reached the scene of horror just before the flood came down from the waters pouring through the blasted levee. These people saw what remained of the survivors , frantic mothers rushing screaming tward the blazing ruins of the school houses as soon as they had gotbout of their own wrecked homes and heard the first news of what had happene happened. What remained of fathers and other adults were summoned from their places of home or employment and all had no question in their frantic hearts. Where is my boy or my girl?

The force of the shock caused by the explosion in the town of Aberdeenia wrecked one wall, and forced three others to topple outward in the biggest orphan asylum in the southern part of Galverinia pulling the roof of the building down upon the lit little inmates of the first section of the structure. In the other section which which fortunately escaped the destruction soot and dush dust chocked and blinded the children but they formed a sort of firm drill by habit and there was sufficient order there to prevent panic. at this town or other buildings including the big childrens hom fortunately no fire broke out out the town within six hours was flooded with twelve feet of water which terribly complicated the horrible situation and hindered rescue workers. At this building the first rescue workers had to brave the peril of overhanging sections, and surviving parents had to be driven back from the ruins of school houses to wait untill temporary morgues had been arranged out of reach of flood waters before identification of the hundreds of dead could start. Home guards, and soldiers from a number of army camps came at once and also took charge of the situation. In searching one of the walls of the undestroyed wing of St Elezabetns School. Danger lines were formed around all big schools and homes that had been wrecked as well as other places and all but picked rescue workers and soldiers kep kept outside, and there the scenes along the edge of these rope lines resembled those at a pit mouth where relatives of entombed miners wait for word from below. At this town there was no fire following the caving in of buildings and had there been more deaths would have resulted as many injured were caught under the walls of their dwellings or of school and childrens homes, and their screams could be heard as the rescuers fought their way to them at the risk of their own li lives. Nurses and doctors and Red Cross members from Pandora and elsewhere were on the s scene as soon as flood conditions would permit them and boats carried the injured into hospitals not wrecked by the shock. The Governer of Galverinia and his wife and chil ren children came from Pandora, and he too took of his coat and went to work pulling on long cables which were attatched to crumbling walls. His wife joined in first aid work and so did her children and tried to comfort parents.

Every available soldier that could be spared from various armies was quickly on the scene. They began an investigation of the wrecked portions of the sleeve levees as soon as the main rescue work throughout the stricken districts had been organized. They discovered when digging revealed them several hundred wires stretched for two miles and a half to the levees and this proved what had wrecked the levee and the city and towns around and started a terrible increase in the flood already spread over so many districts. All plants in Pandora city was ordered closed and all citizens male, were sent to the districts to aid in removing the bodies. What happened in one of the rooms of an orphan home just before the explosion was told by one of the Sisters, Sister Mary Rose, one of the matrons.

" My class of one hundred children had begged for some news as to the flood and the progress of the big war," said sister Rose. " They pleaded for the news because they were anxious about their fath their friends who were in armies. I was telling them some of the details of the flood and forest forest fires and battle scenes when far away the explosion occured with a noise like great thunder.. If I had refused or had finished the children would not have been in their lower room but would have been gathered at the lower room where the brunt of the shock of the distant explosion was felt.. Then without any warning the explosion came. I saw some of the bodies of my children hurled by the convussion against the walls or through windows. Then something crashed down on me and I knew no more till I awoke here in the hospital."

A ten year old orphan girl told of her experience in the Angel Guardian home Wickey Lansin city.

" I was writing a letter to a friend in another home" she said" when I heard an awful loud noise. Everything thing rocked a terrible noise of falling walls came from the streets beyond and in fear I closed my eyes. Then the ceiling cracked and began to fall in on me and all the children started to scream. I then opened my eyes and saw the wall start to sink right on top of me, and I began to holler too. I was right by a window and when the wall came down the glass broke all over me. I waited a minute and then and then I cli climbed out through the window. A few of the children managed to climb out with me but I guess most of my comrades are buried in the ri ruins. That's all I can remember except the awful screams."

About four hundred children were in that section of the building that felt the brunt of the concussion from the blast. As fast as the hundreds of little ones were brought out they had been covered with blankets.

Fear that this colonel may have more men ready to blast another levee soldiers were sent in droves to guard them while other fears that colonel that the colonel may have sent men to dynamite a big dams wall that too was guarded, by a large force of soldiers and engineers. engineers.

Because of the flood caused by this disasterious explosion which killed totally in the whole district outside of Wickey Lansin , more than seventy thousand persons, and injured a hundred thousand complete and swift abandonment of an r area fifty miles wide and a hundred long between the west bank of the river near Wickey Lansin and the higher ground along the other boundary was advised by all aurthorities, charting the course of the flood down that portion of the country.

Pp port Lansin, Wickey Lansin bridge, and ten towns also desteoyed by the blast were already in the flood while a few others were in the threatened terrotirt territory. Besides the wa n warning on the size of the flood still above Aronburge Run and the volume of the flow through the same crevasses blasted before the weather b depaetment and other aurthories urged the evacuation of the remainder of all that rean a score of miles wide to two hundred miles long along both sides of the Mic-Whirther Run south of Big Girl knool and burning and flooded Wickey Lansin to and including Port St John, and the strip a hundred miles west of same river below Wickey Lansin west to the Angelinia Agathia branch of the Abbieannian Bondinia and Galverine railroad.

Seventeen thousand square miles were by this time inundated and the waters from the break in the levee blasted by the Glandelinians which wrecked Wickey Lansin was constantly covering more and more territory and residents of many towns helplessly watched the progress of tye greatest flood in the history of all floods so far as it started to even rise above the levees of Mic-Ollester Run and turn that river into a raging sea of its own. Before rescue could be Effected an undetermined number of lives in the explosion razed towns had been lost because of being drowned in the wreckage and prospects were that many thousands would perish before the waters finally fell as the rescuers themselves were in danger because of the waters continually rising among the wreckage even so high as to quench the fires in the lower ruins entirely.. AAt Mellenville one of the towns near Wickey Lansin destroyed by the shock of the explosion and about sixty miles northeast of Angelinia Agathia on the Mic-Whirther Run River where the most serious break occured because of that tremendous of all explosions, many of the injured caught under the wreckage of lower buildings were unofficially reported to have been drowned and that the fires in the upper ruins becoming beyond control is stopping all work to reach those under the other debris. At turntown another buried into piles of broken buildings by the concussion near Mellenville the fate of four thousand injured persons was not known here, though the rescuers were not hampered by fire. But here the wreck was badly swamped by water. The injured however tyought to have been trapped in ruins of smaller buildings where a fifteen to twenty mile an hour current was flowing are believed to have been drowned.

One of the reccue workers who was credited to having saved two hundred injured from the reckage wreckage in the town, reported the drowning of a man and his three daughters in a small broken down building. The worker said he removed the mother from the wreckage floe in the water logged street and before he could reach the others the wreckage of the house careened before the pressure of the water and they w re were swept away. Ten thousand men and soldiers from Pandora wor working in two twelve hour shifts atthe very risk of their own lives were fighting to save the e remainder of the blasted levee on the east bank of the river opposite Schloederville and one hundred and ten miles northwest of or straight west mean of Big Girl Knool which too felt the shock of the explosion so severely that all west side windows of every house was blown out.

Most of the rescued from the ruins of the towns and Wickey Lansin which had been brought by boats to the town of Melvillie were again driven from this town by the flood waters on November thr 4th and were scattered far and near. Thirty hundred more of the inhabatants of Wickey Lansin remained unaccounted for, and the population of other towns were aroused by the shriek of steam whistles and fire whistles at the time of the blast, and soldiers and levee guards ran through these towns shouting " Big explosion at Wickey Lansin Levee. Crevasse, crevasse broken loose flood coming like the sea upon the land. Onlt six hours to get out before it comes here. Get out for God's sake."

The residents of the e many towns then rushed in terror to embankments and hills many or nearly half of them being attired in their night clothing few even saving personal belongings, and screams of women and children were heard on all sides. However it was lucky they went as quick as they did for within four hours the waters were roaring into the towns. The Mic-Whirther Run river flood disaster was spurring legislation for conyrol of all levees by whole Bri brigades of men with artillery, not only of the Mic-Whirther Run but all rivers necessary.

CALL ON WHOLE NATION TO HELP WICKY LANGIN TRAGEDY.

The residents of the vast Mic-Whirther Run ba i basin between Big Girl Knool, and Angelinia Agathia were all gathering their possessions on the 3th of November and fleeing from their homes because of quick and ominous flood warnings issued by Federal Weather and all other aurthorities state relief director because of the immense size of the flood caused by the breaking of the Wickey Lansin Levee after the explosion which let out a torrent of water like a tidal wave. Their homes in about thirty one to thirty five towns were from one hundred tov one hundred fifty miles from and between Big Girl Knool, Wickey Lansin, and Angelinia Agathia, and northwest to southeast southeast of the o these three big places. The aurthorities had as many telephone operators as wires would permit in that time unflooded regions at work urging the inhabuntants to get out of the path of the spreading waters which were moving at a rate of thirty to fifty miles in some places carrying all before it.

Their instructions were being immediately obeyed by the residents of all these towns none of which had a population of less than from five to seven thousand.

The section was on the route along the railroad lines of the Abbiannia, Bondinia, and Calverinia Railroad expected to be followed by waters from that immense broken levee and torrents pouring through cevr crevasses in other levees of the same river in the same location. levees shaken to pieces by the concussion of the big explosion especiul especially near Mellenville from which eleven thousand men women and children have been surprised and marooned and who were being rescued now by workers and boats in the face of tremendous perils andcdifficulties. All the heroism done during this flood in one space of seven miles would take a million books to write.. These new floods converged fourty four hundred miles more of fresh lands wiping out fourteen million dollars worth of harveste and many farm homes below Wickey Lansin and the lake of deep waters five hundred and fiffyb fi five hundred and fifty five miles long and a hundred miles wide which was created by thatbroken dike i was predicod to rush with express train speed tward Big Girl Knool, and spreading even with frightful velocity tward Angelinia Agathia itself.Because of the terriric explosion a sudden inundation of an additional portion of the country near Big Girl Knool and Albertinia sending six feet of water into Sidelights Run, Albrehambra, Randall, and into the country surrounded Chamberlane was reported, and that the forest fire in the Angelinia C country was spreading around threatening to catch woods even where thousands of refugees were seeing freedom and safty from the flood. More than eight thousun d persons were estimated to be in the inundated territory and who could have easily saved themselves but that the only aven e avenue of escape was cut off by a horde of Glandelinians, and by fierce forest fires.

Rescue workers aided by soldiers and sharpshooters and machine guners were busy notifying them to wait untill a portion of the woods burned down to a smudge and then to wet their clotying and make a retreat across the burned ground but to see that they had wet cloths to put across their faces, and others were notified to rush to the Abbieannia, Bondinia and Calverine railroad where cars armed with artillery and machine guns and many soldiers had been placed to take them out of the hellish territory.

Rescue workers at Ophelia were kept busy for three days and nights answering a steady stream of calls for help which came from inundated areas, whose escape was also cut off by forest fires and enemies far beyond. Therefore 10,000 soldiers had to fight their way through the Glandelinian hornets ns nest of snipers to remove a thousand persons mostly little ones from precarious rifle exposed psitions in box cars, tree tops house to tops and on a levee at Glandorinia.

A scouting party on the top of a high hill near the flood near the Mellville Turner Villiage reported sixteen others marooned on a house top, and therefore an armed relief boat was dispatched immediately followed by two gun boats, and they were saved, but under a hot fire from Glandelinian snipers in a wood some distance from the edge of the flood. Two other danger spots in the lower Aronburgs Run valley caused also by the explosion at Wickey Lansin Levee caused trouble, but nevertheless were reported holding out well. At La Paloma seventy miles above Big Girl Knool on the east banks of the Mic-Whirther Run, one thousand one hundred and fifty feet of a dike that started sloughing because of the tremendous earthquake like explosion shock was repaired by a whole army of desperate men. At Chamberlane on the Aronburgs Run twelve miles north of Lucillie Rickseni a city on the west banks of the Aronburgs Run the force of the same shock which was felt more keenly there caused nearly the whole of the embankment to slough untill there was almost instantly a straight drop of fourty feet from the top of the levee to the raging river which was wilder as it recieved more waters from the terrible flood. The crevasse at La Polama while it lowered the height of the water was said to have so increased the swiftness of the water near Chamberlane as to add to the danger for the little Lucille Ricksen town then to lessen it, and Lucil le Lucillie Rickseni a was already reporting three feet of water in her streets, as well as great property damage.

Another thing which I hope I am not going too far to mention is that the explosion also released the flood waters of another levee near Gandanden, and near a mountainous country also created a slide dam when the Glorianna Heights seemed to have from the concussion slightly shifted and sent an avalanch of rocks, dirt gravel and trees across the Rio Vistia River creating a natural dam which then before the continued pressure of water forming a thirty foot lake of thirty miles across and fourty miles long collasped and joined the already flooded lands below.

The little town of the same name as the stream some distance belo3 where about six hundred and seventy five persons lived was inundated entirely without warning, and as the town was so close to the very dam about ten persons or more were drowned before they could reach house tops or near by hills. Although the death list is about ten many others were accounted for.

As the town was located only six miles below the two bursted levees and the bursted dam created by the explosion no one could expect the disaster which was even stran strange that it could happen so sudden a hour or so after the dam even was no naturally formed. Continueing its race down the valley of Glorianna heights the flood struck Mountain Meadow villiage twenty eight miles below Rio Vista within two hours, and here the torrent though spreading retained the crest of nearly thirty feet. The flood was soon nearly six mile miles wide but no lives were lost in Mountain Meadlwo Meadow villian villiage as residents had been warned to flee, but the torrent carried the whole town away. As the water then rushed into the upper Aronburgs Run River at its junction with the Rio Vista near Mountain Meadow villiage warning were issued to many farmers and cattle ranchers for more than a hundred miles along the Aronburgs Run valley of not only this danger but of the immense flood from Wickey Lansin Levee break spreading upon the district like an ocean wave. As the main torrent maintained a head of nearly fourty feet and caused many officials of the Mountain short district lines here to send out large crews in an effort to save other levees and prevent the ds destruction of expensive bridges across gorges and streams.

All telephone communication to the uppwev upper Aronburgs Run River was terribly crippled and only meager reports were available as to the damage of many other villages villiages in the path of the flood. Only a Catholic church was reported undamaged at Rosa town yet it still was in danger as the waters coni continued to rise. The sudden shock of the Wickey Lansin explosion like a real natural earthquake, and which threw to the ground more than thirty towns and damaged others, create created this natural dam nearly three miles across and upward of one thousand feet in height across the river of Grand Flow which even then from melting snow snows and unusual rains on these mountain slopes was a raging torrent. The river was about a quarter of a mile in width and very deep. The blocking up of the river soon formed a lake about eighteen miles wide according to witnesses of it on the slopes, nearly fourty miles in length and eight hundred feet in depth at the dam itself and two hundred and fiffty deep at other places and thirty at others, while at some points a person could have even alked walked across despite its current.

Of course mountain and state enginners and others would surely if inspecting such a dam pronounce it unsafe due to trees and rocks mixed with the earth, but that it should give way only a few hours after being formed was indeed something unusual, and could not be accounted for. Engineers explained that this lone torrent in reaching Meadow Mountain retained its head of thirty feet as it approached this small city as there was little chance for it to spread from the river itself untill it reached the Aronburgs Run thirty miles further down and into the main valley itself.

Near Wickey Lansin five thousands persons many of them rescued survivors from the explosion shocked towns grouped on a narrow crown of the other Wickey Lansin Levees above Mellenville a day after the full amount had been taken from the ruins saw the last lic link connecting their home towns with high ground cut off. A span of the long Abbieannia, Bondinia, and Calverine railroad bridge connecting Mellenville with the high ground east of the Mic-Chirther Run collasped carrying to their death about a hundred persons who had taken refuge on it. Few persons however were left in the immediate path of the two expanding flood seas of Calverinia and Angelinia.

Fed by flood waters from the other bursted levees caused by the explosion and concussion at ten places between Mellenville and Wickey Lansin the lakes joined at North end to engulf virtually the entire two districts joining into one immense inland inland sea. The Aronburg Run fell slowly along the lower river, the river and levee enginner in engineers estimating that more than half of the water from the Aronburgs Basin being diverted into the Sunbeam Creek Basin through the crevasses. The crest of the flood still was in the Aronburgs Run Basin however far above Lucillie Dickson.

The whole state of Calverinia, Angelinia too and the whole Abbieannian nation in general was called to the aid of stricken Wickey Lansin districts of northern Angelinia where a week after the tragedy fourty four to fifty thousand persons , seven thousand of them school children, and three thousand orphans were sent to their death immediately by a wicked Glandelinian levee dynamiter and of which more perished in the resultant floods, and a number of rescuers including those in flames making a total death list of thouse dying in hospitals mounting to eighty five thousand.

The number of injured mounted to sixty thousand more out of the hundred thousand first reported. All the governers of all states, Emperor Hanson Vivian and Robert, as well as all Mayors of cities of which as many as possible visited the blasted levee as much as safty allowed, on the 8th of November issued a proclamantion calling on all citizens throughout the Abbieannian nation for further financial aid for the sufferers of the Wickey Lansin districts and the whole flood in general, while over the news which spread throughout the nation like wild fire the whole of Abbieannia was angered to white heat. Big cities were crowded dense like bees with indignant persons before the city hall and other public and private buildings, demanding admittance into the army which before had been denied to them as only soldiers were called forth in the conscription which was the ol only way you could enter the army there.

The Emperor himself declared that money from all state executive funds would be used in case private subscriptions did not meet the the demands and added that he would personally defray all funeral expenses of the victims after t e the flood, whose families surviving were unable to do so.

The mystery known as to the real fate of the Wickey Lansin city mayors wife was cleared up a little before the flood drove the rescuers out of the city when a state Abyssinkilien trooper working at the Mayors destroyed resident which fell before the shock found her mangled body and those of her city children. The soldier said kind of indifferently" She is my sister." He did not seem to show any grief over his loss, but other soldiers knowing his real feelings set about to watch him in case he went insane over his loss. A large commitee o committee of catholic pr priests visited the camps of the refugees among which they know were many of the survivors of the tragedy and in many of which tent laid the mangled body of a child or grown person. One of them were the Rev. W H Deviner of Wickey Lansin,, James Angelonio, and George Silver all of the St Anges Catholic Church of the city, while all the others came from far away towns and cities. There was one Glandelinian soldier among the band of blasted blasters who had according to witnesses deserted the colonel because he was a more human humane soldier and therefore he too having been captured however was recieved only as a prisoner of war and he testified a against the colonel. He told a story which as wicked as these Glandelinians might have been yet showed their very heroism in their dastard work which even then had been extremly dangerous.

" The soldiers of whom I dear deserted as not to have a hand in this frightful murder took their chances when they crawled down into a large hole under the levee dug by my comrades and recieved stick by stick and barrel by barrel overfive thousand tons of explosives to be placed in a tunnel dug far under the levee." he said.

"The colonel and his followers about 10,000 in number sir knew their danger for if one of the soldiers would have accidentally dropped a stick of explosive or one of those barrels of T.N.T or gun cotton they would have all been blown to nothing. And they had still a dangerous job in connecting the fulminating caps and wires that formed a new network unor under the ground where they had been covered up after being placed across.

It is my belief that the whole quanity of the dynamite and other detonating powders exploded, for Colonel Scatere man had planted enough sir to have blown up the whole city of Wickey Lansin, there being about five thousand tons of it all. The men had all charges connected with wires, and detonated the explosives by a hand lever battery which was placed about eighteen thousand yards from the blast, and yet the man who exploded the dynamite was injured as rocks struck him down even at that distance, and he was showered by a torrent of water hurled so high in the air by the force of the blast. Had one wiring been defective sir which I cross my heart to die say I hoped for, the city of Wickey Lansin and others, with so many children would not have been so budly wrecked and such a loss of life would not have occured by flood fire and ruin. On One town sir saw that was suddenly engulfed by the rush of waters from the bursted levee and God only knows what became of the inhabatants.

My real theory sir is this; the colonel had recieved a message from general Manley stating that he was not bad condition in facing the national armies at Lieghborg Landing and that with the other four h christian armies coming to join him that is Hanson Vivian and which four singly where were bigger than Hansons alone Manley would have to fight with uneven odds and face a dire disaster. He had been advised by Manley to stop the advance of these new armies some way, and therefore the colonel had planned the whole sale slaughter for several weeks. He decided to wait untill these christian armies wi were within view and then blast the levee. They tell me he captured a store of explosives near Wickey Lansin city sir but can prove to you it is not true. He had been obtaining the explosives from a big ammudition country plant he had captured near Grower Crosp villiage which supplied all kinds of ammunition for army navy and artillery for stump blowning, mountain side blasting and for like purposes. I being his ceptive he had revealed his past life to me and that he had been an eletrical engineer and more recently before entering the Glandelinian army had worked in blasting mining purposes for digging digging canals and widening ship passage through mountains.

He told me he had opposed from the very beginning since he became a man the purpose of the Abbieannian government to put down child slavery because he said that it would increase the dan er of war with Glandelinia and if war broke out over the child slave question he saw it his duty only to join the southern armies and nothing else. Two years or so ago the colonel had abandoned his own religion because he had not recieved and answer to a prayer and then turned traitor against his own country. I do not being a southerner respect our cause or flag but nevertheless I hate any one no matter if he is on our side or yours that turns traitor. When I knew his character I was cold to him.

Because of his wickedness he neglected his own wife and children to join the Insur Insurgent armies and then he decided to do this terrible thing he said not just only to stop general Jack Gen Evans advance but also to have revenge on Heaven because his prayer had not been answered. Therefore he decided to take it out he said on the inanimate object of his hate hatred the city of Wickey Lansin his birty place and al all the christians living in it besides wrecking the adv advancing army.

A recent statement of his to another general that if he was t to hold off the advancing army he would have to destroy Wickey Lansin by flood and blast or he would not have no chance to accomplish his purpose."

The first call to be recieved by state soldiers about twenty miles from the levee was that of a stretch of forests near Sheltories farm and a long line of farm sheds. two big haystacks and a whole field of harvest crops besides a farmers house were afire simultaneously. En route to it the Abbieannian cavarly hear d the levee blast and cha and had the maddest run of their lives or at least of their horses to escape from the path of the chrushing thirty foot wall of water. The statements of all these cavarly soldiers agreed that the levee blast came perhaps twenty minutes after all the woods, and the immense farm property was seen to be burning up and which flood put it out in a hurry with the waters swept also over that district. The finding of the body of the Mato Mayors wife and her children too clothing only in a night gown gave rescuers the belief that when the house began to crash in because of the explosion shock she had ran out but had gone as far as the street when a wall of the building crumpled and fell upon her in flames and dust. Her skull was crushed and the bodies of the children mangled. It was therefore the theory that the rascally rebels had pushed down the lever of the battery which explosion at the levee turned all the big houses in Wickey Lansin and many other towns into shambles..

The surviving matron of the Angel Guardian orphanage prohenage testified before the Governer-

" I had stepped from the building about ten minutes before the explosion to go into a store to buy some paper and pec pencils for some of the children, and when I heard it and saw the high buildings crashing down, I ran back to where the Home was but I could not see a thing because of the dense clouds of plaster dust from all other fallen buildings, therefore I thinking there might be survivors among them I called called to the children to come tward me, but what horrified me was that received no answer or not one obeyed me. I will never forget how many hundreds of the poor little ones were taken out of that burning and water logged building ruins. The few who were not killed or hurt were still in the other section of the building either trapped by flames or water and oh heavens how desperately the rescuers worked to save them, and how I do thank God for their success. It was developed during the day of November the 6th that before the blast the colonel had sent to general Bicknell of the rebel armies his books and records as flood and disaster engineer producer. In the letter colonel Plaster told general Bicknell he was going to blast a levee at Wickey Run to stop the advance of four armies of " Dirty Christian dogs" and wished Bicknell to turn over the accounts to general John Manley himself the main commander which he went over in detail pointing out by map drawing where the chief flood disaster was to occur. He closed by thanking general Bicknell if he would sign the bond. And strange to say this came into possession of Schoefield penrod and his boy scouts who captured the "landslinian messenger and brought b both to general Concentinian Tronburgs army. The messenger was held as a spy and a deliverer of a assassinating and murdering message, and sentence to be shot.

Many visited the site of the destroyed city of Wickey Lansin from a high rise of ground since the terrible All Saints day levee blast catastrophe. The streets and all the neighborhood around what a week ago was one of the larest and properstrous cities of the Tronburg un basin of Angelinia were found encumbered with heaps upon heaps of floating wreckage, and more bodies of dead floating amid the debris. The total number of city now for Wickey Lansin is estimated at fourty thousand. The disaster itself tremendo tremendous as it was took place within an instant and so quickly the vast majority of all these people had been killed.. The town of Marcy closest to the exploded levee was said to be buried under an immense mass of debris water and rocks and earth including including mud from the blown up levee on the early morning of Novemaber the First. Of the two thousand five hundre hundred inhabantats all were believed to have perished and it was feared two other smaller towns just as close by might have met with a similar disaster. The few survivors say the levee seemed like some mountain top that had exploded and there was a terrible convulsion of land and river water.

The town of Roseburb not hit by flood but half destroyed by the concussion of the blast was still burying its dead. Nearly six hundred funerals were held although the majority of one thousand dead were arranged for the next two days. The number of known de dead in this town had increased to one thousand one hundredcand ten, while the slightly injured and seriously maimed or fatally stood near the five thousand mark. Searching the ruins of a hotel there and two rural orphan asylums however very fortunately disclosed no death list among children though the number of injured was high.

The St Georges school was the tomb of its principal Minister Mary Angea and eighty four of the children. The death of the children of the towns Mayor closed one of the most dramantic incidents of the disasters. They lay in the ruins with the water creeping up about their bodies for nine hours while rescuers cut through fallen floors above to release their bodies. Relief work in the explosion earthquake swept areas of northern Angelinia and Suthern Calverinia was also placed upon a systematic basis and reports from the various communities not entirely totally destroyed from the concussion but badly injured nevertheless inc indicated that thousands of injured and homeless were being aided and the remaining inhabatants being removed to higher ground in case the flood would also overspread these districts. Also ten children were killed and a hundred injured when the shock of the explosion also wrecked a childrens home for war orphans at New Angeline the villiage, and though the shock did not damage other buildings to any bad degree yet the noise in the distance, and the vibration of the earth threw the population of the town into panic and wild excitement. police reserves were called to preserve order while heroic efforts were made to rescue the injured and remaining children trapped in the structure which caughtvfire and to recover the bodies of the dead from the lower floor of the wrecked building, which began to catch rapidly from the flames from a large stove which had been overturned with the falling of a wall. Rescuers and fire men while also fighting the blaze plunged among the huge windorws of wrecked bricks motor and timbers twisted gas and water pipes metal and wooden laths and broken concrete and worked desperately and unceasingly to released those imprisoned in the approach of the raging flames.

Wrecked timbers and matal came crashing down from the upper wreckage at times with such spped that f rfire men and policemen policemen had to jump for their lives and at intervals half a dozen rescuers were knocked down and imprisoned themsenc themselves by the movingand falling masses of debris before they succeeded in rescuing all the others. To this town the cause of the explosion and ruin was still a mystery of the asylum matrons as well as the fire police and building department of the town. Though they thought the blast occured in the home they could not ascertain why but all agreed that the wreck had been caused by a heavy explosion. But two days later they learned where the explosion wa was especially when thevinhab tants of the town were warned to flee for their lives before an advancing flood.

Gandundon and Glendorn .St Lawrence County reported twenty eight hundred dead, in the towns of Caldwell, Walnut junction, Imporia, Long town and other small towns and communications were all cut off in that section so that the flood marooned survivers had to seek refuge among the dangerous smouldering ruins. El Toledo Toledo and Pisienia in the northern part of the state reported an earthquake shock of a few seconds duration which killed a few hundred and injured a thousand others, while the towns of Hazel, Glen Lenore and Lookout Bluff reported four hundred dead, and six hundred injured by the concussion.

It was developed during the day of November [illegible] that before the blast the [illegible]

Gandanden and Glandorn .St Lawrence County reported twenty eight hundred dead, in the towns of Caldwell, Walnut junction, Imporia, Long town and other small towns and communications were all cut off in that section so that the flood marooned survivors had to seek refuge among the dangerous smouldering ruins. El Oleede Toledo and Osienia in the northern part of the state reported an earthquake shock of a few seconds duration which killed a few hundred and injured a thousand others, while the towns of Hazel, Glen Lenore and Lookout Bluff reported four hundred dead, and six hundred injured by the wreck caused by the concussion.

Glendorinia reported eighteen hundred known dead, five thousand seriously injured, by wreckage and burns, and nearly a thousand missing, many of whom might also have perished perished in the following flood which also was the toll of the concussion which destroyed Allendale, and Kennon both within thirty miles of Hickey Lansing city but nearest the scene of blast and flood. Messen Messengers from Allendale said the town had been totally wiped out with a loss of an unknown number of lives. The Abbieannia, Bo ndinia and Calverinia railroad and other lines made up emergency trains and sent them as far as they could go to the region of herre, and many doctors and nurses were sent with them.

Preliminary reports indicated that the wrecking of Allendale may have been the worse shock disaster in the history of Angoline vine state.

At the small city of Beachmann six hundred sixteen persons were also killed and an unestimated number of persons i injured and with this many dead this town was the worse known sufferer from the shock for its six size. Other towns with varying reports of loss of life and property loss were, Hunteraville, Nordane, Gendale, Empire Crossroads, Carlen ville North Bend, Jens inia, and Red Rock. Many persons were killed in these towns as well as in Cleveland town and the towns of Brandall, and Fisonia and the shocks of the explosion which also took a toll of seven hundred lives in Calverine Junction however destroyed only two big residents and a few churches, one school and some factories. The factory of John Berne was half razed and sixteen of his employess perished. The owner was away from the factorybat the time on some business trip and escaped. Some curious children visiting the interior of the building was also killed. Another factory known as the Knowlton Lumber Company and Nash Bahs Sash department company were partly demolished and caught fire. Twelve workers in these concerns were killed and four of them injured. An unconfirmed report from Daytonia factory said fifteen persons were killed there but on investigation it was found the building had only the glass of its windows shivered out. Four thousand five hundred were killed in the city of Big Bethel a scene early in thr war of severe fighting.

Thirty two thousand were injured or homeless. Other towns near by reported between two hundred and three hundred homeless, especially at Goldburg the town worse injured by the concussion. The total proper y loss was estimated at two million dollars.

The death list stood at over three to four thousand at Big Bet Bethel, ten hundred in one whole b block at Garland Avenue, two thousand at many other blocks, and two at Wolfe street. Many of the injured were expected to die. Relief work was well organized during the time of the flood but faced the greatest task at all these towns which were flooded, but the homeless of the towns were given what quarters possible in homes which were little damaged or forced to seek shelter from the flood among the higher ruins, or were taken to high levees and other places to await transportation to safty on trains still able to run through. Rushing with a dull roar which remembled continuous thunder under ground most most of the territory over which it passed, the flood spread forward with great speed finally extending until all the explosion towns were engulfed.

In every instance the flood hit these towns about eight hours after the blast as they crossed the Angelinia Calverinia state line at northeastern Angeline line and in every instance caught many of the injured still pinioned under the lower layers of wreckage and drowned them.

Big Bethel was practically destroyed. Only one big building in the heart of the city escaped escape for all its windows and that was a Concrete and iron constructed childrens orphenage and only a few dwellings around or near by remained standing. The concussion raised a wooden house at the street close to the orphen as yeslum off its foundation where two were killed. One coal shed belong to a coal company first vibrated like a drunken man trying to dance the Charleston with his body and then crashed to the ground levee ; leved completely while witi witnessed said they as the upper layers of the coal piles for a moment leap up and down like pop corn in a shaker and the sides of the piles cascade downward.

The shock which hit the resident district nearest the home made some of the houses vibrate against each other, and one house crashed half way through another, another jumped upward at Nevada street, and slide part way across the street, and its roof fell in. Nine persons in that structure were injured and two killed.

In the eight southern states of Calverinia Country the total death list was about fifty two thousand, thirteen thousand of which were killed in Pandora County, and Nint nine thousand in Florida state,

This section of Calverinia, scourged by levee explosions, forest fires, tremendous floods, torrental storms and blizzards over a weeks period counted its dead at over fifty eight thousand with probably a hundred thousand or more injured, a million

BECAUSE of this to tremendous disaster the Governer of Calverinia and Angelinia and all their states had been compelled to call out all companies or full forces of the troops of the National guard of every state that could be spared for patrol duty. In the explosion shocked and flood swept districts of the two state countries and announced that they themselves would go to the districts to look over the situation.

At the town of Populat Grand one thousand five hundred and fifty persons had been killed and nearly six thousand injured because of the shocks which wrecked the buildings that on November the first. Four hundred of the bodies had been recovered, and many more were unaccounted for because of the flood overwhelming the city afterwards but nearly all the survivors had been saved. The shock of the explosion destroyed virtually every building and not a single one story building was even left undamaged. In this town the property loss was estimated at over two million dollars. The city was now in complete darkness during the following nights and during the rising of the flood the cries of the many injured men women and children could be heard from all parts of the devasted town. The effect of the shock was if a tornado had suddenly hit the town. Buildings of the largest sizes crumpled as if they were paper, and trees were fairly shaken from their roots. The most pitiful scenes were observed on the streets befor before the flood waters came. The injured and homeless with no place to turn with what survived of their ruined buildings in flames and their loved ones and friends still in the wreckage were climbing through the wreckage to help rescue them while despite the figh fight the flames could not be brought under control. Many hundreds of children were killed or injured when a big school house fell. Virtually every building big or small was leveled, and fire added to the horror. The town looked like another earthqk earthquake wrecked Lisbon, a combination of ruin water and fire. The i fire had started soon after the explosion wrecked the town and was threatening to wipe out all the remains which the flood did not reach. Six six and eight story hotels were even laid in ruins and also burst into flames and the survivors were trapped and were rescued under the most tremendous difficulty. Members of the Abbieannia National guards began patrolling the streets which were almost impenetra le because of the tangled wreckage untill the rising flood waters drove them up to the burning ruins and trapped the remaining population untill outside aid came.

The aurthoritiesof Lucillie Dickson city reported that nine thousand persons about and about fifteen thousand were injured by the concussion of explosions which effected northern Angeline ine state, effecting most the towns of Gl Grands and Rio Vista or vista in Moldonia county and near Rio Grande City, New Palo and other places. A check of the explosion shocked areas showed them during the days after Rio grands city and orleania were badly affected, while three hundred persons were killed in or near Rio Grande and six hundred were injured, many seriously and the flood added to the dreadful horror. six hundred lives were snuffed out in Santa Monica County, and nine hundred persons were reported injured nearly all of them critically.

On the eleven of November nearly one hundred and fifty thousand were said to have been killed by the explosion shocks and nearly a million injured or rendered homeless and in the other towns not a priest sister of religious person survived in the terrible disaster.

Sixty million dollars damage was believed to have been inflicted by the scourge and flood. At Big Hedda seven thousand are believed to have been killed or drown 3 drowned but also that the di death list was growing and more than thirty thousand were injured as a result of the concussion. All reports coming in added gravely to the disaster, as to town after town reported heavy loss in lives, injured and property destruction and then marooned by the resultant flood. Probably the heaviest hit counties were in Angeline vine state in the northeastern part not far from where the blast occured. These counties reported eighteen thousand dead, in the wrecked cities of homeless and property damage in the hundreds of millions and growing worse hourly. In the eight states from the Mic-ghirg Mic ghirther nun Region to the east, west, and southeastward the fury of the weather adding to the horrors of flood and fire, was bringing further death and intense suffering. The first main destruction by the blast and flood known was wrought in Domdobia state, where the concussion also lashed Melborne, Cumeso, Beldenville, Bicknell, and Vivianna flattening farm houses, small towns and all buildings in rural sections, and laying bigger towns and villiages in waiste.

The worse effect was at Vivianna state for in a dozen communities in the southern part of the state towns went down and the known dead at this section along was about 10,000 with scores of thousands injured, and the heart of the state devastated even in its woods because of the shock. A thousand persons were killed in central Vivianna, three hundred by crashing wreckage, and the rest by fire when they were trapped in the burning ruins and w rescurrs failed to get them out making a total of fully 10,000 in that state with other death lists elsewhere. Bicknell state was x shocked in the northwestern section and the death list there was said to be six thousand and the injured more than three thousand. The death list at Beldenville reached three thousand five hundred, when many died in flood and fale flames or a r as a result of their as a result of their injuries.

The town of Be c Beechnut in the state of Melborne gave a large list of dead when for days the ruins continued to yeild more bodies when the death toll stood at eight thousand while hundreds of injured fought vaily for life. Nearly fifteen hundred bodies wewere discovered on the fifth day after the disaster as tireless workers combed the bricks and timbers for missing persons known to have been in the razed burning buildings. The Red Cross estimated sixthousand more had been injured, more than one thousand of them seriously.

Sixteen thousand were killed in Don Domdobia state which was reported with the partial restoration of communication, while the wiresbrought hourly new names to the death list of more than a dozen communicities and the number of injured was more than eighteen thousand while the property loss was estimated at twenty million dollars. Many isolated communities in the northeastern and western parts of the state still were not heard from and it was feared when reports of these places did come in more numbers will be adde to the list of dead. In the town of Callens houses were seen to fairly hop, skip and jump up and down or back and forth for more than a seconds duration by survivors before they crashed into ruin a most extraordinary occurance for concussions of earthquakes and explosions.

Sixty eight thousand were killed in the state of Angeline Vine where many towns were devastated not only because of the blast but because of fire and flood when follw when following the blast the flood of the river from the opened levee rolled down upon the eight states of Calverinia, and those of Angeline vine. Hundreds upon hundreds of the inhabatants who survived the ruined town had clung precariously to the ruins of buildings above flood in the water logged towns and engineers and others recieved the information that other levees were caving in, before the tremendous prs pr s prr rr gressu pressure and that all those had perished asthe flood reached so high all were drowned as the waters o covered the highest ruins. At Goddale about ten miles north of Wickey Lansin on the opposite side of the river near the blast, the embankments there had been leveled by the concussion and others weakened were said to be falling and efforts made to get leves machines and pile drivers to the scene was vain, and therefore a break there let loose the waters into the territory and therefore caused the frightful loss of life. Rescue work in face of dire perils had continued rapidly with surf and other boats plying through the flood swept streets of the ruined towns removing survivors stoa strande marooned upon the higher ruins but which were climbing upward the upper ruins slowly driving the inhabatants further upward untill all hope seemed lost.

Because of the explosions wrecking towns there were nine thousand flood deaths. A widow and her eight children driving by the invading waters to the top of a ruined school house three stories high were the first victims of Glenders villiage as the flood widened its path and covered the entire school house so that its very roof was ten feet under water. In th In the levee blasted at Wickey Lansin by the explosion a twenty mile gap had been almost suddenly torn and the other fifty mile stretch of it had crumbled afterwards before the impact of the rushing river waters, thus giving rescuers in the explosion shocked region only twenty hours in which to save all they can, and very few they could save. Therefore in Angeline Vine from shock, flood, and fire sixty eight had perished but several duplications were found and many of the dead and injured were listed erroneously from towns and villiages that were never in the neighborhood, so great was th the confusion and horror that followed the warsrecord breaking disaster.

FOR so far distant as that sudden and tremendous vibrations of the earth lasting six seconds accompanied by heavy ruins of glass falling into streets from all big buildi buildings affected Angelinia Agathia on November the first causing the death of fourteen men injuries at least to a hundred persons and immense property damage o mostly in glass, while all articles of furniture in stores, residents and the like not fastened down to the floor were said to litorally leap up to the ceiling and come down with a crash that added to the shock, while many places reported all their dishes broken, as well as thousands of dollars worth of dishes in factories and chinaware companies companies and other, such a warehouses. surface and elevated lines trains and steam railroads in nearly all sections were delayed, some of the main wagon and carriage high ways including Angelinia Agathia, and Vivian Roads in the suburbs were blocked by fallen trees, and north west and south shore interruban and other lines was completed disrupted for many hours when many miles of trolly wires were shaken down or poles twisted from the ground inclinging in all kinds of ways.

Big Girl Knool was more strangely affected. The shocks was general in many pacts o of the state around the city, and fourty deaths were reported in the city, ten at Huckley street, four at other streets and the rest in a schoolhouse where the teacher and some of the cildren were killed and a number injured when the ceiling came down. On the outskirts of the city wooden houses were overturned by the concussion and the flood waters in the streets of the lower section were filled with little waves by the concussion. Two hundred persons were injured in West Frantor avenue and some killed. The concussion caused the walls of one of the buildings of the wharf fire still burning even now to crash down injuring a number of fire men who were expecting qt this time to get the blase under control and starting new fires.

The shock overthrew s church steeples and one witness said he saw a chair with a little girl on it literally jump out of a l window but such rumors was not believed. Some of those killed in the streets were struck by falling materials from the roof of a tall house. The other local victims of the vibration owed their death s to being struck by trolly wires which were shaken down to the ground about five of them. From all parts of Big Girl Knool and from every outskirts came reports of every window broken in the houses, chimneys toppled over, trees shaken together or uprooted, telephone and other wire service interrupted, and other peculiar disasters such as furniture damaged and beds moving a few feet from their standing postures. Many persons were injured in higher places when temporary wooden structures, fragments of toppled church steeples and the like were shaken down.

At Angelinia Agathia the most unusual and spectacular damage was the shaking off or away of the upper part of the big loop scaffold on the tower of the newly constructed St Michales Church being erected at St Peters Stree at the corner of Big grove avenue. The tower was four hundred and sevaty eight feet above the ground and one of the highest of churches in the district. Huge beams 10x18 inches from the top and thirty hundred feet of the most huge scaffolding in the city for hoisting materials was hurled down by the concussion into gt Peters street and the Aronburgs Rum River. inty of the terra cotta settern at work on the fourtybtwo story level of the high church tower saved the iron girders as the flo floor under them and the elevator at the side gave way crashing into the street four hundred feet below. They desperately clutched the steel beams and managed to hold on untill they secured footing in time to get down to safty. itsure for them was a winning battle with death.

Dorothy Gale city still further felt the shocks and so did Betsy obbin and other places but not with any serious effects. Fifteen to twenty were killed as a result o of the shock blasts felt in Gloriamna city which also affected this city. An entire family was reported hurled by the concussion into the flooce flooded streets from the windoes of their home and drowned and it was believed still more deaths occured in eastern Gloriamna and effort s were being made to check up on a long list of m missing persons. The Mayor of this city and three companions was hurled off the city bridge across the river w by the concussion which shook the bridge fairly up and down with loud noise and th y they were swept six miles down the flood and saved but brought to Big Girl Knool suffering from exposure. four seperate shocks each of a seconds duration c affected the city and the surrounding districts and shook into waves the four feet of water and did more than one million eight hundred and seventy thousand dollar damage in thi this city alone. On One of the shocks was accompanied by a huge shower of falling glass from windows of tall buildings and immediately after the the other shocks the windows of all other houses were b broken and a few weater houses damaged. Near the city some bridges were so weakened by the concussion that six of them were washed out one a new one of steel construction with a wooden floor. Scores of trees were damaged by the vibration and many buildings were unroofed, while more than ten million eight hundred thousand windows were broken by the concussion especially those in ten big orphan asylums and schools in the city.

The most of the shocks were felt in the residental c section, some houses were shaken from their foundations and many had their roofs shattered or shaken down altogery altogether. Property along the Abbieannia-Bondinia and Gulverine railroad trace tracks was badly damaged and in the business sections all the big plate glass windows estimated at a value of three million dollars were shattered by the shocks. All wire communication was cut off from Gloriannia, Conservatory pun, and many other cities to the south and southeast for many hours, but it developed from other means of getting reports that the shocks though felt did no damage in those districts. The shock was accompanied by terrific noises and in Little Gloriamna six train men were killed, when a freight train was shaken off the tracks and went rolling into the flood waters.

The city of Honrietta were also affected by the concussion as to have every windo window broken and to result in two hundred and fifty persons to be in hospitals, six of whom may die of their injuries, and that more than a hundred others suffered minor injurie injuries fr m flying glass, falling trees, and dropping timbers and bricks from falling chimneys. Here also at Henrietta the flood waters which had been rising at the rate of six inches an hour forced most of the e people out of their homes. Twelve were killed, scores of persons w re were missing, more than one thousand persons homeless and damage ammounting to six million dollars in proper y. damage was the toll of the concu concussion at or felt in the city of Chamberlane soenough for that town with its highest streets flooded to a depth of two feet. Chamberlane was this day the eleventh of ovember recovering from one of the worse shocks in its history. The son of that city's mayor and a companion were shaken into a stream of water and both were drowned. All train service in and out of Chamberlane because of the flood was demol demorilized due to washouts generally and all other utilities of service was crippled, and all telephone service as well as telegraph was out of service apparently for good. four other persons lost their lives also in the low lands near the town and hundreds fled from their shaking homes in east Chamberlane fearing the builfings buildings would crash down. East and north Chamberlane was the hardest hit,

Most of the missing persons and those killed or injured were in that district. The main thoroughfares of the surburbs were shattered and strewn with wreckage. Two schoolhouses, and one big residence were badly damaged and the recently installed costly fire department was demolished. All the largest manufacturing company plants had all their windows shattered out, and are flooded. In Chamberlane was running in all the streets at some parts as high as five feet. At Pellen street a fifty five thousand dollar residence was destroyed with fourtybfive persons injured and two killed. Elsewhere in the city two hundred homes were destroyed and several big buildings wrecked, a hundred larger buildings unroofed, all windows shaken out and badly crippled telephone and telegraph c communication was the toll of the shock. Many of the injured are in a critical condition. The vibration wascgeneral over the whole section and according to the instrument which records shocks the velocty of the vibration was as severe as the most devastating earthquake which even as far south as Angelinia Agathia, and as far north as Calverine smashed huge display windows and distrupted eletric c transportation.

Also at Chamberlane trainmen lost their lives because of the flood, h when a passenger train ran into a creek near orn Torn after the bridge over the stream had been washed away by the flood waters. The engine and the baggage cars piled up in the creek but fortunately the passenger coaches were not wrecked. The shocks affected Chamberlane from the northeast where it caused most of the damage and injuries. Of towns the furthest Chamberlane was the hardest hit and government and other boats were sent into the lowlands around the city to rescue familes in the outskirts who were driven to the roof of their homes by the flooc flood. Newspaper reporters who toured the district brought estimates to Angelinia Agathia of about two hundred dead in chin in Chamberlane, while they said the shock of the explosions shattered every window in the city. Many washouts played havoc with many railroad lines. The steeple of the Burler High school fell to the roof stunning fourteen teachers, and all the students by the noise, and the shock also done considerable damage to the dome of the citys post office.

The Mayor of even these stricken cities issued statewide appeals for funds for the relief of all the districts stricken by both death and grief because of explosions and flood, and the appeal contained an official proclamantion indicating that the wrecked towns and and city must be replaced either by popular subscription or from draftsmen of the nation.

Angelinia Agathia itself is a town heavily in depth because of the war the war having proved a heavy burden on the meager population and destruction of so much property throughout the war stricken nation premished to place a heavier finacial burden on the tax payers.

" It is hardly possible" the mayors pro proclamantion at Angelinia Agathia said; " to imagine that e the enemy could produce a more terrible disaster than this which destroyed cities and towns from explosion, flood, and fire, and then to snip the refugees in the bargian and fight rescue workers. There is little we can do to lessen the grief and horror of the stricken people, but they have the boundless sympathy of the h whole nation. While not able to comfort them in their grief we can help enough by having this kind of disaster prevented in the future. "

The eastern section of the state of Angeline Vine was also hard hit by the effects of concussion and flood. This counts counts especially in the lowlands business and resident districts of the towns and villiages there, and many houses were swept or shaken from their foundations and then carried away later by water, and thirty thousand men women and children had a close escape from death, when two hundred homes in fifteen tho towns were first partly injured by the explosion shock and then flooded up to the second floor. At the town of Cresent the only known death however brought on by shock and flood was that of the principal of a school. He had been in his office when the shock of the distant explosion caused that portion of the school house to fall in but slowly and though not hurt by wreckage he fell into the flood below and was carried away. The town ovv Cantil was boun water bound, and without heat or power and isolated from the outside world, with damage estimated at one million dolla one million dollars in the place. The shock of the explosion felt in eastern Angeline vine affected the city of the same name in the st state, sixteen hundred solid blocks were laid low, thousands of persons were made homeless, two hundred were killed, eight thousand injured, four hundred seriously and the proper y damage was between twelve million and thirteen million dollaars dollars. A whole school full of children in including teachers and the principal was buried under the wreck of the building and when taken out were found to be not even scratched a tremendous miracle for the size of the building and the nature of the ruin.

But in the same school, two men employees, the furnace man and several others were taken out dead. The disaster caused awful distress throughout all of Angeline vine stat .
state. The loss of at least sixty eight thousand totally is attributed to both flood fire and explosion. Ten towns and four cities suffered from the blast alone.

The extent of the flood waters sweeping down and ito the eastern part of this state was by the 10th of November deemed so great that the aarthir aarthorites at many place iss issued a warning to all the surviving towns that the lake would probably engulf the town and bury it under entirelybas well as the whole state within a few days.
The city of Angeline vine previously had been regarded as safe from the flood and had already two feet of water in its highest streets. The outflow from the Wickey Lansin Leve Levee and others demolished by the concussion was estimated at five million cubic feet a second, and this was carrying probably an average depth of twelve to twenty feet above the rails of the Abbiscannia-Gondinia-and Calverinia railroad line, between the Wickey Lansin and Albertinia highs highways or high lands, and the Aronburgs gum Run river and overflowing the lowlands bet behind Wickey Lansin down to and around Angeline vine and st Anna.

In many towns in Angeline vine state scores of thousands already had been forced to flee from their homes, but many daringly clung to their little towns untill the water drove them to house tops and had to be rescued by relief workers. Refugee camps, at St yartins, Martenville, Alexendria, and Malturia were threatened by the, flood h and had to change their locations. Hundreds of motor boats, and special trains and wagons continued their work of rescue. Two thousand five hundred persons still remained on the leves at Greenbaum refusing to leave even though threatened by the rising waters and arrangements were made by the Red Cross to send them food and provisions regularly while shipping stood by to wait in case the levee would finally be overwhelmed and they would be compelled to go. The Abbiscannia-Gondinia-and Calverine, and other railroad lines found it necessary to discontinue all train service across the flood torn area on the 11th not even being able to run local trains on the edge of the flood.
With the region around Wickey Lansin and Albertinia converted into a raging sea, the residents of other towns were rapidly approaching a panic stage for now the flood was taking on the most mammoth proprtions. Wickey Lansin which is in ruins has now a depth of twenty feet of water, and a number of other towns were entirely submerged. The endangered territory in which more than two hundred and fifty thousand people live was also largely in the path of the flood, and all aurthorities had issued repeated warnings that resis residents of fourty four small towns should flee for their lives. This territory is approximately one hundred and thi thirty miles wouthwest of Wickey Lansin on the opposite side of the river. The towns however which are threatened are small wity with but few exceptions.

Conditions at Little Girl knool, Betsy Bobbin and Trot were reported to be grow ing steadily worse. The water had risen six to twelve feet since the beginning and the depth in these three towns was now fifteen to thirty feet. And Red Cross officials at six camps reported that they had found two thousand cases of infantile paralysis and ha had been forced to establish a strict quarantine around these camps, and other places in close contact. The Health officials also made announcement that they were taking precautions to guard against a plague there, and that a big number were ill. Special Special trains had been made up at many points to aid in the rescue of thousands of persons reported endangered near the North Levee and St Marten as a result of the increase of the flood. The call for immediate help came from the town near by and it was necessary that the rescue work be completed in two days.

Six river war craft were sentthatday to take supplies to marroo marooned refugees in the big North Bend area. Here all telephone and telegraph communication was severed and all repo ts came by wireless. Yet efforts were being made to re-establish telephone communication for several days so that levee officials and flood relief headquarters at Angeline vine could also keep in touch with the situation and learn of no new dangers.
The first time the break at Wickey Lansin Levee occured shortly afterwards came the news of other levees broken by the concussion, and this caused the abandonment of several big towns which was mostly conducted at night by boats and rafts, and there was no fears of further loss of life so far. The course of the waters as charted by the engineers would take them through five new districts affecting one hundred thousand are persons and covering an area of eleven thousand, six hundred square miles, while an area east of one thousand eight hundred and seventy three square miles would be covered, or 1,198, 720 acres. All this while the occurance proceeds in next chapter.

Ranson had learned also while making his preparations upon Leighburg landing that the situation of Vivian Wickey by it being in foe hands was taking effect upon other nations for food stuffs everywhere even in Abbiscannia was soaring in prices from scarcety, in many nations it was reported that factories were closeing on account of the war blockening up factory materials from Calverinia, and if something was not done soon millions of people of many nations would be out of jobs and that there was danger of them being rendered desperate because of want and poverty.
And also the main victims of the war in all nations indeed seemed as if they would be the little innocent children. In Calverinia were where only the candy goods was made transportation of these on account of Ho-Chirthar Janet shutting off all other Calverinian seaports, was becoming impos s impossible, and as the enemy had in July seized the Pleasgiglamenaam and Bay Ving Islands all such provesions could not pass through Vivian Wickey Bay and all seaports of Calverinia on all coasts and also of Abbiscannia and Angelinia were guarded by enemy fleets and submarines and even blockaded, and trains were not at that time able to pass through Abyssinkile because the enemy aurthorities had the Abyssinkilian and Calverinian boundary line barred by many immense inactive Landelinian armies. Of course if this would happen and which was threatening to go into effect all grown persons would also suffer from the effects of the sugar and other famine of sweets, and if Vivian Wickey was not captured and all the River blockades opened by force soon other nations were liable to suffer from a general famine. It was also evident as General Ranson had recieved from general reports of correspondents that the whole world was starting to suffer from the effects of the great rebellion. Building material was threatening to become scarce everywhere outside of wood, and there was sure signs that obstructions of buildings in other countries even across the immense seas would have to be stepped.
Even already all sea traffic had been stepped, Landelinian ships had been intrigued and seized, and others were not allowed to enter. It was apparent that too another sorrow and misery was threatening. This seemed to be the sorrow of Sirtless Giftless christis christmas days and this would probably be the saddest.

This horrible tragedy of the seizure of the Ho-Chirthian Fortifications, the Aronburg Section, and Vivian Wickey, with her perms Catherine and Julie Gallic sections and pederal, and of the closing of all ports had made Ranson fel feel very much like war scarring all his life The city being a hundred miles in extent had already garrisoned in its fortifications over four hundred million Landelinians, and the Ho-Chirthian Fortifications which had been b builded by the Abbiscannians since Eighteen Fourty one was added by the Landelinians in as many ways as possible so that they would be almost impossible to retake.

The rebels who had thus secured the strongest city of fortresses in the world, and which had been able to hold the world at bay had an addition of three hundred and sixty five thousand mine galleries far in advance to blow up any attempt of christian besiegers to advance fortifications against them in case they planned t d to do so.

General Ranson had at ll felt that it had been through the fault of overconfidence and Cal carelessness of the Calverinian governents that this city and its fortresses had not been well guarded in May and June 1918 as they should have been, despite his entreaties, advises and warning, and though the spies who had recieved the information from the nine t or ten traitors had been captured and held for inves tigation they testifed that the carelessness of the Calverinians had been respon sible for the disaster more than they or even the traitors.
At the beginning of the seige however general Ranson had secured by raids and fierce river fighting all ships belonging to christian nations that had been interned by the enemy at the time of the capture of the city ofand fortresses. Of ecurse with the cutting off of the world from this sea port by the Landelinians all commerce with other christian nations had to be stopped and during his preparations general Ranson had said to his brother as he watched the work of the troops constructig constructing pontoon bridges under fire;

"It is only in our countries of Angelinia, Calverinia, and Abbiscannia that all kinds of Christmas Presents are made. It seems to me that through the treacherious conditions of the Ho-Chirthian seas no one dared to send ships out during the storm seasons. This city of Vivian Wickey was the only one the-nation knew off at this time able to transport all articles across the placid Calverinia seas or on railroads going north and northwest to Abbiscannia It seems like christian nations are not going to have any Christmas happiness and enjoyment this year especialy especially in Candies, and Presents and other goods Of course some hopes can be obtained by means of the sea ports of Angelinia, Abyssinkile, and Abbiscannia, and some seaports of Calverinia, but who would dare venture their ships out account of the rovers of Landelinia blockading as it seems the whole sea I think this war is going to cause the whole world a terrible scourge I have recieved notes and letters from all aurthorities of Abbiscannia and Abyssinkile that prices of everything is jumping like the tempture on a Hot July day, and other innocent nations are beginning to suffer the same way. And as I have heard through the correspondents and the eighsee sight seers who had have come to me that no one in the other nations have the means or tarlent of making toys and no material can be obtained either, as such materi ew material in those nations proves of no use to them. If this terrible disaster is really going to happen it will make special sorrow and misery among ligt little children of all christian nations and I will not have doubts that h they will believe S anta C lauss will be a prisoner among the enemy and that us christians will not be able to rescue him. The children of all nations will suffer alike I'm afraid, Abbieannia too I think, and I cannot bear to think how those little children willweep in they get no gifts on Christmas day and so something must be done to relieve those poor unfortunate kiddies. When we strike e here at ivian wickey we must go into it hard and not stop for anything."

"We will have to do all we can" said his Brother. "At all means we must force the positions of Evangelinia Crania before Christmas if possible."

On the fiftsen of December general manson Vivian had his preparations in fully sway, his immense armies into positions, and all stretches tward unbeam creek, eva ranin and Battery ine river with the purpose of launching an assault as soon as opportunity showed itself, and he notified general mansion that his armies were concentrat ing for the purpose planned. uring that time general manson was surprised and startled and appalled over the news of the maddened hellish ferocity of the Glandelinian armies, and of the fiercest struggles that had already raged, and the most consuming conflagrations that ever was seen, and wondered what now would be the result when he made his own attempts to capture Evangelinia Crania Heights through the assaults at Lieghburg Landing.

Even while he was preparing desperate attempts again had been made to re-capture the Mc-Whirthian ortifications by christian fleets, which seemed to be causing a real world shaking bombardment and artillery duels, and he wondered when he could bring on the first bloody wreck of the mighty Glandelinian armies. He was bound indeed to carry his point to prevent the threatening famine of the dainties that children loved so well, to prevent the scarcety of fruits, and the altogether threatening pestelence and general famine among other christian nations, and he decided to order the statesmen and aurthorites of Abbieannia to sent ships laden with provesions and protected by battleships and torpedo cha beat chasers to any nation they that may be in need.

Indeed these were being dark sorrowing days for general manson ivian. ny other christian general had lost their temher at the series of violent and vehement attempts to take Mc-Whirther and other fortresses by sea and land being failures with the results of too heavy a sacrifice of troops and the sights of scores of hundreds of christian warships torn in pieces, with cabins wrecked being sent into Abbieannian seaports for repairs and also to unloaded the many wounded and to give to all the world a report of a conf conglemeration of such evil tidings as to startle all.

From the northern point of ieghburg anding to the extremety of Sunbeam creek, and stretching to Evangelinia rania the concentrated christian army under general Manson alone was about fourty miles long and 250,000,000 strong. The big and beautiful but sad dear old city of ivian wickey was within plain view of the christian to troops on the nearest heights. On the river board of Lieghburg anding during the whole month of ovember during the preparation of the christian armies there was erected by the christian engineers and contractors about fourty five wooden fortresses and stockades place at a great distance from each other, but batteries of artillery was concentrated so closely together that they resembled an immense chain of cannons hey were later known as the Mc-Whirthian or ieghburg-Landing battery line of guns and when during the outbreak of the battle, the Glandelinians thinking them unoccupied had tried to seize them and no one had any idea how hard they were to be taken.

Also during the preparations of Hansons army, far north of his erected intrench ments there ensued a terrific river battle. Christian fleets had steamed up the Mc-Hollester Run River and for three days there was an inferno of seamens, waterspouts produced by explosions and the most tremendous artillery display ever witnessedo on record and which ritubled the volcano of flame and din and the enemy batteries and fortresses in this location resisted all the attempts of the christian fleets to reduce or take them.

The main attacks on these river fortifications during the month of ovember made a clamor that made it appear as if the world was coming to an end. All along the river front, with shore batteries, on both sides, the fortresses, and even in the Bay where christian fleets also attacked ne nearly five hun r hundred thousand cannon were thundering in an unceasing uproar shaking the whole coastline of Calverfinia and making the whole city of- ivian wickey viberate from the din to a tremendous effect. Fleets under Admiral immermann, Mc-Hollester and others belonging to the christian attackers had passed up a certain distance of the river and then had started on a new battle tempest directing some of the efforts of on Margaret gorde, urmer Hill and other points but in vain. At this point 250,000 cannon thundered incessantly and made a sea of smoke. Indeed the resistance of the foe in the fortresses and defending the shore batteries was so desperate that it could have been compared with the resistance of the Angels against the wicked rebellion in Heaven. A day later an Abbieannian fleet steaming up to make a bombard ment upon some of the fortresses of orman Catherine was almost annihilated within the very sight od general Hansons army which roared their own artillery to prevent the total dew tr destruction of the ships. here had been ten thousand ships and only eight thousand survived. Admiral immermann escaped through the fierce gun fire of the enemy with his flagship unimaged however, but one of the flagships of anote another fleet was blown up and set on fire. hese series of bombardments caused the worse fires ever seen within the very view of Hansons christian army at Lieghburg Landing. Even ivian wickey was being battered by shell fire all those days and a number of the great wooden fortresses in possession of the enemy was on fire. No battle in the war as yet ever made such a hellish clamor, and ever pro-duced such a far reaching shock. A score of cities and towns far from ivian Wickey reported broken windows, and damaged furniture, which leaped up and down like a dance of wild rabbits, but no houses were reported in ruins though the norma iver and other streams were soon found full of floating bodies of dead fishes and animals and humans. Of course this bombardment was the first most clamorous in the first year of the war and never yet had their been any bombardments so unindurable in all its shocking horrors. It lasted fully ten days and thre e quarters of an hour and was the first most extensive artillery bombardment of the northern thr theartre of war. It is remarkable to note however that only half of thenumbers of the opposing sides were engaged in the artillery focus but it is not worth while to state any further the fury of the battle the main dew description was the clamor. There were no infantry or cavarly engagements on this occasion however.

On the fifsteenth of December general manson was fully ready for the fray and was hopefully sure that the enemy would not attack him as he intended to do to the attacking himself. If the enemy attacked befors he expected them to, he had no hopes of winning the positions along this part of the line. ut he was not to have all the good luck he hoped for.

It was during these scenes in this chapter that more accounts can be given of the flood from the 10th of October to the 19th of ecember. Somewhere the crvasse of another levee not known of before had resulted in the add addition of two hundred more refugees to the more than nine hundred tyousand already driven from their homes by the flood. Count De iff all this while had been keeping in close touch with the situation until he hoped some time the danfer danger would be passed. He declared that $100,000,000 relief fund collected by the Red Cross would be wholy inadequate to meet the demands of the flood sufferers and to take care of the injured as resultant of the explosions. ourteen more railroad lines were in the path of the flood waters and six more towns were flooded, as well as Handenburg, and the waters were expected by the Twelvth and thirteen to estend to River port and Melthis.

Large fleets of boats were asseb assembled daily from the First of ovember to November to the Thirteen already in the vast area u inundated by the break in the Wickey Lansin Levee at the city to aid the many thousands who formerly had refused to leave in the face of dane danger and warnings. Many tyousands of persons in these districts clun clung desperately to their homes as the flood waters moved upon them. ne hundred and fifty miles of land by this time in Angeline vine sta e state in the east had been inundated since the break at Wicley Wickey Lansin on All aints day and all dry lands between Mic-Whirther un and ronburgs Run had disappeared, and the fear that nearly all of the flood victims might be cut off caused relief agencies to mobolize all ships they could secure.

A section of the Aronburg imited was commandeered by one of the flood relief directors and dictator to remove five thousand persons from the marooned and flooded explosion shocked town of Mic-Whirther south of the explosion scene but they too refused to leave. The dictator was informed that fifteen thousand persons in the vinicity of the Mic-Whirther Run wickey Lansin Levee break were preparing to live on the remaining levees. The majority of them were children, the report said and the food supply was very low only to last one day for each family.

Virtually the whole of the eastern and northern portion of the state of Angeline Vine including other sections further west and north remained under deep water as this shifting inland sea caused by the enemy rolled westward and southward. The move was tward the mouth of the Mic-Whirther Run River and has carried flood waters into six other districts bordering Mic- Whirther Lake the l natural outlet of the river to the sea five hundred miles yet distance.

Big irl knool was recieving a prediction that within another day or two six feet of water would be in her streets and even now in some places more than two feet six inches of water had risen while the extent of the whole flood was breaking all records. The ational headquarters of the Red Cross announced on the 14th of ovember that the Mic-Whirther River Valley flood reliefvheadquarters of the organization had been extended to an enormous distance and that there were ten thousand workers. The Red cross were therefore with as small a number compelled to take care of nearly a million refugees and fifty thousand more was being added since the flood had assumed the proportions of a major disaster the Red Cross had cared for 927,655 persons and treated about fifty thousand injured, and fifteen thousand sick sick.

Wickey Lenain parish by back waters from another explosion shocked crevasse on the east bank of the Aronburgs Run an torrents swept over a railroad embankment on which they had relied for protection. They had failed to heed flood warnings, and therdore therfore the residents had kept themselves in the districts until the back-waters became threatening. Thousands of persons were brought out on the thirteen on a number of last trains operated by the Abbievanna, Bondinia, and Calverinsu railroad, but they left other thousands unable to leave except by boat. Waist deep to six feet of water poured over the railroad embankment a mile north of Morganna when the last train left from the endangered region. The rapid spread of the flood because of the wide break in the Wicker Lenain levee northwest of Big Girl Knool brought consternation to many who had remained in the threatened districts confident that their homes would not be flooded and a steady stream of reg refugees poured from that district into immense concentration camps at Big Girl knool during the last few days. An estimate two hundred miles had been covered near Big Girl Knool since the crevasse occured. And the flood wawaters was still spreading and deepening rapidly.

Goodsworth, and other towns from ten to twenty miles from the break were completely swept away. A ten inch rise of water in the streets of Big Girl Knool had been observed in the last twenty four hours along the Mic-hollester and Pandor a lines which runs through the edge of the city. Boats therefore were being quickly assembled to aid any persons marooned in the districtmany of them the same craft used to aid people in residents around Albertinia. Backwater from the other portion of the flood was rapidly spreading southward over other districts influenced by the main flood spreadin spreading everyshere else. Walls of sand bangs were being erected in deep center fields of many big baseball parks in Big Girl Knool and pumps were started to keep the flood waters from halting the baseball fall season here. A game was played with water in part of center field all balls going into the water counting for two bases.

Yst the flood waters were slowly continuing to rise in the city and the highest of all streets were covered as the water climbed to a height of a foot more, with a probable crest of another foot the following day.

Credit and power also was important subjects at the flood control conference held at Angelinia Agathia on the twelvth of November. So many committees were at work helping Emperor Vivian in arrangements for the meeting that its success in both attendance and accomplishement was simply grand. Besides the prevention of future floods by the enemy with its attendant death toll and loss of property the keep g keeping out of the region a all Glendelinian forces was one of the Emperors main concerns. The Emperor said that all concerns in Angelinia Agathia were and are awaiting the outcome of the conference to determine whrther they will be able to accomplish more to the business interests of the flood stricken regions or whether they shall only write off their losses and regard this war flood as a bad risk in the future.

Should my expectations be fullfilled" he said" no more floods will occur under any reason whatever. Flood control for prevention of future war disasters of these kind is extremely important but no less so is the question of restoring the towns in the devastated regions. If farmers, planters and business institutions who have been wiped at by the war flood can get immediate good results at reasonable terms to enable them to rebuild themselves the present effect of the flood will be overcome. Every effort must be made by the Royal Department and the nation in general to work out the best solution of the problem of making all streams safe from future war floods as we have made them safe from past storm floods. If it cannot be done during the war may I suggest that you officially include measures to restore what the flood has destroyed."

ON November the 12th the flood s i still growing in i ntensity was sweeping before it death and destruction, adding thirty more deaths to its toll of life, and was flooding a large number of additional towns during the past twenty fours hours since the 11th. Even many of the refugee camps were routed from their positions by the spreading flood, and the highes highest of the Red Cross directions directors had established the greatest relief expedition ever known in any disaster on record, and from all over the Abbiannian Nation immense cont conti contributions were po pouring in from every town and city for the caring of a full number now of more than 1,165,000 refugees.

Collaspe of sixteen floating wooden houses in the flooc seven miles norty of north of Albertinia on the 11th sent all their occupants to their deaths, while eighty others died of disease and drowning at Greenburg due to the floods, eight of pneumonia six of mumps and the rest of exposure or driwing.. an escapig escaping landelinian prisoner was drowned at Turmer Bluff s near Springfield Calverinia. The other additionul deaths during the past twenty fours hours of the great flood brouht the death toll so far the as the Red Cross estimated up to abou about1,156. About 100,000,000 acres. acres of farm lands by this time were under deep water, and army enginneers and others after a survey announced that sixteen million acres were flooded in east Angelinde Angeline vine alone. and that the damage to fall and harvest drop of all kinds will run into hundreds of millions of da dollars as big and very rich farms including poor ones poor ones were completely wiped ou out. The engineers said that in the extreme southern part of Calverine alone nearest to the Angelinia Border between Holt Junction and Jennie- Wren-Town ( Calverinia) that 19,000 or ordinary railroad miles were already under water. The engineers being hindered by Glandelinian snipers, and cannon fire from many dif different spots had not succeeded in checking the flooded areas in five other Calverinia states but nevertheless say they believe the total was, about one hndred million acres, and that in some places the water was more than a hundred feet in depth..

The levee engineer at Wickey Lansin declared on the 12th that one thousand would be a small estimate for the floods toll of human life for that immense area, concerning the immense loses caused by other swifter floods e p especially for the area from Albert9nia to Dorlthy Gale to the scene of the Wickey Lansin explosion break near that town alone. If for even this story of fiction I can dare carry on; such an extension for the flood it is then a miracle that so far for all those un hundreds of thousands marooned only a hn thousand and one hundred and fifty six had lost their lives in drowning not counting the loss of life by explosion and fire. Even in the ruins of Wickey Lansin and other blast shaken towns around many thousands were stilo still on the tops of the once sml smouldering ruins with the water having gone up to a height of three feet more. More than 40,000 refugees mostly rescued child slaves and orphan children were still on what remained of the Wickey Lansin Levee awaiting trunsportation to Big Girl Knool or Pandora for safty and they too even at times being harassed by the brutal Glandelinian marksmen hidden in safe spots at a distance or in knools even surrounded by flood. Ne arly all members of the royal Cabenit at Angelinia Agathia who could leave the palace had arived at Big Girl Knool and other places and were already in charge of the relied work, and as the crest of the flood approaced Little Girl Knool, Albertinia and other places the. danger in that section of northern Angelinia was increasing. From the levee bursted by the concussion of the explosion 22,000,000 gallons of water per second was pouring southward to join the main flood carrying everything before it. Should the levees south of Big Girl Knool itself fail to hold many more thousands were in danger of being rendered homeless, perhaps many more lves lives lost and the property damage already in the hundreds of will would surely be redoubled. Also the crest of the flood has even strange to say reached Dorothy Gale, and another rise in the Sunbeam Creek caused by extra waters pouring into it from the big flood as broke down all hope of a real drop in the water here for days, perhaps weeks, though the flood had spread partway into the districts where the fire forest fires had been raging putting out some of it at least.

Refugees from Turmers Levee district were in Big Girl Knool on the 12th and confirmed the reports that between nine hundred and eleven hundred and fifty six lives had been lost lo lost since the flood began and several bodies were found floating in the waters but had been recovered. Even reports from all the down state river districts of Calverinia indicated that the flood waters were still rising slowly at this pint southward and the waters were spreading out further over the lowlands instead of into the main river while it was said the brea break in the Wickey Lansin Levee tended to check the rise somewhat at the west, and this temporary relief was a boon to the scores of thousands of levee workers elsewhere down the river.

About fourty miles south of Wickey Lansin near Beverly on the north bank of the Mic-Whirther Run, and two miles north of grannen town an ernormous levee while refusin refusing to give way before the force of the flood waters was being completely submerged on the I3th of November, and all around that section many hundreds of thousand acren of the richest farm land withall the farmh harvest was inunated inundated, and another one million acres in Chote County also was under water, No loss of life here resulted however as the many farmers lving in the region had been warning warned and had moved their families, cattle, personal belongings to the homes of friends and relatives far out of the reach of danger so far. The male population in this whole district had striven for the past week to keep the other levees from breaking before the breasure of the main flood, and then yet after seeing to the safty of their families and personal property had returned totc the levees of the Aronburgs Run itself, and were supporting these with sacks of sand and clay. The Aronburgs run also recieving so much of the water from the main flood had rose atthe rate of ten inches every twenty four hours and the crest of its own flood was now three feet higher, the crest of the flood of which was now sweeping through the city of Glorianna and also Lucillie Ricksen. It was a surprising news to learn that Lucillie Ickmenian police officials had caught Glandelinian soldiers disguised as beggars lotting several army stores in the neighborhood, and that one of the buildings had been entered and robbed of a thousand dollars worth of National army uniforms and then a portion of it set on fire. To such vandals no quarter is given. Little or no suffering however so far was reported now temporarily sheltered in the bigger buildings of Glorianna and Lucillie Ricksen and these cities were still free from sickness, though the people went boating in the streets.

During the flood horror ever since the Wickey Lansin Levee(he he) explosion launh launches and other craft, any kind that could be made handy were kept desperately busy as the hundreds of thousands desperately begged for aid, and they had succeeded in rescueing thousands every hour or so over a very wide district many who were clinging to branches of trees, house toops, broken lev levees and on rafts. But as soon as they were brought to a camp not ten miles away from the flood when even the whole camp had to be removed as the spreading floods threatened to overwhelm them. One camp was so suddenly surprised that between eight and fourteen drowned there, and many others during the their long distance fligt flight becme he hausted from cold and humber hunger, and perished on the way. The governers of every state had announced that more than a million were calling desperately for aid, that even rescue camps were marooned and that thousands of boats of all kinds were needed to save the refugees not from flooded homes and trapped levees and tree tops and the like alone but also those in relief camps where the flood also came up to surround them. This great fleed in inland boats were being fast assembled despite Glandelinians secretly trying to wreck or destroy them, and every able steam boat on the Mic-Whirther from its source down and hundreds of craft from the sea coat coast region some of them deep sea going boats were being employed in voyages of mercy.

Through another enemy made explosion holes had developed in the levee at Brusswood between Big Girl Knool and Albertinia. It had been feared that ifthe levee went ofmany out many thousands of more acres would be inundated and many more refugees would be added to to the ernormous army of homeless. A great conscription of all abled bodied men for levee work as far as needed started to be underway, and thousands of fresh numbersof coworkers including the brave women and children also placed themselves on the levee so threatened, city but with a roar that could be heard more than a mile the expected happened a large crevasse opened. The break was caused by another explosion somewhere else and instantly the water began to pour through the gap. Then the levee broke s eeping sweeping an additiona three hundred into the water. They however were rescued by small boats a large number which had stationed themselves in the vinicity for such an emergency but the rescue work was done at peril and great difficulty.

On the levee which they all were trying to remend there had been about six thousand and the rest who were not swept into the water at the sudden break were complete ly marooned, because of the critical situation of the flood, and of the enemy doing all they can not only to hinder rescue work, but also to increase the flood, prayers and Masses were said in all the Catholic Churches throughout the Nation. The priests recited the Litney of either the Blessed Virgin or of the Sacred Hearts, and Saints while the congregations answered them. Many priests at the Cospels during Mass spoke about the floods created by the enemy, and also prayers were offered in the different churches near the flood regions for relief.

As the flood continued to rise pre practically the entire Mic-Whirther Run Valley and lowland country was being devastated by a sea wode flood and the city of Big Girl Knool whose towering buildings seemed to offer a safe haven for flood refugees was being threatened more by the flood every day. If there is ever to be a safe haven found in the Mic-Whirther Run region for this apparently endless army of refugees fighting desperately for shelter and their lives to da dau day is even threatened with the loss of the water supply. Many miles down the river the many men had been waging a desperate fight with the Mic-Whirther Run t in an effort to stave off this crowning wur misfortune and in the hotels and residents of Big Girl Knool every thing that will hold water had been filled to the very brim against the hour when the threatened city water plant would be flooded out and ceased to function. For a week and a half since the I2th of November the refugees had been flocking into Big Girl Knool, and other big places, where they said they, and hundreds of thousands of been fighting desperately for their lin lives on house tops levees and trees before they were rescued. The first drove to urive at Big Girl Knool was from Wickey Lansin now under water ranging from fifteen tofourty feet in ddepth and from which the last survivors of that horrible disaster had been taken off. Among them was the Mother superior of the S Angel Guardian OP Orphanag Orphan home one of the few surviors survivors and a few of the children and she too eng enguged in Red Cross work.

About one thousand refugees a day was the average of being reieved oven in flood threatened Big Girl Knool which had become a veritible haven for the fugitives from the Albertinia district as wished to get as far north as the boats of trains would carry them, and yet many thousands were still fighting for their lives, while tye flood continued to rise and deepen. Of the man camps even in danger there was a staff of Red Cross workers to meet each incoming train and boat, and there was a hospital furinh furnished in each camp to which many of the stretcher cases were taken immediately. Every incoming refugee also was given a shot of typhoid vaccine in one arm and of small pox in the other. But despite these precautions the diseases have spread like like wild fire.

Also the Red Cross had troubles with many of them but considering the great numbers thrown upon the camps far exceeding anything they had ever expected or had time to even prepare for they had done well. Many of the refugees who had fought long for their lives in the flood came to the camps after being rescued in the last stage of physical and mental exhaustion. After having endured frightful hardships and fighting for their lives and facing a future which to put it midly was distressing was terrible indeed.

Among some of these hundreds of thousands of arivals on the 15th of November were a man and his wife and only two children the oldest eight and the youngest six. They were the survivors of a family of ten. They had seen all but two of their children drown before their very eyes in the flood that suddenly wrecked their home. They had been forced to put out in t put out in the flood on an improvised raft on which they floated for five days before they were picked up by one of the rescue boats. The minds of the parents havebroken however under the strain and by the time they arived in Big Girl Knool it was necessary to send both the man and woman to a hospital for the insane.

In one of the camps called Camp Callen the refugees were healthy so far but the camp was threatened by water and preparations were being made to move off before it was caught. Yet no one ever can be able to know what all of the children in this flood horror had gone through before they were delivered saftly into the hands of the many rescuers. Many of the nurses had been veterans of many disasters most horrible in the extreme and who had been through dia disaster after disaster in various parts of the war torn country and all had been through the horror of the car and its bloody battles so far and yet they had to cry like the little childre. children themselves as they listened to these poor kids trying to describe the horrors they went through while they and their parents fight desperately for days against flood and death.

So many orphan asylumns in towns and cities had been ruined by flood fire, and explosion that the main problem on the hands of the refugee camps were children. Yet realizing the magnitude of this disaster the Abbieannian people were providing generiously for the needs of those armies of refugees, but the Red Cross had to do more than clothe and fees feed them. They must wipe from the minds of these ci children the memory of the shocking horrors they have gone through or the insant asylumns won't be able to have roomfor many more inmates. All of them have forgotten how to play. The child slaves swamped out of orphan asylums were the mosy dejected and many of them seeing the ruin tegan to even lost their hope and love of God Himself believing He was responsible for the disaster for not putting a staying Hand against the enemy.

The people of Big Girl Knool were doing everytning they could to help the refugees, despite the big fire still raging in their city, and the floodthreatenng it every day. even though they were able also to turn more attention to the serious situation in Northern Angelinia where 300,000 were marooned on house tops, telephone poles, floating trees, levees and wreckage drifts flo fighting desperately against the death which threatened to overwhelm them. One thing that was fortunate for Angelinia Agathia city itself was that the reports from the flood stricken southeastern corner of Angeline Vine State stated that the engineers of levees failed to recieved the facts in the dreaded overflow from the North Bend levee break although nearly all the citizens evacuated after urgent warning from the engineers and the militar.

here the water went no o ' ond seemed to know but the opinion was that sep swift currents carried across the country to Northern Angeline Vin ' without increasing the ttttttttttttt crest of the flood that already covered the whole state itself. The men in charge of the rescue work and evacuation in that section reported residents of many towns had not generally fled, that only few persons had evacuated the places although they had been urgently warned two days before and trains were kept waiting for them, and thay that they were not marooned and fighting for their lives with no sign of rescue in that district. It was also that the water was backing up within a short distance of Dems but almost immediately began to recede and had fallen two inches on the 14th of November. Meanwhile the Red Cross headquarters announced a list of fourty towns in Angéline ,iv Vine state which were flooded and from which all the concentration camps had recieved frightened refugees driven out of these lowlands by the floods charging through new breaks in the main system.

Fifty tons of food were dispatched to camps near Angelinia Agathia, and additions relief workers also wer were enroute.

On the 15th of November from Big girl knool and other places the Mayor himself and others with a piked crew of coa t coast and river guards, relief workers and steamers left early in the morning bound for Havana Angelinia state thirty miles down the great Aronburgs un River to aid in sudden desperately needed relief work being orgnized. Aronburgs un River to aid in sudden desperately needed relief work being orgnized. organized by the Red Cross for many who were even marooned in their camps as the flood had cause a ten inch more of rise in the river in twenve hours. The Mayor and all who followed him worked through the night in an effort to launch as many boats as possible, wh while others hurried to Havana and other towns where according to informations reaching Big Girl Knool disease and death from rising floods seriously threatened the me one hundred thousand refugees. Before of the sudden rise in the Aronburgs un and the flood turning it into a sea more then two hundred and fifty thousand more acres of rich farm land had suddenly been converted into a sea in fourt four counties withih within that twelve hours time.

All the Red Cross officials feared the increasing befoulment of the water would result in a serious spread of disease. Even in the meantime the Aronburgs Run River and the Sunbeam Creek at this point and further down the river was slowly continuing to rise with the peak expected by midnight and about twenty six feet of water was the present height of the river above the levees that kept it within confine with but a few more inches in the rise expected, that if according to the flood if you can really tell which of the water is the main flood and where the river is.

Many of the citizens of all districts suffering from the flood blamed general Manley and all his confederates for their present prec predicament. Never they did did any of these sections even in stormy weather and from l melting snows ever, as far as the oldest inhabatant ever suffer from floods, from naturally bursted levees, when rivers even went on ramages, untill Manley and his felons seng sent glandelinian engineers to take advantage of a time when heavy october rains swelled the river to a flood state and blow basinder levees. Since the war they claim floods have been known to occur with terrib terrible r record breaking loss of property and lives. The recent blasting of leveen near Albertinia and Wickey Lansin is the only thin that saved other districts from more serious loss of life and property. Few families though at times sniped by hidden enemies seem discouraged or afraid at the steady flow of flood waters that had been going on for nearly over a moth now with not the slightest abatement, alt o although even these towns that are not inundated have suffered most serious handicaps. Havana city had been cut off from all communication from the outside world because of the flooded conditions of the roads o and because of enemy destroying all wires and also because of fire storms in forests.

Therefore plans were depated continually at many places places especially at Angelinia Agathia and Big Girl Knool for the immediate construction of levees at all points levees made of materials which blasting will have no effect on whatever. though how to construct them seems a mystery just now. The Abbieannia, Gondinia and Calverine road and the city of Big Girl Knool have already pack u up enough money tu build a high levee around the town itself to protect it in the future. At present the water in the lowest part of the town is five feet deep, and the waters of the river was roaring past at a thirty mile an hour rate, while on the docks the fire had spread to the extent of three miles sending up a dense cloud of smoke into the sky seen a hundred miles from the city. The first case of looting in the city of Big Girl Knool was reported on the 17th when glandelinian vandals attempted to sneak about with a number of child e n ch childre children of a Catyolic home. They were frustrated and sentenced to die as vandals. Protective mea measures were also taken to prevent curious sight seers from collisionwith official boats in the business sections of the town and torrent like river..

Having already wrought one of the o worse disasters in the history of the Calverinian country the flood waters of the Mic-Chirtner Run turning the Aronburgs Run and Gumbeam creek into a raging sea still more threaten the largest ci tcity in its path and that is Big Girl KnoolThe situation also became more grave still when several times soldiers and citizens have fought desperate conflicts with large numbers of glandelinians to prevent them from blasting the threatened leves to the south of that city, which would devastate it in the flood that wo would follow the break. All the army nengineers made no secret of their fears for the safty of Big Girl Knool on this condition. They had estimated that if the enemy would succeed in making such a break with the way the the flood was now the waters would flood that big city with a depth of many feet in all sections with a resultant loss of millions of dollars worth of property if not great loss of life.Before the flood crest fully reaches the Big Girl Knool district the Aronburgs Run River will have reabsorbed not only the flood waters it en empties into the Sunbeam Creekdelta region but also much of that which flows from all other rain flooded streams in Calverinia, and Angelinia Coen Countries.

With such a tremendous volume of water tearing at the levees, yet there is hope they would hold if the enemy did not succeed in blasting them as before they had wi withstood worse flood stages than this. Yet with the crest of the flood still between Havana and Chamberl ne the danger to Big Girl Knool was not regarded as immediate even if the enemy did blow up the levee. Levees also in that section had been strengthened as far as possible and have been holding well, but the question was, whether the defenders of these levees could prevent the glandelinians from breaching them with explosies explosives.

It had been learned through some spies that the plan of the wicked glandelinians was to cut a gap in the levee two thousand feet wide near the the scene of the last Albertinia break which was only six hu hundred feet wide and yet the cause of the beginning of the flood. It was estimated that if the enemy succeeded and made a crevasse about two thousand feet wide the water would flow into the Aronburgs un Run increasing that sea to a terrible stage and the estimated value of the property which would be flooded would be $ 14,000,000./ But it is believed that the total ammount city an and state authoritiesand business men would suffer wl would reach $ 10,000,0000 more.....

With the known dead as far as fifteen hundred, since that day of the 12th and with an additions number going up to six hundred and fifty more who drown and varying estimates of from two thousand to five thousand dead in the whole stricken area, every desperate precaution was being taken to prevent further loss of life, from disease, hunger, exposure and death from enemy snipers. Estimate of the flood damage so far ranged from $,000,000,000 to as nearly one billion dollars. Day and night boats still continued to scour the flooded districts for marooned persons, and other vessels and ship cra ft of shipcraft of the mighty rivers sped to concentration centers and stricken towns with food clothing and medines medecines and assurances of continued relief.

Refugees were newly inu inundated towns and communities in the two Countries was still sw swelling the ranks of the homeless which already had been esti estimated at one billion million one hundred and sixty thousand, scattered over an area of many hundreds of miles. miles,

The overflow or otpouring waters from the great break at Wickey Lansin Levee twenty miles north of Wickey Lansin had joined by the sixteenth of novem er with the back waters from the Aronburgs Run at Glorlannia fourty miles southwest of Big Girl Knool. Glorlannia was already inundated. Further evacuation was taking place in many sections of the two countries as floods from other rivers overflowing themselves even over the levees inundated a number of small towns that same day and were sweeping across northern Angelinia state seeking an outli outlet now in the Angeline Run river and slammer smaller streams in that state.Most of the people left GlorLannia with the refugees the day the flood threatened to go higher but most of the others failed to head the warning and were marooned on house tops and upper floors. The bodies of some women and children were also found in pile of driftwood in the streets of G s Glorlannia but they have not been identified.

The water in Big Girl Knool city continued to rise on the sixteenth but rescueing ships crews reported that the pu population had apparent,y apparently refused to go, though three thousand others were on the dikes and a number of river steamers were ordered there to take them to Angelinia Agathia. Even yet the beleagured city of Little Girl Knool was cut off from wire communications and only meager reports on the sad conditions in the flooded country and towns to the east of it could be obtained, and on one report recieved at Angelinia Agathia said that Count De Biff had gone through the flooded city in a small steamer and said the water was up to the third story windows of the tallest buildings. The Count who was directed by the emperor to co-ordinate all relief work was getting a more close up view of the flood and of the suffering and damage it had caused. He expects to reach Big Girl Knool the following night to confer with army and Calverinian state officials there, though he was told the emergency situation was being brought rapidly under control.

" The disaster is surely assuming increasing proportions almost hu hourly " the count said" and is undoubtedly one of the worse calamities that the enemy had ever placed upon this country. But the emergency situation seems to be gradually being brought under control and reports came last night from the many relief workers in almost every flooded section were to the effect that the supp sup lies of food, tents and other essenti esse essentials were moi moving forward satisfactorily. But the two main problems facing the Red Cross now is the rescueing of many of the still great numbers of stranded refugees, from levees, house tops, and other high points, and the feeding and sheltering of a more than a million, hundred thousand homeless under our care."

Four audition trains for duty in the flooded district had been ordered out from Angelinia Agathia. One will be based at Greener, one at Lake urg, one at urnbur 927 one at Turnebr and the others at various towns and the other at Big Girl Knool.. The crews of the trains were to go to the tops of high hills and make daily surveys of all flooded districts within their view to locate refugees and carry medicine and food to those marooned marooned and unable to obtain succor in any other manner.

On the 18th of November another blast occured at Glassbury Levee ten miles north of Jennie Turner and its break was expected to flood three hundred and thirty six acres more of farm land and inundate Jennie Turner city also a town of five hndred hundred thousand to a depth of several feet. Other towns threatened with partial submersion were MadgeEvans villiage, Flanders, Auraandecallio, and Marcoecllio. The crevasse torn by the blasting was one hndred and tetnirty five yards long and a stream of angry wa ter thirty feet deep was ruhi rushing through ut.

A great number of the residents of the district , a warning by a small blast a day before moved out before the danger was a fact and many thousands hanc had begun to hurry away when the new break became imminent. All were believed to have left in safty but all were not able to take life stock and other property.

Most residents of Jennie Turner were preparing to remain and make the best of having several feet of water on the streets. Several thousand men women and children had been working on the levee for the last week to reinforce it, but the time of the break the Glandelinians had attacked them suddenly driving them all off the levee and then setting the blast before anything could be done to stop them.

From every mile of the dreadfully flooded territery along the broken up levee land of the Mi-Whirtner Run refugees were flocking to cities and towns more furtunately located on high ground and as the seemingly endless processions of destitute also struggle continually into the Red Cross camps rescue boats continued to seek otnef ether thousands still marooned on roofs in many districts who other wise would not have the slightest chance to escape.

Chamberlane which had thr e thousand three thousand refugees in it sixteen hours after it had organized a local chapter of the Red Cross now was feeding and housing nearly a hundred thousand. and still they continued to come day and night. ven now on a high ridge south and west of this city a Red Cross relief fleet of ships rescued fifty two hundred people, eighty three mules, one thousand chickens, and considerable clothing and house hold goods marooned on a large acre that constituted the only pi peice piece of ground for many miles that was out of deep water. From many houses almost su merged submerged almost to the roof the same boats took many women and children. A number of these had perished in the headwaters and the survivers had been drifting for a week. Still more women and children taken from a fleet of derelict like houses found in the flood waters were almost drowned, and so the harrowing stories come in as gradually communic ation is being established by boat. New Gloria which was swamped under an immense wall of water ten feet high when the Mickey Lemain Levee was explosded asunder was the chief source of the tales of the narrow escapes from death.

Count De Biff and many others of his followers had been working day and night for fourty eight hours to rescue the marooned innabatants of Gloriannia and bring them saftly into Angelinia Agathia. In a steamer of small size with nearly a hundred refugees women and children, and the ten rescuers and ships crew Count De Biff first set out for Big Girl Knool. Before flood tide it i usually was a trip by wagon or carriage or horse-back over many miles of state high way through beautifuly, beautiful scenery.

This day to make the trip the steamer had to cruse for many miles in an open sea over submerged smaller hu nouses, through submerged wheatfields, while when reaching shallow waters rowboats would come out to take the passengers from him. The Count and his big cargo of refugees had made half the voyage in good time without even a slight accident when a shot from some hidden glandelinian artillery struck the boat, and she immediately sprung a dangerous leak. The parties managed to make their way to a large brick building which had been a roadside livery stal stable where they took refuge on refuge on the roof even at the risk of being under fire. Also noticing refugees in the windows of some floating houses near by the Count swam over to one of them, and tried to re-establish e telephone communication with either Big Girl Knool or Chamberlane, where the hpone girls and others were remaining on duty in the flooded exchange. He finally succeeded in raising the Big Girl knool wire and the River shore guard vessel Pandora which had been taking refugees from little Gloriania sent a motor boat to the rescue. All were taken off saftly despite the effort the glandelinian gunner made to prevent the rescue.

In the little settlement of Gloria anic which does not exceed fourty persons there were fifteen hundred refugees most of them housed on passenger and box cars. This little community had been praised by the Abbiannia Bo-ma Board of health as one of the best refugee camps in the states state. Each refugee was warmly housed, comfortably lclothed well fed by the Red Cross, and each has had a shot of typ noid th typhoid c vaccine.

In the near by hamlet of Mayenfeild there are about fifteen permanent residents with some seventeen thousand refugees on their hands and more more coming in daily in search of food and shelter. The housing problem here was serious but the Red Cross gradually began to solve it, and a large o number of the refugees were soon housed in tents. most of these also have been comfortably housed against the freezing weather and snow storms that had prevailed three times during the month already in this flood stricken district.

The small towns of Little Gloriania Evangelestia, Jennie Richee, Angeline

Richee Nelby Corinth, and others which also were partly submerged and fighting to save themselves from the flood waters were all housing and feeding refugees running into the thousands. Their phicical condition was being looked after by doctors who had volunteered their services many of whom made long trips every day on horseback or by carria carriage to inspect their patients. Across the flood in the town of Kauffman whether most of the Little Girl knool refugees made their way by ships and boats now house some thirty thousand refugees and had made provision for more though its own population was only six hundred. The Red Cross dird director of that territiry summed up the situat in in his territory as follows;

"Of the thirty thousand refugees IN Kauffman how nearlyhalf of them have declined rations and are eating only on their own resources which are dwindling very rapidly. The others are given food on meal tickets issued to theure against disguised rebels and others not intitled to our rations. At the camp district some eighteen thousand refugees are sheltered in tents, the others in box cars and houses supplied by the Abbiannia Bondinia and Calverinia Railroad and buildings loaned by Kaufmann residents. Our present needs are first and most important money, then a su pply of staple foods, and shoes mostly for children. All children of the north have been very generous and sent jo toys for the stricken children here who are quite a problem but we are arranging recreations for them. We expected about 70,000 more refugees in Kauffman and do not know where they are to b be placed. At Turnerville Angelinia which was completely flooded the Red Cross has seven thousand five Hundred refugees in ca camp. What few residents were left in this town were and are still living inthe third stories of their flooded homes. Here we also need clothing, and shoes and food and need money with which to purchase supplies. At Alberdinia near Turnerville we have two thousand eight hundred refugees most children and money and provisions is badly needed there. The Local chapter of the Red Cross is spending what little funds they are able to raise for food and clothing. At Guide Ville and Whertown north of Turnerville there are thousands od refugees, I do not know exactly how many. The Red Cross work in this community is well organized now having been cut off from telephone communication from the outside world for many days. Provisions and money is badly needed at both places and food and clothing.

At Springerand two other towns Stether and Burns there is a curious situation. These little towns with inhabatants apiece of only a hundred, have singly more than six thousand refugees. So far they have been able to take care of them under great difficult ies and in the face of re great co odds and even send help to some other towns where several thousand thousand rev refugees are gathered. Ed but f od and clothingare clothing are needed there, and big forest fires are burning close by."

Emperor Vivian and five hundred of his royal members and members of other cities joined forces under the standard of Abbiannia First for the greatest and most effective program of flood con control and development of greater America to guard every river from invasion by the foe. The plot which was certain to be historic was made in Emperor Vivian s palace on the 15th of October it being a union of all members of the royal persons of Angelinia Agathia as well as all prominent citizens of all big cities. and this flood control prog am program outlined offered a solution against enemy mining engineers so easy and safe that its very simplicity dwarfed the most distinguished of all the members.

What is planned to be accomplished by federal and Royal legislation and Royal appropriations would make impossible any possible furu future occurances of floods caused by the enemy which was now even menancing Angelinia Agathia itself and which through fire, flood and explosion had resulted in an unusually heavy toll of death and damage throughout the Mic-Whirtner Run valley of Angelinia State from Angelinia Agathia, to Big Girl Knool, and still further northwest and southeast to an even as far as Angeline junction.

Strong military encampments and batteries on every levee were the solution while si spil spillways also would be created which could be opened upon an enemy trying to burst a dam or dike and drown them all. From Angelinia Agathia to the mouth of the Mic-Whirther Run by the long tortuous passage of the river it is about eighteen hundred miles by direct route through lakes and big swamps and bayous the distance is less than twenty two hundred miles.

The river was always running through big strong levees high above the surrounding countires levees too strongly constructed to give way before anything else except powerful blasting of unusual am o ammounts of explosives.. The spillways could be made to cut through the levees ten to fifteen feet from the top, then when during high water and Glandelinians were sneaking upon such a levee to place charges of explosives those on top tho observe it would therefore suddenly but gradually lift up the spillway a cer tain distance and though the water would be released from the overtaxed river between the levee no serious flood would follow except enough water to drown the would be disaster producers. The lead also would be taken off the river, for there would be more than one outlet to the waters of the Mic-Whirtnerian Seas. Spillways all along the levees of the whole length of river would not only need to accomplish the desired result but also would aid farmers in case of a drought in summer.

If strong encampments had been placed on top and below the levees and if the spillways were in existance before the enemy could do nothing to the rivers and even durin during heavy rains and melting snows the water of the big rivers would be twenty or thirty feet lower than they are now lower by the depth of spillways cut in the levee and the lowering o of the water would not only affect only Big Girl Knool u but the entire length of the big river. The Mayor of Big Girl Knool who had been in consultation with the Abbieannian National levee engineers stated that the spillway solution for all levees would cost but some fourty million dollars. Emperor Vivian plunged himself and his royal friends to use all his and their influence to swing a solid national delegation to the support of the full length of the big river valleys throughout the whole country in getting the desired and essential legislation from the Tribunals. The Secretary of every state, the Governer of every state, the Majo Ma, or of every city and so on promished to line up downseate back of the news new move n the drive to prevent future floods. And Angelinia Agathia mayor promished to bringsupport to the southern parts of Galverinia from all over the nation. Such aid, such a program, Emperor Vivian explained at the tremendo s tremendous meeting was probably part of his main plan to crush even the foe.

and so under smiling men of the stricken communities, in the warmoth warmpth of the most enthusitic enthusiastic and cordial welcome that this city famed for vits hispility ever extended to the distressed even when itself in distress,

Emperor Vivian, the builder of half the city, the booster of the nation, raised the standard of his Abbieannia Rescue and flood preventive accociation Association in the cause of a terrified stricken southern states.

The Angelinia Agathia saters, cruisers and all other ships having been sent by Emperor Vivian to rescue the flood victims and having gone through many hundreds of miles of the flooded sections knew what terri terrors existed in the valley and what tremendous damage had been done. Arrival of the Angelinia Agathians with promish of aid to prevent anything like the present flood ever happening against crowded even some of the flood news off the front papers of the Big Girl Knool papers. The flood became the paramount issue, more than the outstanding issues of the war, and though the Mayor of t. Mayor of Big Girl Knool and of other stricken cities smiled and set banners to the breeze in honor of Emperor Vivian and the Angelinia Agathians and gave their time and energies to a monsterous program of entertainment the haunting fear of the flood, and of the enemy liable to break more levees could not be concealed. At every moment all these mayors was in touch with a telephone because the swirli ng sea of muddy or yellow water was always spreading and some of it was withinthree feet of most of the levees of Big Girl Knool.

Here the levees were reported to be in most dangers because of the foe strongly armed guards were patrolling levees in great nu numbers above and below the city to guard against any levee attack inspired by the desire of the Glandelinians to break through another levee to make the flood more extensive. but these battling mayors never admitted fear"

The Mayor of Big Girl Knool said;

" The city is safe alright but the worse it yet to come. The water has risen two or three feet here and the enemy are trying their best to blast these levees lik like they did near Hickey Lansin." He explained that on these levees and in back of them he has mobolized an army of men and soldiers to guard the levees while wagon loads are stationed there while workers are placing millions of bags of sand to prevent the blasting from taking too much a effect even if the glandelinians did succeed in exploding mines near it. Wherever axlevee may need added height the bag bags of sand were being rushed as guns as ar swung into action to protect a threatened line in battle. It was a desperate fight for a city which was going on waged since the flood began for always since the Hickey Lansin disaster there existed the fear of another such blast close to Big Girl Knool although the water has never been so high as it is now.....

view or the end of the flood danger in that section might be spoken of, for there was no telling what the enemy would do next.. Count De Biff whose rapid survey of the flooded regions was through his trained eye, expressed his opinion of the flood situation as follows;

" I believe the flood dead will not greatly exceed 2,000 and the homeless will not be any greater than one million five hundred thousand. DESPERATE MOVE TO SAVE BIG GIRL KNOOL AS FLOOR INCREASES.

Because of general Evans army and others under him having advanced further north tward Lieghburg Landing despite the Hickey Lunsin flood disaster, a long break inthe levee south of Big Girl Knool has been ordered for the twenty first of Novembet to floo the whole country in the path i of this advancing army, and if this was really done a flood would occur which would roll down upon Big Girl Knool city with terri le results. Th The Angeline Vine State natio nal guard, extra regiments of soldiers with artillery supports had been mobolized for any exergency and soldiers now stand guard over all stretches of the levee and an ernormous cavarly force was encamped below it, with its camp also supported by infantry and artillery. Eve Even many trappers and all male residents of these districts to be flooded also maintained an armed watch where this break is to be made, while the other citizens especially women and children were demanding, guarantles against ass before quitting their post in case the enemy would succeed in bursting the levee.Also a general exodious of the residents of these districts also han tegun.

Also with the crest of the dangerous flood approaching dumcated gloriannia city, Angeline Vine State Angelinia additional towns in that western section of the state were also in danger and also the beautiful country bordered by Conservatory Run was slowly being flooded.Complete flooding of southeastern turner State was also threatening threatened by the breaking of the North Bend levee on the Aronburgs Run river south of Glandorn Bluff where the enemy had committed some blasting but where the disaster was arrested so far by heavy work as the blasting fortunately was somewhat weak and faulty. Yet the great army of homeless now estimated at more than 1,178,888 was hourly increasing as the flood waters moving across Angeline Vine, and northern turner state, and also menancing St Anns County in Agathia State. From the south additional trains heavily guard d guarded for use over the ten thousand miles of the inunda ed territories In seeking out the isolated refugees have been called for by the organized relief forces, and these trains had to be supplied also by whole regiments of well armed soldiers supported by machine guns and plenty of ammunition, as the last train disaster was not forgotten. The Red Cross had also called for one thousand small craft from other many districts to aid in the work of rescuing those still marooned. and all the health officers from all states assembled in the flood zones were conferring with Red Cross officers to co-ordinate medical and saintary efforts, state and National.

The National Secretary had completed his own inspection trip within nearly a month and had returned to Angelinia Agathia to arrange with the Red Cross officials there in a more extensive plan of relief, rescue and rehai rehabilitation.

The Secretary of the Calverinia and Angelinia States arived at Big Girl Knool at the very time the news of the threatened break was made and the engineers stated that the waters of the Big Girl Knool levee break would sundated about a hundred thousand acres but with sudden and disasterous rest results. The crevasse of another such a break elsewhere flooded that much territory and killed thousands of people within half an hour, and many towns of all sizes had been engulfed so quickly in the waters that the inhabatants had very little time to escape. The city of St Bernadices would be perilously close to the path of waters and so Big Girl Knool alone would not sudder suffer if the enemy succeeded .

The crisis was probably passed in the Mic-Ehirther and Aronburgs Run river war made flood situation near Lucillie Rickson city and no more estensive hardship suffering and loss of life and property that was expected. The engineers and refugee camp officials and the Red Cross found conditions satisfactory and that by continuing the relief measures nothing out of the way would occur. But yet the inhabatants feared that the view of the end of the flood danger in that location might be upset by later developments, for there was no telling what the enemy would do next.. Count De Biff whose rapid survey of the flooded regions was through his trained eye, expressed his opinion of the flood sitiation as follows;

" I believe the flood dead will not greatly exceed 2,000 and the homeless will not be any greater than one million five hundred thousand. The war training for all of us has taught us all to handle all crissis. Our immense war organizations not yet needed in the fields of battle, the National guard of every state, the War Home Guard,the Abbiennian legions, and the Red Cross, and the men women and children of the whole country did not become hysterical and lose control of the awful situation, but immediately commenced the machinery of assistance and levee guarding. This is the first and greatest lesson of this big flood disaster. Our greatest problem so far however is to find camping ground for the large army of homeless persons and of the rehabilitation and the reestablishment of all farming production in the stricken regions, andof placing armies to protect these towns."

The commerce secretary said he felt confident felt confident that the return to normal farming conductions or productions in the inundated regions even after the water runs off the land would surely without difficulty on their own part be absolutely prevented by the enemy. Meanwhile the waters pouring still from the Wickey Lansin levee break claimed additional scores of thousands of acres of farming lands, in the Mic-Whirther Run River and inunda e inundated some new towns and wiped out even a villlage on a hill so high did the waters riss. Even despite all precautions taken against it a small private levee at Stone Angeline ine had been blown asunder by the enemy and the rest swept away by waters from the same levee many miles north of Wickey Lansin and as a result about twenty five thousand persons were suffering from lack of food and shelter, and could not even reach high ground which seemed easy to run to for, it was bordered by a thic thick forestthat was all afire for thousands of acresat one time. Stone town was about fourty miles north of the Wickey Lansin levee and information reached Red Cross Headquar ters from the newly stricken city during the night, that about two thousand people with dry land within two hundred feet away, had to take refugee on house tops because THEY DARED NOT RISETHE HEAT OF THE FOREST FI FIRES AITHER.

Another swarm of people had taken refugee on a long bridge near the same town but thebridge was closest tothe forest fire and the people continually had to wet their clothe clothing and stay partially surmerged or die from the heat. Water was said to be ten feet deep in some parts of the city. A dozen other towns were inundated by the flood and with water in some of the towns reported twelve feet deep and made sensibly hot by the clo close close by forest fires the city of In ; Undorn faced the crisis of the flood with the tops of its building set afire by the terrible heat of the forest conflagration. And the water was rising at a rate of two inches an hour, and all avenues of escape was cut off except by boat, and thousands of persons had to risk swimming to the flood to safer spots rather than be marooned in the burning house tops and therefore many persons were rescued from rafts, improvised boats, trunks and even floating boxes and furniture. More than five thous thousand refugees from Warner Junction, and six other surrounding towns fled into the flood itself rather than risk the danger of fire in their upper stories while other have flocked into Marcocellic stating that many marroned by water in their towns cannot escape because of miles upon miles of forests burning, and with movement still in progress e churches, schools, even orphan asylums, factories, the post office railroad terminals and other big buildings were opened to the homeless.

The flood crest of the very Aronburge Run was riding between Ophelia and Chamberlane. Along the whole stretch of where the river was once to be seen, there was no more any river but a vast sea as far as can be seen with forests and trees popping out of the water like an immense water swamp. Yet along all other points all levees were being topped and bolstered at weak points and guarded strongly against glandelinians, whil whileinall localities armed guards patrolled the bullwarks bulwarks to prevent Glandelinia engineers from mining them.

Desperate relief measures advanced throughout the flood stricken districts of the Mic-Whirther Run valley since the disaster began with accelerated speed even as new energencies were created by the watersahich up to the late part of November had left more than one million five hundred thousand homeless, and hourly increased its most dis destructive toll. The desperate and ene emergency situation in reference to the whole area was being gradually brought under control near the region of Lucillie Ickson city, even though the relief workers even there claimed that the flood was one of the worse worst disasters in the history of all flood clamities of the world. The government had called on river coast guards for aquition fast patrol boats to be used in the continued efforts to rescue p marooned persons, and other duties in all Calverinian and Angelinia states effected. To restore all comaunications as far as possible the aurthorities of every district begged of the war department for all portable signal corps that could be spared these to set up whatever regular communications that were hampered by the enemy or cut down by them andthe fury of the flood.

Also thata terrible plague may be avoided and the general health of most of the refugees maintained a conference of the health officers of all the states affected was again called and matters for discussion including not only immediate mea measures for the vacc ination of refugees and and all other arrangements for them but for taking care of the situation when at last the waters shall have receded bringing what the relief workers declare will be the greatest menance to not only the health of all the refugees but the whi whole Abbieannian nation as well, and probably Glandelinia too...

With contributions to nearly the b billion mark fund asked through nation wide appeals swelling beyond the three hundred mark m l three hundred million mark officials have begun oconsideration of other measures to aid all the flood sufferers in the rebuild ing of their wrecked homes.....

The Sece Sceretaries of all states discussed such plans often at frequent conferences conferences at Angelinia Agathia, Big Girl Knool anfvotner places with the governers of the afflicted states and the mayors of the flooded or threatened cities and it was ther therefore agreed that the funds now being rasied for the Red Cross,, would be used for bot both to relieve present distress, to restore economic stability to all those who have had all their private property swept away by the flood, and for them to be able to start all over again. Every one believed that it would also be possible to obtain credit extension for planters in the region of the flood horror who had borrowed money from the federal and land banks, or from other concerns.

The city of poroth, Gale though affected also by the flood had subscribed about $,45,678,999 of its Red Cross quota of 4,678,000 dollars to aid the suffers of the Mic-Whirther Run valley, and more than thousands of tons of clothing have been sent to Big Girl Knool, Angelinia Agathia, and other places by the united of clothing concerns. Glorlannia though also flooded gave about six million dollars for the flood relief and double that have been recorded at Lucillie Ickson therefore the full ammount in this district was about eightsen million dollra dollars but it was said this may be doubled because of more dissaterous reports from the stricken sone. From the town of Betsy Bobbin which flooded as it too was was still housing many thousandsof marooned refugees had donated millions of dollars to the flood sufferers of the Mic-Whirther Valley section, and all religious Societies added to the ammount.

Large trainloads of vegetables conyributed by farmers and cities of the lower Angeline Run valley of Angelinia State and many other districts were enrouted for the flood areas and many millions of burlap bags had been shipped from Angeline Junction for flood work along the Mic-Whirther Run River.

Sometime during the date of November the 18th the Glandelinian miners had succeeded in making a seventy eight foot crevasse in the Meadow Lark Bluff at Meadow Munkle and by another blast it had been widened to over four hundred yards, and the ew break new break was flooding nearly eighty thousand acres of fresh land, and six small cities were expected to be inunda ed at any time.Therefore for this section preparations were bei being made in expectation of the coming waters waters household goods and the like being moved to upper floors and all merchandise in stores was being scaffolded or moved. Many times taking too much time and space to name here were also to be affected by the high waters. The tracks of the Evangeline St Clare and Heidi Junction railroad just south of Lucillie Ickson were washed out by the flood at this time and for the city ofGlorlannia the predicted stage of ten feet of water in her lower streets was reache was reached at night on the 19th but it was hoped from reports indicated that the water would soon soon w fall within a day or two. But despite this statement the residents of the city were expecting at least three weeks more of the high waters.

In the vinicity of Lucillie Ickson city on the 19th of November the date Evans reached Emperor Hansons army at Liegsburg Landing all land for the residents of this location was in sight, and the waters were rapidly leaving the streets of the city. Therefore with the gradual passing of the flood crest the day before at Lucillie Ickson came the relief from the tenictension which had gripped that district for more than thr e three weeks and within a short period the many families forced to abandon their homes, or seek refuge on the upper floors were soon coming back to clean up. The Aronburge Run River from Havana Calverinia, to the Angeline Vine state traveled over by many boats pre sented a traffic problem to the remaining inundated towns in the Lucillie district, and instead of driving the people off the streets the flood had caused them to come out of their damp water logged homes in small boats, and therefore boats could be seen ever where, and therefore the result in the streets of these places are as upset as would Be state and Madison in Chicago itself would be if the traffic police went on strike.

Large portions of Havana, Glorlannia, Andundon, Necklebury, and little Ickson including St Michael were still under water from two to ten feet in depth. The people attired in hip boots and knickers enter boats and canoes of or strongly made rafts from their second story windows and paddle off either for sight seeing of the main flood, or for shopping, children go in swimming where the water current is not strong and enjoy the flood as if a pasetime at the old swimming hole...

Now and then also are heard the clashing of oars and loud warninge of impeding bumps..Children, and the curious and the rescue workers add to the congestion, and therefore accidents were numerous and many comical, and the city fathers of the towns were taking steps to regular the traffic before any one is drowned.. Most of the residents of the valley profitted by the danger warning of a coming flood and moved to safe spots before this flood caught them. No one needed to be rescued from houses in the Lucillie Ickson district as far as known except that in Lucillie Ickson itself the Angelinia Agathia river coast guard effect two rescues of marooned families in the late hours of the night of November the 17th during a forced cruise to the main flood when a building occupied by the families on the upper floor became afire through some mysterious causes.

Shortly before midnight, there was a light seen in the sky wi which tells of a fire and the rescue crew going to investigate saw a long house afire on one end and from the roof the guards took three families, who had been marooned in the building for a week and were living on water and raw food. They were caught because the boats they used to communicate them from street to street broke loose and were swept away out of their reach. In the open four square of Lucillie Ickson a floating house drifted toward

Grow orett street and the rescue crew took a whole family of alverinians out of its upper floors. Those rescued were brought to Big Girl Knool. Other crews of the rescuers were ordered to proceed the same night from Big Girl Knool whether they had gone from Lucillie icksen to Dorothy Gale city ti aid in relief work among refugees brought to that section. The Commander of the Red Cross at Dorothy Gale Gale notified the Big Girl Knool crew that their services were so desperately needed that if the boats could be taken from the river and shipped by train, the relief work would make good headway, ( providing the train is not also interfered with by the " beautiful gentle Glandelinian skunks.) Glandelinian hordes.

A passenger on the Mic-Shirther River boat on the lower stretch of the Aronburge run his point of vision( provided it can be pointed) twenty to thirty five higher than it would be in normal water, saw a sea of water, trees protro a forest of trees protruding out of the water like seaweed, and then more water. He did not know whether he was still on the river or whether he went to sea. All the way downstream, the scene was like a sea which you could not at all see across for any distance. It however was placid, the surface broken occassionally by the ridges of enemy blasted levees in front and floating houses moving back and forth.

Here and there this lone curiousity seeker, saw a hardy farmer living on a well made raft in the length of a barge with his horse and cow and a few bales of hay and his small family. Rabbits and all kinds of game have been driven to ha what remains of the leves(he,he,he,he) but the birds still enjoyed the sanctuary of the tree tops rising high above the water and a perfect tumult of bird song was heard throughout the day. Yet doctors in all towns along the river reported that the disease had practically continued to spread at an alarming rate, although in several of the towns an epidemic of the measles was wide spread when the water rose. County farm and state agents along the river reported to the authorities at Angelinia Agathia that in the Lucillie ickson district to two hundred thousand to five hundred thousand farm land is stil under water and that they have notbyet made any estimate on the loss suffered by the farmers. And after the flood waters do drain away which may take several weeks for this location no fresh crops can be planted untill the next year, and the loss of domestic animals and many millions of bushels of wheat and grain has been the most serious blown suffered by the farmers.

Plans were already under way to build up most of the blasted levees in spite of the fact that the leves districts have beenrepeatedly warned that the old levees should been abandoned and new ones with spills builded further back. All the farmers and all town folk stick to their belief that General John Manley and all his followers, were respo b responsible for the disaster.

While Big Girl Knool and lower and upper Angelinia and Calverinia states perfected their plans day after day for the flood emergency, acute and dangerous situation presented themselves in the Big Girl Knool and other reaches of the Mic-Shirther Run ca valley, as the waters swept into new towns, and immensely threatened to increase the horses of homeless. Count e Biff( whom the enemy call" A big Stiff") having completed some of his surveys of the flood area reported at Big Girl Knool that he estimated the death list quite near two thousand of drowned, that more than one million five hundred thousand were added by another one hundred thousand homeless,, and more than a billion dollars lost in the states swept by the inland sea.....

Continual abandonment of all low lands in southeastern Angeline ine, northern, southern Calverinia and other states continued while renewed calls for ships boats and refugee trains food and other aid and more soldiers to fight Glandelinian hidden snipers and cannoneers, poured into the Red Cross and military headquarters at Angelinia Agathia and other places..... The most urgent calls for aid were being recieved on the 16th of. ovember from Black Berry Run as back waters from the Wickey Lansin levee break at Wicky Lansin submerged the country side and the water still continued to pour out in the same volume while the government was making out plans to try and check this terrible torrent before the whole of northern Angelinia and the entire of the Calverinian state be devastated. The towns of Poltburg, Mountain ose, and Blue Bell were submerged so deep that not a house was seen above water, the so with Wickey Lansin and towns hit by the effect of the explosion, and fresh reports of outbreaks of disease in all the refugee camps throughout the flooded districts of both countries complicated the already dangerous situation as boats and ships continued to search for marooned persons or drew huge barges and rafts of logs filled or covered with re refugees to the concentrat ion camps.

The Wickey Lansin break on the Mic-Shirther Run near Wickey Lansin continued to belch its torrents of water into the fertile Mic-Shirther Run country side, the flood thus spreading more and more and driving added thousands from their homes in the Pansy and Sunflower district. Leon city e far east of Wickey Lansin was already going under water and felt the advance of the wave in the low lands west of the city. The city of Leon itself was not in any grave danger since most of it is on g high ground out urgents calls for aid had been continually dispatched in order that the thousands of inhabatants of the low farm lands in that location across from the city may be brought to the city to safty. Boats from the city itself took some away. At the town of Waterport where the lives of thousands were in danger was sought by ships and boats speeding from other points where rescue work had been well advanced. The leves engineers also believed that the four weeks of heroic work spent on the other leves and their being well guarded might prove absolue absolutely successful following what the Abbiannians call a miracle when the Glandelinians in exploding one of the levees caused the debris of it to settled settle back into a high impassable pile which prevented the outflow of waters after all. The vigiliance however was not relaxed and more men and sand bangs guarded by soldiers were rushed to the scene where a break would widen the vast inundated area in southeastern Angelinia and increase by manyfeet the depth of ater water in the many towns. A report prepared by many persons of high standing estimated the flood damage to southeastern Calverinia alone at more than three hundred million dollars. It showed many hundreds of thousands of a acre under water and nearly four hundred thousands persons affected in many counties. All the families in that section would be compelled to start life anew, and one per cent of the families are foreigners.

The refugees in the concentration camps at Lucillie ickson city now numbered more than a hundred thousand, and supplied with food by all the relief agencies, the refugees cooked their own meals by the light of thousands of camp fires gleaming along the lowrr slopes of Gloriannia heights from Ophelia to Rickson City. More than six thouns thousand otyers were brought into the camps the day later as the evacuation of the flooded territories continued.

Another report from Lucillie ickson City said that there were fifteen to sixteen thousand refugees on the main Aronburge un Levee at Rickson Landing who must be taken off unless and adequat e adequate means are provided to house and feed them. Investigators were dpspatched dispatched from the red Cross. The town of Ophelia though also flooded was caring for fifty thousand persons, many of whom were housed in box cars and tents while it was planned to take thousands of others to Rose Hill where another Concentration camp under guard was concentrated. Lever Angeline ine was also filled with refugees and was not able to take care of those pouring into the town and territory around ickson Run where a new levee broke a few days before, not before explosions but because it was being swept away by the pressure of the flood. The flood situation presented the gravest health and other problems Abbiannia had ever faced outside of war times even. The entire fresh water supply in the flood areas were all out of commission and there was no way whatever to handle the waste and dangers of all kinds even face the concentration camps because of enemy snipers trying to fire into the very camps and the coming of the winter climate was adding to the danger.

Yet there was no expectations of the dangers to health reaching its peak untill the flood waters would starte start to recde recede but if winter came on good there would be no real danger from stagnation. Yet men women and children their strength already weakened by exposure had been crowded too thickly in some of the refugee camps but there was no fear of any contagious diseases of dangerous character with real winter soon coming on.

But there were outbreaks of mumps and measles and even whooping cough and scarlet fever in all of the camps and the Red Cross had to make added precautions to prevent serious outbreaks for even their own members at least a number of them even caught the disease. Great sickness mostly from severe fall colds produced by explosure was reported from the Calverinian concentration camps but vaccinations for colds and other precautionary measures were being taken as rapidly as all means were available.

In Turmer State the Red Cross extended its etpost in order that it might be on the scene with instant succor should the Glandelinians succeed in breaking the main levee where thousands of armed men were toiling to strengthen bulwarks and fight off the attacking Glandelinian.

Levees in that section not observed by the Glandelinians were reported in good condition but no chances were being taken nevertheless. Thousands of soldiers armed to the teeth patrolled the embankments to fight off Glandelinians or to give warning of impending breaks or to guard against possible mining. Meanwnile the northern Turmer districts flooded poured their inhabatants into Lucillie ickson, Oh Ophelia and other safer towns. At this time the Sunbeam Creek flood was receding, and it was believed as long as the stream recieved no more waters from the main flood the river would continue to fall steadily but slowly.

The Royal Administration was again considering the control of future floods. future floods made by the enemy and the nation was even asked to provide means to prevent a reoccurance of the present da disaster. One of the head members of the Head committees who worked with the Red Cross during the Emergency pointed out that flood control measures not only would prevent such a loss of life and property but would be advantageous in debeloping after the war hydro-eletric powerDisease and starvation hit about two hundred thousand of the refugees of the million not rescued yet and desperate means were being taken to gain access to them.

Further and more startling reports that a full army of Glandelinian soldiers were on the a way to break the main levee south of Big Girl Knool turned every citizen between Big Girl Knool and Lucillie ickson and Henrietta into a minute man shortly after the news was reached. A large detatchment of "inkie Abyssinkillian soldier s was immediately dispatched to strengthen the guard on the levee and the roads and high ways, and by the tims the militiamen reached their pst they found the roads blocked by citizenry, and the levee crowded with trapper and other guards, and truck farmers, all heavily armed. The soldiers reinforced them since the announcement that the Glandelinians would explode T.N.T at the levee on the earlier date than mentioned before before of armies moving from other points to reinforce Emperor Hanson at Lieghburg Landing feelings had bee been bitter in the areas threatened. Threats also had been made of by Glandelinians Glandelinians to cut other levees above and near Big Girl Knool, and so soldiers levee Guards and even residents from the city itself went out to watch these levees, but the Glandelinians so far did not appear. The general manager of the board of commissioners of the River ports of Big Girl Knool and Henrietta city had requested a large guard of soldiers and marines to accompany him and his party, when he makes a tour of the area still in danger to estimate the claims and damage if the region happened to be inundated. because of the landGlandelinians.

The city commissioner also designated as head supervisor of all levees of the Aronburgs Run River also had soldiers and marines accompany him as guards for it was feare feared Landelinians would attempt to assassinqte assassinate him. n examination of An exmanation of the leves threatened to be broken by the foe was also made by Count De Biff and his party on the 20th of Nob november and while this was being done Glanuelinians in a far distant clump of trees surrounded by the flood fired at him and his followers and they had to lie low untill the militia answered the fire with good effect.....

The residents of the endangered region were alarmed and all the citizens were out to make sure the Glandelinians would not ac irreparable damage to the huge dikes.

The levees d along the Aronburgs Run from Henrietta to Big Girl Knool were in good condition and the engineers said they were capable to withstanding the assaults of a high water crest equal to the fury of a tidal wave. ut if they are blasted by the enemy millions of more acres of the most fertile land would be flooded in quick time, crops would be wiped out, and the loss of life would be dreadful.

The levee to the north was being remended which had been recently blasted but despite the work seeming to be successful the engineers still were worrying, and keeping up their inspections....fourty rifle shots and shot and shell were fired on the west bank of the river, while the Secretary of the nations Nation was returning from an inspection trip of the orposed preventive of the levee break at Beldonbville supposedly from Glandelinians, or from a leves protection guard who might have mist ook the ship for a Landelinian craft coming to dynamite a levee.

There was feared a possibility that the grrat numbers of men protecting the big leves would not save Big Girl Knool from the flood fi waters if the Landelinians should come any way and in overwhelming numbers. While the break would increase the floos to a terrible extent it was also estimated accordin to the egi engineers that theyhave found an an unknown factor which would result also in the waters from reflooding the Sunbeam Creek in such a way as to extend the flood southward as far as Angeline Junction and that these waters flowing from the parent flood, would therefore overflow the Angeline Run stream and cause it to inundate an inundate bread expanses of landxs in their downwar downward course tward the city. Then through natural drainage canals these waters would abso lutely return to the Mic-Whirther again to swell anew the flood tide which by the break would have been temporarily lessened at Lucillie Hicksen.

Should these waters reach the Angeline Run river near Angeline city in time to extend and raise the flood so immensely a serious situation for the whole of southern Abbiesnnia would be possible, and the nation jeopardized, the engineers said...

The continual rumors of the enemy making plans and attempts to dynamite the levees at very points below Big Girl Knool caused the soldiers guarding them to be still more increased in numbers and a detatchment of National Guardsmen were sent to the vinicity after reports had been recieved that Landelinians planned to dynamite the levees and attack the guards in overwhelming force. It was reported that at some leves the Landelinians did try an attack in overwhelming numbers but were worsted after severe fighting for several hours. The death list of the Aronburgs Run section of the flood had been estimated at three hundred with the droonings of several families near pillier villiage, and several others when a small levee was dynamited.

And stirred by unusual sporadic looting and vandalism of business houses at Lucillie Hicksen by Glandelinians in disguise the military aurthorities proceeded to comb the streets day and night in motar boats to shoot down every strange person leaving a store in any suspicious manner and carrying bundles. The guards recieved orders to shoot to hit, unless summons to halt are made and to arrest all persons found on the streets who not being refugees cannot prove they are resigents of Lucillie Hicksen or other flooded to sections after the curfew hour or nless they can show an official pass.

Five persons claiming to live on south Hickforder street Big Girl Knool city all their lives were arrested in Lucillie Hicksen wail while caught on the charge of looting and were held on the second floor of the city jail while investigators went to Big Girl knool to find out if they lived there. They came back with the statement that those houses were never occupied by any persons by those names and therefore they were held as Glandelinian vandals in disguise. police officials and the national guard aurthorities declared no mercy will be shown to persons arrested for roppery and making fires while the districts were flooded, and would give to them the same punishment given to vandals vandals. The conditions in the refugee camp and town of Lucillie Horden generally were des r described as satisfactory with no id indication of any outbreak of disease, but nevertheless these places too had been attacked by Glandelinian vandals, some had been roo robbed, tents were set on fire, and six buildings in the town burned. Even throughout southeastern Angeline Vine, Turner State, to central southern Calverinia and elsewhere new caravans joined the armies of refugees on the march in the face of floods or threats of floods, and they too reported being attacked by Glanuelinians and robbed. Thousands moved out of the western Big Girl Knool levee districts carrying their possessions and abandoning their homes and farms to be deliberately flooded by the foe to prevent the advancing of christian armies tward Lieghburg Landing.

Army enginners were stilldoubtful were still doubtful whether so many men protecting the levees could resist the Glandelinians long. And as the flood waters till still continued to inundated additional towns and farms in northern Angelinia and southern Calverinia, Red Cross agencies were bending every energy to relieve situations there, described as desperate, and yet the Red Cross soon reported of being fired on by snipers, and being robbed of their own supplies by Glandelinian vandals and their tents set on fire. Also rising waters from the Flood near the south region reached more towns and villiages on the 20th and increased the flood depths at Dorothy Gale city also and many other big places where large numbers of refugees were gathered. Hundreds who had sought refuge in Caldwell abandoned that town and marched to Marcecillo ofr to Marcocellio where more than fourty thousand refugees were already being cared for and then the inhabatants and refugees of that town too were forced to go.

Across the Mic-Whirther Run the flood waters still poured through the Wickey Lansin break above the submerged city and was pushing gradually out the huge lake in the lower Aronburgs Run Valley flooding half a dosen more towns completely under water entirely making total of more than three hundred now entirely out of sight under the water..

Emperor Vivian had recieved reports also that probably almost as great a territory as already flooded now will yet be flooded in Southern Calverinia if the break in the Wickey Lansin levee does not recieve some desperate attention as if must be closed somehow. Reports from Big Girl Knool - Big girl Knool showed two hundred and eighty thousand refugees concentrated in thirty towns which also were being flooded, and then that Greenbaum, Leland, Longdell, and Pecon were completely under water, and that only the tops of the biggest buildings at Little Girl Knool was above water. While plans were being worked out to relieve Big Girl Knool from the impending flood the battle along levees with attacking Glandelinians, and with the rising and extending flood continued most desperately and with unabated energy up river and along other points of the edge of the flood tide.

Desperate and most strenou strenous activity was necessary to also prevent the Glandelinians from startening a s threatened break at the Feilding plantation about thirty six miles west of Vandalia, when Glandelinians ten thousand in number made a fier fierce attack, while others during the confusion sought to place the explosive to blow both the levee and the defenders up into the air. Several thousand men were thrown des perately to work to prevent the placing of the explosives, while the remainder drove off the assailants, and thus so far prevented a break. Other attacked spots brought the possibility of a break in the chain, even then thr thirty thousand additional acres of farm lands were added to the already flooded area in the Aronburgs Run district when the Landelinians in making an attack did succeed in bursting a levee at Cricket Junction and killed two hundred defenders with the force of the explosion and captured the remainder. Only four or five acres above Cricket Junction remained above water, and eleven thousand persons manybof them farmers, fled to the hills persued by the ruthless Glandelinians who strove to shoot down their children. Boat transportation boat transportation was the only means of reaching Cricket junct Junction but the persons could not be reached as the Landelinians fired on all boats attempting to go to the rescue of the marooned with telling effect.

Two thousand persons had been driven from their homes in another section of the same district and were seeking safty on Beldon hill a few miles from Cricket Junction but found that hill in possession of Glandelinian soldiers and a rebel camp, and they had to take their chances with the flood then with the Glandelinians. Big Girl Knool was to be ruled by a civilian dis dictator untill the flood subsided according to Emperor Vivians decree, and he through CountbDe Biff appointed the Calverinian governer as director of the flood situation in the states. Emperor Vivian felt that the danger to the Big Girl Knool city with its two million population will be increased by the break in the a main levee which he felt sure would result in an extreme inundation between Henrietta and Loriannia, and that the flood might wreck a tremendous loss in the very Lucillie Hicksen districts unless immediate measures of levee protection can avert it.

" The nation should take a lesson from this big flood" said the Emperor. Two thousand lives have already been lost because of the flood alone, fifty thousand have perished because of explosions shaken cities into ruin; two million persons have been driven from their homes more than a billion dollars worth of destruction has been committe caused and the flood is still increasing. The floods of the river can be controlled in spite of the enemy if goo - good engineering works are installed. Thirty of our states have suffered the effect of this flood but of more positive interest is the fact that no part of the nation can suffer a loss without that loss reflecting onto eve y every other part. The people in this vast region who contribute so much to national wealth shoul should be relieved of this anxiety and terror. It is a national problem and should be solved nationally and vigorously. I have because of the flood ordered my brother laying before Lieghburg Lansing to take no prisoners during battle. The way the Glandelinians war with us we'll war with them. Because of these Glandelinians the worse dangers of the big flood is to come, but what surprises me more and which makes me respect my nation much more and creates a willingness in me to fight it out with Glandelinia to a finish in behalf of Abbiesannia is that the six hundred million relief fund sought by the Red Cross though it is not really enough to care fo for flood victims and to create protected camps went far above what had been expected nevertheless and is still coming in. Not only does the extent of the l flood and the desperate attempt of the enemy to increase it and the destitution already i c incurred require even more than a bi llion dollars but the crest of the flood has not yet reached the southern p a rt of the stu es states thus inflicted The Red cross has already a u burden far exceeding its present appeal, and twenty thousand soldiers have lost their lives in their defense of the levees in the many conflict with the Glandelinians."

Emperor Vivian had recieved a telephone message from Gallensburg that the hope of saving the levee there from the Glandelinian attackers has been abandoned, and the residents in the area were being warned to leave at once.

The picturesque city of Big Girl Knool of two million people turned hopefully the next day November the 21th 27th for continued salvation from the floods which already have laid waste more than thirty thousand square miles of the richest area in the Calverin and Angelinia countries in the Mic-Whirther Run River states. The hope was staked on the successful preventive of the enemys attempts to break in the main levee outh south of Big Girl Knool by the patrols and many pointed out to the city authorities the spot where the Glandelinians had propsed to set the explosive charges where they had intended to make the first biggest crevasse in the hundreds of miles of levees ever found necessary in all the history of past Mic-Whirther Run River war floods. This spot was directly opposite the point of the battle ground of Genitori the original scene which dates back to the days of Glandelinian control in this section untill driven out by general Gladerlinia. All those versed in river engineering however said that there would be little of the dramatic about the actual break itself if the enemy did succeed, that probably the explosions would only make small openings and not really weaken the great stretch of levee with the mighty run rush of waters stopped before they would complete the break.

This would mean howe however if the enemy was successful that the inundation of the Lucillie Ricksen and Henrietta districts would be very gradual with time still left for the hundreds of thousands of refugees to join the caravans of refugees. selection of the place for the break was pointed out by colonel Harder who cruised down the flooded region with Count De Riff, representive of Emperor Vivian in the flood area, chief of army engineers, and acting chairman of the Red Cross.

As the party was returning upstream on a government craft, there came from the east bank a volley of shots, and two on board the ship were hit. Investigation by spy glasses revealed that the shots came from a horde of Glandelinians hidden in bush, but most of the shots which continued to be directed at the launch went wide of their mark. Then shells followed the rifle shots, and the guns placed on board the ship quickly responded with lively affect the shells hitting the bushes and putting the rebels immediately to flightThroughout the whole country there had been a most tense feeling ever since the cause of the floods were made known and the population of the whole nation was fiercely angered. Yet while prepared for any disaster state aur aurthorities feared no open resistance by the enemy when stronger foe es force forces moved to the scenes of the threatened breaks to carry out the drastic plan for the protection of Big Girl Knool and the other towns and cities in her district. The hope of those who suggested this desperate means of relieving Big Girl Knool of danger was also strengthened by forcasts from the war department, an official statement declaring that the levees would be guarded more strongly every day untill the enemy was driven altogether out of the territor territory that Vivianna was already near ed with his monsterous army. The crest of the flood by this time was between Henrietta and Beldon cities with the exact location not yet known but that the water was rapidly rising at Chamberlane where the flood that still poured through the Bickey Lansin levee break was finding a entrance into a portion of the Mic-Hollester Run River and threatening to start a flood in that location. But before the flood crest reached here some of the flood waters from the levees of the Aronburgs Run river Run River which continued to spread anew over the territory of its valley inunda diting more towns and once more threatening Lucillie Ricksen, was rejoining the Mic-Whirther through the Sunbeam creek and Erminie and other creeks, which also already have recieved so much water that they too were becoming raging seas of their own.

Perhaps the worse break over the entire flood area as recently stated had occured with the blasting of the Bickey Lansin dike which continued to throw flood waters from the flooded river into the lower end of Henrietta city and inundating fifteen hundred thousand additional acres of the Aronburgs Run delta section.

From all sections of northern Angelinia and southern Calverinia urgent calls for aid were recieved as backwaters from the flooded Aronburgs Run submerged the towns of Hendro and pedro to the tops of their highest houses and the surrounding country side. It was already reported that despte despite the resistance they recieved the glandelinian soldiers had succeeded in making new breaks in railroad river levees in Angeline vine state with thousands are made homeless and the streams of refugees from Henrietta and Helkingtorn continueing, while threatens of Glandelinians driving the soldiers from the Henrietta levee was also reported. Count De Riff and Big Girl Knool officials stood on the top of the levee with blue prints before them as they determined upon the wi site where the Glandelinians would attempt to make the break which would inundate eight thousand square miles more of farming, and city grounds and marsh lands. If they were not prevented.

Even to this day the health aurthorities of all the twnty state swept by the Mic-Whirther Run River floods increased their efforts and those by the Red Cross and Catholic elief Societies to protect the health and lives of more than two million Homeless Persons." Called into conference by the National medical officer of the Red Cross Doctor B.J. Caldwellian, the health aurthorities were told that they faced solving, " The greatest war time health and life saving problem ever confronted a Red Cross corn corn throughout the world in all disasters combined"

' pisease stalking in the wake of the flood, Glandelinian soldiers hidden in ambush snipping not only refugees and rescuers, but religious persons and members of the Red Cross, enemies secretly entering such camps and occassionally starting fires that wiped out thousands of tents, was jeopardizing life and health inthe whole two sections of Calverinia and Angelinia, and Doctor Caldwellian was trying to plan what could be done to stop every bit of this. He asserted that prompt and great measures were needed to prevent both the flood disease, and also the enemy snipers from taking a greater toll of lives, and that every soldier regim nt that could be spared should patrol all points of landsnot touched by the flood, or land surrounded by water and hunt out and destroy every bushwacking nest they could find, and to " Take no prisoners".

In his plea Doctor Caldwellian was joined by the National director of relief for the Catholic Relief society Cardenial Peddia who related that a staff of one hundred and eighty four thousand nurses was needed, and that the dreaded small pox, measles, mumps typhoid fever, tuberculosis, influenzu and other diseases such as bad colds and death colds due to germs and exposure in the flooded areas was increasing in alarming numbers. and threatening the nation with plague.

With the entire water supply in the flooded area put out of commission, another menance lay in the path of all the doctors who must co conquer the aftermath of the flood which may follow if the winter weather comes latevaccination for every one assurance of safe drinking water, and mile milk through proper sanitaion and immediate isolation of all cases of disease were proposed to the health officials as the most effective measures to combat the situation. "very point Or from every point of the newly districts struck by the flood the most imperative calls for rescue boats came. 10,000 persons were reported marooned in the lowlands near Caldwell like, and ships and boats were hastily dispatched to take them off, and did rescue them but under fire from Glandelinian snipers, und even met artillery and gas bombs. Still other thousands for the most part freed child slaves from flooded orphan asylums and orphans themselves were found perching on floating houses, barns and trees in the valley of the Sunflower creek and were rescued with great difficulty but all were na saved. Urgent calls for gun boats and large armed craft to combat the glandelinian snipers also were sent out.

Emperor also said it in another statement.

"The biggr biggest rivers in this country should be guarded strongly on all their largest s and smallest levees and also another way to prevent these dreadful war floods is to deepen the rivers so that the water does not even reach a level with the levee at the flood stage.This can be done by dredging at of its bed the innumerable trees that the flood had uprooted and lodged in the channel, causing sand reefs and sandbars rendering the river wider and shallower and hindering the efforts of navigation when at a low stage.

From time to time during this disaster whole floods have been uprooted and strung along the bottom of the channel, and these therefore when the flood has subsided and the enemy has been driven from the region should be rapidly removed and placed at the head of the sliuf sloughs, and the river bed therefore free of such obstruction would finally deepen itself.. And exposed and shelling banks should be protected by strongly made piles driven in front of them, and from Pandora to Angelinia Gathia a line of massive reservior dikes strong enough to even defy explosives and earthquakes should be and can be built and filled in flood time to replenish the water of the river when at a low stage.And such a system of reservioirs and spillways,, should be diplicated on the upper waters of all the big branch rivers of the mighty Mic-Hollester and the ernormous Erminie Rivers as well.....Many of my most highest commissioned men, the members of the Chief Gemini pureaus and others including my own rel relatives have wondered how it could have been possible why the enemy is on the worse ramapge of all times, and being able to cause such ernormous damages as these disasters.We have not been even conscious of such exception weather conditions during this part of the year, of which the enemy took full advantage of to bring on such an exceptional disaster.

The preparation for the great floods feared by the enemy in making should have begun at the start of the war. And to say the whole nation is startled to know that this is not the only flood raging. Excl Explosions have occured near Scholader town and fires are raging in forests and the cities of Sperryville and Orientown because of the explosion, and I have recieved reports that the convussion of the explosion had broken or

939 shaken from its foundations o the levees of Lake Selicia and brought on a flood 940 that though not one third as ext extensive as this one has nevertheless wiped out an ernormous t numm number of towns several big cities, and a whole country side and more than a million lives are unaccounted for. There are other floods also joining this, and an ernormous forest fire all out of prope proportions are wiping out many thousands of acres of forests in a dau and day and rendin rendering hundreds of thousands homeless. causing damage to many millions of doilors worth of trees not adding of floods. This big flood covering more ground however than that from Lake Selicia ois passing eastward and southwardo over twenty of ar Calverinian and Angelinian States, our own capitol and Big Girl nool and a score of other big cities are threatened, and the flood is finding its way into all streams making them risi rise high above their own mark, though this ought to be a floodless seuson.

I suspected from the start that the enemy was going to start on a monsterous flood and I and all aurthorities had sounded warnings and had guards watching all levees.
Can our government do anything in such a situation of three disasters, two big life destro destroying floods, and a score of forest fires, and many death dealing esplosions.,?
All it has been doing is to give warning, as in case of violent storms, and I had also sent out flood warnings as much as six months in advance. The disregard of my warnings is the main responsibility of the great loss of lives as the foolish people would not even take the word of their own Righteous Emperor thinking perhaps I was only cracking a joke.
Now look at the situation. But as Gemini Leader Hendro Parker chief of the Gemini headqua rters of spies reminds us, prediction is not at all as good as prevention. Prevention firs first and warnings afterwards is my motto" he said.

That is the duty of the nation now to see that prevention overtakes predko prediction. It is probably the greatest physical task of Abbieannia's entire history and calls for the best engineering and scientific knowledge and skill to be had. We have surely procrastinated to long. We have been teached a costly lesson by the enemy and ought to make use of it before its true force has been entirely forgotten. but this of course does not mean that we ought to act with inconsiderate haste for on the contrary the problem should be deeply and comprehensively made up and deliberated and thought over, and the enemy should be overcome first of all."""

The whole of Abbieannia might have known of the second disaster occuring at Schloeder town for the news papers throughout the country reported it as thus;;

"Angelinia Agathia, November the 15th [redacted] or 1912.
Concussion of severe explosions believed to have been felt in or around Schloedertown and perryville ccaused concussions to affect many towns and villlages throughout the district, including Angelinia Agathia, whose concussion dodestroyed a number of church steeples, many small houses, and flooding the sidewalks wit, broken glass from the wondows of many tall buildings. Trees, and window glasses in residences were also damaged but no one was injured, and whatever exploded, has caused serious forest fires to break out placing Irlenetown and many other places in danger, while another flood of immense proportions have suddenly developed from Lake Selicia causing a terrible loss of life.

ANOTHER LEVEE BLAST INCREASES THE FLOOD..
HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS MORE ARE DRIVEN FROM THEIR HOMES..
ORDERS STERN MEA U MEASURES TO PRENT THE BIG GIRL KNNOL DIKE FROM BEING BLASTED BY THE ENEMY. RESIDENTS GIVE RESISTAINCE RESISTANCE.
ANOTHER BIG LEVEE IS BLANTED DURING FLOOD.

IT happened on the 18th of November that the levee at Caldwell Junction of the Mic-Whirther Run had been definetly been broken by Glandellinians who blasted it after driving off its brave defenders during a fierce close quarters fight, and the citizens and soldiers who defended the levee narrowly escaped with their their lives.. At the moment the blast was set off it tore an explosion entrance and made an opening sixty yards wide and two hundred long, and fresh flood waters was rushing on through to the districts of Henrietta narrowly catching a whole army encamped there in the torrent and the soldiers had to abandon all camp provisions and everything in the short time they had to flee to the hills to safty. The flood swept every tent away hundreds of thousands of them, and started pushing the barracks off their foundations and floating some of them away. It was believed the opening would be exerting good effect in preving preventing christian armies from advancing in that direction as two other immense camp ful full of soldiers had been surprised and every one narrowly escaping from drowning.
Two other town towns were flooded by this new greak break and other towns in the path of the new wave from the north end break on the Aronburge Run River have also been entirely swept away, and Red Cross laborerers and camp refugees surprised there laborered feverishly to evacuate the towns before the flood was upon them. But the Red Cross and the refugees have been marooned there for several days after on floating fragments of houses and improvished rafts and immense drifts and floes of wreckage. More than fifteen hundred persons had been seperately the number of inhabatants of these towns and though they escaped with their lives, along with the refugees they had sheltered they had with their very eyes seen their homes and all their belongis brlonging swept away beyond all hope of recovery.

The town of Little Heidi was also suddenly overwhelmed by this break and the toll of the human life taken by the flood in this town leaped up to two hundred and twenty.
Three large streams were flowing that night through the breaches made by the enemy dynamiters in the new Mic-Whirther Run levee fifteen miles south of Henrietta City even after dramatic and desperate preparations and fighting by the soldiers and citizens to relieve the city from the flood menance had continued to the last. That night the engineers estimated about one thousand cubic feet of water per second was passing through each of the three breaks.

At Henrietta at this time the rivers flow of itse it its own self was placed by the experts at one million five hundred thousand feet a sc second, and officials had expected that if the enemy did succeed in making the break in the levee it would release 1,234,567 feet per second, and lower the whole section of the river at this point into Henrietta city and quadruple the disaster. But the night passed and the river had not been lowered by the slughish streams at the break, and successive explosions of dynamite buried deep in the huge walls of earth thrown up to hold the river to its course caused fortunately only three small trenches throughwhich the water seemed at first reluctant to run, and many men were rushed to the the scene with carloads of sun bugs and pick and shovel and most of the breaks were being mended before the waters gradually gained in volumne but its movements had been so unsatisfactorily to the enemy, that it was feared they would come again and place several additional charges of stronger explosives to accelerate the flow and cause a grave disaster...

They feared that even on the fol owing moring the Glandellinians would again resort to durther y dynamiting, although some engineers and soldiers again guarding the levee were of the opinion that the force of the current itself might gradually open the small artificial channels which in their opinion were even too far gone to be mended entirely, untill a sufficient volume was drawn to sweep out the levee for a distance of many miles or more. This view also was shared by the War Department here which sent out a special flood warning late that day forcanting that the enemy would succeed in making a break ot or two of probably ten thousand feet or more, or sufficient in the opinion of the experts to increase the extent of the flood bothat Henrietta and lower down the river.

was little save for the dashing about of plice and military soldiers and citizens there
According to the spectular about the creation of the first crevasse in this dike.
the soldiers and citizens who had been unable to withstand the assault of the overwhemling numbers of Glandellinians the first charge of dynamite was set off at four oclock in the evening more than two hours ahead of the time expected. There was a loud roar heard for two or three miles away and a tremendous geyser of dirt and smoke.

As this settled( providing the water flow allowed it to settle) it was seen by the survivo survivors of the defenders who fe survived the conflict that the first effort had created a ditch some eighteen feet deep and probably six feet wide or more( a hundred and fift, sticks of dynamite having been used at this first chagre) through which the water begun to move slowly. The second and third detonations followed a few minutes later after the attacks of the defeners defenders failed to drive off the glandelinians and the Glandelin ians themselves rushed away expecting to see a migh mighty leap of the waters tward the lowlands some eighteen feet n beneath the crest of the river.

However a fairly good stream got under way in the first trench, but those in the second and third were sluggish and when the enemy moved off and out of sight the survivors of the defenders and a reinforcing army of workmen with pick and shovel and sandbags immediately went to work but were fired on hotly from a distance. However though working under fire, their efforts improved slightly"the situation, but the Glandelinians from a hiding place at a distance started firing artillery of big calibre which hurled big shells which exploded among the breaches and among the soldiers and workers driving them off the levee pellmell.

Coursing through the narrow trenches, the water continued to tumble over the edge of the precipice where the blasting of the earth had stopped and flowed down into the point where a section of the Altoon roads meants at Grand or Porunda Road near Empire Town which slowly was being inundated along a stretch of a hundred thousands yards.

Crossing the high way, the waters moved gently into a meadow, and then engroached encroached gradually upon the deserted little town of Mellville which spralwed out over the line dividing the St Bernard State with Turner State which by the enemy was selected as the point for the break. Then later on seeing that the flood was not going as they had expected the enemy kept hurling shells at the levee powerful shells, and so gradually undermined it that it finally let go a tremendous flood of water and the very defenders ha had to run for their lives. By night fall after engulfing three camps and sweeping away all the tents, and drowning out three towns the water was flowing slowly over other land, covering a part of the Lucillie Dickson and Angelinia Agathia railway tracks, and reaching out for a large number of other plantations.

And unless all calculations of the dike and levee engineers go amiss practically all of the state of Angeline vine now and a large portion of St Bernard State will be under water within a day. And should the expected roaring Niagara Niagara develope the most flimsy houses throughout Henrietta city itself and other big towns like Chamberlane and Ona would be swept away, and if the flood still continued to spread it was also believed it would in time make a junction with the one caused by the bursting of the dikes at Lake Selicia. In the far reaches of the districts where the flood waters will fortunate ly be several days in arriving, thousands refused to desert their dwelling s and already 10,000 more were homeless. These who refused to go including the home guards who are always accustomed to all kinds of floods and violent storms and even a war disasters of all kinds too, and who believe they are familiar enough to with the rivers to escape harm in the flow of broken levees.

Yet several more thousands of residents were seeking safty in flood menanced Big Girl Knool, untill now that city too was facing a tremendous problem of taking care of the refugees when it too was even being menanced by the flood waters of Lake Selicia which threatened to join the main flood in this direction and whose edge was only eight miles to the west. The state of Peru was also menanced in Angelinia when the waters of the flood swollen Aronburgs Gun Run was tearing through a two hundred yard gap blown by the enemy in the levee at the Altonia Bend which would completely inundate the whole state before long. Meanwhile it was discovered by the " Mo Mosquito Squadron" that the enemy was menancing four other dikes on the Mic-Whirther Run, and they sounded the warning, while on another levee where an army of men had labored for many days in even the cold weather untill the sweat soaked their clothing so to save the south Bend Levee, some hidden Glandelinian gunners with big cannons fired some bigvshells which started a break below the point where they had spent more than six hundred hours in continual battle with levee dangers, and Glandelinian snipers.

If this breach too is complete by gun fire at such long range the flood waters will pour into the territory already largely inundated from the previous breaks further up-stream. Therefore grave fears were felt by the relief workers for thousands of persons reported still marooned from the first flood wave, for the new breaks will raise the depth of the flood in many other towns and probably submerge them alltogether.

Already in some parts of the low land water was ten to thirty feet deep. Therefore the waters from this new break new break will leave scarcely a dry spot in Pr Peru State, except Marcocellio and Jennie Richee which already have housed inos the new breaks an additional 77,000 refugees making with adding to the 10,000 about eighty seven thousand, and the continual evacuation of many affected towns and villiages ocontinueing will make another 100,000. Many scouting patrols on the swiftest horses, spread the alarm by telegraph or army detonation signals, and a number of refugee trains were held in readiness. but still in the location of Lucillie Rickson so far, the flood waters were

SLIPPING AWAY BY THAT DATE FASTER THAN IT HAD AROSE, AND ALTHOUGH THERE WAS A HEAVY rain that night and morning it was doubtful if this would do more than retard the slow fall in the flood in the lower river. One of the rescuers whose name might have been Francis Doronio was commended by members of the military for the part he took in the ASSISTANCE OF A WHOLE FAMILY OF PERSONS HE RESCUED FROM HIS LITTLE ROWBOAT FROM A house top at 1987 Gloriannia street Gloriain city near Gloriannia. As he was rescuing them one of the little girls lost her balance from the roof top and fell into the water her foot striking the gunwale of the little boat so as to captsize it and throw the OTHERS IN THE WATER. THE RESCUER THEN DOVE INTO THE ICYWATERS AND HELD THE LITTLE GIRL up, swimming to the wall of the floating house with her. But there he or the others could find nothing tograsp, and they all almost went down before another rescue crew heard the crow cries of manywho thronged the shore of the flood, and coming up pulled THEM INTO THEIR OWN BOAT JUST IN TIME, FOR AT THAT MOMENT THE HOUSE PARTED IN TWO AND would have hurled them under the wreckage.

During this time there was held in Big Girl Knool another meeting which held for the first steps tward further and more protection of residents and homes of the parts of THE MIC WHIRTHER RUN VALLEY NOW FLOODED. H THE HEAD OF THE COUNCIL SAID:

" As chairman of the committee on flood control of the house of repren representives and personally desire to do everything possible to help first in driving out all the Glandelinians from the river districts. General Vivlannia is closing in on all points of the flood which he sees safe to go at and the enemy will soon be stopped in their FURTHER BREAKING OF DIKES AND LEVEES, I HAVE SET NOVEMBER THE 21TH AS A DATE FOR SUCH a time where all Glandelinian soldiers taken prisoners because of being near levees shall be questioned and forced by torture if necessary to reveal the true reason why they are commanded to bring on such disasters as these."

EMPEROR VIVIAN ON THE I'TH OF NOVEMBER MADE ANOTHER NATION WIDE APPEAL FOR ADDITIONAL flood relief funds. Because it was said that a new survey of the situation disclosed that the one billion dollar fund given out by so many of the rich people of the nation during the past weeks of this ernormous flood will not be sufficient, and that extra funds are needed now to care for surviving refugees from the Lake Selicia horror and the forest fires raging in consequence. Coincidentally it was announced that the new FLOOD WAS NOT MAKING ANY JUNCTION WITH THE OLD ONE BUT THAT NEVERTHELESS OPHELIA AND Chamberlane and Big Girl Knool were some what threatened and Angelinia Agathia too. The shipping companies announced that it had sent the biggest flood expeditionary force in its history, and that eighteen cruising cutters, eight hundred river cutters, a hundred patrol boats and as many motor driven boats as possible were needed to rescue THE MAROONED OF THE OTHER FLOOD. AND TRAINS WERE NEEDED TO RESCUE THOSE IN DANGER FROM the forest fires.

The ware water still pouredclike a torrent through the new breaks, three miles north of Henrietta and the other fifteen miles south, and nearly fifty miles southeast of Big Girlknool on the opposite side of tyne river the river. Other levees not broken by enemies were being buried out of sight by the flood waters however for the water was FLOATING OVER THE TOP IN MANY PLACES. AND THE E WATER WAS RISING OVER TEN INCHES IN A day. And the waters from these crevasses were hourly adding to the total square miles of submerged lands in the states, engulfing the famious grain districts and the breaks alone were increasing the agricultural losses of the states by eleven million dollars more and boostinga new total of hundreds of thousands being rendered homeless. When this flood was increased about a million acres more of land was submerged in a vast lake two hundred and twenty five miles wide and many thousand miles in length.

A new crevasse also blasted at Morgannia was reported to be six hundred yards wide with a wave of water eighteen to thirty feet deep d sweeping through the gap. Morgannia was being rapidlby abandoned and the whole adjoining territory also was being deserted.

A scouting party on a high hill near the crevasse said that the waters would reach Henrietta city within fourty eight hours. But it was hoped no lives would be lost even though the ccrest of the flood was moving steadily southward and westward. All roads in the immediate vinicity of the crevasses were thickly lned with refugees fleeing from the rushing tide, and day and night boats patrolled the levee line to take off many of those who went to the dikes for safty. The War depaetment reluctantly issued a warning that little relief could be expected along the Mic-Whirther Run as the flood waters was going higher than before and all attempts to prevent the enemy from bursting levees apparently was impossible. impossible.

And even as the Mic-Whirther Run and Aronburgs Run floods continued to extend on the 19th near Henrietta city water which overflowed the Angeline vine bank ofthe latter river near the Narrows northwest of Turner Bluffs undermined a large stretch of the Big Girl Knool Yellow Brick Roads in this section, trapping it was believed a large army of Nationals who were the object of a fe frenzied search by other army soldiers.

As so many tents were known to have been swamped and an army barracks of small size and large were seen floating in the flood waters, great anxiety for the command was felt, though it was hoped that it was possible that the soldiers might have reached higher groun ground. The State of Peru where many thousands of runaway child slaves before the war 943 found a haven of refuge was also menanced, and everyone in the state including all the children and others and even camps full of soldiers, were being forced to seek refuge. This beautiful picturesque country along the Mic-ghirther Run swamp regions was also in the path of the raging flood waters pouring through the many levee crevasses and all the waters was driving every one from the districts. Where the fields were beautiful with harvest crops of wheat, grain, oats, sugar cane, rice and so on, is now becoming a muddy torrent which rushing on southwestward, wrecking farm houses, small towns and spreading devastation upon the land whose people refugeed thousands of little runaway slaves a year before the war began. St Ann and other towns are flooded but no loss of life has occured.

The governer of the State of Angeline Vine whose capitol city itself reported three feet of water issued a proclamantion declaring that a public emergency existed and that all troops from camps not needed just now in the field of battle should muster out and defend every remaining levee as much as possible. And with nearly eight thousand cases reported Marco cellio was even taking every measure to prevent an epidemic of scarlet fever among the four hundred thousand refugees now being taken care of there, and the camps around it all on high ground. Emergency wards have been established and serum was being rushed there, as even cases of pellagra too was reported. Also a big crevasse in the Al deleheid and the gi wisher Leves at Glorianla point had widened to over four hundred yards, and that the new break was inundating one hundred and thirty vie t one hundred and thirty five thousand more acres of land. Two big towns in that district, Adeleheid, with a population of fifty thousand, and Clara city were being inundated and the inhabutants fleeing for their lives.

Large caravans of familes families were continuing in an endless rush into Big girl knool since the new breaks began after orders had been issued calling for the evacuation of the districts also threatened by the flood making nearly two hundred and fifty thousand persons homeless and causing property damage of twenty million doll dollars more, while more levees were cut below but a great distance from Henrietta city allowing the flooded mic-ghirther Run to rush over two hundred thousand acres in st Bernard state and peru but even this did not yet menance Big girl knool.

It was no now planned to have about one quarter of all the soldiers from the mobolization camps at Dorothy Gale city quartered on quartered on all the levees as big girl knool is determined to save itself, the state of Angelinia had approved of all the plan, and the Abbiesannian oyal government, had given its consent.

The state too had ordered out its entire nation al guard to aid the tremendous exodus from all the new districts threatened by the flood, to aid is the real word used but even if necessary the armed force will be used to compell the removal of the people and the sacrifice of their fall crops that their lives may be spared.

Armed guards including soldiers made up of volunteers and home guards and even women, and children the latter armed with sticks with nails, and rocks and sling shots were patrolling the leves for twenty to thirty miles below Big girl knool. The men themselves walk up and down their post rifles on their shoulders, grim and determined that their homes and lands shall not be inundated by the enemy just because the enemy wants to stop armies moving to the support of the armies besieging vivian vickey. Besides the women and children it was said that there were four thousand armed men, all citizens, and ten thousand soldiers, and large bodies of cavarly with artillery and hand grenades ready to dy die ready to die to prevent the Glandelinians from dynimating that good protecting levee. One of the commanders of the levee guards recieved a note sent by a landelinian officer that they are to order their armed men out of the district of the leved levee or a whole landelinian army would be sent to drive them out.

A party of men and even children with their mothers though at some risk were permited to visit the district in danger of being flooded. Near the historic battleground of Angeline ichee a soldier barred the road to all wagon and other such traffic.

"why are you doing this" an officer of the guard was asked.

"we must get every man woman and child, as well as their furniture and live stock out of these districts before the enemy do succeed in making the crevasse in case they drive off the dikes defenders." he replied.

But the Big Girl Knool party was permitted to go ahead, tille Violet paul town Violet-Paul town was reached. Thousands of wagons, persons on foot, caravans of asses were coming the other way. Every kind of vehicle was loaded to their utmost, with house hold articles and families. Live stock also was coming on the hoof, or in carts. Here was an overloaded wagon with one wheel running round crooked but not stopping. Childrens toys could be seen on others. A long wagon passed on with furniture which was piled six feet high over the top. Rickety carts, and all kinds of people were marching out from feet high.

Home and birthplace because the people were being ordered to go in case the disaster would cou occur.

The governer of the State of peru said;

"there are three hundred and fifty thousand people in the district of this state and if the enemy do succeed in blasting that monsterous levee we are going to lose everything. My own p.rsonal loss will run into the hundred thousand, and therefore I am going to follow the order of the Emperor and his oyal Royal Chambers and have the levee defe defensive defensive force increased. It is true the enemy is making out desperate plans to blow the levee here to prevent christian armies from advancing to reinforce Emperor Vivian at Lieghburg Landing, but if this comes so not only our land will be devastated but the highest streets of Big Girl Knool will have a depth of twenty to thirty feet of water... our only contention is that we should have the full chance to make the ruthless enemy pay un in us in full for all this wanton destruction. Even we hear of the dreadful perryville disaster happening now, whose flood has increased and killed over a million people, and of two big towns including Schloedertown being burned by fire and not a chance to do anything for reparation and redress. It is even a surprise that for such a nation Abbiannia is, with every one being so unusually good that even god allows us to suffer this, but it might for for our own good in the end. God has promished that the worse always comes for the enemies of the good in the end and I know this will cause a big disaster for Glandelinia too some day."

The perple of Big Girl Knool rode past Little Heidi right at the spot where it was planned by the enemy to loosen the river, and as far as Jennie Riches. Here ernormous families were seen quickly moving out of houses and into wagons. Such pretty little homes, such beautiful gardens and flowery fields and these all in danger. A man and o woman would puss carrying a huge bundle and one or two children his family having ho no wagon.

Not far away children were being marched out of a big orphan asylum. The building looked immense and too strong for a flood to damage and was three stories high, but when the superior was asked the reason why the Sister said;

"The flood might get so deep as to go over the roof of the building."

The whole home was being emptied and the children were being allowed to take what they could with them while a canning factory on the other side was loading wagons to be used for the provisions of the orphans. The Big Girl Knoolians including the citys mayor heard protests from the people gathered there.

"I'm fighting for my children" said one farmer." I want to educate them so they won,t need to grow up to be only farmers. My life work is at full stare now. If the enemy succeed in making this crevasse, I will be penniless, as well as homeless. I can't get a job in Big Girl Knool as too many refugees are there already. No one in anybtown surviving the flood can even rent me a home as no room is to be had." We have had our citizens standing guard here even all night, and for three weeks already day and night, about four thousand of us to save these levees. We know the glandelinians are wicked enough to blow up the levee here, disregard to the danger coming upon us. We by our taxes maintain the levee, a hundred thousand people or more paying to save the property of five hundred or more thousands, as well as the hundred thousand refugees in Big Girl Knool, and the enemy want to blast it. We have therefore mustered as well as soldiers including women and chuldren to proctct th protect the lves levee."

These refugees said that from the other crevasse of a week or so ago the farms of the people in its path were unproductive for two or three years, the animals were scarce, the good fishes used for game were killed by the rush of flood waters, and the most fertile part of the country and world as is threatened with famine.

Oh if the enemy is co conquered in this war, what they depth they will have to pay if they wish mercy shown to them.

While the question of protecting Big Girl Knool and its surrounding districts was occupying the attention of the levee engineers and the governemnt of all states government of all states as well, the flood waters of the same bursted levees were hourly and by the minute making the situation more acute in the whole flooded region. Conditions in the southern state of Angeline vine gave Red Cross Officials the most concern for the flood there was spreading with alam alarming rapicity, inundating sixteen more towns and rapidly swelling the army of regu refugees. Peru city on the Mic-Ghirther Run River below Andertown was under from seven to fourty feet of water, with thirty three thousand refugees on the levee, and about thirty thousand more marooned in the very lowlands. The Red Cross was dispatching steamers to this town to remove the refugees.

Further westward the flood spread to Aurandico turning all small streams in that location into a big sea and the town of Bandico was flooded, and that from fifty five to eighty acres of land under Heidi County was being under three feet of water. Rescuers from Big Girl Knool and Lucillie Ricksen where the flood waters was still still receding slowly also co continued their search in the flooded area for refugees still reported clinging to house tops and trees. While the epidmecs were increasing from some of the Red Cross concentration camps, the Red Cross officles officials feared danger of them bei becoming a real plague because of the crowding in close quarters and therefore were taking steps to prevent any serious outbreaks.

Responding to a request of the governer of the State of peru the Red Cross headquarters directed the Big Girl Knool department to ship to Henrietta 125,000 unites of small pox vaccine, 345,000 unites of typohid vaccine, and 225,000 unites of sodium hypercholiride to other places to be used in northeastern Angeline vine State,

The Red Cross also sent at calls for all the nurses that could be spared. So acute had the problem o involving the rescus of so many to thousands of perons of the flood become that the directors of the disaster relief for the Abbiannian Red Cross telegraphed the national secretary to order fresh numbers of boats to proceed full speed to all river points to aid in saving thousands of men women and chilcren. The situation he declar eswas growing more seriously every hour. The reports of so many flood victims marooned on levees, o the roof on the roofs of houses, the spires of country churches, large mounds and other high places were coming in by wirlewireless, by telegraph, by telephone and messenger.

The flood waters which were still sweeping through the crevasse of the blasted Wickey Lansin levee tore away a wall of the Mic-_ollester and Calla _ompany building in Loop town and flooded one hundred thousand bales of v l valuable Cotton. The damage to the cotton goods, such as mens suits, shirts, underwear and all kinds of clothing for men women and children was estimated at one million six hundred thousand dollars, and damage to the building was about sixty thousand dollars. Rushing slowly but surely into this city at a rapid rate the rising waters had within two days covered all the streets of the city, and crept into the biggest buildings, and drove all the inmates of the St Gertrudes_p rphanga orphange of small children off the first floor to seek shelter on the second. All the city was in darkness at night as the power plants were flooded, and a cull was issued for help. or even another day later the water was still rising steadily and rupidly, and thereforethe warers was even creeping over the high embankments of railroad trucks cutting the town off railway communication.

It was therefore feared if the water would still continue to rise it may inundate all portions of the industrial sections, consisting of railroad shops, wardhouses, freight railway depots mills and all the resident homes. Therefore while the evacuation of practically every town was underway _amotor boats and trains rushes rushed people to safty before rushing torrents, the people of the city was advised to abandon their homes to seek safty for the flood would not stop in its rise. Five counties more had been flooded, and therefore with a continued rise thousands in the city fled to the upper floors of their homes, and a relief train leaving Ice Village loaded with flood refugees was wrecked by the enemy near the city, while six more towns werebeing flooded near by.

The Plantation of the high governer of the whole country of Angelinia and Calverinia combined in plauden County Angelina. Ine state regarded as the most beautiful in the state was being flooded as it lay directly in the path of the rushing torrent. and after a hurried survey of the flood tossed areas near Henrietta city Count De Biff returned to Big Girl Knool city on the 09 19th and assumed complete control of the relief organization. He brought harrowing stories of the horrors and suffering found between Albertinia and Big Girl Knool, and stopping at his hotel for only a fe few moments the Count proceeded immediately to Red Cross Headquarters where he was confronted with more reports of addition l levee breaks caused by the enemy during the last twenty four hours, and growing angry he denounced the Glandelinian nation in words and orations which though would be no sin at all to mention yet would not be found in any prayer book nevertheless.

Into the pages of the relief chart being worked out rapidly by Count De Biff was the printed accounts of the entire flood area in Calverinia and Angelinia, and the Count who had brought into existance one of the greatest war time relief organizations in all history in only a few weeks, declared with the other big flood from Lake Selicia and of the big forest fires, the job was not half started.

At this time fourteen new blu blasts of explosives whether dynamite or T.N.T were exploded to thr north of Big Girl Knool in the Mic-_irther Run in another levee at Polyknoles on the afternoon of the 20th of _ovember unleasing additional thousand thousands of tons of water on the doomed districts of St Bernads state. The river had been roaring through this levee break for a whole night tearing fiercely at the sides of the gaps made the day before, and yet Glandelinians soldiers were determined despite all resistance offered them to siden the gap by aid of pwerin powerful explosives to 2,000 yards as soon as possible which even would increase the present flood danger at Big Girl Knool. flood waters in the states of St Bernard and Peru and turmer and also Angeline yine and many other counties was now up to the roofs or over the roofs of houses far from the levees.

On the following morning each of these gaps broken in the levee on the 20th was from one hundred to a thousand feet side each, and every second many clumps of ground were tumbling down into the rushing torrent, widening and deepening the breaks, whole many men and even women worked and struggled madly to try and repair them with sand bags and even xo concrete and gravel and every kind of junk hu hauled from unflooded districts. But Glandelinians attacked them with the purpose of resorting to further dynamiting in their determination to make a single gap twenty two thousand yards long in the levee, a width of five hundred feet, necessary to stop all christian armies from advancing north tward Lieghburg Landing. The River gauge at Big Girl Knool was still standing stationary and it was believed that it will be several days before the full effect of the crevasse was felt there, but the workers and engineers were determined to hasten matters as much p as possible. yet at Big Girl Knool the enemy had discovered they were picking one of the most toughest and most strongly defended levees in the district for their dynamiting having lost six thousand in killed and wounded for their unsuccessful attempts so far.

The enemy too was not finding it so easy to blast away the tightly bound eart earth and sand bags of Levee number ten asctneybdid to the as further up the stream where they tore asunder a weaker barrier as if it had been so much sand.Between nineteen and twenty square miles of the beautiful Conversatory _un district was also badly flooded with the eater which still roarse d through the Wickey Lansin gap, the released waters having crept many miles even upstream from the break and further than a hundred to the west. For many miles the roads which only a few days before carried out the refugees could only now be located by the very tips of telephone and telegraph wire poles sticking out above the surface of the water. Sometimes the days diring and r during the flood dawned dark gray and rainy, or cloudy and snowy; and not withstanding the storms many curious seekers observed the full import of the desolation which had come to all flooded districts in the two countries.. But yet Big _irl _nool was not being touched as long as its main levee was protected, though further off from the city as far as eye can see from the top of high levees beside the gaps there stretched a real sea like expanse of moving waters. All kinds of water birds were to be seen whirl and swirl by countless thousands above the surface of the waters, eating their fill of the small l insects which had been driven from the ground and fall vegetation by the flood and have no where to light but most float on the waters or struggle unavailbly above them, untill some darting water bird with a shrill cry swoops down and has another bite to eat.

Gulls too of all kinds had congregated over the waste land like vultures. TThe Wickey Lansin levee break was also in front of Nelby _ostellio, and the many thousands of houses of the city were buried in swirling waters up to their very top floor windows, or small houses were entirely under water.

Many of the houses were even about to float away or half overturned, their foundations having been weakened by the rush of water, gree great green cisterns which before the flood stood upright in near flowered yards, were hot floating either like boats or upon their sides many miles from the spot theo they originally stood. In the center of the city its tall smokestack lifeless and futile standing like a sentinel told of its factory buried completely under water. This building was completely inundated by the waters and it might yet be swept entirely away. At the present northern limit of the city the water was a sample of what can happen to Big _irl _nool if the Glande Glandelinians succeeded it getting a twenty two thousand foot gap flowing. The main body of the flood water however was draining out tward the Mic- ollester Run River itself as was expected, and people in that neighborhood were working by hundreds upon hundreds of towns, all towns being out women and children including to heighten the levees of that river so that the flood would not fill that river with so much water as to cause a back flow which if water does back up would carry away every house of every town in the districts already flooded and endanger the towns of the Mic-_ollester Run districts as well with the river already recieving much of the water from the Lake Selicia catastrphoe or disaster.

The escaping waters at the Wickey Lansin , and other many gaps were already beginn beginning to dig channels for themselves at right angles from the Levee St John which protects the districts of Violet Lansin near the Mic- ollester Run River as could be seen from the foam and spray shooting fifty feet high over the dike where the torrents were gouging out a deep cut in the earth of the embankment which threw the water below upwards against the surface and made a continual roaring whirlpool of muddy waters, which if it caused this levee to give way would be therefore added immensely from the bigger river itself with sure disasterous results to Big _irl _nool and Henrietta and more so for Lucillie ricksen city the latter of which would be swept out of existance entirely.

One could gain some idea of the picture at this threatening new new break of a n ew river by imagining six healthy waterfalls from one hundred to six hundred feet high, laid on their sides along a levee and which at this point kept thousands of men women and children busy day and night, trying to keep portions filled in. Fortunately in this district no enemy was in sight for if blasting was begun here, the breaking of this levee would make gaps in the embankment which would let the waters of the Mic- ollester Run free to wreck its worse and probably cause a flood disaster which not even the most foolish of all readers would believe even for fiction. Scouting parties were busy in hundreds of thousands in the levee districts of this mighty river to ascertain that no enemy mining engineers were in sight, and also whether all stragglers were out of the doomed regions in front of the new threatening levee break, and men bearing photographing machines were not permitted to make pictures unless they proved by permits they were Abbieannians and not persons of foriegn nations as the aurthorities did not des ire any pictures of the disaster to reach the outside world if they could help it.

Many swift little ships mounted with one pounders in the bow and machine guns on the cabin top darted up and down this river, stopping ships flying foriegn flags, case that they would not unconsciously run into the peril and share the horrors of the flood and the cat captian of these foriegn fl ships were indeed very thankful saying that the Abbieannians have as much consideration forvforeigners as they had for themselves and their own. even foriegn c ships crew usually reported to levee guards by signal when ever they too saw Glandelinians moving to blast a levee near a spot where were disappointed however when they saw glandelinians blast a levee near a spot where a foriegn ship was stationed, but the Glandelinians themselves were disappointed, when the aynamite which explodes downwards, and maybe( sometimes not at all) encountered the touch clay and sand bags of the leves and sent puny yets of mud some fifteen to twenty feet skyward and splattered them till they looked like mud cookies of human shape and done no harm to the levee whatever. Observors however kept a respectful distance from the scene because as aurthorities adin admitted" Any person no matter what Nationalty they are would recieve a violent fire from these "landelinians if they were within range for the Glandelinians have become a sort which fespects no one or no flag whatever, and it seems even their own nowadays. The" city waited apprehensively to day on the 21 21th of November for work that the break a was not coming at its own levee but the enemy seemed to have kept shy of that one as it appeared to be too strongly guarded. The engineers in charge of the mining operations among theglandelinians declared to their commanders that they cannot gap about fourty of the biggest levees on the Mic-Whirther Run planned for creating a strong current in the flood and making the flood break through the weaker dikes of the river and other streams because they were too strongly guarded by the National army and that Vivianna was sending all soldiers to even risk flood perils to drive all landelinians at of that part of the country and with orders to take no prisoners. A natural break in a levee south of Big Girl Big Girl knool but a hundred miles distant created a new section of the flood but seemed to lower flood waters.

Another break occured in the Lemer Levee but it was only four hundred feet wide and it took a day for it to spread a eleven thousand foot stretch of flood waters, when a further widening was prevented by the plating of protective pilings and finally the leakage was stopped altogether.

To make the most desperate attempts to at this very time stop the enemy from increasing the flood which was nearing a monsterous proportions by this time was urged by Baron De Kalb on the 19ty of November before the oyal Flood control committe at Angelinia Agathia. Count De Iff who was one of the early advocates of the flood control measures demanded that the situation be made more dangerous to the enemy.

" Why should we powerful nationals allow the enemy to do this," he said." Yet even though it is more extensive this flood is not the greatest for loss in life caused. The flood at Lake Selicia is even now threatening to place more land under water and committin more damage than property and making a greater loss of life than any flood or even storm disaster in the history of our oly Nation. go let this be a warning that we will never forget as long as we live. The main danger fear is that if either this flood would undermine the levees of Mic-ollester Run which it is striving to do, or would form a junction with the mightier Lake Seclilca flood the deluge would destroy Big Girl knool and Angelinia Agathia, and if immediate action is not taken, the day won't be far away when the bigger river and Lake Selicia will add their flood waters to this Mic-Whirther Horror at the same time and Big Girl knool and Angelinia Agathia will be cities of the past. Therefore Abbieannia is called on to solve a problem that has balked all the nations of the whole world. No nation of the earth, have yet successfully met the big problem brought on by floods, but we Abbieannians are surely going to try it and do it first, and make it our effort to stop the enemy before they start a disaster that will paralize the the whole nation.

The Mic- ollester Run River has been long ago deepened and its levees are made with great spillways, and this should be done also with our other big rivers. My idea ought to be given more credit because of my thirty five years experience in levee construction and railroad grading, which indicates an experience in as well as knowledge of the cost of constructing spillways. From Mic- ollester city to the mouth of the Mic- ollester Run there is about three thousand nine hundred miles with an averag e fall of less than four feet per mile per hour. sometimes the fall is one foot per mile and the water moves most of the length of the river in sixty hours. The river is always full but it moves so rapidly and its channels are one good and its levees are so con structed that the river channel is sufficient even in rainy seasons in taking the water seaward, and though the river remains always deep enough for ship traffic its full length, it has happened permanently that countless millions of acres of land on oboth both sides of it in the richest valley in the world is free from natural dangers of floods as well from enemy blasting, for to blow up one of our levees would take more stores of explosives than would fill up every large room of a eight story building. And the spillways protect the levees from approach while cannons have no effect upon them. The levees of the Mic-whirther Run, and other rivers ought to have been constructed in the same way."

About two million, six hundred and fourty two thousand persons of the Mic-whirther Run flood alone, about only three hundred thousand of them in refugee camps were recieving aid from the Red Cross in the flood area while sixty five hundred acres of relief offices had been established, and ninty nine hndred trained red Cross disaster workers were were directing relief, rescue work and transportation which is being done by all boats available despite hinderance by enemies. Hundreds of doctors, thousands of nurses, and Nuns are in the field and many more are needed. More than a hundred thousand persons have been vaccinated against small pox, and also inoculated against typhoid, and hundreds o f thousands of dozes of quinine given as a preventive of swamp fevers and malaria.

IN nearly all the refugee camps a terrible plague of small pox has spread with unusual rapidty among the flood refugees and an epidemic of other diseases has threatened accord ing to Gertrude Angeline the little girl heroine who came to Angelinia Agathia in braving the perils of the flood to get vaccine and aint-typhoid serum. Angelinia Aronburg decided to return to Big Girl Knool as soon as possible where the main danger of a plague was feared i with one hundred thousand smapp small pox points and many thousands of unit units of typhoid prophylaxis. she said twenty thousand persons mostly children suffer ing from small pox were discovered in many districts of the city itself. and this was in the lower sections where the inhabatants were marooned in the second story windows!

The 22 of November came and the Aronburge Run River flood waters reassembling from the flooded lowlands of northeresstern Angeline vine to advance upon the other southern sections and south central portions of the State of Local Knool still had failed to encompass Henretta and Big Girl "nool too was not menanced. Local b levee board officials said the main big embankments would hold as the masses of citizens and soldiers continued their desperate fight to hold back the onemy; but it was feared that at Heidi Levee the work men were losing the fight to save the Heidi swamp lands for the enemy had made some disfigurement and the water was pouring through ..

The vast sea of waters from the Wickey Lansin and other bursted dikes covering northern Angelinia and southern Calverinia state or countries was creeping steadily south and westward tward the delta of the Mic-Whirther Run, as the waters rolled over sixteen other districts. It was feared that within another few days the big sea would cover more than sixteen more districts stretching far from the northern boundary of the Angelinia country and southwestward to the Mic-Whirthian seas, an area more of six hundred and twenty two miles long and ranging from fifty to two hundred miles wide untimately driving about two hundred thousand more people from their homes.

Rescue work and rencue fleets of any kind of boats that could be secured were operating in all sections which the flood was freshly engulfing removing many hundreds and thou thousands from their homes and from levees and tree tops and the tops of floating rafts and houses around which the waters already whirled and tossed them aboiud, while too many thousands to state here were making for nigh land over lands that will in a few hours be inundated. Ever since the floofd flood in every instance no matter where refugees were pickedcup or where they were fleeing and seeking refuge they reported of being fired on in ambush and rp proofs of this was certain when many of the inhabatants were treated for bullet wounds, even children, rescuers, and Red Cross workers, nuns and priests. It was therefore considered by the aurthorities as the greatest our outrages of the entire war, and the " No quarter " command was being pressed to the utmost to the military hunting out sniping Glandelinians.

More than 2,000,000 acres was now included the in the vast sea when the torrents moving southward and northward and as well westward, three directions entirely because of its tremendous depth would reach the delta.. Coming from the highest hi ls hills in the nearest region of flood hill signal stations along the river reported that the whole middle northern state of Angelinia and the country of southern Calverinia as far as eye could observe was covered so deep with water that only the tops of the tallest trees protruded, and only the roofs of the highest houses and church steeples could be seen and not even the tops of the highest telegraph and telephone poles in the farming areas where the agricidla agricultural lands existed could not be seen.

section was included even though the flood seemed drawn slightly away from Lucillie Ricksen, but still more threatened Gloriannia. The comission of the farming districts claimed that the added loss would go over the ten to twenty million dollar loss loss to the agricultural industury of the whole nation. no surprise the nation still more the enemy again succeeded in breaking down another levee and this rampart to crumble was on th the mainB ayou Bayou La Matador, and the breach rapidly widening caused before noon on the 22th a stream of water ten to fifteen feet deep, and six hundred yards wide which roared down upon five other districts in the St martin district.

This new break followed another enemy made crevasse on Algoria ,u nction on an extension of the Bayou La Matanor st system, and ended a fight against foe and flood of more than two weeks to save the embankments from destruction. shortly before or after the break there, flood relief Dictator George Adelsheid, at the town of the same name was informed there had been a break by blasting at the Levee callbe called Bordens. this was at first denied by some scouting parties who came from that region who said that while the landelinians had driven off the workers and defenders after a long and bloody fight and the town was deserted the landelinians had nevertheless not succeeded in bursting the levee as they found themselves under cannon fire of grape and canister about two hundred yards away from the embankment, and many lost their lives before they were forced to flee.

The workers had been defeated by the attack of the landelinians and so long had been the continual attackers that even the workers had become disheartened and exhausted, one of the scouts said, but had been forced by overwhelming numbers to give up their efforts to save the town and country side. With landelinians peppering them with grape and canister from a little knoll and attacking them incessantly in overwhelming numbers and and without their own ammunition ru ing running out and their numbers being sadly depleted by their losses they were compelled to quit the fight and retreat. But unknown to both sides, a force of chris An soldiers had placed a machine gun batterswithin easy range of the levee andwhen the blandelinians had succeeded in driving off its defenders and seemed to have an open chance to plant explosives a hot from from that place of concealment, surprised them in flank and they were routed, by the fire which threatened to annihilate them. The Levee ureau at Big Girl Knool warned that the breaks along the other sections would not remendy the situation along the main stream levee close by although it reiterated the statement that some of the nut natural formed crevasses because of explosion shocks would prevent the river from exceeding a stage of thirty six feet here, which would even allow the flood to flow over the levee and regorge ghthe Aronburgs Run iver with disasterous results.

The sweep of the waters escaping from the bursted levees was also taking them into five other districts dangerously close to Big Girl Knool each of these districts of which are large producers of even sugar cane and wheat, and all kinds of farm crops and each of which was in the beautiful Conservatory Run country, made famious by the beautiful seas of every flower ever known in the world not growing wildly but cultivated also, with beautiful snow capped mountains far off in the distance and the magnificent scenery observed from the extensive Gloriannia heights.

The flood rushing into the Sunbeam reek turni ng that into an inland lake was still continuing to rise in the location of the town of Aurandecullio junction even on the 22th and all smaller branch streams were forced to back up their lengths to a considerable distance causing many hundreds of families to move off from their homes. and farms.

Basements of the big packing and other plants located in some of the towns closest to the stream were filled with water and considerable damage was already done to all other business establishments in the low lands. But it was hopee and believed that already the crest or uprise of the flood had been nearly reached. and that no further greatdamage, was to be expected here. even though down state points reported the flocf- flood still rising. and that the Angeline Run river itself had risen six f feet above its normal stage in flood time. In this district of the Bayou La Matador the rescue fleet concentrate concentrated in the flood zone stated that the enemy had placed or cause four other levees there to be in a extremely critical situation, and that if they did any more dynamiting a new crevasse might occur at any moment. The head of the Red Crosste legraphed of the Red Cross telegraphed that the fiercest defense of the levee guards did not drive the enemy off, and that also because of the floods roaring from the Wickey Lansin break a hundred and seventy five thousand more were in danger of being rendered homeless.

It was already resulting in the addition of one hundred and sixty five thousand refugees to the more than three million already driven from their homes by the flood. including of the millions also homeless because of the second big flood from Lake Solicia and the big forest fires burning rientown and many other placesplaces.

The awful new break in the levee guarding the Conservatory Run districts which was releasing a p part of the inland sea into the Aronburgs un and spreading over Conservatory Run changing that beautiful stream into a fierce lake was causing the greatest concern, and mperor vivian sent many aurtnorities to investigate and find out whether General Viviannia was doingbhis level part to stop the enemy and drive the foe out of the region, or whether the flood also was frustrating his attempts.

Grave apprehension was felt for another twenty five mile stretch of le ue levee along the Heidi Bend section of the Bayou La Matador where it was said a hundred thousand soldiers had defended the levee in a battle of a days duration killing and wounding fourty six thousand glandelinians, and recieving a loss to their own side of over thirty six, with ten generals down, and the landelinians victorious forcing the soldiers to abandon the embankment. Before the conflict the waters of the flood had mounted to within a few inches of the tops of the embankment and at points trickling over, and it was said after the conflict that general Memphis who commanded the nationals held a truce with the enemy, asking the rebel commander for at least mercy on the inhabatants of the villiages around, and that he replied that if it can be fully proven within two days that no monsterous column of christian armies were not advancing by that route within fifty miles the levee would be spared. but not otherwise, and that the people of the towns might as well take the opportunity while there is yet time and leave their homes right away. The effect of this bloody levee pa conflict was problematical, and because the christians were beaten, and the rebel general gave no satisfaction, the Big Girl Knool weather bureau itself renewed its warning that every precautionary measureshould be taken along that section of the Aronburgs un where that levee was situated.

The crest of tye flood was still in the Conservatory un Run basin that day of the 23th moving slowly westward, southward and also northward, and a little to the southeast besides. It remained stationary at Little Ricksen, but was rising again at Gloriannia and even Mic- ollester City was threatened, besides Bepoo Lansin reported a depth of ten feet in her highest streets.

Different opinions was expressed as to the course of the water the terrible flood wo would take. The levee Engineers reported tothe government as to the course the main flood would take, and these engineers and scouts said that not even the natural drainage systems and other streams could not take care of the flood, and that even as far south as that town the city of Gertrude Angeline a big town of a million inhabatants gave reports hundreds of thousands were being marooned on their second story e windows and three hundred houses were wrecked and 10,000 swept away, Angeline unction was wrecked and half devastated, the Angeline un was an inland ocean by this time and the lowest portions of the city of Marcuelan was entirely under water. It was hoped that this portion of the flood which was even flooding Trot city to the very house tops would flow into the turkey Bayou turn return of Adele Bayou and then flow down the Angeline Basin into the stretch of the Mic-Hollester Run which would at that point without further disaster draw the flood into the sea. But the flood turned off entirely and and headed for the Erminie Creek starte starting that river into an inland sea and complicating the disaster far and wide so that Mom Bombi city, was flooded anew, and the bridge at the famious battle of Erminie Creek was in danger of being washed away as the waters was above its flooring.

The crevasse of the Wickey Lansin levee was said to be about five hundred feet wide, and 10,000 feet longer with a stream of water as large as a mile wide river flowing through tward the main flood. At the El Matador Bayou the work had been abandoned at other levees where before the pressure of the flood danger of inundation occured and though there was said to be no danger of the water forcing its way through because of the strength of the levee nevertheless the levee would be covered. This levee surrounde surrounded by the flood as well as many others by this time was about a quarter of a mile from Conservatory Run Town and one hundred and fifty miles from Angelinia Agathia. Elswehre as far up as Big Girl Knool the dan er threat was not so great, but nevertheless the flood was continuing its rise between Big Girl Knool, and Albertinia.

FLOOD HIT- HITS NORTHERN CALWERINIA CLOSE TO AVYSSINKILIAN BOUNDARY LINE.

It was reported that because of some dike blown asunder of the Norma un river that all low land between Springfield city near the Abyssinkilian Boundary, and Mic-Whirther Janet a distunce of two hundred and sixty miles were under flood waters of the Norma Run with six thy sixty thousand families driven from their homes, but sum desperate measurees was taken to prevent further flooding that it was believed that no more places would suffer, and that the flood was receding, and emptying its waters into the sea.

About one hundred and seventy five miles north of Big Girl Knool at the levee known as the vidalia embankment which stretched a hundred miles long, there was great expectatio expectations of many breaks caused by landelinians and that the levee before the blasting would collaspe at any time allowing the most tremendous rush of the muddy waters across the whole country nirth of Big Girl Knool where most of the nations most expensive wheat and grain were already stacked up for harveet. ord from that section came to Adj- general Ben Hendro pedroes and said that there were nevertheless many brigades of soldiers with field and machine guns ready to defend the levee at any time, and that the desperate fight had not been given up, and at the Big Bend of the same levee where even the heo heoric efforts of all citizens men women and children of all ages had been concentrated to bolster the rampart to make it stronger, work and fighting still continued. But should the enemy succeed in making the crevasses here it was believed that then the straining on the remainder of the long levee would be so strong as to cause all of it to give way which would let out nearly the whole of the flooded river at that section and then surely the flood of Lake Solicia would be united and that the waters of the later would deepen the former flood so that even Big Girl Knool would be entirely under water and beautiful Angelinia Agathia porothy Vale and other cities also. But sofar the brave and desperate defense of this long levee was preventing the danger so as to give great hope, but that it oul could be said nevertheless that one break of the levee at Bayou Des Palo would cause such a torrent of water as to continually undermine the levee and then i within a day millions of acres of new land would be inundated, which would flood a hndred towns, and drive another dllion from their homes to refugee camps. rescue fleets of great size had been mobolized in the danger zone so that no loss of life would occur.

Gloriannia city itself remained inundated by the waters and precautions had been taken at Lucillie Ickson as the flood began anew to rise there but it was hoped it would would again recede before property loss would be great. Many more citizens seeing the new rise moved again their house hold goods to higher floors, others had remained on the upper stories ever since more than two weeks ago, when the levee in the river front seemed to be overtopped by the flood waters.

The crest of the two immense floods, the Mic-Whirther Run disaster, and the Lake Selicia flood horror were both moving tward Angelinia Agathia city on the 22th itself, one increasing from the new breaks in the Bayou La Matador levee and other points, and the other increased from pulling out some torrents from the Cubin Lord and Dennis Quarter Levees in nor h northwest Angelinia state which were washed out from the river edge by the Lake Selicia flood whose current was tremendous beyond measure and the latter moving far ahead of the first flood was due to run into the Angeline Run Rier River between the 22th and 24th of ovember and that because of this danger the inhuvatants of that city, and Angelinia Agathia were making all preparations to either flee to go to the tops of the highest buildings in the cities. The waters of the distant flood from Lake Selicia spreading over wider territory and longer territory by this time than the first flood did, was deepening as it went over large hollows and lower meadow plains being the deepest flood of all and that scores of big towns and hundreds of hamlets were either entirely under water or had been washed clean away and that big cities re was said to have suffered the brunt of the terrible disaster. The first flood flood also spreading was still rising at a rate of five inches of twenty hours and all levee engineers were watching anxiously fearing both floods would make a junction near Henrietta from the latter was reported only eighteen miles away from the first.

These triple disasters, two immense floods in the same month, and a enormous forest fire wchih wh wiped out the cities of Prinetown, Schloeder town and Perryville, and a score of others, and which had burned over a hundred and fifty miles of forests, so far, drove christian armies under Concentinian Aronburg before it, rendered a million others homeless, and marooned flood victims from being able to leave flooded homes bec because of burning on forested country at the edge of the flood, was drawing the horrified attention of all nations of the world, and causing the Abbieannian government to be paralized with horror and indignation.

Count De Biff came again to Big Girl knool for a lively and exciting conference not only on relief measures be but to debate on the three enormous world breaking disasters, after which he would go to Angelinia Agathia to confer with Gloriania flood dictator of the Mic-Whirther Run and the finiancial committe in that state on the renteration of homes and towns. A $100,000,000 financiance corporation for restoration of farmers in all point points of the two floods was formed at Angelinia Agathia and began functioning immediately.

Thre the Count and his followers severely criticized general Manley and the other Glandelinian generals and the Glandelinian government in general for their refusal to recall all the Glandelinians who were doing their vandal work in the flooded regions, and of their efforts to prevent the provision of relief for the Lake Selicia and Mic-Whirther Run flood regions and flood and fire refugees. He declared eleven of the highest of the Glandelinian aurthorities had approved of the horrors, saying it was the only way to bring the " Christian dogs" to subi submission. The abbiegnnian govermemtn was doing all it could, and Count De Biff pointed out that more than $100,000,000 more was given to even the Lake Selicia sufferers as one reason for quick government action and that the enemy was striving to hinder this relief work also. The Emperors secretary contended that nothing was being left undone that can be done but Count De Biff said"

He " He is wrong. Though the Royal chamber is assembled and money to immense sums have been given out so that the starving, suffering people can be relief, and refugeed and epidemics can be prevented and minimized the Glandelinians are trying their level best to prevent this, and to make matters worse every day are firing upon refugees, refugee camps, Red Cross stations, and increasing the horror in every other way they can. I do not believe the flood is made to stop advance of christian armies as armies have never been seen in the flooded regions and Evans big army was at Lieghburglanding on October the 15th, with the Vivian Girls, and because of so much communications cut off neither he, the Vivian girls or Emperor Hanson vivian knows a thing of the floods. His brother tried to notify him and cannot get him or his daughters on any wire, and to notify by wireless in that region for some region or other seems impossible too. About all the government has been able to do most of all is no to furnish tents and boats. People cannot eat tents or boats. Emperor vivian has many of his secretaries on the ground including myself and to hungry and drowning persons all we could do was but just bring the small consolation that they will be rescued but they must starve in consequence. Why? Because the enemy wreck provision trains, robb rob the stations of the food provisions and do all other acts of vandalism so that now Emperor Vivian has to remain at Angelinia Agathia for a whole and place the army he formerly had under the command of general Hore Francis Vivianis and have them guard all approaches to the floods in every direction so food provision trains can pass true. I've heard that the whole world is astonished at the magnitude of these disasters, and the King of Protestentia had told Emperor Vivian by wireless;

" Your Gracious Majety, you are not contending with an enemy of a nation, you are opposing a wicked rebellion against God Himself and the whole world of christianity in general."

Whether that is true or not I do not say can be proved but I for one believe it with my whole heart and soul."

The "levee basis was to probably form the basis of the governments future flood control policy in every state of big rivers and streams, and mountain lakes and dams during the war in the opinion of the Secretary who passed through Big Girl knool city en route to Henrietta city by boat to discuss with members of all River commissions the problem of making spillways for every dike and to have immense guards on every dike and of also bridling the stream so it will be impossible for the enemy to cause floods in the near future.

" It is certain" the secretary said" that the one dllion one hndred million dollars heretofore given by the nation for flood relief will have to be increased as well as for the refugees of the big forest fire. Just how much it will have to be increased, we will now be able to determine untill our study is completed. But this disaster is the greatest on record for all big disasters ever known the world over."

Under the pressing of steadily rising waters of the main flood against or rushing fiercely along side at a rate of twenty miles an hour and even hurling wreckage and floating houses occasionally against them, the levees of the Mic-Hollester Run facing the sea waters were still holding on the 23th, but with dire warnings that a crevasse might occur at any hour if the flood should wash the levee away. Ever since the flood extended as far as that levee of the new river hundreds upon hundreds of men women and children, soldiers, and laborers also from many towns and even cities, filled sanbags sandbags with iron gravel and sand and earth to prevent the side sweep flow of the flood from undermining the levee, and also to top and rise the extensive dikes between Abbieann, and Mic-Hollester junction an extent of one hundred and twenty five miles, and also on the west side where the Lake Selicia flood was sweeping for some distance along side.

The flood relief headquarters at Mic-Hollester Junction city were notified that not only did the big flood strive to enter the river by tearing away the levee but was even nearly reaching the top of the long dikes, the height of the flood being thirty feet higher already than the river itself, and army engineers believed that even if the flood waters would be cascading over the top and entering the river below if a crevasse did not occur before then, it would not help the flood matters much and might start the river itself to commit a rampage of its own, and increase the extent of the flood. So nearly five hundred persons were and han had been working day and night in their effort to gh greatly heighten the levees and to prevent the levees from being washed asunder by the speed of the torrent along their sides. Lice stock in the newly threatened area had already been moved to safty, and all residents from a score of towns had been moved to higher ground, except the hundreds of thousands of men, adding women and children, who sent out early in the week the words," If the levee goes out before the side swipe of the Mic-Whirther flood it will go out with us on top of it."

While outside the area plans had been gone forward for immediate relief in event of a crevasse, or in event the water goes over the top and raises the river to flood proportions, the citizens have delcared they might be able to hold back the flood waters, as this region for hundreds of miles up and down the river is too full of h christian camps to have enemy engineers around to blust the dikes. Rescue fleets have been concentrated at all stragic points.

A crevasse at the threatened dikes, or the overtopping of them by the flood would cause much of the flood waters within the next twenty four hours to be diverted down a portion of the Mic-Hollester Run country side and valley, bringing on a second Lake Selicia horror thus redoubling the disaster, while it would bring no relief whatever to the Mic-Whirther Run Flood districts and increase the flood there only.

A tremendous small pox epidemic in the Mic-Whirther Run flood section in all states was continually feared by Red Cross relief workers because evidence showed the enemy snipers tried to frus frustrate this also. Two hundred thousand small pox c vaccine points and as many small pox and typoh typhoid serum taken twara the region by a number of Red Cross workers to a camp containing a hundred thousand refugees of which they had charge was captured by the enemy to be used by the Glandelinians themselves. The Red Cross officials were taken prisoners and murdered. Rising waters still from the horrible Wickey Lansin Break compelled the necessity of the evacuation of all refugees concentrated in refugee camps and boats and snips removed them under severe fire to a christian army protected town known as Jennie's Burg, Sardinia, and Messinia.

The crest of the flood as along the edge of the Embelonia State on the 23th and moving slowly also tward Angelinia Agathia, whose inhabutants expected its coming to be within another two or three days, if the second flood does not beat it. From Angoria thousands upon thousands continued their desperate work to hold of evenemy blasters and and to strengthen the levees and heighten them in preparation for the final assault of the flood as the waters from the numerous bursted levees of both the Aronburgs Run and Mic-Whirther north of there returned to the stream by way of the Angeline Run which moves into the Mic-Whirther Run from the southwest.

The ship ment of huge supplies mostly in f ood that would place sixty four flood relief concentration centers on a six weeks ration reserve basis, were said to have been captured by a horde of landelinian vandals but retaken by a squadron of Concentated Domdobian cavarly which destroyed half the glandelinian force and captured their main commender. The Red Cross held large forces into in two Vivian state istricts where the breaks in the leyees had added the one hundred thousand homeless persons extra. Rededing waters however in the older inundated sections had brought up the pri problem of rationing all points so that when boat and ship transportation was no longer possible there would be enough food to feed the refugees untill high ways and bridges could be made safe for travel, but the problem went all ammies when this section was found barricaded by a vast glandelinian army under the command of general Richardson Tamerline and Hellfrey Adelsheid. The command rightly belonged to general Phellinia Tamerline who was at glandelinia city holding a war council with the aurthorities of the rebel war Department.

The o continued contributions to the two flooded regions and forest fire districts fr for relief fund wa was said to have passed the billion mark but with the ornormous legions of refugees far beyond original estimates, and which seemed but were not at all exaggerated, and destructive forest fires by scores, and terrific devastating explosions adding to the death list and awful suffering, the Red Cross Official said all the money sent by the Nation could do no good. The total so far contributed, was one billion nine hundred and ninty nine million, nine hundred and sixty five thousand dollars.

Reports to the Red Cross headquarters es i estimate the explosion dead at Lake Selicia from the towns wrecked at nearly thirty to dixty thousand more, and a death list of one million seven hundred from flood fire, and exposure and those who frose to death, where winter at that se : section was coldest being further nort west.

The federal National loan committee declared that to refugee and take care of all the fugitives would about break one third the Nation, and that steps were taken as quickly as possible to take out a two fold program of levee explosion prevention and to provide better shipping accomodations for all districts not injured by disaster, and that all home guards and national guards would be sent from every state to reinforce those defending levees and river courses.

On the 24th of November the powerful dikes threqtened by the flood along the edge of the Mic-Hollester Run was strengthened by the hundred thousands who worked day and night on shifts and news came that the two big flood crests were spreading further and apart that no junction now seemed inevitable. But nevertheless the residents of man cities bent evero desperate effort to the task of reinforcing the Mic-Hollester Run embankments holding back the flood waters from entering the bigger river. The crest of the Lake Selicia inundation south of aymond ville with a narrow ridge seperating it from the Mic-Whirther Run flood was spreading further while i s its northern limits usaid to be draining began to freeze over. But the crest still deeper than usual but slightly narrowing was rushing southwestward in the same course as the first to meet with the waters of Angeline Run which was overflowing because of the floods already reaching there, and this section of the flood had moved upon Roy and el orrio but at both places the waters had only attained a height of seven feet at the deepest spots indicating that the worse of the flood had passed that district, but Gertrude Angeline city all but the biggest buildings was completely engulfed.

The second flood of the Mic-Whirther Run itself moving on a same course but increasing its width had already swept over the whole peru and other states and spread a hundred miles east of Angeline junction, and these waters had covered thirty counties and hundreds of districts or at least 10,668,999 acres of land, and Angeline Junction city and Mombi, and also Betsy Bobbin were under fourteen to twenty feet of water, and all the remaining inhabatants marooned on house tops and taird or four story windows, and far out of reach of rescue because of the speed of the flood at this point. Fortun ately expecting the waters the stores had transported their provisions to all upper floors of big buildings so that no starvation was feared here, and no other peril as long as the flood would not rise high enough to engulf the highest structures. The Highest water mark in Angeline yine state was at the town by the same name, and only the steeple of the highest churches and the stories of the biggest buildings showed above water, while all the inhabutants were gone. 10,000 weaker houses of this town were carried away by the flood.

More than six hundred bodies of persons were found in the town of Nevada because of the levee explosion of Lake Selicia which drowned so many persons and yet this town was far out of reach of either floods but nevertheless felt the effect of the blast. The entire section of the city facing the direction of tye explosion was practically torn out by the sudden air waves, and within another day six hundred bodies hadobeen removed from the ruins. All of the bodies have been identi identified. About one thousand towns were wrecked or had been wrecked and ten thousand damaged and all windows of surviving houses gone out. Thevmedicial situation there was well in hand with more doctors and nurseson the scene than needed which were sent to the flood zone. Nevada city a town of approximately 100,000 population had about four hundred doctors and this number was greatly increased by near by towns who which only were shaken by the concussion. The Red Cross and Abbiannia, Bondinia, and Calverinia railroad also dispatched do t doctors and Red Cross nurses to the scene. News came of the great numbers killed by the concussion at perryville and schlosdertown but as fire and flood cut off all communications nothing much could be heard as the refugees were gone. The estimate of the dead in evada town was made by one of the Red Cross workers, who said that when all the wreckage and debris would be removed the tollwould surely increase. About two thousand injured all badly hurt were being treated in the emergency hos hospitals and stations, when other hospitals were taxed beyond their capacity.

The overner of the Tumbler state arived at the scene, and made a survey of the situation, while a relief organization was made also and a committee named to make an official survey of the explosion shock area.

The news of this disaster may be as follows;

Lucillie Ricksen . State of urmer. November the 24th.------

By International News service ofvAbbiannia and world-----

More than six hundred and fifty people were killed and hundreds injured many fatally, in concussions and rains of glass and falling buildings which affected parts of the state to on the 13th according to meager reports just able to come in, and which filtered into Luci llie Ricksen to day. As telephone and telegraph service to every place is cut off and as perry Ville, Schlosdertown and other places also were wrecked by the explosion, which razed the ernormous Levee at Lake Selicia it is believed that the dead and injured lists will mount to the thousands as the other districts are heard from. A second flood or ernormous prope proportions have resulted, which wiped out many towns, and a report from evada city struck by the concussion places the death list at six hundred, with approximately three thousand four hundred injured, one thousand seven hundred of them fatally and seriously.Many others are dead and some also fatally injured as a toll of the forest fires broughtbon by the explosion that is sweeping half the state, and burning through, the Heid, christian, Stbann, urmer, and Grove counties. A large number of fire rangers have been killed by falling trees or trapped in the fires. The big city of Irlenetown in christian County, is being completely laid waste by the fire as well as perryville and schlosdertown, but few lives were lost as most of the inhabatants escaped on time by boat boats and trains. There were quite a few drowned in a panic on the piers caused by intense heat started over the area by the fire even though ten twelve miles away. It is reported a section of the Mic-Hollester Woods is catching, and that the forested slopes of the Vivian Hills is in danger."

sixteen deaths believed caused by breaking and falling glass into the streets among crowds tching the fire still burning on the docks near the river, and numerous injuries, and operty damage estimated at two million six hundred thousand dollars, and ten big fires ich cost more millions in damage, and furniture in all houses playing off insane if you wish to imagine it that way, and of all weak wooden houses. suffering from St vitus dance, and Irish jigg disturbances were charged up on the 28th against the sudden concussion of the Levee explosion at Lake Selicia which affected the city on the 13th of ovember, all of which affected the city and its its surburbs. The explosion a vibla t blast from somewhere in the far west, where other explosions had wrought havoc in four other states was accompanied throughout the city by a terrific down pour of newly broken window glass. As the water had receded the streets had been entirely free, and on the thirteenth street car and elevated and citybrailroad traffic was jammed during the rush hour by debris in streets, all other traffic has brought almost to a standstill, and twenty railway trains were blocked for three hours. The rear or front ends of wa o wagons danced the charlestown for several moments, church steeples swayed back and forth, trees were shattered, and uprooted in many sections of the city, signs were hurled down, all plate glass windows recently mende mended were smashed, houses unroofed, telepho telephone and light poles and wires shan shaken off their fastenings or foundations, and many were injured by flying debris and broken glass.

The head Matron of the Mc ertenquevOp orphange at Exchange street was in the Homes h hospital in a serious condition from injuries recieved, when a heavy iron beam crashed through the roof of the home on the top floor at which she had been at the moment of which same beam hurled a torrent of plaster and laths upon the whole room of children causing panic which brought on o injuries to many.

The Matron worke working for the Mother Superior of the Home Sister Margie was intertaining the children up on that bed room floor when the heavy iron beam shaken from the Allentor building under construction alongside the Childrens Orphan Home crashed through the roof of the Home during a ten story plunge. The Home lost all its windows and a hundred children were injured. A little girl whose name was Jannie Genni and her brother James, both six and seven, and five playmates were cut and g bruised by falling bricks and glass when while leaning out of a window in their interest to watch the rush of flood waters in the river running past the main city, when a chimney was hurled from the roof of their home above the window by the same b a beam which struck upon and through the roof. Another little girl and two of her boy playmates suffered severe cuts when a large window pane below which they were standing was blown in by the air waves created by the blast, while the attendant William Feidtia was also cut by the falling glass, while he was playing with them with a big rubber ball ball which he had bought for them. All the other children were injured from plaster shaken from ceilings of other rooms, but their injuries were only cr scratches small qu cu cuts and bruisies.

The head health commissioners of every big city north or south went to Angelinia Agathia on their return trip from an inspection of the two great flood districts from the river and Lake Selicia with reports of a serious health and sanitation situation as Angelinia Agathia neared its quota of seventeen million seventeen million five hundred thousand fresh relief fund.

"Three million people from the Mic-Whirther Flood alone have been driven from their homes, and 10,000,000 are homeless because of the Lake Seclisia and Orientown forest fire and explosion disasters." one of them said. "The water supplies are polluted and much exposure h has resulted from the sudden change of living conditions and something desperate must be done for them before winter really starts in next month. For the many legions who have refused to go to concentration camps fo food supplies have been placed in upper stories and are liable to become contaminated. Countless thousands of bodies of dead animals such as pigs horses cows and the like are floating around, and when the flood recedes or freezes over during the recession these will first be frozen into the ice so they cannot be removed and therefore left in the fields to decay in the coming summer. Thousands are marooned on rafts. When people return to what homes are left to them everything will be water soaked and the situation is indeed desperate, as where shores are within reach of refugees forest fires cut them off from escape. Health must be guarded for months after the flood has receded."

At that time the concussion of the explosions at Lake Selicia was considered the only angency that would have been able to wreck other levees had it continued more longer for the shocks through some mystery of its power had for ten seconds lashed some sections of the flood waters near Big Girl Knool into great fury. yet the concussions did not worry the huge engineering crews who still were making their desperate stands on the remaining levees to save nine hundred million dollars worth of property menanced by the Mic-Hollester levees should the flood overtop them. However the embankments had been raised from two to six feet to meet the predicted crest, and the soft dirt boarded pavements and sand bags holding it in place were being hammered by waves of the flood caused by high southwinds with ruinous regularity along three hundred miles of critical fronts.

The explosion shock though it did not committ extreme havoc at Big Girl Knool nevertheless committed enough to cause excitement. Fearing the remainder of the iron scaffolding of the building near the orphan asylum would fall on pedestrians the police established a guard over the street and halted all traffic at Exchange street. The round stand of the Horse Racing plant on the outskirts of the city, which seated a total of sixty thousand was hurled bodily up by the concussion, and churled more than one hundred feet from its foundation. Serious damage was done to many race tracks, all the stables were demolished. In Red Rose Park the entire circus camp was shake down. The owner had refused to give the customary circus performances fearing wheath and flood conditions, and no one therefore was injured. But the circus employes repo the greatest difficulty in preventing a stampede of the hundreds of big elephants with the show.

At the Big Girl Knool balcon field two miles west of the city and a mile from the edge of the big flood on the Big Girl Knool Road were seriously damaged and three hundred and fifty huge expensive balcons and one big airship got away. One of the army aroeplanes there also was hurled up to the top of the roof of a temporary hanger by the peculiar freak of the concussion wrecking in this fashion both the machine and the structure. A huge eletric sign on the Aberdinia Religious theater which only shows scenes of the Bible at fourty second and Algrot street was hurled down and blocked surface lines for an hour, much of the greatest damage by the concussion was of broken glass, and greenhouses in the city will have to be completed refitted with glass.

A five story building at 1167 Exchange avenue because of the concussion teetered for about eighty hundred seconds before it shrugged itself into a mighty tremor of its own and tumbled down into a dusty pile. Yet hundreds of lives had been saved, and the crash became a miracle among all these war disasters with no fatality and only six seriously injured.

The feeble warning of a few falling bricks, cracked panes of glass, and a shiver in the side of the wall during the concussions attracted the attention of a po policeman and he suddenly gave the signal rushing up and down the isles commanding every one inside to get out at once. He run to the fourth and fifth floor repeated his signal and down to the third second und first. Then just as the last were believed out, the building which was weakened by the concussion at some portion of its foundation toppled forward and inward and smashed down flat, fifth floor on first into a solid mass of crushed tow stone into a dust swirl of bricks and motur. Once again the miraculous entered in. For the concussion which caused the collapse and therefore endangered the lives of four hundred in the building all residents and men women and children was the same factor which saved the lives hundreds of them this time. The east of the building seperated
